AUTHOR OF "THE ARTICLED CLERK'S MANUAL" ETC. ETC.

THIRD EDITION.

ADVERTISEMENT TO THE THIRD EDITION.

THE AUTHOR submits a Third Edition of the Lexicon to the profession and the public. Several additions have been made, the text has been revised, the alterations in the law since the last edition have been noted, and the references to statutes have been brought down as nearly as possible to the date of publication, Hilary Term, 1864. In preparing this edition, the Author has been assisted by G. H. COOPER Esq. of the Inner Temple, and R. SEARLE Esq. of the Middle Temple.

ADVERTISEMENT TO THE SECOND EDITION.

THE TEXT of the previous edition has been revised, the citations verified, and the law, in all its branches, exhibited to the best of the Author's ability in accordance with the most recent Statutes, Cases, Rules, and Orders. Many articles have been rewritten, others inserted, and all emended. A great number of terms and phrases has been added, more especially those which relate to Civil, Mercantile, and International Jurisprudence, and to the Hindu and Mussulman juridical systems, as administered in India; as well as those which have been invented to supply the exigencies of modern developments. The size of the book is therefore enlarged, but it is hoped not uselessly, as the purpose has been to preserve a due medium between a scanty vocabulary of mere words, and a prolix cyclopædia of exhaustive discussions, that the work may render concise information upon the given subject, and become a servicable auxiliary to further knowledge by indicating the locality of its sources.

Should this purpose have been even approximately attained (for perfection in such an undertaking is impracticable), every care and labor, every anxiety and fatigue, will have been gratifyingly rewarded.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION.

It is not without very considerable diffidence that this Lexicon is submitted to the indulgence of the Profession and the Public, for no man can be more conscious of the difficulties besetting such a subject—of the many requisites of the task—and above all, of the great discrepancy usually exhibited between what a book ought to be, and what it is—than the Author of the present undertaking. Knowing, however, from his own experience, the want of a Dictionary especially adapted to ready reference, which should contain the modern law and alterations, as also the terminology comprehended in our varied and intricate jurisprudence, was the inducement to commence, continue, and complete this work. The aims attempted, throughout its arrangement, have been compression, avoiding obscurity, and yielding information easily and effectually. A word-book, when it obviates tediousness of search by giving a concise answer to one consulting it, possesses a peculiar virtue; for irksome is the process of turning out a word, where, instead of finding its explanation, there is a reference to another part of the book; but should the place referred to again direct the inquirer elsewhere, or, perchance, disclose neither notice nor interpretation, nor, in fact, anything concerning it, then patience becomes exhausted, and perseverance indeed hopeless.

Often has disappointment ensued, when, after reading up a given point of practice or theory, the Author has referred to the Dictionaries extant, in order to learn the precise force of the words and phrases that he had met with in his researches: for frequently they have not even been noticed, or being noticed, their interpretation has involved more confusion, since for the most part the very imperfect impression which was entertained before concerning them, often became obliterated by the utterly obscure manner in which the lexicographer had treated them. Some of these works handle a subject in a mass; for instance, under the head 'Bills of Exchange,' an immethodical essay is written, in which are explained, after a fashion, the several characters of acceptor, drawer, indorsee, payee, and the several subjects of acceptance, presentment, notice of dishonor, protest, and so on; for instead of breaking up the whole subject, and distributing the elements under their appropriate heads, the inquirer searching for acceptor, &c. is referred to Bills of Exchange, where he must wade through the greater part of a long and rambling statement before he comes to the precise point he wants. A Dictionary is not consulted for an essay or treatise on a particular theme, but to answer a sudden doubt, or explain a present difficulty, as to the proper meaning of a certain technicality. 'In considering any complex matter,' writes Burke,* 'we ought to examine every distinct ingredient in the composition, one by one, and reduce everything to the utmost simplicity; since the condition of our nature binds us to a strict law and very narrow limits. We ought afterwards to re-examine the principles by the effect of the composition, as well as the composition by that of the principles. We ought to compare our subject with things of a similar nature, and even with things of a contrary nature; for discoveries may be, and often are, made by the contrast, which would escape us on the single view. The greater number of the comparisons we make, the more general and the more certain our knowledge is like to prove, as built upon a more extensive and perfect induction.'

The constituents of the great subjects have been distributed under their proper letters, with a view to prevent as much reference to other parts of the book as possible; and when a phrase or technicality belongs in common to several departments of our laws, an analysis has been made, in order to keep separate the details of the particulars and distinctions. Occasional passages from the Jewish, Greek, and Roman antiquities have been quoted, either to illustrate a doctrine or to indicate an analogy; but of this, sparing use has been made, as their too frequent insertion would have increased bulk, without perhaps augmenting value. The authorities relied upon are referred to for examination, in order that the subject may be more fully studied by those who desire to acquire a fuller knowledge of historical jurisprudence or the polity of the ancients. Method has been attended to, as the main design of a Dictionary is immediate use.

> Thus useful arms in magazines we place,
> All rang'd in order, and disposed with grace:
> Nor thus alone the curious eye to please,
> But to be found, when need requires, with ease.†

Whether the work is successful or not, in attaining its avowed purpose, cannot here be determined; its real value—its suitableness as a Lexicon—will be tested by experience, which neither a persuasive preface nor an unfavorable review can influence. The Author craves pardon for any trivial error or misprint, as the greater part of the book was written, and the proofs corrected, during his academical studies; and he will be grateful for any suggestions, which, supplying the defects and elucidating the obscurities of this edition, would increase the utility of a second, should a second be called for.

* Preface to the Enquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful.

Law-Lexicon

OR

DICTIONARY OF JURISPRUDENCE.

A—ABA

A. This letter is frequently used as an abbreviation or as a mark of reference, for the purpose of identification. It was inscribed upon a ballot, and stood for 'antiquo,' I vote against. It was used by the Romans who voted against a candidate for office. See U. R.

A ballot or waxen tablet, similarly inscribed, was also used in their Courts of Judicature, being the initial letter of 'absolvo,' I acquit (not guilty). Cicero calls A, literam salutarem, a comfortable letter, because it was a note of Absolution; but C, literam tristem, a sorrowful letter, because it denoted Condemnation. See C. and N. L. Taylor's Civil Law, 191; Juv. Sat. xiii. 3.

A 1. An expression signifying a first-class vessel excellently built—Shipping term.

Ab [fr. abba, Syr., father]. The eleventh month of the Jewish civil year, and the fifth of the sacred. It answers to the moon that begins in July, and consists of thirty days. On the 24th is observed a feast in memory of the abolishment of the Sadducean law, which required sons and daughters to be equal heirs and heiresses of their parents' estate.—Brown's Dict. of Bible; Jahn's Bib. Antiq.

Ab, at the beginning of English-Saxon names of places, is generally a contraction of Abbot or Abbey; whence it is inferred, that those places once had an abbey, or belonged to one elsewhere, as Abingdon in Berkshire. Blount's Law Gloss.

Abacinare, a punishment described by historians of the middle ages. The criminal was blinded by the means of red-hot irons held before his eyes.—Encyc. Lond.

Abacist, or Abacista, a caster of accounts, an arithmetician.—Blount; Cowel's Interp.

Abacot, the royal cap of state formerly worn by the Sovereigns of England. It was made in the shape of two crowns.—Chron. Angl. 1463.

Abaction, a carrying away by violence.

Abactor [fr. abigo, Lat.], a stealer and driver away of cattle or beasts by herds or in great numbers at once, as distinguished from fur, a person who steals a single beast only.—Encyc. Lond.

Abacus [fr. ἄβαξ, Gk., a board], arithmetic, from the Abacus, an ancient instrument for facilitating calculations by means of counters. Its form is various, but that chiefly used in Europe is made by drawing parallel lines distant from each other at least twice the diameter of a counter, which, placed on the lowest line, signifies 1; on the second, 10; on the third, 100; on the fourth, 1,000; and so on. In the intermediate spaces, the same counters are estimated at one half of the value of the line immediately superior. There were also other inventions similarly denominated; viz. Abacus Pythagoricus, a multiplication table invented by Pythagoras; Abacus Logisticus, a rectangled triangle, whose sides forming the right angle contain all the numbers from 1 to 60, and its area the products of each two of the opposite numbers; it is also called a canon of sexagesimals; and the Abacus, or table strewed with dust, upon which the ancient mathematicians drew their schemes.—Dyche's Dict.; Encyc. Lond.

Abalienate, to make over to another.—Civ. Law.

Abalienation [fr. abalieno, Lat.], a making over of realty, goods, or chattels, to another, by due course of law.—Ib.

Aballaba, the ancient name of Appleby in Westmoreland.

Abandonee, one to whom anything is relinquished.

Abandon, to relinquish, to desert.

Abandoner, one who relinquishes anything.

Abandonment [fr. abandonner, Fr.; fr. bandon, command, order, dominion], the relinquishment of an interest or claim; the desertion of a husband or wife or child (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 27); also the relinquishment by an assured person to the assurers of his right to what is saved out of a wreck, when the thing insured has, by some of the usual perils of the sea, become practically valueless. Upon abandonment, the assured is entitled to call upon the assurers to pay the full amount of the insurance, as in the case of a total loss. The loss is in such case called a constructive total loss.—2 Selw. N.P. 976. The damage to a cargo must exceed half its value, to entitle the assured to abandon, and recover as for a total loss, and to justify the abandonment of a ship, the particular injuries must be such, that no repairs would render her seaworthy for the remainder of the voyage, or that the cost of making her seaworthy would exceed her value when repaired. The assured must give notice of his intention to abandon and claim as for a total loss to the underwriters, or their agents, within a reasonable time after he has received intelligence of the casualty, otherwise it will be taken that he intends to claim for a partial loss only. Abandonment very frequently takes place in cases of capture: the loss is then total, and no question can arise in respect of it. Where, however, a ship and cargo are re-captured within such a time that the object of the voyage is not lost, the assured is not entitled to abandon. The mere stranding of a ship is not deemed of itself such a loss as will justify an abandonment. If by some fortunate accident, by the exertions of the crew, or by any borrowed assistance, the ship be got off and rendered capable of continuing her voyage, the assurers are only liable for the expenses occasioned by the stranding. It is only where the stranding is followed by shipwreck, or the ship is in any other way rendered incapable of prosecuting her voyage, that the assured can abandon. Consult Arnould, Marshall or Park on Marine Insurance.

Also the surrender of his property by a debtor for the benefit of his creditors.

The Civil Law permitted a master who was sued for his slave's tort, or the owner of an animal who was sued for an injury done by it, to abandon the slave or animal to the person injured, and thus relieve himself from further liability.

Abandun or Abandum, any thing sequestered, proscribed, or abandoned. Abandon, i. e. in bannum res missa, a thing banned or denounced as forfeited or lost, whence to abandon, desert, or forsake, as lost and gone. Cowel. Pasquier thinks it a coalition of à ban donner, to give up to a proscription, in which sense it signified the ban of the empire. Ban, in the old dialect, signifies a curse; and to abandon, if considered as compounded of French and Saxon, is exactly equivalent to diris devovere.

Abannition, a banishment of one or two years for manslaughter.—Obsolete.

Abarnare [fr. abarian, Ang.-Sax., denudo, detego, Lat.], to lay bare, discover, detect. Hence æbere theof, a detected or convicted thief; æbere morth, a detected homicide. Also to detect and discover any secret crime to a magistrate.—Ancient Laws and Institutes of England; Leg. Canuti, c. 104.

Abarstick [fr. a priv. and berstan, Sax., disrumpo, Lat.], insatiable.—Cowel.

Ab assuetis non fit injuria. Jenk. Cent. Rep. (From things to which we are accustomed, no legal wrong results.)

If a person neglect to insist on his right he is deemed to have abandoned it. 'A Court of Equity,' said Lord Camden, 'which is never active in relief against conscience or public convenience, has always refused its aid to stale demands, where a party has slept upon his right, and acquiesced for a great length of time. Nothing can call forth this Court into activity but conscience, good faith and reasonable diligence: where these are wanting the Court is passive, and does nothing. Laches and neglect are always discouraged; and, therefore, from the beginning of this jurisdiction, there was always a limitation to suits in this Court.' Smith v. Clay, Ambl. 645; 3 Bro. C. C. 639.

Abatamentum, Abatement, an entry by interposition.—1 Inst. 277.

Abate [fr. abbattre, Fr.], to prostrate, break down, remove, or destroy; also, to let down or cheapen the price in buying or selling. Encyc. Lond.

Abatement, a making less, used in seven senses:—

(1) Abatement of Freehold.—Where a person dies seised of an inheritance, and, before the heir or devisee enters, a stranger, having no right, makes a wrongful entry and gets possession of it. Such an entry is technically called an abatement, and the stranger an abator. It is, in fact, a figurative expression, denoting that the rightful possession or freehold of the heir or devisee is overthrown by the unlawful intervention of a stranger. Abatement differs from intrusion, in that it is always to the prejudice of the heir or immediate devisee, whereas the latter is to the prejudice of the reversioner or remainder-man: and a disseisin differs from them both, for to disseise, is to put forcibly or fraudulently a person seised of the freehold out of possession.—1 Inst. 277*a*; Finch L. 12[illegible]; 3 Bl. Com. 167. See OUSTER.

(2) Abatement or removal of Nuisances.—A remedy allowed by law to the party injured by a nuisance to abate, destroy, remove, or put an end to the same by his own act. Whatever unlawfully annoys or damages another is a nuisance, which may be abated, i. e. taken away or removed by the aggrieved party, so that he commit no riot in the doing of it. This seems to be the primitive sense of the term abatement. The reason why the law allows this summary method of doing one's self justice, is because injuries of this kind require an immediate remedy, and cannot wait for the slow progress of the ordinary forms of justice. It is also used in a privative sense, in Statute, Westm. 1, 3 Edw. I. c. 17, where mention is made of abating a castle or fortress, clearly signifying to pull it down and level it even with the ground.

(3) Plea in abatement.—A defence by which a defendant shows cause to the Court why he should not be impleaded or sued, or, if impleaded or sued, not in the manner and form adopted by the plaintiff, and praying that the action or suit may abate, i.e. cease.

A plea in abatement at Common Law is a species of the class dilatory, and states some fact for quashing or abating the original writ in a real, or the declaration in a personal, action, on account of an informality, or offers an exception to the personal competency of the parties sueing or sued. This plea must be delivered to the plaintiff in four days after receiving the declaration, and cannot be resorted to afterwards. It must be accompanied by an affidavit of its truth, unless the mistake is plainly apparent on the record, otherwise the plaintiff may treat it as a nullity, and sign judgment by default.—4 Anne, c. 16, s. 11.

A defendant may plead in abatement to part of a declaration, and upon the merits as to the residue.

When this defence succeeds on the trial, the particular action is defeated, but the right of action subsists, since the plea does not involve the merits by denying the cause of action itself, but only impeaches the technical frame of the proceedings. Therefore upon amending the tenor of the proceedings and removing the disability, a new action can be maintained for the same right. With a view to this privilege, the plea must correct the mistake so as to enable the plaintiff to avoid the same objection in framing his new action.

The plaintiff may demur to this plea without going to trial, and then should the Court in banco decide against the plea, the judgment will be respondeat ouster (let the defendant answer over) without regard to any defect in the declaration, for which purpose he has four days after judgment on the demurrer signed, or as the Court shall otherwise direct.

If a plaintiff find that he cannot successfully resist the plea, he should abandon the action and enter a cassetur breve as a matter of course; he will not then be liable to pay any costs.

The Judges discourage these pleas, for they favour cunning and frivolity, avoid the substantial merits of an action, create vexation and accumulate costs. See Chitty or Stephen on Pleading, and 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 865–874. See MISNOMER, NONJOINDER, PLEA and PLEADING.

In Equity, declinatory pleas to the jurisdiction, and dilatory to the person, are in the nature of pleas in abatement, for they question the propriety of the particular remedy or suit, whilst they tacitly admit the existence of a cause of suit. No practical consequence, however, results from their being so deemed; it is only an attempt to render pleas in Equity analogous to those at law, that the assimilation has been indulged in by the text-writers. 1 Dan. Prac. by Head, 512.

In Criminal proceedings, a plea in abatement might have been given in writing by a prisoner or defendant on account of misnomer, wrongful or no addition, annexing thereto an affidavit of its truth. But this plea is now obsolete, since by 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 19, in case of misnomer the Judge may amend the indictment or information, and call upon the prisoner or defendant to plead in bar to the merits; and by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 1, no indictment or information shall be held insufficient for want of or imperfection in the addition of any defendant.

(4) Abatement of Debts and Legacies.—In Equity, when equitable assets are insufficient to satisfy fully all the creditors, their debts must abate in proportion, and they must be content with a dividend for æquitas est quasi æqualitas.

So in the case of legacies upon a deficiency of assets after payment of the debts, they abate proportionably, unless a priority is specially given to any particular legacy. A testator is always presumed to intend that the legacies shall be equally paid unless he express in his will a contrary intention. But a widow's legacy in lieu of dower has the priority, and very properly so, since she gives up a legal right for it.

When there are specific and pecuniary legacies, and the assets are not sufficient to pay both, the specific have the preference, and only abate proportionably amongst themselves, unless one of them is payable out of a particular fund, and others out of other funds, for then each must bear the loss arising from any deficiency of the particular fund.

(5) Abatement of Litigation.—The Common Law Procedure Act (1852) provides, that the death of a plaintiff or defendant shall not abate an action; that the death of one or more of several plaintiffs or defendants, if the cause of action survive to or against the survivors, shall not abate the action, but the death being suggested upon the record, the action may proceed; that in case of the death of a sole or surviving plaintiff, his legal representative may, with leave, enter a suggestion of the death and of his being the legal representative, and proceed with the action, and if the suggestion be made before trial, its truth shall be tried thereat, together with the deceased's title, and the person making the suggestion is to be treated as if he were originally the plaintiff; that in case of the death of a sole or surviving defendant, the action surviving, the plaintiff may make a suggestion in any of the pleadings before issue, or in a copy of the issue, after joining issue, of the death, and that a person named therein is the executor or administrator of the deceased, who may then be served with a copy of the writ and suggestion, and with a notice requiring him to appear within eight days afterwards, or in default the plaintiff may sign judgment and proceed in the ordinary way; and where no pleadings have taken place before the death, the declaration with the suggestion forming part thereof may be served together, the new defendant pleading thereto at the same time; and if the plaintiff have declared, but the deceased did not plead before his death, the new defendant must plead at the same time to the declaration and suggestion, and if the deceased did plead before death, the new defendant can only plead to the suggestion by way of denial, or as may be necessary by reason of his representative character, unless by leave he is permitted to plead fresh matter to the declaration; and if the deceased did plead before death, but the pleadings have not arrived at issue, the new defendant, besides pleading to the suggestion, must continue the pleadings in the same manner as the deceased might have done, and the pleadings upon the declaration and suggestion shall be tried together, and if the plaintiff recover, he shall be entitled to the like judgment, as in an action originally commenced against an executor or administrator; that the death of either party between verdict and judgment shall no longer be alleged for error, provided the judgment be entered within two terms after the verdict; that if a plaintiff die after interlocutory and before final judgment, the action abates not, if his executors or administrators might have maintained it; and so if a defendant thus die, if such action might have been maintained against his executors or administrators, but the plaintiff or his executor or administrator may issue a writ of revivor against the defendant or his executor or administrator to show cause why damages should not be assessed and recovered by him or them, and if no sufficient matter be shown at the return of the writ, in arrest of final judgment, or there be a default, a writ of inquiry of damages is awarded, or the amount is referred to a master to be ascertained, whereupon final judgment is given. ss. 135–140.

The Act also provides that the marriage of a woman, plaintiff, or defendant, shall not abate an action, which may notwithstanding proceed to judgment, and this may be executed against the wife alone, or, by suggestion or writ of revivor, judgment may be obtained against husband and wife, and execution issue thereon; and on a judgment for a wife, execution may issue thereon by the husband's authority, without a writ of revivor or suggestion, and if a wife have sued, or defended, by attorney appointed when she was sole, he may continue to act, unless the husband countermand his authority, and change him in the ordinary manner.—s. 141.

The bankruptcy or insolvency of a plaintiff, in an action which his assignees might maintain, cannot be pleaded in bar, unless they decline to continue and give security for costs within such time as a judge may order, proceedings being stayed until an election made by them; if the assignees neglect or refuse, the defendants may within eight days afterwards plead the bankruptcy.—s. 142.

With regard to proceedings in error—the death of a plaintiff in error, after service of the note of the receipt of the memorandum alleging error, with a statement of the grounds of error, operates no abatement; but if one of several plaintiffs in error die, a suggestion of it, which is not traversable, yet can, of course, be set aside if untrue, may be made, and the proceedings continued by the surviving plaintiffs. If a sole plaintiff, or all the plaintiffs in error die, the legal representative of such sole plaintiff, or of the surviving plaintiffs, may, with leave, enter a non-traversable suggestion of the death and of his being the legal representative, and the proceedings are thereupon continued; but if no such suggestion be made, the defendant in error may affirm the judgment, or take such other proceedings as he may be entitled to.

The death of a defendant in error does not abate the proceedings, but if one of several defendants die, a non-traversable suggestion of it may be made, and the proceedings continued against the surviving defendants. If a sole defendant, or all the defendants in error die, the plaintiff in error may proceed, upon giving ten days' notice of the proceedings and of his intention to continue them, to the representatives, or if such notice cannot be given, then upon such notice as the Court or a judge may direct.

The marriage of a woman, plaintiff or defendant, does not abate proceedings in error, but they may be continued in like manner, as the action below under similar circumstances as already detailed.—ss. 161–167.

Bankruptcy does not abate proceedings in error, which may be carried on in the bankrupt's name by the assignees.—1 T. R. 463.

In the mixed action of ejectment the death of a claimant or defendant shall not abate the action. If a deceased claimant's right survive to another claimant, a non-traversable suggestion of the death may be made, and the action may proceed at the suit of the surviving claimant; if such a suggestion be made before trial, then the claimant shall have a verdict and judgment upon its appearing that he was entitled to bring the action either separately or jointly with the deceased claimant. If one of several claimants die before trial, whose right does not survive to the survivors, then, where his legal representative shall not become a party to the action, a non-traversable suggestion of the death may be made, and the survivors may go on with the action for their share of the property.

Upon the death before execution executed, of one of several claimants, who have obtained a verdict, the survivors may, whether the legal right to the property survive or not, suggest the death, and proceed to judgment and execution to recover the entire possession of the property and costs, without affecting the right of the legal representative of the deceased claimant, or the liability of the survivors to him, and the entry and possession of the survivors shall be considered that of such legal representative as to his share, and the Court may direct possession to be delivered accordingly. If a sole claimant, or, before trial, one of several claimants, whose rights do not survive, die, his legal representative may, with leave, enter a suggestion of the death, and of his being the legal representative, upon which the action proceeds; if the suggestion be made before trial, its truth is triable thereat together with the deceased's title; and if it be made in the case of a sole claimant, after trial and before execution executed, and it be denied by the defendant within eight days after notice of it, or such further time as shall be allowed, then such suggestion shall be tried; if a verdict pass for the plaintiff he shall recover possession, and all costs occasioned thereby; if for the defendant he shall be entitled to judgment for his costs. If one of several defendants, defending jointly, die before or after judgment, a non-traversable suggestion of it may be made, and the action proceeds against the survivors. If a sole defendant, or all of them when more than one, die before trial, a non-traversable suggestion of it may be made, and the claimants shall be entitled to judgment, unless some person appear and defend within the time fixed by order of the Court or judge, and the Court or judge may order that the claimants may sign judgment within a given time, unless the person then in possession, by himself or tenant, or the legal representative of the deceased defendant, shall within such time appear and defend; the order may be served like the writ. But if the death or deaths happen after verdict, the claimant may still sign judgment and issue execution, without suggestion or revivor, against the legal representatives. If one of several defendants, defending separately for a part of the property, die before trial, the same proceedings may be taken as to such portion as in the case of a sole defendant's death, or the claimant may proceed against the survivors as to the other portions. If one of several defendants, defending separately as to property for which the survivors also defend, die before trial, the Court, or a judge, may allow the person then in possession of the property, or the legal representative of the deceased, to appear and defend on reasonable terms, and if no such leave be applied for, the claimant suggesting the death may proceed against the survivors to judgment and execution.—s. 190–199; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1075, et seq. See REVIVOR, WRIT OF.

A suit in Chancery altogether abates by the death of a sole plaintiff. Whereupon the defendant may make a special motion to the Court for an order that the legal representative revive the suit within a limited time, or that the bill be dismissed. 63*rd Order of May*, 1845. It also abates upon the death of one of several co-plaintiffs; in which case the defendant can perhaps obtain an order for the surviving plaintiffs to revive the suit, or submit to have the bill dismissed with costs. Smi. Ch. Pr. 726, et seq.

A suit abates by the death of a defendant quoad his interest; and his personal representative may move that the plaintiff revive the suit against him, or the bill stand dismissed as against such deceased defendant.

A suit by a corporation aggregate in their corporate capacity does not abate by the death of some of the members, though they are mentioned by their names; but the death of a corporation sole operates an abatement.

When a relator claims an interest, and the suit is instituted by bill and information in which he appears as a plaintiff as well as a relator, his death abates the proceedings; but not so where the suit is by information alone. Upon the death of a sole relator, or of all the co-relators, the Attorney-General applies for leave to name a new relator.

If during a suit instituted by a husband and wife, touching her personalty, the husband die, it does not abate the suit, but she may either continue it or stay it without being liable to costs;

if, however, the wife die, the suit abates and the widower must administer, and then revive the suit if he desire to continue it. And should he die before the suit is wound up, the next of kin of the wife would be entitled, upon administering, to proceed with the suit as trustees for the husband's representatives.

A suit instituted against a husband and wife is not abated by the husband's death; but if the wife thereby acquire a new interest she may put in another defence, if there have been already one, touching such new interest. If the wife dies the suit abates.

It is not, however, the death of every party to a suit that will cause its abatement; for if the deceased's interest then determines and becomes non-transmissible, as in the case of a life-tenancy and temporary contingent or defeasible interests, the suit may still be proceeded with against the survivors. But if the deceased was a sole party the suit is at an end, the subject of litigation having determined. And if the whole interest of a deceased party survive to another party, as in the case of joint-tenancy, or trustees or executors, the deceased not having acted or possessed any of the trust-property, no abatement occurs, since no claim can be sustained by or against the representatives. Also where a surviving party can continue the suit, as in the case of several creditors, &c., no abatement arises, for the deceased's representatives may come in under the decree; but if an original plaintiff in such a suit die after decree, his personal representatives may, if they choose, revive the suit.—Burney v. Morgan, 1 S. and S. 358.

The marriage of a feme sole plaintiff abates a suit; and it would appear that the defendant may move that the husband revive within a short time or that the bill be dismissed with costs.

The marriage of a feme defendant does not abate a suit, but her husband should be named in all the subsequent proceedings.

An infant-plaintiff attaining his majority does not abate a suit, but he may elect whether he will carry on the suit or not.

While the bankruptcy or insolvency of a sole plaintiff does not strictly abate a suit, yet it renders it as defective as if it did, since the bankrupt-plaintiff cannot prosecute it. The defendant may obtain, after notice to the assignees and upon special motion, an order that the bill be dismissed without costs within a limited time, if the assignees do not in the meantime revive it. If one of several co-plaintiffs become a bankrupt, the defendant may obtain an order without giving notice to the assignees, that the solvent plaintiffs revive within a given time or submit to the dismissal of the bill.

The bankruptcy or insolvency of a defendant does not abate a suit; but the plaintiff has his election either to continue the suit, making the assignees parties, or stay and go in under the bankruptcy; and such defendant may move, at the proper time, to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, but without costs. See Revivor, Order of.

Bankruptcy proceedings abate altogether only where the bankrupt dies before adjudication. 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 116.

Actions at law or suits in equity commenced by assignees do not abate by their death or removal; but upon a suggestion of the fact made, the proceedings go on in the substituted name of the surviving or new assignee.—Ib. s. 157. This provision includes official assignees. The Insolvent Act, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 53, provided the like in cases of insolvency; but proceedings in insolvency are now abolished by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. These enactments do not apply when the assignees are defendants.

(6) Abatement or rebate in commerce, an allowance or discount made for prompt payment.—Lex Merc. It is sometimes used to express the deduction that is occasionally made at the Custom-House from the duties chargeable upon such goods as are damaged, and for a loss in warehouses, regulated by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 52, s. 32.

(7) A badge in coat-armour, indicating dishonour of some kind. It is also called rebatement.

Abator or Abater, one who prostrates a nuisance or enters into a house or land vacant by the death of the former possessor, and not yet taken possession of by his heir or devisee. Cowel. Also an agent or cause by which an abatement is procured.

Abatuda, or abatude, anything diminished. Moneta abatuda is money clipped or diminished in value.—Du Fresne's Glos. Used in old records.

Abavia, a great grandmother's mother.

Abavus [fr. avusavus, avavus, Lat.], a great grandfather's father.

Abawed [fr. echalier, Fr., attonitum reddere, Lat.], terrified.—Blount.

Abbacy [fr. abbatia, or abbathia, Lat.], the government of a religious house and the revenues thereof, subject to an abbot, as a bishopric is to a bishop.—Cowel. The rights and privileges of an abbot.

Abbandunum, abbendoma, abbendonia, Abingdon in Berkshire, which took its present name soon after Cissa, King of the West Saxons, had founded the abbey there. It was also, as some say, called Sewsham and Cloveshoe.

Abbas [fr. æstuarium, Lat.], Humber in Yorkshire.

Abbatis, an avener or steward of the stables, an ostler.—Spelm.

Abbe, the old Norman-French word for Abbott.—Vide Bro. Abr. 'Abbe.'

Abbey, or Abby [fr. abbatia, Lat.], a place or house for religious retirement, governed by an abbess where nuns are, and by an abbot where monks reside. Formerly in England great privileges were, and now on the continent are, granted to them, such as being exempted from the bishop's visitation, and as a sanctuary for persons escaping from the penalties of an infringed law, even although they be murderers. No less than 190 abbeys were dissolved by Henry VIII., whose yearly revenue amounted to 2,853,000*l. per annum* (an almost incredible sum considering the value of money in those days), a great part of which went to Rome, the governors and governesses of several of the richest among them being foreigners resident in Italy. Certain abbots and priors in England, in right of their monasteries, held lands of the crown, for which they owed military service, and on that account obtained the title of Lords, and were summoned as Barons to parliament. For a like reason the Bishops of the present day have the same honour, and are denominated Spiritual Peers.—1 Hall. Const. Hist. c. ii. p. 74; Monasticon Anglicanum ; 2 Steph. Bl. 343.

Abbot, or Abbat [fr. abbas, Lat.; abbé, Fr.; abbud, Sax.: others derive it from abba, Syr., father.] A spiritual lord or governor, who had the rule of a religious house. An abbot, with the monks of the same house, were called the convent, and made a corporation.—Termes de la Ley. Henry VIII., as is well known, dissolved the monasteries. See Du Cange, and Carpenter's Supp.

Abbot of Misrule, the master of the revels who directed the diversions, called in Scotland the abbot of unreason.

Abbrevatio Placitorum is an abstract of ancient pleadings prior to the year-books. See it cited in Stephens on Pleading, App. p. xvii.

Abbreviate of adjudication, an abstract of adjudication.—Scotch Law.

Adjudication is that diligence of the law by which the heritage of a debtor is adjudged to belong to his creditor in payment of a debt; and the abbreviate of the adjudication is an abridgment of the record, containing the names of the creditor, debtor and lands, with the amount of the debt; it is signed by the Judge who pronounced the decree in the process of adjudication, and must be recorded in the register of abbreviates.—Ib.

Abbreviation, an abridging or contraction. The 4 Geo. II. c. 26, provided that all law proceedings should be in the English language, written legibly, and in words at length, and not abbreviated; but the 6 Geo. II. c. 14, permitted numbers to be expressed in figures, and such abbreviations as are commonly used. In 9 Co. 48, is this maxim, Abbreviationum, ille numerus et sensus accipiendus est, ut concessio non sit inanis. (In abbreviations, such number and sense is to be taken, that the grant be not made void.)

Abbreviators, officers who assist in drawing up the Pope's briefs, and reducing petitions into proper form, for their conversion into Papal Bulls.

Abbreviature, a short draft.

Abbroch, to monopolise goods or forestall a market.

Abbrochment, or Abroachment [fr. ab, Lat., and broche, Fr., a spit.] The forestalling of a market or fair.—MS. Antiq. Forestalling is abolished by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24, by which Act are repealed many statutes in restraint of trade. This act extends to Scotland and Ireland.

Abbuttals, or Abuttals [fr. abutter or aboutir, Fr., to limit or bound; or perhaps fr. to butt or strike.—Wedgw.] The buttings and boundings of land, east, west, north, and south, with respect to the places by which they are limited and bounded. The sides of the land are properly said to be adjoining to, and the ends abutting on, the land contiguous.—Termes de la Ley. The 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 64, settled the divisions of counties and the limits of cities and boroughs within England and Wales. The Enclosure Acts empower commissioners to settle boundaries of parishes and manors, hamlets and districts between lands to be enclosed, and adjoining lands. See Reg. Gen. H. T. 1853, s. 18.

Abdicant, giving up, renouncing.

Abdicate [fr. abdico, Lat.], to renounce or refuse anything. Termes de la Ley; to disinherit in the civil law.

Abdication, where a magistrate or person in office voluntarily renounces or gives it up before the time of service has expired. It differs from resignation, in that abdication is done purely and simply, whereas resignation is in favour of some other person. It is said to be a renunciation, quitting, and relinquishing, so as to have nothing further to do with a thing, or the doing of such actions as are inconsistent with the holding of it.—Chamb. Dict. On King James II.'s leaving this kingdom, and abdicating the crown, the Lords would have had the word 'desertion' made use of, but the Commons thought it was not comprehensive enough, for that the king might then have liberty of returning. The Scots called it a forefalture (forfeiture) of the crown, from the verb forisfacio. This was fully canvassed in the then Parliamentary Debates. Involuntary resignations are also termed abdications, as Napoleon's abdication at Fontainebleau.

Abditorium [fr. abditus, Lat.], an abditory or hiding-place to conceal and preserve goods, plate, or money, or a chest in which reliques are kept, as mentioned in the inventory of the church of York.—Dugdale's Monasticon Anglicanum, p. 173.

Abduction, the forcible or fraudulent taking away of women or children, especially girls. This criminal offence is of three kinds—viz. (1) Kidnapping; (2) Carrying away infant females under sixteen; and (3) Stealing heiresses.—See these treated of under their respective heads, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 53, 54, 55. There may also be abduction of a ward or of a wife. See title GUARDIAN and WIFE; and see 3 Bl. Com. iii. 552.

In logic, a particular form of argument, by the Greeks called ἀπαγωγή, wherein the greater extreme is evidently contained in the medium, but the medium not so evidently in the less extreme as not to require some further medium or proof to make it appear.—Encyc. Lond.

Abearance, carriage or behaviour. A recognizance to be of good abearance means to be of good behaviour.—4 Bl. Com. 251, 256.

Abeched [fr. abecher, Fr.], to be satisfied. Cowel.

Aberemurder [fr. abere, apparent, notorious, and mord, murder, Sax.] Plain or downright murder as distinguished from the less heinous crime of manslaughter or chance medley. It was declared a capital offence, without fine or commutation, by the laws of Canute, c. 93, and of Henry I. c. 13.—Spelm.

Aberfraw [aber-fraw, Welsh, efflux of the Fraw]. The princely seat of Venedotia (North Wales) was situated where the brook Fraw flows into the sea. Here was erected the Supreme Court of Law for the administration of justice in that part of the Principality.—Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales.

Abessed [fr. abaisser, Fr.], humbled, depressed, abased.—Blount.

Abet [fr. abettare, from a (ad vel usque), and bedan or beteren, to stir up or excite, Sax.; or boutli, Fr., impello, excito, Lat.], to maintain or patronise; to encourage or set on, the substantive abetment signifying the same.

Abettor, or Abettator, an instigator or setter on, one who promotes or procures a crime to be committed.—Old Nat. Br. 21. Treason is the only crime in which abettors are excluded by law, every one concerned being a principal. See ACCESSARY.

Abettors in misdemeanors are punishable as principal offenders. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 8; as also are abettors in offences punishable on summary conviction under the 'Larceny Act,' 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 99; and the 'Malicious Injuries to Property Act,' 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 63.

Abeyance, or Abbayance [fr. abayer, Fr., to expect, to look at anything with open mouth]. In expectation, remembrance, and contemplation of law.—Cowel. The word abeyance has been compared to what the civilians call hereditas jacens; for, as the civilians say lands and goods jacent, so the common lawyers say that things in a similar condition are in abeyance, as the logicians term it in posse, or in understanding. Thus in the case of a parson, who has an estate for life only, the fee simple of his glebe is in abeyance; and when the parsonage is void, the freehold, until a successor be appointed, is in abeyance.—1 Steph. Bl. 241: Abeyance in gremio legis, or in nubibus, means in consideration of law.—Plowd. Rep. 547. The strict interpretation of this word as to freehold interests has puzzled eminent lawyers, but is rather a matter of curiosity than practical importance.

Abib (green ears of corn or fresh fruits, sometimes called Nisan, a Babylonish name), the first sacred, and seventh civil, month of the Jewish year. It contained thirty days, and answers to part of our March and April. Brown's Dict. of Bible; Jahn's Bib. Antiq.

Abiding-by, where a deed or document is challenged as forged, the party founding on the deed or document must appear in Court and abide by it. This is done by his signing a declaration that he abides by the deed or document quarrelled or challenged, sub periculo falsi, which has the effect of pledging him to stand to the consequences of founding on a forged instrument. The abiding-by is usually qualified thus:—in the case of a bill of exchange, the holder states that it came fairly into his hands in the course of business, and he will abide by it under that protestation and qualification, and as in no shape accessory to the alleged forgery.—Scotch Term.

Abigeat, the crime of stealing cattle by droves or herds. It was severely punished, the delinquent being often condemned to the mines, banishment, or death. Also a miscarriage procured by art.—Ash.

Abigeus [fr. abigo, Lat.] a stealer of cattle, the same as abactor.—Cowel; Civil Law.

Ab initio [Lat.] (from the beginning). A person who abuses an authority given him by law becomes a trespasser ab initio, i. e. is liable as a trespasser from the beginning. See the Six Carpenters' case, 8 Rep. 146; 1 Smith's L. C. 128.

Abintestate, inheriting from a person who died without having made a will.

Ab irato [Lat.] (by a man in anger).—Civil Law.

Abishering, or abishersing, quit of amercements. It originally signified a forfeiture or amercement, and is more properly mishering. mishersing, or miskering, according to Spelman. It has since been termed a liberty or freedom, because, wherever this word is used in a grant or charter, the persons to whom the grant is made have the forfeitures and amercements of all others, and are themselves free from the control of any within their fee.—Rastal's Abr.

Abjudicate, to give away or transfer by judgment.—Obs.

Abjuration [fr. abjuro, Lat.], a forswearing or renouncing by oath. In the old law it signified a sworn banishment, or an oath taken by a person claiming sanctuary, to forsake the realm for ever, now abolished by 21 Jac. I. c. 28. The oath of abjuration (introduced by 13 Wm. III. c. 16, and altered by 6 Geo. III. c. 53) was to be taken by every person entering upon any public office or trust. By this he renounced the Pretender, and recognised the right of Her Majesty, under the act of settlement, engaging to support her, and promising to disclose all treasons and traitorous conspiracies against her. Stamford's Pl. C. b. 2, c. 40. Another oath is now substituted for this by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 48. See QUAKERS and ROMAN CATHOLICS.

Abjure, to retract, to recant, or abnegate a position upon oath.

Ablato-Bulgio, Bulness, or Bolness, in Cumberland.

Ablegate [fr. ablego, Lat.], to send abroad a person on some public business or embassy.

Ablegati, Papal ambassadors of the second rank, who are sent to a country where there is not a nuncio with a less extensive commission than that of a nuncio.

Ablocation, a letting out to hire for money.

Abnepos, the grandson of a grandson or granddaughter.

Abneptis, the granddaughter of a grandson or granddaughter.

Abo, a carcase of an animal killed by a wolf or other beast of prey.—Ancient Laws and Inst. of Wales.

Abode, habitation or place of residence; stay or continuance. In law it is used in different senses, to denote the place of a man's residence or business, temporary or permanent. For some purposes, in law a man may be deemed to have an 'abode' where he has a place of business, even although he reside elsewhere, or where he has a temporary residence, although his permanent residence is elsewhere, or even abroad. But 'abode' or residence are quite distinct from domicil, which means much more than even a place of permanent residence (see that word, post); whereas, it would seem that 'abode' does not even necessarily imply that. 'Abode' seems larger and looser in its import than the word 'residence,' which in strictness means the place where a man lives, i. e. where he sleeps or is at home.

Abolition [fr. abolir, Fr.; fr. aboleo, Lat.], to erase or annul], a destroying, effacing, or putting out of memory; also, the leave given by the Sovereign or judges to a criminal accuser to desist from further prosecution.—25 H. VIII. c. 21.

Abone [Abonis, Lat.], Avington or Aventon, in Gloucestershire.

Aborigines [fr. ab, from, and origo, Lat.], a name given to the original or first inhabitants of any country, but more particularly used for the ancient inhabitants of Latium, who lived there when Æneas and the Trojans arrived in Italy. It is frequently employed in the sense of Autochthones, i.e. people coeval with the land which they inherit.—Clas. Dict.; Dion Halicar.; Livy; Aurelius Victor.

Abortion [fr. ab, which in composition signifies defect, according to Martinius, and orior, Lat., to arise], a miscarriage, or the premature expulsion of the contents of the gravid uterus, before the term of gestation is completed.

Our law does not recognise the distinction adopted by medical commentators on the subject, who consider miscarriages during the first six months as abortions, and those during the last three as premature labours; but applies the term abortion to the throwing off of the fœtus at any period of the pregnancy. Medical science divides the causes which induce women to abort into (1) natural or habitual, and (2) violent or artificial. Natural or habitual, it sub-divides into predisposing and occasional or exciting; and violent or artificial into accidental, and premeditated or intentional. The law deals only with premeditated or intentional abortion, which is now more appropriately denominated fœticide.

To kill an infant in its mother's womb is not murder in legal contemplation; because to constitute this crime the individual slain must be a reasonable creature, in being, and under the queen's peace, at its perpetration. A child en ventre sa mère, and not actually born, does not fall within this predicament.

The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 58, enacts, that 'every woman being with child who, with intent to procure her own miscarriage, shall unlawfully administer to herself any poison or other noxious thing, or shall unlawfully use any instrument or other means whatsoever with the like intent, and whosoever, with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman, whether she be or be not with child, shall unlawfully administer to her, or cause to be taken by her, any poison or other noxious thing, or shall unlawfully use any instrument or other means whatsoever, with the like intent, shall be guilty of felony, and, being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding three years.' By s. 59, 'Whosoever shall unlawfully supply or procure any poison or other noxious thing, or any instrument or thing whatsoever, knowing that the same is intended to be unlawfully used or employed with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman, whether she be or be not with child, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.'

It is no excuse that the woman consented to, or even solicited, the perpetration of the offence; for this would be to set the law at naught, inasmuch as the crime is seldom attempted but with the woman's approval.

It should never be forgotten by those engaged in judicial investigations of this offence, that abortions from natural, habitual, and non-criminal causes are of frequent occurrence: so frequent, that medical experience indicates that one in three of all conceptions in London terminate in abortion.

Connected with this subject is this very serious question:—Is it, under any circumstances, morally and legally justifiable for a medical man to induce premature delivery? See Guy's For. Med. 117, and Taylor's Med. Jurisp. 518; Greave's Crim. Acts, 82, et seq.

Abortion [fr. abortus, Lat.], the fruit of an abortion incapable of life.

Above, higher in place; the superior court.

Above-cited or mentioned, quoted before. A figurative expression taken from the ancient manner of writing books on scrolls, where, whatever is cited or mentioned before in the same roll must be above.—Encyc. Lond.

Abrevicum, Berwick-upon-Tweed.

Abridge [fr. abréger, Fr., abbreviare, Lat.], to make shorter in words, but still retaining the sense and substance. Also the making a declaration or count shorter by substracting or severing some of the substance therefrom, e.g. a man is said to abridge his plaint in assize, and a woman her demand in action of dower, where any land is put into the plaint or demand which is not in the tenure of the defendant; for if the defendant plead, non-tenure, joint-tenancy, or the like, in abatement of the writ as to part of the lands, the plaintiff may leave out those lands, and pray that the tenant may answer to the rest.—Brook. tit. Abridgement.

Abridgement [fr. abbreviamentum, Lat], a large work contracted into a narrow compass; a summary, epitome, or compendium.

Abridgement of Damages, the right of the Court to reduce the damages in certain cases. Vide Bro. Abr. Abridgement.

Abridgements or Digests of the Law, of ancient authority. See 1 Steph. Bl. 53. The principal of these are Brooke's, Fitzherbert's, and Rolle's and Comyns's Digest. Besides these there are Viner's and Bacon's Abridgements, and Harrison's and Chitty's Digests, of later date.

Abrogate, to disannul or take away anything; to abrogate a law is to lay aside or repeal it.—Cowel. The maxim is Leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant. 11 Co. 626. (Subsequent laws repeal prior contrary laws.)

Abrogation, stands opposed to rogation; it is distinguished from derogation, which implies the taking away only some part of a law; from subrogation, which denotes the adding a clause to it; from obrogation, which implies the limiting or restraining it; from dispensation, which only sets it aside in a particular instance; and from antiquation, which is the refusing to pass a law.—Encyc. Lond.

Abscond, to go out of the jurisdiction of the Courts, or to lie concealed in order to avoid any of their processes.

Absconding Debtor's Arrest Act, 1851. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 42.

Absconding Shareholder, Arrest of. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 14, ss. 11, 12.

Absence, want of appearance. A decree is said to be in absence where the defender does not appear; every Scotchman within the kingdom is liable to be called in an action before the Court of Session, in which action decree may be given against the defender, although he do not appear. Even a foreigner, though not within the kingdom, provided he possess an estate in it, or goods, which have been attached for the purpose of founding jurisdiction, may be exposed to a decree in absence.—Scotch Law.

Absence, generally, is of a fivefold kind or species:—(1) A necessary absence, as in banished or transported persons; this is entirely necessary. (2) Necessary and voluntary, as upon the account of the commonwealth, or in the service of the church. (3) A probable absence, according to the civilians, as that of students on the score of study. (4) Entirely voluntary, on account of trade, merchandise, and the like. (5) Absence cum dolo et culpâ, as not appearing to a writ, subpœna, citation, &c., or to delay or defeat creditors, or avoiding arrest, either on civil or criminal process. Ayliffe.

Absence of Husband or Wife for Seven Years is, under certain circumstances, a defence in an indictment for bigamy. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57, 'Any person marrying a second time whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years last past, and shall not have been known by such person to be living within that time,' is exempted from the penal consequences of bigamy.—Greave's Crim. Law Consolid. Edn. 1862, p. 82; Roscoe's Crim. Law, p. 650.

Absentee, a person who is away from his usual place of residence.

Absentees, or des absentees. A parliament so called was held at Dublin, 10th May, 8 Hen. VIII. It is mentioned in letters-patent dated 29 Hen. VIII.

Absentia ejus qui reipublicæ causâ abest, neque ei, neque alii damnosa esse debet.—(The absence of any person who is abroad in the service of the state ought to be detrimental neither to him nor to another.)

Absolve, to acquit of a crime, to pardon or set free from excommunication. See ASSOILE.

Absoluta sententia expositore non indiget, 2 Inst. 533.—(A positive decree is not in need of any interpreter.)

Absolute, complete, unconditional, not relative, as a rule—absolute, which can be forthwith enforced in contradistinction to a rule nisi, which is incomplete until cause be shown, or the opposite party make default in appearing. There are some rules which are absolute in the first instance.—2 Arch. Pr. 1184.

Absolute Covenant, an unlimited convention, including every person and thing

Absolute Law, the true and proper law of nature, for it is immutable in the abstract or in principle; in theory, but not in application. For very often the object, the reason, situation, and other circumstances, may vary its exercise and obligation.—1 Steph. Bl. s. 2.

Thus, neminem lædere is always a reasonable and natural duty in itself, universally true, the voice of nature, and founded upon the fairest principles. But a person can suppose himself in such a situation, where the voice of nature would direct the quite contrary; that is, if he be unjustly attacked; for there it would prescribe self-defence, which possibly may not be procured sine læsione alterius. Here the rule holds good in thesi, but not in hypothesi. The subject-matter becoming differently circumstanced, there is occasion for another rule of nature to come into the consideration. This is an exception, which confirms the general precept, not a contradiction, which defeats it. And it may be concluded that the everlasting principle de neminem lædendo still maintains its absolute verity; but in this particular case it must be interpreted or limited, quoad hoc, by a more important law of the same nature. Whence comes a rule of law—quotiescunque duo præcepta juris concurrunt, et utrumque servari non potest, toties standum fortiori. Taylor's Civ. L. 143.

Absolution, a dispensation; a remission of sins; an acquittal by sentence of law.—Ayliffe.

Absoniare, to shun or avoid, used by the English-Saxons in the oath of fealty.—Somner.

Absque hoc [Lat.] (without this). The technical words of exception made use of in a special traverse; as, the defendant pleads that such a thing was done at B., &c., without this (absque hoc), that it was done at, &c. 1 Saund. 22; abolished C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 65.

Absque impetitione vasti [Lat.] (without impeachment of waste). A reservation frequently made to a tenant for life, that no man shall impetere or sue him for waste committed. This reservation only excuses from permissive waste, but is never extended to allow malicious waste to the very destruction of the estate itself.—2 Ch. C. 32.

Absque tali causa [Lat.] (without such cause): formal words in the now obsolete replication de injuriâ.—Stephens on Plead., 191.

Abstention, keeping an heir from possession; also, the tacit renunciation of a succession by an heir.—French Law.

Abstinence, a forbearing from the unlawful taking of another's goods.

Abstract [fr. abstrahere, abstractus; fr. trahere, Lat., to draw], an abridgement or epitome; also a purloining.

Abstract of title, an epitome of the evidences of ownership.

Such an abstract should show the soundness of a person's right to a given estate, together with any charges or circumstances in anywise affecting it. A perfect abstract discloses that the owner has both the legal and equitable estates at his own disposal perfectly unincumbered.

Upon a sale or mortgage, the solicitor of the owner usually prepares the abstract at his client's expense (except on sales to a railway company, when it must be borne by the company, unless it be stipulated otherwise, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 18, s. 22), and delivers it to the solicitor of the proposed purchaser or mortgagee, who compares it with the original title-deeds, and makes requisitions (when necessary) in order to ascertain any important but undisclosed facts, to remedy any defects, or to dissipate any doubts or ambiguities. He then should lay all the papers before counsel, for his opinion as to the safety of the title, and the propriety of his client's embarking his capital in the transaction.

Should the abstract be long and voluminous, a list of the dates and nature of the deeds and muniments, chronologically arranged, with references to the pages of the abstract in which they are to be found, facilitates perusal.

The object of every abstract is to enable the purchaser or mortgagee, or his counsel, to judge of the evidence deducing, and of the incumbrances affecting, the title.

Every title involves the question of legal and equitable ownership; for as it is in vain that there is a good title at law, if that title be bad or defective in equity, so it is not sufficient that there is a good title to the legal estate or to the equitable estate if it be incumbered with judgments, legacies, debts to the crown, or other charges, because in proportion to the extent of such incumbrances there must be a reduction in the actual value of the vendor's interest.

Every abstract, then, should describe whatever will tend to enable a purchaser or mortgagee, or his counsel, to form an opinion of the precise state of the title at law and in equity, together with all chances of eviction or even of adverse claims.

All these points should therefore be kept in mind in preparing the abstract of title, and also in comparing the same with the original documents or muniments of the title.

An abstract showing a clear and good root of title for sixty years to a freehold estate is sufficient, although the owner have title-deeds relating to a much earlier period; while these, however, need not be abstracted, yet the purchaser or mortgagee has a right to inspect them, in order to see that they do not disclose any defects, or lead to any dangerous consequences, and a vendor would not be justified in withholding them.

A simple abstract relating to one estate only should set forth chronologically a clear statement of the material parts of the deeds, wills, writings, records, and private acts of parliament, which at all affect or concern the title to be deduced, together with such matters in pais, as births, majorities, marriages, deaths, survivorships, pedigrees, descents, and successions, as connect the several transactions, or in anywise vary the title; and these facts should be authenticated by such legal evidence as would be deemed satisfactory and conclusive in an action to try the title. Judgments, crown-debts, charges, and incumbrances, should be fairly and unreservedly stated.

But a complex or compound abstract is not susceptible of a chronological arrangement; as when the title relates to different parcels of land or different interests, or the property belongs to joint tenants, tenants in common, or coparceners, who have entered into a partition, and there is a different title to their shares; it would then be better to arrange the documents relating to one portion under a distinct heading, so as to keep the title to each part in a connected series, and sometimes separate abstracts, for the different titles would simplify the business and avoid an embarrassing confusion, especially if the several properties be distinct, or the title is compounded of both freehold and copyhold estates. Should the distinct titles to the several parts of the property afterwards become united, then there should be a deduction of the title to each part separately up to the point of junction.

As soon as practicable, after the abstract of title is delivered to the vendee's solicitor, he should himself diligently compare it with the original documents, since he is answerable for the consequences of any negligence. For this purpose they are usually produced at the chambers of the vendor's solicitor, or at the vendor's residence. If they are in town, the solicitor's agent should be instructed to undertake the comparison; but if they are in a distant part of the country, then the journey of the vendee's solicitor occasioned thereby will be at the vendor's expense if there be no stipulation to the contrary.

Should the title-deeds be lost by fire or otherwise after their examination by the purchaser's solicitor, but before the title has been accepted, the vendor must prove the contents of the deeds and documents and their due execution.

Should the vendor have a covenant for the production of the title-deeds, he himself must obtain them for the vendee's inspection, since the holder might legally refuse to produce them to the vendee or his solicitor.

The points to which the attention of the solicitor should be most particularly directed in comparing the muniments with the abstract are the stamps upon the deeds, the dates of the different assurances (he should not depend upon the indorsement for this purpose); the names and additions of the parties, and the characters in which they respectively act, as whether trustee, executor, or heir-at-law; that no important recitals are omitted, and that those that are abstracted are faithfully given. The receipt-clause should be attended to, to see that there is no unusual or special matter contained in it relative to the purchase-money, which may affect the purchaser. The amount of the consideration, the names of the grantors and grantees, and particularly the identity of the parcels, and that there are no exceptions therein. The words of the different limitations of uses and trusts must be cautiously made to agree, and any deficiency therein must be supplied by the necessary alteration in the abstract; the covenants for quiet enjoyment and freedom from incumbrances should be scrutinised, for if there be any collateral right of enjoyment or lurking incumbrance, it will most probably make its appearance there, so all burdensome covenants in leases must be looked into. The interest which tenants in possession have in the lands must also be enquired after, for the purchaser will be bound thereby; but in nothing is caution more necessary than in attending to the execution and attestation of the different deeds, to see that they are executed by all the parties, or that the abstract notices those who have not done so; and when the execution and attestation are under a power which directs a particular mode of execution, there is still greater necessity to be satisfied that the precise terms of the power have been complied with; and, in the case of wills, that the law requiring two witnesses has been observed, and that the attestation expresses that the testator signed in their presence; that the receipt for the consideration money is endorsed on the deed and witnessed. It is generally witnessed by the same party who attests the execution of the deed. And, lastly, where the deed has been enrolled or registered, or livery of seisin has been requisite, the indorsement of these different acts upon the deed should be noticed.

Whenever the deeds are in the possession of third parties, they should be informed of the negotiation to purchase the estate to which they relate, and an inquiry should be made of them respecting their particular interests therein. Such an inquiry should also be made of tenants or persons in possession, when the leases under which they hold cannot be inspected. If the property be vested in trustees, inquiries should be made of them as to any incumbrances, and they should have notice of the intended purchase, in order to exclude a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer, since priority of notice gives priority of equity.

Of coarse those persons to whom these questions are put will be bound by their answers; but an incumbrancer need not satisfy any inquiry relative to his security in the absence of an offer to satisfy him his claim. See TITLE.

Absurdum est affirmare (re judicatâ) credendum esse non judici, 12 Co. 25.—(It is absurd after judgment to assert that the judge is not trustworthy.)

Abundans cautela non nocet, 11 Co. 6. (Extreme care does no mischief.)

Abuse, a thing established by usage, though contrary to rule or good order.

Abuse of authority. Vide AB INITIO.

Abuse of distress, using an animal or chattel distrained, which makes the distrainer liable as for a conversion.

Abusing children, having carnal intercourse with young girls with their consent. If the girl be under the age of ten years, the offence is a felony, punishable with penal servitude for life, or not less than three years, or imprisonment (with or without hard labour) for not more than two years; if the girl be above the age of ten and under twelve, the offence is a misdemeanor, punishable by penal servitude for three years, or imprisonment, with or without hard labour, to the extent of two years. An attempt to have carnal intercourse with a girl under twelve years, even with her consent, is an offence punishable by a like imprisonment. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 50, 51, 52. See RAVISHMENT.

Abut [fr. aboutir, Fr., to touch at the end], to border upon or approach.—Encyc. Lond.

Abuttals. See ABBUTTALS.

Accapitare, to pay relief to lords of manors. Capitali domino accapitare, i. e. to pay a relief, homage, or obedience to the chief lord on becoming his vassal.—Fleta, l. 2, c. 50.

Accapitum, money paid by a vassal upon his admission to a feud; the relief due to the chief lord.—Encyc. Lond.

Accedas ad curiam [Lat.] (that you go to the Court.) An original writ to the sheriff, issued out of Chancery, where a man has received false judgment in a Hundred Court or Court Baron, or justice has been delayed. If a plaint in replevin be therein levied, it is removed by this writ, which is in every respect the same as the recordari facias loquelam, excepting that it directs the sheriff to go to the Lord's Court, and there cause the plaint to be recorded, and so to return it to the Court above, being one of the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster.—F.N.B. 71 D.

Accedas ad vicecomitem [Lat.] (that you go to the sheriff.) Where the sheriff has a writ called pone delivered to him, but suppresses it, this writ is sent to the coroner, commanding him to deliver a writ to the sheriff.—Reg. Orig. 83.

Acceleration, the shortening of the time for the vesting in possession of an expectant interest.

Acceptance, the taking and receiving of anything in good part, and as it were a tacit agreement to a preceding act, which might have been defeated or avoided if such acceptance had not been made.—Blount Bro. Abr.

Acceptance, in commercial language, an engagement to pay a bill of exchange according to the tenor of such acceptance, which may be either absolute or conditional. In the case of English and Irish bills of exchange, the acceptance might have been in writing on the bill, but Scotch and foreign bills of exchange might have been accepted verbally, or by letter or other collateral memorandum, 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 78. But by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 6, no acceptance of any bill of exchange, whether inland or foreign, made after the 31st day of December, 1856, shall be sufficient to bind or charge any person, unless the same be in writing on such bill, or, if there be more than one part of such bill, on one of the said parts, and signed by the acceptor, or some person duly authorised by him. An absolute acceptance is either general or qualified, and is usually written across the face of the bill of exchange thus, 'Accepted, payable at Messrs. ——, Bankers, London;' if it is to be qualified, the words 'and not otherwise or elsewhere' are added, and then follows the signature of the person accepting. If the acceptance be qualified, non-presentation of the bill of exchange at the specified place, and in proper time, would exonerate the person who accepted it, and all the other parties, but the person who accepted it would not be so exonerated if the acceptance were general. It may be conditional, as 'It will not be accepted until the ship with the wheat arrives,' or 'cannot accept till stores are paid for,' these are undertakings to accept when the ship with the wheat arrives, or the stores are paid for. Acceptance supra protest for honour (called in France, acceptation par intervention), is sometimes resorted to in the case of foreign bills of exchange; where the person upon whom the bill is drawn cannot be found or refuses to accept, some friend after the bill has been protested for non-acceptance accepts thus, 'Accepted, supra protest, for the honour of Messrs. —— A. B.' The bill must still be presented to the person on whom it was originally drawn, and after refusal and protest for non-payment, resort must be had to the person accepting for honour.—6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 58. Consult Story, Chitty, Byles or Bayley on Bills of Exchange. See AU BESOIN.

Acceptilatio, the verbal extinction of a verbal contract, with a declaration that the debt has been paid when it has not, or the acceptance of something merely imaginary in satisfaction of a verbal contract.—Scotch Law; Smith's Dict. of Antiq.; Sand. Just. 493. See STIPULATION.

Acceptor, or Accepter, a person who accepts a bill of exchange drawn upon him; he is called a drawee before acceptance; he is the first and principal party liable to pay the amount of the bill.

Access, approach, or the means of approaching.

Accessary, or Accessory [particeps criminis quasi accedens ad culpam, Lat., as though assenting to the offence]. He who is not a chief actor in a felony, nor present at its perpetration, but yet is in some way concerned therein, either before or after the fact committed. An accessary before the fact is one, who being absent at the time of the commission of the felony, yet procures, counsels, or commands another to commit a crime. Absence is necessary to make him an accessary, for if he be present, he becomes a principal. An accessary after the fact may be, where a person knowing a felony to have been committed, receives, relieves, comforts or assists the felon. To make an accessary ex post facto, it is in the first place requisite that he knows that the felony has been committed; in the next place, he must receive, relieve, comfort, or assist the felon, and generally, any assistance whatever given to hinder the apprehension, trial, or punishment of the felon, makes the assister an accessary. In treason, and misdemeanours, there are no accessaries, either before or after the offence, every person implicated being a principal. In manslaughter there cannot be an accessary before the fact, for it is by judgment of law an unpremeditated offence. As to the trial and punishment of accessaries:—By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, the 'Accessories and Abettors' Act, ss. 1, 2, 3, an accessory before the fact to any felony may be indicted, tried, convicted, and punished in all respects as if he were a principal felon, and any accessory, either before or after the fact, may be indicted and convicted either as such accessory, together with the principal felon, or after his conviction, or may be indicted and convicted of a substantive felony, whether the principal felon shall have been convicted or not, or shall or shall not be amenable to justice, and may thereupon be punished as an accessory before or after the fact (if convicted as an accessory), may respectively be punished. An accessory after the fact is in general punishable with imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years (with or without hard labour), and may also be required to find security to keep the peace, or in default to suffer an additional imprisonment to the extent of one year. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 4.; but an accessory after the fact to murder is punishable by penal servitude for life, or not less than three years, or by imprisonment (with or without hard labour) to the extent of two years. (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 97.) See also Greave's Criminal Law; Roscoe's Digest of the Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases.

Accession [fr. accedo, Lat.], addition, arriving at, the commencement of a sovereign's reign. Also the absolute or conditional acceptance by a nation of a treaty already concluded between other countries.

Accession, property by. The doctrine of property arising from accession is grounded on the right of occupancy, and derived from the Roman law; thus, if any given corporeal substance receive an accession, either by natural or artificial means, as by the growth of vegetables, the pregnancy of animals, the embroidering of cloth, or the conversion of wood or metal into utensils, the original owner of the thing was entitled by his right of possession to the property of it under its improved state; but if the thing itself, by such operation, was changed into a different species, as by making wine, oil, or bread out of another's grapes, olives, or wheat, it belonged to the new operator, who only made a satisfaction to the former proprietor for the materials so converted. The brood of tame and domestic animals belongs to the owner of the dam or mother, the English law agreeing with the civil, that partus sequitur ventrem (the offspring follows the mother); and in accordance with the Roman law principle, si equam meam equus tuus prægnantem fecerit non est tuum sed meum quod natum est (if your horse get my mare with foal, the foal is not your property, but mine). But this maxim is for the most part disallowed in the human species.—Bracton, l. 2, c. 2, s. 3; Puff. De Jur. Nat. et G. l. 4, c. 7. The rule of the Roman law was expressed thus: Accessio cedit principali. Commentators have used the word accessio not only for the increase itself, but also for the mode in which the increase becomes one's property. Sand. Justin. 185; Dig. 34, l. 2, c. 19, s. 13.

Accessorium non ducit, sed sequitur suum principale, Co. Litt. 152.—(That which is accessary does not lead but follows its principal.)

Accessorius sequitur naturam sui principalis, 3 Inst. 139.—(An accessary follows the nature of his principal.)

Accessory to Adultery, a phrase used in the law of divorce, and derived from the criminal law. It implies more than connivance, which is merely knowledge with consent. A conniver abstains from interference, an accessory directly commands, advises, or procures the adultery. (Macqueen on the Law of Divorce, p. 78.) A husband or wife who has been accessory to the adultery of the other party to the marriage, cannot obtain a divorce on the ground of such adultery.—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, ss. 29 & 31.

Accident, an extraordinary incident; something not expected. It is also a head of Equitable jurisdiction, concurrent with that of the Courts of Law.

The meaning to be attached to the word 'accident,' in relation to equitable relief, is any unforeseen and undesigned event, productive of disadvantage. Against such an accident, Equity will relieve, should the Common Law remedy be inadequate, and the suitor be entitled to redress.

It is material to remark, that Courts of Law now entertain cases of accident, which in times past they would not have recognised; and that new statutes are constantly conferring upon them remedial equitable powers. Now it is a fundamental rule, that if originally the jurisdiction have properly attached to Equity, on account of the defective remedy at Law, such jurisdiction is not ousted by reason of the Courts of Law affording relief, which they formerly withheld, since that would be to place the powers of the Court of Chancery at the caprice of the Common Law tribunals. 'Upon what principle,' observed Lord Eldon (Kemp v. Pryor, 7 Ves. 249, 1802), 'can it be said the ancient jurisdiction of this Court is destroyed because Courts of Law now, very properly, perhaps, exercise that jurisdiction which they did not exercise forty years ago? Demands have been frequently recovered in Equity, which now would be without difficulty recovered at Law. I cannot hold that the jurisdiction is gone merely because the Courts of Law have exercised an Equitable jurisdiction, more especially in the action for money had and received.' The inquiry then to be made as to the adequacy of the legal remedy is, whether the Common Law would have granted suitable relief originally, for it may have acquired subsequently a concurrent, but certainly not an exclusive, remedial authority.

To illustrate this position, take the case of a lost bond or a negotiable security. Equity still retains, upon an affidavit of the loss, the jurisdiction of enforcing a compulsive discovery and payment, besides decreeing an indemnity, protecting the defendant from being liable to any after-demand in respect of such lost instrument, although profert of a bond or other deed has been abolished at Common Law (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 55), which will now give adequate relief if a proper bond of indemnity be offered; and although the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (s. 87), enacts that in case of any action founded upon a bill of exchange or other negotiable instrument, it shall be lawful for the Court or a Judge to order that the loss of such instrument shall not be set up, provided that an indemnity is given to the satisfaction of the Court or a Judge, or a Master, against the claims of any other person upon such negotiable instrument.

Where title-deeds are lost, the defect occasioned by such an accident will be supplied; thus a mortgage-deed being stolen, the mortgagor or purchaser of the property will be compelled to pay the loan or consideration-money upon the mortgagee's reconveyance, and indemnity against such loss. If, after a contract for sale of an estate, and before the title is accepted, the title-deeds are destroyed by fire, Equity will compel the specific performance of the contract, provided the vendor can furnish the purchaser with the means of showing what were the contents of the destroyed deeds, and of proving that such deeds were duly executed and delivered.

A purchaser being deemed the equitable owner of the purchased estate from the signing of the contract for sale, he will be compelled to complete the purchase, although the property be destroyed during the negotiation; but a bidder at a sale under the authority of the Court of Chancery not being deemed the purchaser until the certificate that he is the highest bidder has been confirmed, he is not liable to any loss by fire or otherwise which may happen to the property in the meantime; he would however have to pay the purchase-money if the estate were merely a life-interest, and the cestui que vie should die immediately after the acceptance of his bid.

It is upon the principle of relieving against the prejudicial consequences of accident by loss of deeds, that grants are often presumed: thus the payment of rent for twenty years raises the presumption that there has been a grant; the enclosure of a common for thirty years raises the presumption that the enclosure was properly made; and when a person has been in possession of property for a great length of time without interruption, Equity will not allow such possession to be disturbed.

A commission will be granted to ascertain the boundaries of estates, or to distinguish copyhold from freehold property in cases of confusion or accident requiring the Court's assistance and in the absence of adverse title; but a commission will not be granted to ascertain the boundaries of manors or parishes.

Although it is a delicate function to restrain the exercise of a legal right, yet Equity relieves against penalties and forfeitures on the ground of accident, provided an adequate compensation can be given, or the thing can be done afterwards without damaging the interests of other parties. Thus, in the case of a bond for the payment of money at a given time under a penalty, if the money is not paid, Equity will relieve against the penalty on the ground that it would be unjust for the obligee to avail himself of the penalty when an offer of full indemnity, by the payment of the sum due with interest, is offered Where an estate is sold by auction, and there is a condition that the deposit shall be forfeited on the non-completion of the contract by a certain day, Equity invariably relieves against the lapse of time. The Court also allows a redemption of a mortgage (although the estate is forfeited at Law), because the contract is simply a security, and time is not of its essence; therefore to insist upon taking the land for the money would be unconscionable. Again, in the administration of assets, if an executor or administrator pay the legacies and certain debts, upon the reliance of the sufficiency of the assets, and it afterwards turns out that from subsequently discovered liabilities or unforeseen occurrences the assets become insufficient, Equity will relieve, provided the executor or administrator have acted faithfully and cautiously, and this on the ground that otherwise he would be innocently subjected to an unjust loss arising from pure accident. If the master of an apprentice die before the term has expired, a return of part of the premium will be ordered, on account of the failure of the contract from accident. If a penalty be inserted in a bond or instrument to secure the enjoyment of a given thing, this is deemed the main intent, and the penalty is treated as accessional and as a mere security and collateral guard for the damage really incurred; if then the penalty be sued for at Law, Equity will stay the proceedings and direct an issue quantum damnificatus, in order to ascertain the actual damage sustained. If instead of a penalty specific compensation is provided for the breach of a contract, then Equity will not interfere; for the specific compensation is not a penalty, but a liquidated, stipulated, or ascertained damage. Where the condition of a bond or deed is to pay a higher rate of interest, if it be not satisfied by a given day, it is in the nature of a penalty, and will be relieved against. Equity relieves against forfeitures incurred by permissive, but not wilful, waste, though the latter may admit of compensation; but forfeitures under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, or conditions in Law which do not admit of compensation, or forfeitures which may be considered as limitations of an estate, and which determine it when they happen, cannot be relieved against.

The construction of covenants must be the same in Equity as at Law, that is to say, every covenant is to be expounded with regard to its context; the exposition must be ex antecedentibus et consequentibus and according to the reasonable sense and construction of the words; but their performance materially differs at Law and in Equity; for in the former Courts they must be strictly and literally performed; but in the latter substantially, according to the true and practical intent of the covenanters; and if, by unavoidable accident, fraud or ignorance not wilful, a literal execution be prevented, Equity will relieve upon compensation.

Though Equity will relieve against the consequences of a breach of covenant by the non-payment of rent, yet it will not assist a tenant who has assigned without the stipulated license, or protect him from the payment of rent, or obligation to repair, if the demised premises have been burned down, for he ought to have secured himself from such a catastrophe by a special stipulation.

By 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, a Court of Equity shall have power to relieve against a forfeiture for breach of covenant or condition to insure against loss or damage by fire, where no loss or damage by fire has happened, and the breach has, in the opinion of the Court, been committed through accident or mistake, or otherwise without fraud or gross negligence, and there is an insurance on foot at the time of the application to the Court in conformity with the covenant to insure, upon such terms as to the Court may seem fit.—(s. 4.)

The Court, where relief shall be granted, shall direct a record of such relief having been granted to be made by indorsement on the lease or otherwise.—(s. 5.)

The Court shall not have power under this Act to relieve the same person more than once in respect of the same covenant or condition; nor shall it have power to grant any relief under this Act where a forfeiture under the covenant in respect of which relief is sought shall have been already waived out of Court in favour of the person seeking the relief. (s. 6.)

The preceding provisions shall be applicable to leases for a term of years absolute, or determinable on a life or lives or otherwise, and also to a lease for the life of the lessee, or the life or lives of any other person or persons. (s. 9.)

'Upon the general result of the authorities,' writes Maddock (1 Prin. and Prac. Chan. 51), 'the rule perhaps may be stated thus:—that in all cases of breach of covenant, except by non-payment of rent, Equity will only give relief, provided the omission and consequent forfeiture are the effect of inevitable accident, and the injury or inconvenience occasioned thereby is capable of complete compensation; but that, wherever the transgression is wilful, or the compensation impracticable, Equity will refuse to interfere.' A further qualification of this proposition must of course be admitted wherever the forfeiture can be shown to have arisen from the misconduct, or to have been waived by the laches or subsequent dealings of the party who seeks to take advantage of it.

A condition precedent (i.e. one to be performed before an estate or interest can vest) must be, as a general rule, literally fulfilled, for Equity cannot relieve so as to give an estate which never vested; but in the case of a condition subsequent (i.e. one upon the breach or performance of which the continuance of an estate depends) it will prevent the devesting of an estate, if a proper compensation can be made.

'Upon a general survey of the grounds of equitable jurisdiction in cases of accident,' observes Story (Eq. Jur. c. 4, ad fin.), 'it will be found that they resolve themselves into the following results:—that the party seeking relief has a clear right, which cannot otherwise be enforced in a suitable manner; or that he will be subjected to an unjustifiable loss, without any blame or misconduct on his own part; or that he has a superior equity to the party from whom he seeks the relief.'

Courts of Common Law have also now jurisdiction to relieve in certain cases against 'accident,' for by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 83, 'it shall be lawful for the defendant or plaintiff in replevin in any cause in any of the superior courts in which, if judgment were obtained, he would be entitled to relief against such judgment on equitable grounds, to plead the facts which entitle him to such relief by way of defence; and the said courts are hereby empowered to receive such defence by way of plea,' &c.; and by s. 85, a plaintiff may reply facts which avoid such plea on equitable grounds. Under these sections it has been held that a plea on equitable grounds can only be sustained in cases where a Court of Equity would have granted unconditional relief, and that where a Court of Equity would only grant relief on imposing certain terms, a Court of Common Law—as it has no power to make decrees imposing terms—will not interfere. See Day's C. L. Proced. Acts, p. 241.

Moreover, by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 1, in the case of any ejectment for a forfeiture brought for non-payment of rent, the Court or a Judge shall have power upon rule or summons to give relief in a summary manner, but subject to appeal as hereinafter mentioned, at, to, and within the like time after execution, executed and subject to the same terms and conditions in all respects as to payment of rent, costs, and otherwise, as in the Court of Chancery; and if the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns shall, upon such proceeding, be relieved, he and they shall hold the demised lands according to the lease thereof made without any new lease. By s. 2, in the case of an ejectment for a forfeiture for breach of a covenant to insure against loss or damage by fire, the Court or a Judge shall have power upon rule or summons to give relief in a summary manner, but subject to such appeal as hereinafter mentioned in all cases in which such relief may now be obtained in the Court of Chancery under the provisions of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35 (above set out), and upon such terms as would be imposed in such Court.

By s. 4, an order of a Judge is subject to an appeal to the Court.

Accidental Fire. By 14 Geo. III. c. 78, s. 86, no action shall be prosecuted against any person in whose house, chamber, stable, barn, or other building, or on whose estate any fire shall accidentally begin; but nothing therein contained shall defeat any contract or agreement made between landlord and tenant. The statute will not protect tenants from the consequences of fires caused by their negligence. Woodf. Land. and Ten. by Horn, 462; 4 Step. Com. 173.

Accite, to summon.—Obs.

Accola, a husbandman who comes from some other country to till the land, and is thus distinguished from incola, viz. accola non propriam, propriam colit incola terram (Accola is one who does not till his own land, Incola one who does).—Du Fresne.

Accolade [fr. accoler, Fr., collum amplecti, Lat.], a ceremony anciently used in knighthood, by the king putting his hand upon the knight's neck.—Cowel. Greg. de Tours writes, that the kings of France, in conferring the gilt shoulder-belt, kissed the knight on the left cheek. The accollé, or blow, John of Salisbury assures us, was in use among the Normans; by this William the Conqueror conferred the honour of knighthood upon his son Henry. It was first given with the naked fist, but afterwards with the flat of a sword.

Accomenda, a contract whereby a person entrusts property to the master of a vessel, to be sold for their joint profit.—Italy, mar. law.

Accommodation, a friendly agreement; an amicable composition between persons at variance. An accommodation Bill of Exchange is where one person accepts a bill for another, there being no consideration between them, for the purpose of raising money upon it for the present necessity of one or both of them. Lord Eldon thus observed upon this subject: 'The pernicious effects of a fabricated credit, by the undue use of such instruments, drawn out of the ordinary course of trade, have been too much felt to require any observation: the use of them where there is no real demand subsisting between the different parties is injurious to the public as well as to the parties concerned in the negotiation' (Ex parte Wilson, 11 Ves. 411). Unless, perhaps, in cases where, from some sudden and unexpected event, a particular branch of commerce may be affected, or the trader unable to bring his commodities to a fair market in time to meet the payments for which he has to provide, then, by the temporary assistance of friends, through the medium of 'accommodation paper' (to use the commercial phrase applicable to such transactions), his credit may be saved, and he may be enabled to hold his goods till some fair opportunity of sale presents itself.—Chitty on Bills, 204. See 2 Mill's Pol. Econ. 41–46.

Accommodation Lands, land bought by a builder or speculator, who erects houses thereon, and then leases portions thereof upon an improved ground-rent.—Builder's Term.

Accommodation Works, works which a railway company is required to make and maintain for the accommodation of the owners or occupiers of land adjoining the railway, e. g. gates, bridges, culverts, fences, &c., &c.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 68.

Accomplice [fr. complice, Fr., complex, Lat., bound up with one in a project, but always in a bad sense], one concerned with another or others in the commission of a crime.—Hawk. P. C. 87.

Accord [fr. accorder, Fr., to agree], is an agreement between two persons, one of whom has a right of action against the other, that the latter should do or give, and the former accept, something in satisfaction of the right of action. When the agreement is executed, and satisfaction has been made, it is called accord and satisfaction. Accord and satisfaction bars the right of acting, accord without satisfaction does not. In the case of an ascertained debt, the acceptance of a smaller sum is no satisfaction, e. g. payment of £50 is no answer to an action for a debt of £100; though if anything other than money, e. g. a negotiable instrument for a smaller amount or a peppercorn, had been accepted in satisfaction, the action would have been barred. See 3 Steph. Com., 433; 1 Smith's L. C., 5th Ed., 288; Bullen's Precedents of Pleadings, p. 281 n.

Accouchment, the giving birth to a child.

Account, or Accompt [fr. compte, Fr., computo, Lat.], a registry of debts, credits, and charges, or a detailed statement of a series of receipts (credits) and disbursements (debits) of money, which have taken place between two or more persons. Accounts are either—(1) open, where the balance is not struck, or it is not accepted by all the parties; (2) stated, where it has been expressly or impliedly acknowledged to be correct by all the parties; and (3) settled, where it has been accepted and discharged.

There is at the Common Law a very ancient, but now obsolete, action of account, to compel parties to render a true statement of monetary transactions that have arisen between them; but in consequence of the inconvenience and expense of passing accounts before arbitrators or auditors, to whom the Court of Law delegates its jurisdiction, and who are merely appointed pro hâc vice in such an action, and the superior advantages afforded by a Court of Equity, not only from the great and accurate knowledge of the intricacies of accounts possessed by its officers, consequent upon their extensive practice in such matters, but also from its more efficacious power to purge the defendant upon oath as to the truth of his representations and other advantages, suitors now invariably resort to the Equity Courts for relief in most dealings involving accounts. And Equity has extended its remedy to many cases of implied and constructive trusts, as well as to matters of fraudulent contrivance and tortious misconduct, which the action at Common Law could never have reached. See as to the action of Account, Steph. Com., vol. 2, 103 n., and vol. 3, 548.

Equity entertains suits for accounts when they are mutual, i.e. where there exists a series of expenditures on one side, and of payments on the other, and not merely one payment and one receipt, and also where the account is on one side only, but is of so complicated and intricate a nature that it cannot be satisfactorily disposed of at law, and a discovery is wanted which is material to the right of relief. But for a mere matter of set-off at law a suit in Equity will not be the remedy.

The usual cases of accounts arising from contracts or quasi contracts, which are investigated in Equity, are the following:—Agency, Apportionment, General Average and Contribution, Waste, and Winding-up of Companies.

In suits for accounts, both parties are deemed plaintiffs (actores) when the cause is before the Court upon its merits; a defendant may, therefore, have an order for a ne exeat regno even against a co-defendant, and if a balance is ultimately found for the defendant, he is entitled to a decree against the plaintiff for its amount, since it is implied, if not expressed in the decree to account, that the balance shall be paid to the party entitled thereto. If the plaintiff die after an interlocutory decree to account, the defendant can revive the suit against his personal representatives, and if the defendant die, his personal representatives can revive the suit against those of the plaintiff. If the legal right be doubtful, an issue at law is directed; and if the right be there sustained an account follows. After the Court has decreed an account, an action at law cannot be brought for the same cause, and the party persisting in bringing it would be attached.

The Statute of Limitations cannot be pleaded in bar to an open account, unless all accounts have ceased above six years. By 'The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856,' 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 9, 'All actions of accounts or for not accounting, and suits for such accounts, as concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant, their factors or servants, shall be commenced and sued within six years after the cause of such actions or suits, or when such cause has already arisen, then within six years after the passing of this act (29 July, 1856), and no claim in respect of a matter which arose more than six years before the commencement of such action or suit shall be enforceable by action or suit by reason only of some other matter of claim comprised in the same account having arisen within six years next before the commencement of such action or suit.' In the case of a legal demand, Equity acts in obedience, and not merely by analogy, to the Statute of Limitations; but as to an equitable demand, Equity acts in analogy thereto or refuses to interfere after a considerable lapse of time.

These are the general principles which govern Equity in decreeing an account when such is the main object of the suit; but, it must be recollected, that in very many proceedings instituted for other kinds of redress, an account is frequently incident to the relief sought; and it may be laid down as a broad rule, that whenever the relationship of trustee and cestui que trust is established between the parties, the cestui que trust has always the right to an account from his trustee, since without it he would probably lose the full benefit and proper protection of his interests.—1 Chit. Eq. Ind. by Mac. 3–36; Story, Eq. Jurisp. By the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, ss. 3 & 5), power is given to the Court or a Judge before or at the trial to refer to arbitration matters of mere account which cannot be conveniently tried in Court.

Account current, a running or open account between two or more persons or firms.

Account stated, a common count in a declaration upon a contract under which the plaintiff may prove an absolute acknowledgment of his claim by the defendant. It may be joined with any other count for a money demand, though it may not be intended to establish a distinct subject-matter of complaint in respect of each of such counts.

Accountable Receipt, a written acknowledgment of the receipt of money or goods to be accounted for by the receiver. It differs from an ordinary receipt, or acquittance, in this that the latter imports merely that money has been paid. See Clark v. Newsam, 1 Excheq. 131. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 23, the forgery of an accountable receipt, or any indorsement on, or assignment of, it, with intent to defraud, is a felony punishable by penal servitude for life, or not less than three years, or imprisonment not exceeding three years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement. — Greave's Criminal Law Acts, 284; Roscoe's Crim. Law, 503, 504.

Accountant, or Accomptant, one whose business it is to compute, adjust, and range in due order accounts.

Accountant in Bankruptcy, an officer who has the control and management of the proceeds of bankrupts' estates. Upon the first vacancy the office is to be abolished, and its duties discharged by the Chief Registrar. See 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, ss. 31–35, 55; and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, ss. 12, 67, 127, 181, 183.

Accountant-General, or Accomptant-General, an officer of the Court of Chancery, appointed by Act of Parliament to receive all money lodged in Court, and to place the same in the Bank of England for security. (12 Geo. I. c. 32; 1 Geo. IV. c. 35; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, ss. 18–22, & 39. Smi. Ch. Pr. 18.) There is a similar officer in the Court of Chancery in Ireland.

Accouple, to marry.

Accredit, to give credit to. To accredit a diplomatic agent is to receive him in his public character and give him credit and rank accordingly.

Accredulitare, to purge an offence by an oath.—Blount.

Accretion [fr. accresco, or adcresco, Lat.], the act of growing to a thing.

Accretion of land, land gained from the sea. It is of two kinds: by alluvion, i. e. by the washing up of sand or soil, so as to form firm ground; or by dereliction, as when the sea shrinks below the usual water-mark. If this accretion of land be by small and imperceptible degrees, it belongs to the owner of the land immediately adjacent to it, in accordance with the maxim De minimis non curat Lex (the Law cares not about trifles), but if it be sudden and considerable it belongs to the Crown.—4 Hale, De Jure Maris, p. 14; 1 Steph. Com. 457.

Accroaching, attempting to exercise royal power.

Accroche [fr. accrocher, Fr.], to hook or grapple unto, to encroach. The French use it for delay, as accrocher un procès, to stay proceedings in a suit.—Cowel.

Accrue [fr. accroitre, accru Fr., fr. crescere Lat. to grow], to grow to, or to arise.

Accruing costs, expenses incurred after judgment.

Accumulation, a gathering together, heaping up, or amassing. The dominion over property, and its rents, issues, and profits, is restrained by our law as regards perpetuity and accumulation. The rules against perpetuities and accumulations bound the proprietary right on every side, and limit that species of vanity, which, in the language of Lord Nottingham, 'fights against God, by affecting a stability which human providence can never attain to.'—2 Swanst. 460. See PERPETUITY.

It being deemed expedient by the legislature that all dispositions of real or personal estates, whereby their profits or produce are directed to be accumulated, and their beneficial enjoyment postponed, should be restricted, and 'posthumous avarice' put an end to, the 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 98, was passed. This statute is sometimes quoted as Lord Loughborough's Act, from the circumstance that Lord Loughborough, L. C., introduced the Bill into the House of Lords, but it is more commonly called 'The Thellusson Act,' because the case of Thellusson v. Woodford (4 Ves. 227–343, 1798, and 11 Ves. 112–151, 1805) was the occasion of its enactment. It is a restraining, remedial statute, and declares, that no person or persons shall by any deed, surrender, will, codicil, or otherwise howsoever, settle or dispose of any real or personal property, so and in such manner that the rents, issues, profits, or produce thereof shall be wholly or partially accumulated for any longer term than—

(1) The life or lives of any such grantor or grantors, settlor or settlors; or

(2) The term of twenty-one years from the death of any such grantor, settlor, devisor or testator; or

(3) During the minority or respective minorities of any person or persons who shall be living or en ventre sa mère at the time of the death of such grantor, devisor, or testator; or

(4) During the minority or respective minorities only, of any person or persons who, under the uses or trusts of the deed, surrender, will, or other assurance, directing such accumulations, would for the time being, if of full age, be entitled unto the rents, issues, and profits, or the interest, dividends, or annual produce so directed to be accumulated; and in every case where any accumulation shall be directed otherwise than as aforesaid, such direction shall be null and void; and the rents, issues, profits, and produce of such property so directed to be accumulated, shall so long as the same shall be directed to be accumulated contrary to the provisions of this act, go to and be received by such person or persons as would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed.—(s. 1.)

Nothing in this act contained shall extend—

(1) To any provision for payment of debts of any grantor, settlor, or devisor, or other person or persons; or

(2) To any provision for raising portions for any child or children of any grantor, settlor, or devisor, or any child or children of any person taking any interest under such conveyance, settlement, or devise; or

(3) To any direction touching the produce of timber or wood upon any lands or tenements; but that all such provisions and directions shall and may be made and given as if the act had not been passed.—(s. 2.) By s. 3 it is provided that the act shall not extend to any disposition respecting heritable property in Scotland; and by s. 4, that the act shall not affect wills made before the passing of the act, unless the testator shall have been living and of sound mind for twelve months after the passing of this act. Consult Hargrave on Accumulation, for a full exposition of this statute.

The statute operates as a restraint upon those trusts for accumulation, which aim at a duration beyond the statutory limits, simply by causing them to cease and become of no effect immediately upon the twenty-first anniversary of the death of the settlor or testator, and until that date, leaves them as valid and effectual in all respects as if the act had not passed. In Griffiths v. Vere (9 Ves. 132), Lord Eldon said the object of those who introduced this bill was simply to declare the limitations void, and to make the rents and profits go, not to those claiming by the disposition, but (by the effect of the act striking out the direction for accumulation) to those who would have been entitled in cases of intestacy. Thus, if a testator directed what the act authorises him to direct, that for the first twenty-one years after his death there should be accumulation, at the end of that time there might be a very long period, during which the rents and profits would go to no one by the disposition, but in the case of real estate would belong to the heir-at-law, and in the case of personal estate (unless there was an express disposition of what was not disposed of), to the next of kin. So that the effect of the statutory vacating of the accumulating trust is not to accelerate the title of the person to whom the property is limited at the termination of the trust, but merely to produce an intestacy pro tanto.

It has been thought that under cover of the second exception of the act the restraints of the act may be altogether evaded. For instance, there seems to be no objection to a trust for accumulating the rents and profits of a testator's real estate, or the interest and dividends of personalty, within the rule against perpetuities relating to the corpus of property, in order to raise any specific sum as a portion for the child, who shall be then living, of a person taking an interest under the same will. If so, Mr. Thellusson's will would become a valid precedent under the present state of the law, if the testator limit the amount, which he thinks sufficient to give as a portion or portions to his remote descendants, and direct his trustees to pay any small annuity to all and every of his descendants, whose children shall be presumptively entitled to such portions.

Accumulative Judgment. If a person already under sentence for a crime be convicted of another offence, the Court is empowered to pass a second sentence, to commence after the expiration of the first.

Accusare nemo se debet, nisi coram Deo: Hard. 139.—(No one is bound to accuse himself, unless in the presence of God.)

Accusation, the formal charging of any person with a crime.

Accusator post rationabile tempus non est audiendus, nisi se bene de omissione excusaverit. Moor, 817.—(An accuser ought not to be heard after the expiration of a reasonable time, unless he can account satisfactorily for the delay.)

Accused, a person charged with an offence, accusing of crime.

Ace [fr. as, Lat. and Fr., asso, It., a single one] of Hearts, an unlawful game.—4 Steph. Com. 353.

Acemannes-ceaster [Acemanni Castra, Lat.] Bath.

Acephali, the levellers in the reign of Hen. I., who acknowledged no head or superior. Leges H. 1. Also certain ancient heretics who asserted that there was but one substance in Christ and one nature.

Ac etiam billæ (and also to a bill). A clause which was formerly inserted in a writ where the action required bail. Now no longer used.

Acherset, a measure of corn, conjectured to have been the same with our quarter or eight bushels.—Cowel.

Achwre [Ach-gwre, near belt], an enclosure of wattles or thorns surrounding a building, at such a distance as to prevent cattle reaching and damaging the thatch.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Acknowledgment-money, a sum paid in some parts of England by copyhold-tenants on the death of their lords, as a recognition of their new lords, in like manner as money is usually paid on the attornment of tenants. Cowel.

Acknowledgment of a wife's assurance. Numerous and elaborate formalities must be observed in order that a married woman may legally convey her estate, or extinguish her rights or powers in realty, or money directed to be laid out in realty. These are prescribed by the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, ss. 77–91, and the rules of Hilary and Trinity Terms, 1834, framed by the Court of Common Pleas; and see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 75. As to Personalty in Reversion, see 20 & 21 Vict. c. 57, s. 2.

A married woman not being a tenant-in-tail, may by an ordinary deed dispose of her lands of any tenure, and money subject to be invested in the purchase of lands, and also may dispose of, release, surrender, or extinguish any estate which she alone, or she and her husband in her right, may have in any lands of any tenure, or in any money to be laid out in land, and also may release or extinguish any power vested in, or limited, or reserved, to her in regard to any lands of any tenure, or any such money, or in regard to any estate in any lands of any tenure, or in any such money, and also may convey her contingent, executory, and future interests, and possibilities, coupled with an interest, and also rights of entry as fully and effectually as she could do if she were a feme sole, but such disposition will not be valid and effectual unless her husband concur in the deed by which the same is to be effected, nor unless the deed be produced and acknowledged by her (except it be such a deed as may be executed by her in the character of protector, for the sole purpose of giving her consent to the disposition of a tenant-in-tail), upon her executing it, or afterwards, as her act and deed, before a judge of one of the superior courts at Westminster, or before two of the perpetual commissioners, or two special commissioners, or the judge of a county court, under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, ss. 26 & 73; but before such acknowledgment can be received, he or they must examine her apart from her husband, touching her knowledge of such deed, and shall ascertain whether she freely and voluntarily consent to such deed, and unless she freely and voluntarily consent, he or they cannot permit her to acknowledge it; and then the deed will, so far as relates to her execution of it, be void.

The certificates and affidavits verifying the same must, within one lunar month from the making of the acknowledgment, be delivered to the proper officer of the Common Pleas, who shall not after that time receive the same without the direction of the court or a judge.

The above statute excepts the case of a married woman being a tenant-in-tail. "Where she is such a tenant, and desires to bar the entail, the deed must be enrolled in Chancery, according to the directions of the act: and should such deed operate as a transfer of her beneficial interest, it must also be duly acknowledged by her as just explained. So that enrolment and acknowledgment are both requisite in such a case. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 70; and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 75; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 97.

Acquisition, the act of procuring property.

Acquittal [fr. acquitter, Fr.; quitte, quietus, Lat. to free, acquit, or discharge], a deliverance and setting free of a person from the suspicion or guilt of an offence; also to be free from entries and molestations by a superior lord, for services issuing out of lands. Cowel. Acquittal is of two kinds—(1) Acquittal in deed, as when a person is cleared by verdict; and (2) Acquittal in law, as if two be indicted for a felony, the one as principal and the other as accessory, and the jury acquit the principal, by law the accessory is also acquitted. 2 Inst. 384.

Acquittal contracts, a discharge from an obligation, which is either by deed, prescription, or tenure.—Co. Litt. 100 a.

Acquittance, a release or written discharge of a sum of money or debt due, as where a man is bound to pay money on a bond, rent reserved upon a lease, &c., and the party to whom it is due, on receipt thereof, gives a writing under his hand witnessing that he is paid, this will be such a discharge in law that he cannot demand and recover the sum or duty again, if the acquittance be produced. Termes de la Ley, 15.

Acre [fr. αγρος, Gr.; ager, Lat.; akrs, Goth.; acker, Germ.], a measure of land. The imperial or standard English acre contains four roods, each rood forty poles or perches, each pole 272¼ square feet, and consequently each acre =43,560 square feet.—5 Geo. IV. c. 74; 6 Geo. IV. c. 12, and 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 63. The French acre, arpent, contains 1¼ English acre, or 54,450 square English feet. The Strasburg acre is about ½ an English acre. The Welsh acre contains commonly two English acres. The Irish acre is equal to 1 acre, 2 roods, and 19 perches $\frac{37}{121}$ English. The Scotch, 6,150⅔ square yards, the Roman, 3,200, and the Egyptian aroura, 3,698⅘.

Act of bankruptcy, an act, the commission of which by a debtor renders him liable to be adjudged a bankrupt. Before 'The Bankruptcy Act, 1861,' 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, a man was not liable to be made a bankrupt unless he was a trader, and had committed an act of bankruptcy as defined by the statutes in force.

By the recent Act, two important alterations have been made in the law of bankruptcy. 1. A non-trader is now in certain cases liable to be made a bankrupt, and 2. A debtor may be made a bankrupt in several cases, although he may not have committed any act which in terms is declared by any statute to be an act of bankruptcy. The cases in which a man may now be adjudged bankrupt are specified in 'The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849,' 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, and 'The Bankruptcy Act, 1861,' 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134.

These are acts of bankruptcy under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. By sect. 67: If a trader shall depart this realm, or shall remain abroad, or shall depart from his dwelling-house, or otherwise absent himself, or begin to keep his house, or suffer himself to be arrested or taken in execution for a debt not due, or yield himself to prison, or suffer himself to be outlawed, or procure himself to be arrested or taken in execution; or his goods or money to be attached, sequestered, or taken in execution; or make or cause to be made any fraudulent grant or conveyance of any of his lands or goods, or any fraudulent surrender of any of his copyhold lands, or any fraudulent gift, delivery, or transfer of any of his goods (sect. 68) provided that no conveyance or assignment by deed of all the estate and effects of a trader, shall be an act of bankruptcy, if made in trust for the benefit of all his creditors, unless a petition for adjudication be filed within three months, if such deed be executed by all the trustees within fifteen days of its execution by the trader, and its execution be attested by an attorney or solicitor, and notice thereof be given in the Gazette.

Sect. 71. When a trader, after a petition for adjudication has been filed against him, shall pay or deliver to the petitioning creditor any satisfaction or security whereby the petitioning creditor shall receive more in the pound than the other creditors.

Sect. 77. If a creditor of a trader having privilege of Parliament to an amount sufficient to support a petition for adjudication, shall file an affidavit in any Court of Record at Westminster that such debt is justly due, and that the debtor is such trader, and shall sue out of this same Court and personally serve a writ of summons, and such trader shall not, within one month after service, pay, secure, or compound for the debt or enter into a bond with sureties to pay such sum as shall be recovered with costs, and cause an appearance to be entered in such action, he shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy from the time of the service of the summons.

Sect. 78. A creditor of a trader may file an affidavit of his debt in the Court in the district in which the trader resides, and of the service on the trader of the particulars of his demand requiring immediate payment. The Court may issue a summons calling upon the trader to appear, and if he shall not appear, or shall appear and shall refuse to admit the demand, and shall not depose that he has a good defence upon the merits, and (if required) shall not enter into a bond with sureties to pay such sum as shall be recovered with costs, he shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy on the eighth day after service of the summons, provided a petition for adjudication be filed within two months from the filing such affidavit (ss. 79 & 80). If he shall admit the demand, and shall not pay or satisfy, or give security for it within seven days after his admission, he shall, on the eighth day, be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy if a petition for adjudication be filed within two months after filing the affidavit (s. 81).

Sect. 82. If he admit part, and shall not depose that he has a good defence on the merits to the residue, and, if required, enter into bond to pay the sum that may be recovered by action and costs, if within seven days after his filing such admission he shall not pay or offer to pay, or secure or compound for the sum admitted, and as to residue shall not pay, secure, or compound for the same, he shall, on the eighth day after service of the summons, be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, provided a petition for adjudication be filed within two months from the filing of the affidavit, provided he shall not be liable to be made a bankrupt on any such act of bankruptcy, unless a petition for adjudication be filed within twelve months.

As to acts of bankruptcy under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134:

The following acts of a non-trader are acts of bankruptcy. Sect. 70: If any person, not being a trader, shall, with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, depart this realm, or being out of this realm shall with such intent remain abroad, or shall with such intent make any fraudulent conveyance, gift, delivery, or transfer of his real or personal estate, or any part thereof respectively, such person shall be deemed to have thereby committed an act of bankruptcy: provided always, that before any adjudication in bankruptcy shall be made against the debtor under this section the following rules shall be observed: (1) A copy of the petition for adjudication shall be served personally on the debtor, either within the jurisdiction, or in such place or country, or within such limits abroad, as the Court shall, upon application for that purpose, direct. (2) The copy of the petition shall have endorsed thereon a memorandum, in a form to be settled by a general order, specifying the time within which the debtor is to appear on such petition; and such time shall, when the service is to be made abroad, be the time which the Court shall think reasonable, having regard to the place or country where the service is to be made. (3) In no case shall the time for appearance be less than thirty days after service. (4) If such personal service has not been effected, the Court must be satisfied that every reasonable effort was made to effect the same, and that the attempts to serve such petition came to the knowledge of the debtor and were defeated by his conduct. (5) If at the expiration of the time limited for appearance the Court shall, on the hearing of such petition, be satisfied that an act of bankruptcy has been committed within the meaning of this section, it may adjudge such debtor to be a bankrupt. Provided always that no non-trader, who shall be abroad at the time of the passing of this act, shall be deemed to remain abroad with intent to defeat or delay his creditors until the expiration of six months after the passing of this act.

Sect. 71. If any debtor, whether a trader or not, having been arrested or committed to prison for debt, or on any attachment for nonpayment of money, shall, upon such or any other arrest or commitment for debt or nonpayment of money, or upon any detention for debt, lie in prison, being a trader, for fourteen days, or, not being a trader, for two calendar months, or having been arrested for any cause, shall lie in prison as aforesaid, after any detainer for debt lodged against him, and not discharged, every such debtor shall thereby be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy; or if any such debtor, having been arrested, committed, or detained for debt, shall escape out of prison or custody, every such debtor shall be deemed to have thereby committed an act of bankruptcy from the time of such arrest, commitment, or detention: but no debtor shall be adjudged bankrupt on the ground of having lain in prison as aforesaid, unless having been summoned he shall not offer such security for the debt or debts in respect of which he is imprisoned or detained, as the commissioner or registrar whose duty it would otherwise be to adjudicate shall deem reasonably sufficient.

Sect. 72. If any debtor, whether a trader or not, shall file in the office of the chief registrar, or with the registrar of a district court of bankruptcy, or of a county court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy, a declaration in writing, in such form as general orders shall direct, signed by such debtor, and attested by a registrar of the Court, or by an attorney or solicitor, that he is unable to meet his engagements, every such debtor shall be deemed thereby to have committed an act of bankruptcy at the time of filing such declaration, provided a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy shall be filed by or against him within two months from the filing of such declaration.

Sect. 73. If any execution shall be levied by seizure and sale of any of the goods of a trader and debtor upon any judgment in any action personal for recovery of a money demand exceeding £50, such debtor shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy from the date of the seizure.

Sect. 75. The filing of a petition by or against a debtor, whether a trader or not, in any court having jurisdiction for the relief of insolvent debtors in insolvency or bankruptcy in any of her Majesty's dominions, colonies, or dependencies, and the adjudication of an act of insolvency or bankruptcy on such petition, shall, for the purposes of this act, be accounted and adjudged conclusive evidence of an act of bankruptcy committed by such debtor at the time of filing such petition, or of the filing the petition on which the adjudication of an act of insolvency or bankruptcy shall have been made; and any creditor or creditors of such debtor whose debt or debts shall be of sufficient amount to enable him or them to petition for adjudication of bankruptcy under this act, may, at any time within two months after notice of such adjudication shall have been given in the London Gazette, petition for adjudication of bankruptcy under this act against such debtor, and under such petition all such proceedings may be had and taken as are authorised and directed by this act.

The compulsive and involuntary act of bankruptcy by nonpayment, &c., after summons, is effected thus:—By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, s. 75:

Every judgment creditor who is or shall be entitled to sue out against a debtor a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, or to charge the debtor in execution, in respect of any debt amounting to £50, exclusive of costs, shall be entitled, at the end of one week from the signing of judgment, to sue out against the debtor if a trader, or not being a trader at the end of one calendar month, and whether he be in custody or not, a summons, to be called a judgment debtor summons, requiring him to appear and be examined respecting his ability to satisfy the debt. By s. 90, the debt must be contracted after the passing of the act.

Sect. 77. Where, after the commencement of this act, a decree or order of a court of equity, or an order in bankruptcy or insolvency or lunacy, directing the payment of money, is disobeyed by the debtor, the same having been duly served on him, and the person entitled to receive the money or interested in enforcing payment of it has obtained a peremptory order of the competent jurisdiction, fixing a day for payment, and the debtor does not, being a trader, within seven days, or, not being a trader, within two calendar months, after service on him of the peremptory order, or, such order having been duly served, within seven days after the day fixed by the peremptory order for payment (which shall last happen), pay the money, or secure, or tender or compound for it, to the satisfaction of the creditor, the creditor shall be entitled at the end of those seven days to sue out against the debtor a judgment debtor summons.

Sect. 78. The judgment debtor summons shall, unless the court shall in any case otherwise direct, issue according to the following rules:—Where the debtor is in England, then out of the court of bankruptcy for the district in which the debtor usually lives, or at the time of the issuing of the summons happens to be. Where the debtor is not in England, then out of the court of bankruptcy for the district in which is the debtor's usual or last known place of abode in England.

Sect. 79. It must be served, if the debtor is in England, personally, unless the Court otherwise direct, or if he is out of England, in such manner as the Court shall deem fit.

Sect. 83. If after service of such summons, or due notice thereof, the debtor shall not pay the debt and costs, or secure or compound for the same to the satisfaction of the creditor, the Court may on the appearance of the debtor, or on his non-appearance having no lawful impediment, adjudge him bankrupt without the presentation of a petition for adjudication or other proceeding.

Sect. 86. Any debtor may petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against himself, and the filing of such petition shall be an act of bankruptcy, without any previous declaration of insolvency by such debtor.

Sect. 98. A debtor, whether trader or not, imprisoned for any debt, may petition for an adjudication of bankruptcy against himself in formâ pauperis, and if not previously discharged by a Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy under s. 101, he may be brought up to the County Court of the district, and shall be examined by that Court and adjudged bankrupt.—Sect. 100. The gaoler of every prison in England and Wales is to make monthly returns of persons in his custody for debt to the London Court, the District Court, or County Court within the jurisdiction of which the gaol is situated.—Sect. 102. The Court which has jurisdiction is to order its Registrar to attend at the prison; and he, having given notice to the creditors, is directed to examine every prisoner included in the return who, if a trader, has been in prison fourteen days, and if a non-trader has been in prison two months, touching his estate, &c., and shall have power to make an order of adjudication in bankruptcy against each, and to grant protection, to order his release, and to direct in what Court the adjudication shall be prosecuted.

A notice of an act of bankruptcy to accredited agents of public companies is sufficient, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, ss. 87 & 88. All the members of a firm must have committed an act of bankruptcy to sustain a joint petition against them.—Arch. Bank. 40, 1863.

Act in Pais [Pais, Law Fr. country], a thing done out of court, and not a matter of record.

Act of Parliament, a statute, law, or edict, made by the Queen, with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and the Commons, in Parliament assembled. Acts of parliament form the leges scriptæ, i. e. the written laws of the kingdom. The oldest now extant is Magna Charta, and the earliest statute of which any record exists is that of Gloster, 6 Edw. I. The statutes from Magna Charta down to the end of the reign of Edw. II., including also some which (because it is doubtful to which of the three reigns of Hen. III., Edw I. or II. we should assign them) are termed incerti temporis, compose what have been called the vetera statuta; those from the beginning of the reign of Edward III. being contradistinguished by the appellation of the nova statuta. An act of parliament cannot be altered, amended, dispensed with, suspended or repealed, but by the same authority of parliament which created it, the maxim being, that it requires the same power to dissolve as to create an obligation.

Statutes are either public or private, general or special. The distinction between public and private acts was first made in the reign of Richard III. A public or general act is a universal rule applied to the whole community, which the Courts must notice judicially and ex officio, although not formally set forth by a party claiming an advantage under it. But special or private acts are rather exceptions than rules, since they only operate upon particular persons and private concerns, and the Courts are not bound to take notice of them if they are not formally pleaded, unless an express clause is inserted in them, that they shall be deemed public acts, and shall be judicially taken notice of as such, without being specially pleaded; which provision is now usually introduced. For convenience of reference, the printed Statute Book of a parliamentary session is classed thus:—(1) public general acts; (2) local and personal acts, declared public, and to be judicially noticed; (3) private acts, printed by the Queen's printer, and whereof the printed copies may be given in evidence; (4) private acts, not printed. For a chronological table of Public Statutes from Magna Charta to 16 & 17 Vict. c. 137, see 4 Chit. Stat. 365–384, 2nd edit.

With regard to the different nature of their objects or provisions, public general acts are sometimes described as declaratory, penal, or remedial; declaratory, make plain what the Common Law is or has ever been, when it has almost fallen into disuse, or has become disputable by its obscurity; penal, impose punishments for offences committed; and remedial, supply defects or redress abuses in the existing law. They are also distinguished into enlarging or restraining, enabling or disabling acts.

The principal rules for the interpretation of acts of parliament are the following:—(1) that a statute begins to operate from the time when it receives the royal assent, unless otherwise provided. But where an act expires before a bill continuing it has received the royal assent, the latter act takes effect from the expiration of the former, unless otherwise provided, and except as to any penalty (48 Geo. III. c. 106); (2) it is to be construed equitably, not according to its mere letter, but the intent and object with which it was made; (3) that these points be considered—the old law, the mischief, and the remedy; (4) that a remedial statute be more liberally, and a penal more strictly construed; (5) in construing a statute, all other statutes made in pari materiâ, ought to be taken into consideration; (6) a statute which treats of things and persons of an inferior rank, cannot by any general words be extended to those of a superior; (7) where the provision of a statute is general, everything which is necessary to make such provision effectual is supplied by the Common Law; (8) a subsequent statute may repeal a prior one, not only expressly, but by implication, as when it is contrary thereto, i. e. so clearly repugnant that it necessarily implies a negative, but if the acts can stand together, they shall have a concurrent efficacy; (9) if a statute, that repeals another, is subsequently repealed, the repealed statute no longer revives without express words, 13 Vict. c. 21, ss. 5 & 6; and (10) acts of parliament derogatory from the power of subsequent parliaments do not bind.

Statutes are variously cited: many of the old statutes are called after the name of the place where the parliament which passed them was held, as the Statute of Merton, or Marlebridge, or Winchester, or Westminster; others are denominated entirely from their subject, as the Fines and Recoveries Act, the Non-arrest Act; some are distinguished from their initial words, as the statute Quia emptores or De donis. But since the time of Edward II. they are generally cited by naming the years of the sovereign's reign during which the session of parliament was holden in which the statute was passed, together with the chapter or particular act, according to its numerical order, as 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74. All the acts of a session together make properly but one statute, and therefore, when two sessions have been held in one year, it is usual to mention stat. 1 or 2. Consult Bac. Abr. Statute, Barrington or Dwarris on Statutes; 1 Steph. Com. p. 69; and Stamp's Index to the Statute Law.

Acts of Parliament bind all persons within the territory to which they extend, but not the crown unless it be specially mentioned. They extend to England, which by 20 Geo. II., c. 42, s. 3, is deemed to include the dominion of Wales and town of Berwick-upon-Tweed; and also, if passed since the respective unions of those kingdoms with England, to Scotland and Ireland, though not expressly mentioned, unless they are excepted by express words or by necessary implication. They do not extend to the Isle of Man, a distinct territory from England, nor to the Channel Islands, Jersey, Guernsey, Alderney, and Sark, and their appendages, which were originally parcel of the Duchy of Normandy, unless they are expressly mentioned. As to the colonies, if acquired by occupancy, all acts of parliament passed previously to their acquisition, so far as they are suitable to the social state of an infant colony, extend to them upon their acquisition; but it is otherwise if they have been acquired by treaty or conquest; and as to both kinds they are not affected by acts of parliament passed since their acquisition unless express mention of them be made. So also an act of parliament does not apply to India unless it be expressly mentioned. See 1 Steph. Comm. 85–138.

By 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, 'An act for shortening the language used in Acts of Parliament,' it is provided inter alia that an act may be altered, amended, or repealed in the same session (s. 1). That words importing the masculine gender shall include females, and the singular shall include the plural, and the plural the singular, unless the contrary as to gender or number is expressly provided; that 'month' shall mean calendar month, unless words be added showing lunar month to be intended; county shall mean also county of a town or of a city, unless such extended meaning is expressly excluded by words; 'land' shall include messuages, tenements, and hereditaments, houses, buildings of any tenure, unless there are words to exclude houses and buildings, or to restrict the meaning to tenements of some particular tenure; and 'oath,' 'swear,' and 'affidavit' shall include affirmation, declaration, affirming and declaring, in the case of persons allowed by law to declare or affirm instead of swearing (s. 4). That where any act repealing in whole or in part any former act is itself repealed, such last repeal shall not revive the act or provisions before repealed unless words be added reviving such act or provisions (s. 5). Whenever any act shall be made, repealing in whole or in part any former act, and substituting some provision or provisions instead of the provision or provisions repealed, such provision or provisions so repealed shall remain in force until the substituted provision or provisions shall come into operation by force of the last made act (s. 6). That every act made after the commencement of the act shall be deemed and taken to be a public act, and shall be judicially taken notice of as such unless the contrary be expressly provided and declared by such act (s. 7). That this act shall commence and take effect from and immediately after the commencement of the next session of parliament (s. 8).

The confused mass of law contained in the Statute Book, occasioning, as it often does, great uncertainty as to what the law really is, has long been felt to be a great evil. For this evil the remedy would seem to be a classified consolidation of such of the Statute Law as remains in force.

The main objects to be effected by such consolidation would appear to be these:—

(1) The expurgation of all obsolete and repealed acts, and all abrogated portions of acts, together with the total rejection of every kind of tautology and all unnecessary words and phrases.

(2) The re-entitling of those acts whose present titles afford no clue to their purpose, and the separation of acts comprising subjects of a totally different nature.

(3) The insertion of those unrepealed statutes and clauses of statutes which are omitted in the printed copies, and the collation in one act of the continuing, enlarging, explaining, correcting, repealing, and reviving acts made in pari materiâ.

(4) The classification of all the dispersed statutes in force, after a general plan and under a simple arrangement, in accordance with the leading branches of our laws, so as to bring together all the statutes relating to a given subject, preserving at the same time their order, date, and connection, that the aid for their interpretation arising therefrom should be preserved, and reconciling the text with judicial decisions, and making their meaning correspond with their legal effect.

(5) A general glossarial statute, defining the technical words, phrases, and sentences made use of throughout the Statute Book, and containing the rules applicable to the construction and the interpretation of the statutes at large, and also some general provisions applicable to all local and personal acts.

Statutes made subsequently to the classification can be easily referred to their appropriate places; and this will not only facilitate and improve legislation, but render judicial construction more consistent, and consequently less uncertain.

This, it is submitted, is a reform worthy of accomplishment by the parliament of a great nation; and that it can be accomplished, although it is certainly perplexed and requires the most cautious consideration, so as not to affect existing interests, admits of no doubt. The partial consolidations effected during late years have swept away many difficulties, and prepared, to a slight degree, the way for this full and perfect revision. Rome did it even in her decline; America has also done it, and is about to do it again! Surely, then, England should attempt it. It is a subject which has occupied the attention of our jurists and legislators from an early period of our history, which has been often recommended from the throne, embodied in parliamentary reports, and even petitioned for by our two legislative houses.

Of late years steps have been taken by the Government with a view to remedy the existing evil. In 1833, a commission was issued to certain barristers to digest the Criminal Law, written and unwritten, and generally to inquire and report how far it might be expedient to consolidate the other branches of the existing Statute Laws or any of them. This commission (which devoted itself chiefly to Criminal Law) made one report on consolidation generally in July, 1835. In March, 1853, Lord Cranworth, L.C., constituted 'The Statute Law Board' for the consolidation of the Statute Law. It made three reports. In 1854 the Statute Law Commission issued, for the purpose of consolidating the Statute Laws, or such part as they might find capable of being usefully and conveniently consolidated, combining with that process, if they should think it advisable, the incorporation of any parts of the common or unwritten law in such manner as should seem desirable, and also for the purpose of devising and suggesting such rules, if any, as might in their judgment tend to insure simplicity or uniformity, or any other improvement in the form and style of future statutes. Four reports were made by that commission, and under it a Register of Public General Statutes from the union of Great Britain and Ireland was prepared. In October, 1859, the Statute Law Commission having been discontinued, F. S. Reilly and A. J. Wood, Esquires, Barristers-at-Law, were engaged by the Government to make a revision of the Statute Law with a view, in the first instance, to the preparation of a new edition of the statutes, to contain (as far as possible) solely such enactments as are in force, and thus to show what the existing Statute Law is, and bring together the whole body of it in a manageable shape, for the purposes either of ordinary use or of consolidation and other improvement. It has been considered that, as a preliminary step, a systematic examination of the Statute Book should be made, for the purpose of ascertaining what enactments have ceased to be in force by virtual repeal, expiration, or otherwise, without having been expressly and specifically repealed, and that the enactments in this condition, when ascertained, should be now repealed, so that there may be little or no question as to what is or is not to be comprised in the new edition. This work is now going on. One repealing Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 101, has been passed, and in the present session a further repealing bill will be introduced, covering the whole period from the earliest Statute to the Revolution.

months had elapsed from the rendition of judgment, in which the judge issued his warrant to seize, first, the movables, which were sold within eight days afterwards, and then the immovables, which were delivered in pledge to the creditors, or put under the care of a curator, and, if at the end of two months the debt was not paid, the land was sold.—Dig. 42, t. 1; Code, 8, 34. Civil Law.

Actio non, special pleas began with this allegation, 'that the said plaintiff ought not to have or maintain his aforesaid action thereof against him,' actio non habere debet. Hence technically termed the actio non. 1 Ch. Plead. 531; 2 ib. 421; Steph. Plead. It is abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. 76, s. 66.

Actio non accrevit infra sex annos, the name of the plea of the Statute of Limitations, when the defendant alleges that the plaintiff's action has not accrued within six years.

Actio pro socio, an action by which either partner could compel his co-partners to perform their social contract.—Poth. Contr. de Société, n. 134. Civil Law.

Actio ad exhibendum, an action instituted for the purpose of compelling a defendant to exhibit a thing or title in his power. It was preparatory to another action, which was always a real action in the sense of the Roman Law, that is, for the recovery of a thing, whether it was movable or immovable.—Merl. Quest. de Dr. tome i. 84. Civil Law.

Action of adherence, an action competent to a husband or wife, to compel either party to adhere in case of desertion.—Scotch Law.

It is analogous to the English suit for restitution of conjugal rights.

Action redhibitory, an action instituted to avoid a sale on account of some vice or defect in the thing sold, which renders it either absolutely useless, or its use so inconvenient and imperfect, that it must be supposed the buyer would not have purchased it had he known of the vice.—Civil Law.

Actions ordinary, all actions not rescissory. Ersk. Pr. L. Scot 4, 1, 5.

Actions rescissory, are either (1) actions of proper improbation for declaring a writing false or forged; (2) actions of reduction—improbation for the production of a writing, in order to have it set aside for fraud; and (3) actions of simple reduction, for declaring a writing called for null until produced.—Ersk. Pr. L. Scot. 4, 1, 5.

Actiones nominatæ, writs for which there were precedents. The statute of Westminster, 2, c. 24, gave Chancery authority to form new writs in consimili casu. Hence the action on the case—Bac. Ab. Court of Chancery, a.

Actio injuriarum personalis moritur cum persona. Bacon.—(A personal action on a tort [i. e. ex delicto], dies with the person.) But if the tort or injury be of such a nature as that thereby property is acquired, which benefits the wrong-doer, an action for the value of the property would survive against the executor of the wrong-doer for legal waste, and equity would probably, in respect of equitable waste, decide in analogy to law.—Lansdowne v. Lansdowne, 1 Mad. 16; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 2. See 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93.

Actio non datur non damnificato. Jenk. Cent. 69.—(An action is not given to him who is not injured.)

Action on the case. See CASE.

Action prejudicial, otherwise called preparatory or principal, an action arising from some doubt in the principal, as in case a man sue his younger brother for lands descended from the father, and it is objected against him that he is a bastard, this point of bastardy must be tried before the cause can proceed. It is, therefore, termed prejudicialis, i. e. prejudiced.

Action of a writ, a phrase used when a defendant pleads some matter by which he shows that the plaintiff had no cause to have the writ sued upon, although it may be that he is entitled to another writ or action for the same matter.—Cowel.

Action of abstracted multures, an action for multures or tolls against those who are thirled to a mill, i. e. bound to grind their corn at a certain mill, and fail to do so. Jacob.

Action for poynding on the ground, so called because founded upon some infeoffment for an annuity (whether annual-rents, life-rent, or feu-duty, &c.), that affects the ground, and that ground being thus debitor, it is called debitum fundi (a debt of the ground), for which movables found upon the ground may be poynded (distrained), and these failing, the property affected by this servitude may be apprised or adjudged even in prejudice of intervening singular successors.—Scotch Law.

Actionare [i. e. in jus vocare, Lat.], to prosecute a person in a cause at law.—Thorn's Chron.

Actionary, a foreign commercial term for the proprietor of an action or share of a public company's stock, a stockholder.

Actiones compositæ sunt, quibus inter se homines disceptarent, quas actiones, ne populus prout vellet instituerent, certas solemnesque esse voluerunt.—(Forms of actions have been framed by which men dispute among themselves, which forms are made definite and solemn, lest the people proceed as they think proper.)

Actiones in personam, quæ adversus eum intenduntur, qui ex contractu vel delicto obligatus est aliquid dare vel concedere.—(Personal actions are those which are brought against him who, from a contract or tort, is obliged to give or allow something.)

Actionum quædam sunt in rem, quædam in personam, et quædam mixtæ. Co. Litt. 284.—(Some actions are against the thing, some against the person, and some mixed.)

Actitation, a debating of law-suits.

Active debt, a debt due to a person.

Active trust, a confidence connected with a duty.

Active use, a present legal estate.

Acto [Acton, Aketon, Fr. Hanqueton]. A coat of mail.—Du Fresne.

Acton-Burnell, the statute giving the remedy by statute merchant 11 Edw. I. A. D. 1283, so termed from the place where it was made, situated in Shropshire.—Cowel; 2 Reeves, c. ix. p. 158.

Actor, a doer, generally a plaintiff or complainant. In a civil or private action the plaintiff was often called by the Romans petitor; in a public action (causa publica) he was called accusator. (Cic. ad Att. i. 16.) The defendant was called Reus, both in private and public causes; this term, however, according to Cicero (De Orat. ii. 43), might signify either party, as indeed we might conclude from the word itself. In a private action, the defendant was often called adversarius, but either party might be called so with respect to the other. Also a proctor or advocate in civil courts or causes. Actor dominicus, a term often used for the lord's bailiff or attorney. Actor ecclesiæ was sometimes the forensic term for the advocate or pleading patron of a church. Actor villæ was the steward or head bailiff of a town or village.—Cowel.

Actor qui contra regulam quid adduxit, non est audiendus.—(A plaintiff is not to be heard who has advanced anything against authority.)

Actor sequitur forum rei. Home's L. T. 232.—(A plaintiff follows the court of the defendant.)

Actore non probante reus absolvitur.—(When the plaintiff does not prove his case the defendant is acquitted.)

Actori incumbit onus probandi. Hob. 103. (The burthen of proof lies on a plaintiff.)

Acts of Court, legal memoranda of the nature of pleas, especially in Admiralty Courts.

Acts done, distinguished into acts of God, of the law, and of men, hence the following maxims:—

Actus contra actum, a mutual consent.

Actus curiæ nemini gravabit. Jenk. Cent. 118—(An act of the court will hurt no person.) See this maxim exemplified Cumber v. Wane, 1 Str. 126; & 1 Smith, L. C. 245–255.

Actus Dei necnon legis nemini est damnosus, or facit injuriam. 5 Co. 87.—(An act of God and also of law is hurtful, or operates an injury, to no one.)

Actus incœptus cujus perfectio pendet ex voluntate partium, revocari potest; si autem pendet ex voluntate tertiæ personæ, vel ex contingenti, revocari non potest. Bacon.—(An act already begun the completion of which depends on the will of the parties, may be recalled; but, if it depend on the consent of a third person, or on a contingency, it cannot be recalled.)

Actus legitimi non recipiunt modum. Hob. 153.—(Legal actions do not admit a limitation.)

Actus me invito factus, non est meus actus. (An act done by me against my will is not my act.)

Actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea. 3 Inst. 307.—(An act does not make a man guilty, unless he be so in intention.)

Actus repugnans non potest in esse produci. Plowd. 355.—(A repugnant act cannot be produced as in responsible existence.)

Acts not in use, repealed by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 64.

Acts of Sederunt, ordinances of the Court of Session, made under authority of the act 1540, c. 93, by which power is given to make such statutes as may be necessary for the ordering of processes and the expedition of justice. The Court is also authorised by other acts of parliament to make enactments relative to certain matters therein pointed out.—Scotch Law.

Acts of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. The acts of the general assembly, issued under their legislative powers, are binding on all the members and judicatories of the church. The form of their procedure is regulated by an act of the church (1679) termed the barrier act.—Ibid.

Actuarius, a notary.

Actuary, a short-hand writer, a registrar of a public body. Also a clerk that registers the acts and constitutions of the Lower House of Convocation; or a registrar in a Court Christian.—Jacob. Also an officer appointed to keep Savings-Banks' accounts, or the proceedings of a common Court. The manager of an Insurance Company; also a person skilled in the doctrine of life-annuities and insurances, and who is in the habit of giving opinions upon the value of interests in property.

Actus, a footway and horseway.

Adar (the same meaning as Aries, a ram, mighty). The twelfth sacred month of the Jewish calendar, and sixth of their civil year, answering to the end of February and beginning of March. As the lunar year which the Jews followed in their calculations is shorter than the solar by about eleven days, which at the end of three years make a month, they then intercalate a thirteenth month every third year, which they call Veadar, or the second Adar.—Brown's Dict. of Bible; Jahn's Bib. Antiq. c. vi. s. 103.

Adawlut, justice, equity ; a court of justice. The terms Dewanny Adawlut, and Foujdarry Adawlut, denote the civil and criminal courts of justice. See Dewanny and Foujdarry. Indian Words.

Adcordabilis denarii, money paid by a vassal to his lord upon the selling or exchanging of a feud.—Encyc. Lond.

Adcredulitare, to purge one's self of an offence by oath.—Leg. Mæ. c. 36.

Ad damnum (to the damage).

Addecimate, to take tithes.

Addictio, the giving up to a creditor of his debtor's person by a magistrate. The ordinary means of execution under a law which did not allow execution of a debtor's property. Sand. Just. 422.

Ad diem (at the day).

Addition, the title, or mystery, and place of abode of a person besides his names.—1 Hen. V. c. 5 ; Termes de la Ley, 20. By 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 24, no indictment shall be held insufficient for want of, or imperfection in, the addition of any defendant.

Additio probat minoritatem. 4 Inst. 80.—(An addition proves minority.)

Additionales, propositions or terms added to a former agreement or contract.

Ad ea quæ frequentius accidunt jura adaptantur. Wing. 216.—(The laws are adapted to those cases which more frequently arise.)

Address, a petition, also a place of business or residence. See Bill in Chancery.

Adeling, Ethling or Edling [ædelan, Sax.], noble, excellency. A title of honour among the Anglo-Saxons, properly belonging to the king's children.—Spelm. Glos.

Adelingia, Athelney in Somersetshire.

Ademption [fr. adimo, Lat.], revocation ; a taking away of a legacy, i. e. if a testator, after having given a legacy by his will, alienate the subject of it during his life, it is an ademption. Ambl. 402 ; 2 Wms. Executors, 1189. See Satisfaction.

Ad finem, abbrev. ad fin. [Lat.] (at, or near to, the end.)

Adhering, cleaving to or joining.

Adiation, a term used in the laws of Holland for the application of property by an executor. Knapp. Rep. Privy Council, p. 107.

A digniori fieri debet denominatio et resolutio. Wing. 265.—(The title and exposition ought to be made from that which is the more worthy.)

Ad inquirendum, a judicial writ commanding inquiry to be made of anything relating to a cause in the Superior Courts.—Reg. Judic.

Ad interim (in the meantime).

Adiratus, a price or value set upon things stolen or lost, as a recompense to the owner. Cowel.

Adjournment [fr. jour, Fr. a day], a putting off to another time or place, a continuation of a meeting from one day to another. An adjournment of parliament is a continuance of the session from one day to another.—1 Bl. Com. 185. The consul used to dismiss the Roman Senate in the following words : 'Nil vos moramur, Patres Conscripti.' Adjournment of parliament differs from prorogation, the former being done by the Houses themselves, whereas the latter is an act of royal authority.

Either House may interrupt or postpone any debate, defer the consideration of any measure, or altogether adjourn its sittings. The Lords frequently adjourn 'during pleasure,' which means that the Lord Chancellor or other speaker of the House may, in the exercise of his discretion, take his seat on the woolsack, two other peers being present, and cause business to proceed at any hour within the day on which such adjournment 'during pleasure' takes place, otherwise their Lordships' House will stand adjourned to the usual hour on the following day; but usage has fixed five o'clock P.M. as the time for resuming after an adjournment 'during pleasure.' The Commons, on the contrary, always adjourn to a time specified. The adjournment of one House is no adjournment of the other. In Committee, to move that the Chairman report progress is equivalent to moving that the debate be then adjourned. Adjournment does not close the session ; prorogation does not terminate the parliament ; the former is an act of either House ; the latter an act of the Crown, the duration of which may be subsequently extended or curtailed, according to the royal pleasure. All unfinished proceedings during an adjournment remain in statu quo. A member who moves the adjournment of a debate, or is addressing the House at the time of adjournment, is said to be in possession of the House, and can speak again when the sittings are resumed. When Committees of the whole House adjourn, however, this rule does not prevail.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

Adjournamentum est ad diem dicere, seu diem dare. 4 Inst. 27.—(An adjournment is to appoint a day, or to give a day.)

Adjournment-day, a further day appointed by the judges at the nisi prius sittings to try issues in fact which were not then ready for trial. Notice of trial should be given ten days before this day.

Adjudication, giving or pronouncing a judgment, sentence, or decree. In Bankruptcy Law, adjudication is the act of the Court declaring a person to be bankrupt. In Scotch Law it is used to express the diligence by which land is attached in security and payment of a debt, or by which a feudal title is made up in a person holding an obligation to convey without procuratory or precept. There is thus (1) the adjudication for debt ; (2) the adjudication in security; and (3) the adjudication in implement.

Adjudication in implement, the mode of perfecting a defective title to property.—Scotch Law.

Adjudication special, when the Lords of Sessions adjudge to the creditor some part of the debitor's lands proportionably to the sums due, with a fifth part more beside for composition due to the superior, and the expenses for obtaining enfeoffment; but if the debitor do not consent to such an adjudication, in the terms of the act 1672, all his lands and other heritable subjects are adjudged in the same manner as they were formerly apprised.—Ibid.

Adjudication after the old form, when the hæreditas jacens (the heir having renounced) is adjudged to the creditor for payment of his money.—Ibid.

Adjudication upon obligement, when a man, having obliged himself to enfeoff another in lands disponed by him, the Lords adjudge upon his refusal to perform.—Ibid.

Adjunction, when a thing belonging to one is attached or united to that which belongs to another, whether by inclusion, soldering, sewing, construction, writing, or painting, the whole generally becomes the property of the latter.—Civil Law.

Adjuncts, additional judges.

Adjunctum accessorium, an accessory or appurtenance.

Ad jura regis, a writ which was brought by the king's clerk presented to a living against those who endeavoured to eject him, to the prejudice of the king's title.—Reg. of Writs, 61.

Adjuration, a swearing or binding upon oath.

Adjustment [fr. adjuster, Fr. to make even] of a loss, the settling and ascertaining the amount of the indemnity which the assured, after all allowances and deductions made, is entitled to receive under the policy, and fixing the proportion which each underwriter is liable to pay.—Marsh, 529.

Adlamwr [ad-lam-gwr, Cym. one returning], a proprietor who, for some cause, entered the service of another proprietor without agreement, and left him after the expiration of a year and a day, was liable to the payment of thirty pence to his patron.—Welch Law.

Ad Lapidem, Stoneham in Hampshire.

Ad largum (at large), used in the following and other expressions: title at large, assize at large, verdict at large, to vouch at large, &c. Cowel.

Adlegiare [fr. aleier, Fr.], to purge of a crime by oath.—Brompt. Chron. c. 4 & 13.

Admanuenses, persons who swore by laying their hands on the book.—Old Law Books.

Admeasurement, Writ of. It lay against persons who usurped more than their share, in the two following cases:—admeasurement of dower, where the widow held from the heir more land, &c., as dower, than rightly belonged to her; and admeasurement of pasture, which lay where any one having common of pasture surcharged the common.—Termes de la Ley.

Adminicle, aid, help, or support, 1 Edw. IV. c. 1. In the Scotch Law, it is a term used in the action of proving the tenor of a lost deed, and applicable to any deed or even scroll tending to establish the existence or terms of the deed in question. In the Civil Law it means imperfect proof.

Adminicular evidence, explanatory or completing testimony.

Administration, the giving or supplying of something; the disposing of an intestate's property; a term applied to the body of ministers appointed by the Crown to carry on the government of the country.

Administrator, the manager of a business; he to whom the goods and effects of a person dying intestate are committed by the Probate Court. The following are limited administrations:—Administration durante minori ætate, is granted where an infant is entitled to administration, or is made sole executor. The grant is made to the duly appointed guardian of the infant for his use and benefit until he attain the age of twenty-one years, when it ceases. Administration durante absentiâ is granted when the next person entitled to the grant is beyond sea, lest the goods perish or the debts be lost. Administration pendente lite is granted where a suit is commenced in the Probate Court concerning the validity of a will or the right to administration, until the suit be determined, in order that there may be somebody to take care of the testator's estate. Administration cum testamento annexo is granted when there is not any executor named in the will, or if a person be named who is incapable, or one who refuses to act. Administration de bonis non is granted when the first administrator dies before he has fully administered. An ancillary administration, so called because it is subordinate to the original administration, is granted for collecting the assets of foreigners. It is taken out in the country where the assets are situated. Consult Toller on Executors; Williams's Executors and Administrators; and Story's Conflict of Laws, 518, 522.

Administratrix, a woman who has goods and chattels of an intestate committed to her charge in like manner as an administrator.—Blount.

Admiral [supposed to be derived from Amir al bahir, Arab. commander of the sea or fleet], an officer having high command in the Royal Navy. An admiral has two subordinate commanders under him, a vice-admiral and rear-admiral, distinguished into three classes by the colour of their flags, white, blue, and red. The admiral carries his flag at the main-topmast head, the vice-admiral at the fore-topmast head, and the rear-admiral at the mizen-topmast head.

Admiralty, the High Court of, is held before the Judge of the Admiralty, who sat as deputy of the Lord High Admiral of England until that office was put into commission, and then as deputy of the Lords Commissioners. There are two divisions of the Court—the Prize Court and the Instance Court. In the Prize Court the Judge has jurisdiction, by virtue of a commission issued under the Great Seal, at the beginning of every war to proceed upon all and all manner of captures, seizures, prizes, and reprisals of ships and goods which are or shall be taken, and to hear and determine according to the course of the Admiralty and the Law of Nations. In the Instance Court, also, the jurisdiction exercised by the Judge is conferred by a commission under the Great Seal. This is a municipal tribunal, it is a court of record, and its decrees and orders for the payment of money have the same effect as judgments in the Superior Courts of Common Law. It has jurisdiction in cases of private injuries to private rights arising at sea, or intimately connected with maritime subjects. Its jurisdiction in cases of torts is confined to wrongs committed at sea, or at least on the water within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty. Such are suits for—

(2) Collision of ships. (For which there is also remedy at common law.)

(3) Restitution of possession of a ship where there is no bonâ fide claim to withhold her; and

(4) Piratical and illegal takings at sea.

In cases of contract, its jurisdiction is confined to those of a maritime nature, as—

(1) Between part owners of a ship. (Equity has a concurrent jurisdiction in this case.)

(2) Mariners' and officers' wages. (Also recoverable by action at law, or before a magistrate.)

(4) Bottomry and respondentia bonds; and

(5) Salvage (which is the compensation to be made to persons by whose assistance a ship, or her freight, or loading, has been saved from impending peril, or recovered after actual loss), and those relating to wreck. Salvage is also recoverable by action at law, or by summary hearing before magistrates or the Cinque Port Commissioners.

(6) Whenever any ship is under arrest by process issuing from the High Court of Admiralty, or when the proceeds of any ship having been so arrested have been brought into the Registry, the Court has jurisdiction to take cognizance of all claims and causes of action of any person in respect of any mortgage of such ship, and to decide any suit instituted by any such person in respect of any such claims or causes of action respectively. (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65.)

The proceedings in this Court (which sits at Westminster) are greatly conformable to the civil law, in conjunction with marine customs. The Court of Admiralty has been entirely re-constructed, its practice improved, and civil jurisdiction extended by the 3 & 4 Vict. cc. 65, 66, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 10. Serjeants, barristers-at-law, attorneys and solicitors, have been admitted to practice there, the practice has been assimilated to that of the Common Law Courts, power has been given to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of papers, to take evidence vivâ voce in open Court, to order issues to be tried in any of the Courts of Nisi Prius with the same authority as the Common Law Courts as to bills of exceptions and new trials, to make rules of Court, and to commit for contempt. The judge may have the assistance of a jury; and in suits for collision, he usually decides upon his own view of the facts and law, after having been assisted by, and hearing the opinion of, two Trinity masters.

There is a summary form of proceeding, by an act on petition, in which the parties state shortly their respective cases, supporting them by affidavits; this is adopted in order to enforce payment of a bottomry-bond.

The first process in a plenary suit is frequently the arrest of the defendant's person, upon which he must find bail, or fidejussors in the nature of bail. The Court may fine and imprison for a contempt in its presence, although it is not a court of record.

In order to obtain restitution or enforce a claim, the arrest of a ship, her apparel, and furniture, is allowed, when, in order to release her, bail for her value, and intermediate earnings, must be given, and for the return of the vessel into the hands of the claimant, if the Court should ultimately adjudge the possession to him, or for the amount of the claim.

A monition is sometimes the first proceeding, as when an agent is required to bring in his account of the sale of a ship and cargo, and to distribute the balance of the proceeds, as in case of prize.

The Court may rehear and revise its own decrees; but it will very reluctantly permit such a proceeding. An appeal lies to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. See 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 51.

Whenever any of H. M.'s ships of war attack persons alleged to be pirates afloat or ashore, the High Court of Admiralty or any Court of Vice-Admiralty may determine whether such was the real character of the persons attacked, and all ships and goods taken from pirates by such ships, and their officers and crews, may be proceeded against in any of such Courts, and are liable to condemnation as droits and perquisites of H.M. in her office of Admiralty; but if any part of the property shall be duly proved to have been taken from H.M.'s subjects, or the subjects of any foreign power, the same shall be restored to the former owner on his paying in lieu of salvage a sum of money equal to one-eighth part of the true value, to be distributed among the captors. (13 & 14 Vict. c. 26.)

This Court formerly had cognisance of all crimes and offences, committed either upon the sea, or on the coasts, out of the boundary or extent of any English county, until the 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 36, establishing 'The Central Criminal Court,' enacted by its 22nd section, that with a view to speedy justice, it should be lawful for the Judges to be appointed by the commissions to be issued under the authority of the act, or any two or more of them, to inquire of, hear, and determine any offence committed or alleged to have been committed on the high seas and other places within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, and to deliver the gaol of Newgate of any person or persons committed to or detained therein for any offence alleged to have been done and committed upon the high seas aforesaid, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, and all indictments found and trials and other proceedings had and taken by and before the judges of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery, should be valid and effectual, to all intents and purposes whatsoever; and any three of such judges of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery, might order and direct the payment of the costs and expenses of such prosecutions in manner prescribed and directed by the 7 Geo. IV. c. 64.

There is a Court of Admiralty in Ireland; but the Scotch Court was abolished by 1 Wm. IV. c. 69. Vice-Admiralty Courts exist in many of our colonies. Consult Bac. Ab. tit. Court of Admiralty; Com. Dig. tit. Admiralty; and Browne's Law of the Admiralty. See PRIZE COURT.

From a Vice-Admiralty Court an appeal lies to the Sovereign in Council.

As to the jurisdiction of the Admiralty in the colonies, see 12 & 13 Vict. c. 96, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 88.

Admiralty, Droits of. See DROITS OF ADMIRALTY.

Admissions in evidence, concessions of certain facts by an opponent.

Admission of a clerk by the bishop, when a patron of a church has presented him to it. It is, in fact, the ordinary's declaration that he approves of the presentee to serve the cure of the church to which he is presented.—Co. Litt. 344 a.

Admittance, giving possession of a copyhold estate. It is of three kinds: (1) Upon a voluntary grant by the lord, where the land has escheated or reverted to him. (2) Upon surrender by the former tenant. (3) Upon descent, where the heir is tenant on his ancestor's death. Wood, b. 2, c. 1; 1 Chit., p. 349.

Admittendo clerico, a writ of execution upon a right of presentation to a benefice being recovered in quare impedit, addressed to the bishop or his metropolitan, requiring him to admit and institute the clerk or presentee of the plaintiff.—Reg. Orig. 33 a.

Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 105, s. 13.

Ad Pontem, Pawnton in Lincolnshire.

Adpromissor, an accessory to a promise, in order to give a stipulator greater security; he guaranteed the fulfilment of a promise.—Sand. Just. 453.

Ad proximum antecedens fiat relatio, nisi impediatur sententiâ. Jenk. Cent. 180.—(Let relation be made to the nearest antecedent, unless it be prevented by the context.)

Ad quem [Lat.] (to whom or which). See JUDEX AD QUEM.

Adquieto, payment.—Blount.

Ad quæstiones facti non respondent judices; ad quæstiones legis non respondent juratores. Co. Litt. 295.—(Judges do not answer to questions of fact; juries do not answer to questions of law.)

Ad quod damnum, a writ which ought to be issued before the Crown grants further liberties, as a fair, market, &c., which may be prejudicial to others; it is addressed to the sheriff, to inquire what damage it may do to grant a fair, market, &c. It is also used to inquire of lands given in mortmain to any house of religion, &c. It may likewise be used for the turning and changing of ancient highways, which could not formerly be done without a licence from the Crown, which was obtained by this writ on inquisition found, that such a change would not be a public detriment; but now a highway may be diverted by order of two magistrates.—Termes de la Ley, 26.

Adrectare, to do right, satisfy, or make amends.—Gerve Doroberen, anno 1170.

Ad rectè docendum oportet primum inquirere nomina, quia rerum cognitio à nominibus rerum dependet. Co. Litt. 68.—(In order rightly to teach a thing, inquire first into the names, for a knowledge of things depends upon their names.)

Adrogation, the adoption of an impubes, i. e. a male under 14, and a female under 12 years old.

Ad sectam, abbrev. into ads or ats [Lat.] (at the suit of). It is used by a defendant in entitling the cause against him: thus, C. D. (defendant) ats A. B. (plaintiff.)

Adstipulator, an accessory party to a promise, who received the same promise as his principal did, and could equally receive and exact payment; or he only stipulated for a part of that for which the principal stipulated, and then his rights were co-extensive with the amount of his own stipulation.—Sand. Just. 453.

Ad terminum qui preteriit, a writ of entry, which lay for a lessor or his heirs, where a lease of premises had been made for life or years, and after the term had expired the premises were withheld from the lessor or his heirs, by the tenant or other person in possession of them: but now by the 4 Geo. II. c. 28, if a tenant for life, or years, or person holding under him, shall wilfully hold over after the expiration of a notice in writing, given by the landlord, and after demand of possession, the tenant will be liable to double the yearly value for so long a time as he detains the premises, to be recovered by an action of debt. And by the 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 18, it is enacted, that if a tenant give notice of his intention to quit the premises (which needs not be in writing), and do not deliver up possession at the time mentioned in his notice, he, or his executors or administrators, will be liable to pay double rent, to be recovered by the landlord, either by distress or action at law.

Ad tunc et ibidem [Lat.] (then and there).

Adult, a person of full age, i. e. of the age of twenty-one years.

Adulteration, the corrupt production of any article, especially food or beverage. It is a criminal offence, 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 37. By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 84, s. 1, every person who shall sell any article of food or drink with which, to the knowledge of such person, any ingredient or material injurious to the health of persons eating or drinking such article has been mixed, and every person who shall sell as pure or unadulterated any article of food or drink which is adulterated or not pure, shall for every such offence, on a summary conviction of the same before two justices of the peace at petty sessions in England, and in Scotland before two justices of the peace in justice of the peace court, or before the sheriff substitute of the county, or before justices at petty sessions or a divisional justice in Ireland, forfeit and pay a penalty not exceeding five pounds, together with such costs attending such conviction as to the said justices shall seem reasonable; and if any person so convicted shall afterwards commit the like offence it shall be lawful for such justices to cause such offender's name, place of abode, and offence to be published, at the expense of such offender, in such newspaper or in such other manner as to such justices shall seem desirable.

Adulterine, the issue of an adulterous intercourse.

Adulterine guilds, traders acting as a corporation without a charter, and paying a fine annually for permission to exercise their usurped privileges.—Smith's Wealth of Nations, b. i. c. 10.

Adulterium, a fine imposed for the commission of adultery.

Adultery [ad, Lat. and alteram, another person], anciently termed Advowtry (quasi ad alterius thorum). The violation of conjugal fidelity; the sin of incontinence between two married persons, or it may be where only one of them is married, in which case it would be single adultery, to distinguish it from the other, which is double. This offence is only punishable by ecclesiastical censure and penance, pro salute animæ et reformatione morum; the temporal courts do not take any cognisance of it as a public wrong. It is by these courts considered only as a civil injury.

By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, which creates a Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, a husband can obtain a dissolution of his marriage upon the ground of his wife's adultery, and a wife can obtain a judicial separation on the ground of her husband's adultery, or a dissolution of marriage on the ground of his adultery, coupled with cruelty, or desertion, or bigamy, or of his incestuous adultery, provided that the person applying to the Court for relief has not been guilty of certain kinds of conjugal misconduct enumerated in the act.

It has long been a national reproach that our law should afford to a husband pecuniary compensation for the loss of a wife's society, comfort, and assistance. But how has the legislature dealt with this revolting subject? True, the action of crim. con. is abolished by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 59; but the money-compensating degradation is still retained, for by s. 33 of the same act, a husband may claim damages from an adulterer, to be assessed by a jury, and the Matrimonial Court has power to direct in what manner the damages shall be paid or applied, and that the whole or any part thereof shall be settled for the benefit of the children, or as a provision for the maintenance of his wife.

Adultery being a gross betrayal of the marriage bed, the law holds it to be manslaughter only, if a husband detect a man in the act with his wife, and then and there directly kill him or her; but it is murder to kill a person on mere suspicion of adultery.

In countries where polygamy prevails, if a married man have criminal intercourse with a married woman, or with one promised in marriage, or with a widow expecting to be married to a brother-in-law, it is accounted adultery. If he be guilty of such intercourse with an unmarried woman, it is considered fornication merely. Adultery, even before the time of Moses (Gen. xxxviii. 24), was reckoned a crime of a very heinous nature, as being the corruption of marriage—the foundation of society—and was punished accordingly. In Egypt, the nose of an adulteress; in Persia, her nose and ears, were cut off. (Ezek. xxiii. 25.) In the Mosaic code, the punishment was death. (Lev. xx. 10.) The Jews had a particular method of trying or rather purging an adulteress, or a woman suspected of the crime, by making her drink the bitter water of jealousy, which, if she were guilty, was said to make her swell. (Numb. v. 17–28.) Reuben's incest with Bilhah is the first act of adultery we read of. In ancient Greece, adulterers, however high their station in society might be, were amenable to the laws; but they were sometimes allowed to commute the punishment by the payment of a fine called μοιχάγριον to the injured husband, and the father of the adulteress returned the dowry which he had received of her husband. Among the Romans, originally, an adulterer might be prosecuted by any person as a public offender, but under the Emperors, the right of prosecution was limited to the husband, father, brother, patron, and avunculus of the adulteress. Among the Romans, if a husband kept his wife, after his discovery of her adultery, he was guilty of the offence called Lenocinium. Among the ancient Britons, adultery was severely punished. By the laws of Ethelbert, anyone who committed adultery with his neighbour's wife was obliged to pay him a fine, and buy him another wife. Edmund the Saxon ordered it to be punished in the same way as homicide; and Canute the Dane ordained that an adulterer should be banished, and the woman's nose and ears cut off. In the time of Henry I. it was punished with the loss of eyes and genitals.—Jahn's Bib. Antiq. c. x. s. 158; Smith's Dict. of Gk. and Roman Antiq.; Encyc. Lond.

The word is used by ecclesiastical writers to describe the intrusion of a person into a bishopric during the former bishop's life. The reason of the appellation is, that a bishop is supposed to contract a sort of spiritual marriage with his church.

Adurni portu de, Etherington, or Ederington.

Ad valorem, a term used in speaking of the duties or customs paid on certain goods; the duties on some articles are paid by the number, weight, measure, tale, &c., and those on others are paid ad valorem, that is, according to their value.

Advance (fr. avancer, Fr. to push forwards, fr. avant, Fr. avante, It. ab ante, Lat.), money paid before it is due; encrease.

Advancement, promotion; additional price. To the doctrine of resulting trusts there is a very important exception, for in equity, where a purchase is made in the name of a wife or child, or of an illegitimate child, grandchild, or nephew of a wife, to whom the purchaser has placed himself in loco parentis, there will primâ facie be no resulting trust for such purchaser; but, on the contrary, a presumption arises that an advancement was intended, pursuant to the obligation to provide for such relations. And a purchase by a parent in the joint names of himself and his child, as well as a purchase in the joint names of his child and a stranger, will be held an advancement for the child to the extent of the interest vested in him, the stranger however holding the estate vested in him in trust for the parent. The father's entering into, and keeping possession, and taking the rents and profits of the purchased property, or the son's giving receipts in the name of the father, will not prevent the presumption of advancement from arising, especially where the son is advanced but in part. Where, however, a son is fully advanced, the father's entry into possession, and into the receipt of the rents or profits of property purchased in his son's name, may be considered as evidence of a trust.

The presumption of advancement may be rebutted by evidence of facts, showing the parent's intention, that the son should take property, purchased in his name, as a trustee, and not for his own benefit. Such facts, however, must have taken place antecedently to, or contemporaneously with, the purchase; or immediately after it, so as to form, in fact, part of the same transaction; for subsequent facts will not be admissible in evidence to show an intention against the presumption of advancement.

This presumption may also be rebutted by evidence of parol declarations of the father made contemporaneously with the purchase, but not by any of his declarations made subsequently to it; but these may be used in evidence against him by the son. A fortiori, parol evidence may be given by the son to show the intention of the father to advance him; for such evidence is in support as well of the legal interest of the son as of the equitable presumption.

It is to be remarked, that if the parent and another person pay the money, it will not be deemed an advancement, for the child being a trustee for the latter, he will be held to be trustee for them both.

Advent, a coming to; also the month preceding the anniversary of the nativity of Jesus Christ. It begins on the Sunday that falls either upon St. Andrew's day, the 30th November, or next to it, and continues till the feast of Christmas day.—Blount.

Adventitious, that which comes unexpectedly or incidentally.

Ad ventrem inspiciendum [to inspect the womb]. See DE VENTRE INSPICIENDO.

Adventure [fr. advenire, Lat. to come to], the sending to sea of a ship or goods at the risk of the sender.—Lex Merc.

Adventure, bill of, a writing signed by a merchant, stating that the property of goods shipped in his name belongs to another, to the adventure or chance of which the person so named is to stand, with a covenant from the merchant to account to him for the produce. An adventure is commercially defined as a speculation in goods sent abroad under the care of a supercargo, to be disposed of by him to the best advantage for the benefit of his employers.

Adversaria [adversa, things remarked or ready at hand], rough memoranda, common-place-books.

Adversary, a litigant-opponent.

Adverse possession, occupancy of realty without molestation, which may at length ripen into an unimpeachable title. As to adverse possession since 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, see Nepean v. Doe, 2 M. & W. 910; and as to it before this statute, Taylor d. Atkyns v. Horde, 1 Burr. 60, and 2 Smith's L. C. 433—584.

Advertisement [fr. avertissement, Fr.], a public notice or announcement of a thing. The duties payable on advertisements were repealed by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 63, s. 5.

Advertising for stolen or lost property. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 102, whosoever shall publicly advertise a reward for the return of stolen or lost property, and shall in such advertisement use words purporting that no questions will be asked, or purporting that a reward will be given without seizing or making inquiry after the person producing the property, or shall in such public advertisement promise or offer to return money paid for or advanced on such property by a pawnbroker or other person, or any other reward for the return of the same, or shall print or publish such advertisement, shall forfeit £50.

Advertising vehicles, prohibition of, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 33, s. 16.

Advice [fr. avis, Fr. avviso, It. avise, Old Eng. view, opinion], counsel; also, the instruction usually given by one merchant or banker to another by letter, informing him of bills or draughts drawn on him, with particulars of date, or sight, the sum, and the payee. Bills presented for acceptance or payment are frequently dishonoured for want of advice. Advice is also necessary to prevent forgery; if a merchant accept or pay a bill for the honour of another person, he is bound to advise him thereof, and this should always be done under an act of honour, by a notary-public.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Advisement, deliberation.

Ad vitam aut culpam, an office which is to determine only by the death or delinquency of the holder, or which is, in fact, held quamdiù se bene gesserit (so long as he conduct himself properly).—Jacob.

Advocare [Lat. Tyman getyman, Ang.-Sax.], to defend, to call to one's aid, also to vouch, to warranty.—Anc. Laws of England.

Advocate, a patron of a cause assisting his client with advice, and pleading for him.—Spel. Glos. He is defined by Ulpian (Dig. 50, tit. 13) to be any person who aids another in the conduct of a suit or action.

In the English Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts, until recently certain persons learned in the civil and canon law, called advocates, had the exclusive right of acting as counsel. They were members of a college situate at Doctors' Commons, incorporated by charter, June 22, 8 Geo. III., under the title of 'The College of Doctors of Law exercent in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts,' and had, previously to their admission to that college, taken the degree of Doctor of Laws at an English university. The jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in matters matrimonial and testamentary has now been transferred to the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes and the Court of Probate respectively, and these new courts and the Admiralty and Ecclesiastical Courts have been thrown open to the bar. By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, ss. 116, 117, the College of Doctors of Law, &c., is empowered to sell its real and personal estate, and to surrender its charter of incorporation, upon which surrender the college is to be dissolved.

Advocate, Lord, the principal public prosecutor in Scotland. He is assisted by a Solicitor-General and four junior counsel, termed advocates depute. He is understood to have the power of appearing as prosecutor in any court in Scotland, where any person can be tried for an offence, or in any action where the Crown is interested; but it is not usual for him to act in the inferior courts, which have their respective public prosecutors, called procurators-fiscal, acting under his instructions. He does not, in prosecuting for offences, require the intervention of a grand jury, except in prosecutions for treason, which are conducted according to the English method. The Lord Advocate is virtually Secretary of State for Scotland.

Advocate, Queen's, a member of the College of Advocates, appointed by letters patent, whose office it is to advise and act as counsel for the Crown in questions of civil, canon, and international law. His rank is not fully settled, but he claims precedence of the whole bar.

Advocates, Faculty of, the bar of Scotland in Edinburgh. Only a small proportion, however, of these profess to be practising lawyers, and it has become a habit for country gentlemen to acquire the title of Advocate, in preference to taking a degree at the Scottish Universities. The Dean of Faculty and the two crown lawyers, the Lord Advocate and Solicitor-General, are the only persons who take precedence at the Scottish bar, independent of seniority. The Lord Advocate and the Solicitor-General are the only members of the Faculty who wear silk gowns and sit within the bar.

Advocatia, the quality, function, privilege, or territorial jurisdiction of an advocate.—Civil Law.

Advocation, a process by which an action may be carried from an inferior to a superior court before final judgment in the former (1 & 2 Vict. c. 86).—Scotch Term.

Advocati, patrons of churches.—Blount.

Advocati Fisci, advocates of the revenue among the Romans, tantamount to Queen's Counsel.

Advocatione decimarum, a writ which lay for tithes, demanding the fourth part or upwards, that belonged to any church.—Reg. Orig. 29.

Advocatus, a pleader or narrator.

Advocatus est, ad quem pertinet jus advocationis alicujus ecclesiæ, ut ad ecclesiam, nomine proprio, non alieno possit præsentare. Co. Litt. 119.—(A patron is he to whom appertains the right of presentation to a church, in such a manner that he may present to such a church in his own name, and not in the name of another.)

Advow, or Avow, or Avouch [under the feudal system when the right of a tenant was impugned, he had to call upon his lord to come forward and defend his right. This, in the Latin of the time, was called advocare, Fr. voucher à garantie, to vouch or call to warrant. As the calling the lord of the fee to defend the right of the tenant involved the admission of all the duties implied in feudal tenancy, it was an act jealously looked after by the lords, and advocare, or the equivalent Fr. avouer, to avow, came to signify the admission by a tenant of a certain person as feudal superior. Finally, with some grammatical confusion, the words advocare, and avow or avouch, came to be used in the sense of performing the part of the vouchee, or person called on to defend the right impugned. Wedgw.], to justify or maintain an act, e. g. one distrains for rent, and he that is distrained brings an action of replevin; if the distrainer, in his defence, justify or maintain his act, he is said to advow or avow, and his plea is called avowment or avowry.

It also signifies to call upon or produce, thus, anciently, when stolen goods were bought by one and sold to another, it was lawful for the right owner to take them wherever they were found, and he in whose possession they were found was bound to produce the seller to justify the sale, and so on till they found the thief.—Old Nat. Br. 43.

Advowee, or Avowee, the person or patron who has a right to present to a benefice.—Fleta, lib. v. c. 14.

Advowee paramount, the sovereign, or highest patron.

Advowson [fr. advocare, Lat.], a right of presentation to, or the patronage of, a church or spiritual living; the person possessed of this right or patronage being called the patron or advocate (patronus aut advocatus), on account of his obligation to protect and defend the privileges of the particular benefice. An advowson is in the nature of a temporal property and spiritual trust. For the origin and history of advowsons consult Mirehouse on Advowsons, pp. 1–6.

There are several kinds of advowsons, viz.:—

(I.) Presentative advowsons, subdivided into,
  (α) Appendant.
  (β) In gross, and
  (γ) Partly appendant, and partly in gross.

(III.) Collative advowsons.

A presentative advowson appendant is a right of patronage annexed to the possession of some corporeal inheritance. Thus, where an advowson has immemorially passed together with a real or reputed manor by a simple grant of such manor, without particularly referring to the advowson, it is then said to be appendant, i. e. annexed to the demesnes of such manor, which subsist perpetually.

A presentative advowson in gross is a right of patronage self-subsistent, belonging to the patron as an individual, and not in anywise appendant to a corporeal inheritance.

While a few advowsons were originally in gross, as when the right originated in an agreement that a builder of a certain church and his heirs should be its patrons ratione fundationis, yet the greater number of them was primarily appendant, becoming by subsequent circumstances severed in gross.

The severance may take place in several modes:—(1) when the corporeal inheritance is conveyed away, with a special reservation of the advowson; (2) when the advowson is granted away, and not the corporeal inheritance to which it was incident; (3) when the patron presents to it as though it were already severed. An advowson once completely and unconditionally severed, can never again become appendant. But should an advowson be disappended conditionally, as in the case of a mortgage, it will reunite when the loan is repaid. So, if the advowson be excepted in a lease of the corporeal inheritance, it remains in gross during the lease, but upon its expiration it becomes appendant again. These instances, however, are rather suspensions than severances.

A disappendancy created by a wrongful act, may be done away with by defeating such act; and should it be effected by operation of law, the appendancy will be preserved unless otherwise expressly intended.

A presentative advowson may be partly appendant and partly in gross; thus, when the owner grants to another every second presentment, for then the advowson will be appendant for the grantor's turn, and in gross for that of the grantee. And should the advowson appendant, and that in gross be afterwards possessed by the same person, still the advowson will be appendant for one turn, and in gross for the other. So, if three persons be seised of a manor with a presentative advowson appendant, and two of them release their right of the patronage to the third, he then becomes seised of two-thirds of the advowson in gross, and of the unsevered third as appendant; but upon the death of this third person, the entire advowson will devolve upon his heirs or devisee in gross.—Mirehouse on Advowsons, p. 20.

A donative advowson is a spiritual preferment, not presentable, conferred by the royal letters-patent upon the founder of a church or chapel, to be visited by the founder and not the bishop or ordinary.

The deed of donation gives to the parson possession without any presentation, institution, or induction.

The donee or person taking a donation must be a priest episcopally ordained; must read the morning and evening prayers according to the Book of Common Prayer within two months after his donation, or in case of an impediment to be allowed of by the bishop, within one month after its removal, together with the form of giving assent and consent thereto; must before his admission subscribe to the declaration of conformity to the liturgy before the archbishop, bishop, or ordinary, or his vicar-general, chancellor or commissary; if the donative have a parish-church belonging to it, he must take a certificate under the hand and seal of the person before whom he subscribed his assent and afterwards read the same in the parish-church; must take the oath prescribed by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 48, before the patron; must subscribe to the thirty-nine articles before the bishop, if the donative be a benefice with cure; must also within six months again take the above-mentioned oath in one of the courts at Westminster, or at the general or quarter sessions; must read the thirty-nine articles, and assent thereto within two months, or at the time when he reads the services, as already mentioned, if the benefice be with cure; and, within three months after subscribing to the declaration, he must read the bishop's certificate of his subscription, and again make the same declaration within his parish-church.—Mirehouse on Advowsons, pp. 23–25.

It is the better opinion that where this kind of advowson is once presented to, it ceases to be donative.—Ib. 26.

A donative advowson never lapses, unless by the terms of the foundation, or by act of parliament, it is subject to lapse (1 Geo. I. st. 2. c. 10, ss. 6 & 7); but the bishop may compel the patron to fill the benefice by ecclesiastical censure. The complete dominion over the vacant benefice, and the freehold in it, remain in the patron, together with the right to take the intermediate profits until it is again granted by him to a new incumbent. The right of donation always devolves upon the real representatives of the patron, and never devolves upon the Crown, when the incumbent is promoted to a bishopric. The resignation of a donative must be to the patron.

A collative advowson arises when a bishop has the right of patronage, either originally or by lapse. Collation is the conferring of a benefice by a bishop. It is an immediate institution, without any presentation, and is completed by the induction of the collatee. Where a bishop collates and dies before induction, the Crown presents as having in its custody the temporalities of the vacant bishopric.

A presentative advowson may be sold and conveyed in fee, fee-tail, for life, for years, for the next presentation, or any number of future presentations. It may be limited in possession, reversion or remainder, and held in joint-tenancy, tenancy-in-common, or coparcenery. It is also subject to curtesy and dower, and, being deemed assets for the payment of debts (except during an actual vacancy), may be sold by an order of the Court of Chancery. An advowson in gross cannot be extended under an elegit, because it is not susceptible of being valued, but it is chargeable in equity under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13.

The alienation of an advowson may result (1) from some wrongful act, as an usurpation (or, as the civil law calls it, an intrusion), which prevents the patron from presenting for that turn only (7 Anne, c. 18), or a disseisin, the disseisor presenting before the person disseised; (2) from operation of law, as dower, curtesy, and descent-cast; or (3) from the conveyance of the proprietor, either expressly by granting it, or incidentally by a transfer of the corporeal inheritance to which the advowson is appendant, as it passes under the word 'appurtenances,' except in the case of the Crown, when it will not pass without particular words or express mention of it (17 Edw. II. c. 15); for nothing will pass by a royal grant, but that which is clearly and explicitly intended.

So a right to present to a future avoidance may be expressly aliened by the same means. An avoidance is either in deed, upon the incumbent's death, or in law, upon resignation, plurality, deprivation, incapacity, union or simony. An actual vacancy can never be granted, unless by the Crown, for this would be simony.

All ecclesiastical persons seised of advowsons in right of their churches, all masters and fellows of colleges, and guardians of hospitals, seised in right of their houses, are restrained from making any grants of things incorporeal, such as advowsons or appropriations, and next avoidances which lie in grant; such grants are void against their successors, although good against the grantors during their own time.—1 Eliz. c. 19; 13 Eliz. c. 10.

The patrons of united churches (1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, s. 15, et seq.; and 4 & 5 Vict. c. 39, s. 23), have several rights, for though there be but one advowson, yet every patron has the whole advowson in his turn, since the patronage remains as before, though by the union the incumbency of one church is extinguished; and though the incumbency of the churches is united, the tithes, boundaries, moduses, and profits continue as before, for there can be no union of parishes, though there be of churches.

The patron of the most valuable church has the first presentment, and a subject-patron of a benefice of the greatest value has his turn before the sovereign-patron of the lesser church.

As no change is made by union in the rights of patronage, which are reserved to the patrons, the advowsons continue as before, both in their nature and right.—Mirehouse on Advowsons, c. 6; see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 50. See also 23 & 24 Vict. c. 142, as to the union of contiguous benefices in cities, towns, and boroughs.

Advowson of the moiety of a church. Where there are two several patrons, and two several incumbents, in one and the same church, the one of the one moiety, and the other of the other. Or where two must join in the presentation, and there is but one incumbent, as where there are two parceners, and they agree to present by turn, yet each of them has but a moiety of the church.—Co. Litt. 17 b.

Advowson of religious houses. Where persons founded any house of religion, they had thereby the advowson or patronage of them. Kennett's Paroch. Antiq. 147, 153.

Æbudæ, the Hebrides or Western Isles of Scotland.

Ædificare in tuo proprio solo non licet quod alteri noceat. 3 Inst. 201.—(It is not permitted to build upon one's own land that which may be injurious to another.)

Ædificatum solo, solo cedit. Co. Litt. 4 a. (That which is built upon the land goes with the land.)

Æfesn [Pasnagium or Pannagium, Lat.], the remuneration to the proprietor of a domain for the privilege of feeding swine under the oaks and beeches of his woods. This remuneration, according to Ine. 49, consisted of the third hog, when the fat was three fingers thick, and so on in proportion. Instead of a payment in kind, a payment of money appears to have been customary at the time of the survey. See Sir H. Ellis's Introd. to Domesday, vol. i. p. 99, note. Spelman cites one or two rather far-fetched etymons of the word pannage or pasnage, but its derivation is obviously from the French paisson, pasture.—Ancient Laws of England.

Æglesburgus, Ailesbury in Buckinghamshire.

Ægylde, or Agylde, or Orgylde [inultus, Lat.], uncompensated, unpaid for, unavenged. From the particle of exclusion, a, æ, or ex, (Goth.), and gild, payment, requital.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Ægyptians, commonly called Gypsies. A strange kind of commonwealth, made up of wandering impostors and jugglers, who appeared in Germany in the beginning of the sixteenth century, and have since spread themselves throughout Europe and Asia. The Turks called them Zingarees; they have been also called Zigenners, Sziganys, Cygernis, and Tschingenes, all appearing to be derived from the ancient German Zichegan or vagrant. The severe statutes against these people have been repealed, and they are now only punishable as vagrants by the 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, s. 4.

Æhlip, transgression of the law.—Ancient Inst. Eng.

Æhte-swan [Servus Porcarius, Lat.], a swine-herd, from 'æht,' possessio pecus, and 'swan' (Old Norse, or Icelandic, sveinn), a servant.—Ib.

Ælmfeoh, or Ælmsfeoh, Peter pence, which used to be paid to the Pope.

Æquitas agit in personam.—(Equity operates upon the conscience.)

Æquitas est convenientia rerum quæ cuncta coæquipărat, et quæ, in paribus rationibus, paria jura et judicia desiderat. Co. Litt. 24.—(Equity is a conveniency of things which makes all accord, and which, in equal reasonings, desires equal rights and decisions.)

Æquitas est correctio legis generaliter latæ, quâ parte deficit. Plowd. 375.—(Equity is a correction of law, when too general, in the part in which it is defective.)

Æquitas est correctio quædam legi adhibita, quia ab eâ abest aliquid propter generalem sine exceptione comprehensionem. Plowd. 467.—(Equity is a certain correction applied to law, because on account of its general comprehensiveness, without an exception, something is absent from it.)

Æquitas est perfecta quædam ratio quæ jus scriptum interpretatur et emendat; nullâ scripturâ comprehensa, sed solâ ratione consistens. Co. Litt. 24.—(Equity is a sort of perfect reason which interprets and amends the written law; comprehended in no code, but depending on reason alone.)

Æquitas est quasi equalitas. Co. Litt. 24. (Equity is as it were equality.)

Æquitas est verborum legis sufficiens directio, qua una res, solummodo, cavetur verbis, ut omnis alia in æquali genere, iisdem cavetur verbis. (Equity is the efficient application of the language of the law, so that although only one thing is guarded against by its language, every other thing in the same category is also guarded against by the same language.)

Æquitas nunquam contravĕnit leges.—(Equity never counteracts the laws.)

Æquitas sequitur legem. Gilb. 136.—(Equity follows law.)

Æquum et bonum est lex legum. Hob. 224. (That which is equal and good is the Law of Laws.)

Æra or Era, a fixed point of chronological time, whence any number of years is counted. The origin of the term is contested, though it is generally allowed to have taken its rise in Spain. Sepulveda supposes it formed from A.ER.A. the notæ or abbreviatures of the words annus erat Augusti, occasioned by the Spaniards beginning their computation from the time their country came under the dominion of Augustus, or that of receiving the Roman calendar.

The difference between the terms æra and epoch is, that æras are certain points fixed by a people or nation, and epochs are points fixed by chronologists and historians. The idea of an æra comprehends also a succession of years proceeding from a fixed point of time, and the epoch is the point itself. Thus the Christian æra began at the epoch of the birth of our Saviour. Kock's History of Europe, Introd.; Encyc. London.

Ærie [fr. æria accipitum, Lat.], an airy or nest of goshawks.—Spel. Glos.

Æstimatio capitis [pretium hominis, Lat.], fines paid for offences committed against persons according to their degree and quality, by estimation of their heads, ordained by King Athelstane.—Cress. Ch. Hist. 834

Æstimatio præteriti delicti, ex postremo facto nunquam crescit. Bacon.—(The estimation of a committed crime is never increased by a subsequent fact.)

Ætate probanda, a writ which inquired whether the king's tenant holding in chief by chivalry, was of full age to receive his lands. It was directed to the escheator of the county, now disused.—Reg. Orig. 294.

Ætheling, a noble, though generally signifying a prince of the blood.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Affairs, a person's concerns in trade or property.

Affectio tua nomen imponit operi tuo. Co. Litt. 177.—(The affection of a person gives a name to his work.)

Affectum, challenge propter.—See JURY.

Affectus punitur licet non sequatur effectus. 9 Co. 56.—(The intention is punished, although the consequence do not follow.)

Affeerors [fr. affeurer, or afferer, Fr. to tax, fr. feur or forum, Lat., a market], persons who, in court-leets, upon oath, settle and moderate the fines and amercements imposed on those who have committed offences arbitrarily punishable, or that have no express penalty appointed by statute. They are also appointed to moderate fines, &c., in courts-baron.—Cowel.

Affiance [fr. fidem dare, Lat.], the plighting of troth or promise between a man and woman, upon agreement of marriage.—Termes de la Ley, 27; Litt. s. 39.

Affidare, to plight faith, or give or swear fealty, i. e. fidelity.—Blount.

Affidatio Dominorum, an oath taken by the lords in parliament.—Ibid.

Affidari [seu affidari ad arma, Lat.], to be mustered and enrolled for soldiers upon an oath of fidelity.—MS. Dom de Farendon, 22, 55.

Affidavit [fr. affirdare, M. Lat., to pledge one's faith, fr. fides, Lat.], a declaration in writing, sworn before a person having authority to administer an oath; an affidavit ought to set forth the matter of fact only intended to be proved, it ought not to declare the merits of the case of which the court is to judge.—21 Car. 1, B. R.

By the practice of the Court of Chancery, the plaintiff and defendant may not only support their case by affidavit on interlocutory applications, but, when issue has been joined, may verify their respective cases either wholly or partially by affidavit, or wholly or partially by the oral examination of witnesses.

Every affidavit is intituled in the cause or matter in which it is made, and contains the true place of residence, description and addition of the deponent. The affidavit is taken and expressed in the first person of the deponent. Any solicitor, party, or person filing an affidavit not so taken and expressed, will not be allowed the costs of preparing and filing such affidavit in any taxation of costs.

The affidavit must state distinctly what facts or circumstances deposed to are within the deponent's own knowledge, and his means of knowledge, and what facts or circumstances deposed to are known to or believed by him, by reason of information derived from other sources than his own knowledge, and what such sources are, and if it fails so to state, the costs of it will be disallowed on taxation unless the Court otherwise directs. Before an affidavit is exhibited in court, or otherwise produced for the purpose of grounding any proceeding thereon, it shall be filed in the office of the Clerks of Records and Writs. And no order grounded upon an affidavit shall be drawn up unless the affidavit be first so filed, and an office copy thereof be produced.—Orders, Hilary Term, 1860, xviii. 1–5; Smi. Chan. Prac. 407.

By the rules of practice at Common Law, Hil. T. 1853, rule—

138. The addition and true place of abode of every person making an affidavit shall be inserted therein.

139. In every affidavit made by two or more deponents, the names of the several persons making such affidavit shall be written in the jurat.

140. No affidavit shall be read or made use of in any matter depending in Court in the jurat of which there shall be any interlineation or erasure.

141. Where any affidavit is sworn before any Judge or any Commissioner, by any person who from his or her signature appears to be illiterate, the Judges, Clerk, or Commissioner taking such affidavit, shall certify or state in the jurat, that the affidavit was read in his presence to the party making the same, and that such party seemed perfectly to understand the same, and also that the said party wrote his or her mark or signature in the presence of the Judge's Clerk or Commissioner, taking the said affidavit.

142. No affidavit of the service of process shall be deemed sufficient if sworn before the plaintiff's own attorney or his clerk.

143. Where an agent in town, or an attorney in the country, is the attorney on the record, an affidavit sworn before the attorney in the country shall not be received; and an affidavit sworn before an attorney's clerk shall not be received in cases where it would not be receivable if sworn before the attorney himself; but this rule shall not extend to affidavits to hold to bail.

144. An affidavit sworn before a Judge of any of the Courts shall be received in the Court to which such Judge belongs, though not entitled of that Court; but not in any other Court, unless entitled of the Court in which it is to be used.

145. Where a special time is limited for filing affidavits, no affidavit filed after that time shall be made use of in Court or before the Master, unless by leave of the Court or a Judge.

146. No rule which the Court has granted upon the foundation of any affidavit shall be of any force unless such affidavit shall have been actually made before such rule was moved for, and produced in Court at the time of making the motion.

147. All affidavits used before a Judge out of Court, shall be filed with the Masters of the said Courts, and be alphabetically indexed; and such affidavits shall be delivered to the Masters of the respective Courts, in order to be filed within ten days next after that on which the matter is disposed of.

148. No commission for taking affidavits shall be issued to any person practising as a conveyancer, unless such person be also an attorney or solicitor of one of the Courts at Westminster; and no such commission shall issue without an affidavit made by the person intended to be named therein, that he is not and does not intend to become a practising conveyancer, or that he is an attorney or solicitor duly enrolled in one of the said Courts, and hath taken out his certificate for the current year.

Every affidavit to be used in any cause or civil proceeding in any of the superior courts of Common Law shall be drawn up in the first person, and shall be divided into paragraphs, and every paragraph shall be numbered consecutively, and, as nearly as may be, shall be confined to a distinct portion of the subject. No costs shall be allowed for any affidavit, or part of an affidavit, substantially departing from this rule.—Rule 2, Mic. V. 1854.

Any party to any civil action or other civil proceeding, in any of the superior courts of law requiring the affidavit of a person who refuses to make an affidavit, may apply by summons for an order to such person to appear and be examined upon oath before a Judge or Master, to whom it may be most convenient to refer such examination as to the matters concerning which he has refused to make an affidavit; and a Judge may, if he think fit, make such order for the attendance of such person before the person therein appointed to take such examination for the purpose of being examined, and for the production of any writings or documents to be mentioned in such order, and may therein impose such terms as to such examination, and the costs of the application and proceedings thereon, as he shall think just.—C. L. P. Act, 1854, s. 48.

Such order shall be proceeded upon in like manner as an order made under 1 Wm. IV. c. 22, and the examination shall be conducted and the depositions taken down and returned, as nearly as may be, in the mode now used on vivâ voce examinations under the said Act of Parliament.—Sect. 49; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Prem. p. 1541, et seq.

Affidavit Office in Chancery, abolished by 15 &16 Vict. c. 87, ss. 27 & 29, and its duties transferred to the Clerks of Records and Writs.

Affiliation, the adoption of the child of another; also the proof of a child's paternity.

Affinage [purgatio metalli, Lat.], refining metal, hence fine and refine.—Blount.

Affinitas affinitatis, the connection which has neither consanguinity nor affinity, as, the connection between a husband's brother and his wife's sister.

Affinitas dicitur, cùm duæ cognationes, inter se divisæ, per nuptias copulantur, et altera ad alterius fines accedit. Co. Litt. 157.—(It is called affinity, when two families, divided from one another, are united through marriage, and either approaches the confines of the other.)

Affinity, relationship by marriage between the husband and the blood relations of the wife, and between the wife and the blood relations of the husband.—2 Steph. Com. 259. This is a relationship in law, and no real kindred.

Affinity is distinguished into three kinds. (1) Direct, or that subsisting between the husband and his wife's relations by blood, or between the wife and the husband's relations by blood. (2) Secondary, or that which subsists between the husband and his wife's relations by marriage. (3) Collateral, or that which subsists between the husband and the relations of his wife's relations.

Affirm, to ratify or confirm a former law or judgment.—Cowel.

Affirmance, the confirmation of a voidable act.

Affirmant, a person who solemnly affirms, instead of taking an oath.

Affirmanti, non neganti incumbit probatio.—(The proof lies upon him who affirms, not upon him who denies.)

Affirmation, a solemn declaration without oath; an indulgence to the people called Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists, who, in giving evidence either in civil or criminal cases, in lieu of an oath, may make a solemn affirmation that what they say is true. False affirmations are liable to the penalty of perjury. 9 Geo. IV. c. 32; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. cc. 49 & 82; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 77; C. L. P. Act, 1854, s. 20; and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 25, Scotland. See QUAKERS.

Affirmative Pregnant, an assertion implying a negation.

Affirmativum negativum implicat.—(An affirmation implies a negative.)

Afforare, to set a price or value on a thing. See AFFEER.—Blount.

Afforatus, appraised or valued, as things vendible in a fair or market.—Ibid.

Afforciament, a fortress, stronghold, or other fortification.—Ibid.

Afforciare, Afforce, to add, increase or make stronger; in case of disagreement of the jury, let the assize be increased, which is an afforcement of the assize.—Ibid.

Afforest, to turn ground into a forest. Chart. de Forest. c. 1.

Affranchise, to make free.

Affray [fr. effrayer, Fr., to affright], a skirmish or fighting between two or more persons; there must be a stroke given or offered, or a weapon drawn, otherwise it is not an affray. It is a public offence, and is so called because it affrights persons. It differs from an assault in that it is a wrong to the public, while an assault is of a private nature.—1 Hawkins, P. C. 154; 4 Steph. Com. 318; Roscoe, Crim. Law, 253.

Affreightment [fr. fret, Fr.], the freight or lading of a ship.—Cowel.

Affri, or Affra, bullocks, horses, or beasts of the plough.—Ibid.

Aforesaid, already mentioned.

Aforethought, prepense, premeditated.

A fortiori (by so much stronger [reason], Lat.) It is thus applied:—A private person, and à fortiori, a peace officer (it being his especial duty), who is present at the commission of a felony, is bound by the law to arrest the felon, on pain of fine and imprisonment.—2 Hawk. P. C. 74.

Africa, Coast of. By 6 & 7 Vict. c. 13, amended by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 121, provision is made for the government of British settlements on the coast of Africa.

African Company, a company which, under a charter of Charles II., enjoyed an exclusive trade from the port of Sallee, in South Barbary, to the Cape of Good Hope, both inclusive, with all the islands near to those coasts. Several statutes passed, placing their trade upon a new footing, but the 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 28, abolished the company and annulled all the grants made to them; under it the Crown took possession of their forts and castles, and the trade was thrown open.

African Slave Trade, The, was abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 73; the 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 91, made the slave trade piracy, and the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 3, s. 19, abolished slavery apprenticeship, and gave compensation.—See 25 & 26 Vict. c. 40 and c. 90.

Aftermath, the last crop of grass or pasture.

Agalma, [ἄγαλμα, Gr.], an impression or image of anything on a seal.— Cowel.

Agard, award.

Age, the criminal responsibility of males and females, and their power to do certain acts, depend upon their age. Thus in criminal matters, a person of the age of fourteen may be capitally punished for any capital offence, but under the age of seven he cannot. The period between seven and fourteen is subject to much uncertainty; the rule applicable to it depends upon the infant's capacity to discern good from evil; if he could, then the maxim is, malitia supplet ætatem (malice supplies the want of age), and he may be convicted and executed. A male at twelve years old may take the oath of allegiance, at fourteen is at years of discretion, so far at least that he may enter into a binding marriage, or consent or disagree to one contracted before, and at twenty-one, he is at his own disposal, and may aliene his lands, goods, and chattels. A female at twelve is at years of maturity, and may enter into a binding marriage, or consent or disagree to one contracted before, and at twenty-one may dispose of herself and all her property. Full age in male or female is twenty-one years, which age is completed on the day preceding the twenty-first anniversary of a person's birth. — 1 Co. Litt. 78; Bro. Abr. 'Age.'

The Roman Civil Law divides age thus:—

I. Infantia, from birth to seven years.

II. Pueritia { (a) Ætas infantiæ proxima, from 7 to 10½. (b) Ætas pubertati proxima, from 10½ to 14.

III. Pubertas, from 14 upwards. During infantia and ætas infantiæ proxima, a person was not punishable for any crime. During ætas pubertati proxima, a person was liable, if doli capax. At pubertas, a person became fully responsible. — Tayl. C. L. 254, et seq.

Age-prier or prayer [ætatis precatio, Lat.], to pray age, thus, when an action is brought against a minor for the recovery of lands, which he possesses by descent, he petitions or moves the court to stay the action until he attain his majority, which is generally acceded to.—Termes de la Ley, 30.

Aged witness, a person seventy years old.

Agency, deed of, a revocable and voluntary trust for payment of debts.—Lew. Tr. 483.

Agenfrida, the true lord or owner of anything.—Cowel.

Agenhina, Agenhine, a guest at an inn, who, having stayed there for three nights, was then accounted one of the family.—Ibid.

Agent, a person appointed to transact the business of another.—Dyche.

Agents may be divided into three classes:—

I. Commercial, as —
- (a) Auctioneers.
- (b) Brokers.
- (c) Factors.
- (d) Consignees.
- (e) Supercargoes.
- (f) Ships'-husbands.
- (g) Masters of ships.
- (h) Partners.

II. For the purpose of litigation, as —
- (a) Attornies at Law.
- (b) Solicitors in Equity.
- (c) Proctors in the Spiritual, Probate, and Divorce Courts.

III. Social, as —
- (a) Attornies in fact.
- (b) Servants.

It is a general common law rule, that where an authority is given to two or more persons to do an act, the act binds the principal only when all of them concur in doing it; for the authority is construed strictly, and the power is deemed to be joint, unless expressed to be several.

But a more liberal construction in favour of commercial transactions is admitted, for, if a joint consignment be made to two factors (whether partners or not), each possesses the whole power over it, but such joint-factors are co-obligors, and as such, are jointly accountable and answerable for one another in solido. Story's Agency, 38.

Agent and patient, when the same person is the doer of a thing and the party to whom done; thus, where a widow endows herself of the best part of her husband's possessions, this being the act of herself to herself, she is both agent and patient. Again, if one be indebted to another, and afterwards the debtor makes the creditor his executor, the creditor may retain out of the testator's assets as much as will satisfy the debt; by such retainer he is both agent and patient. 8 Rep. 118, 138.

Agentes et consentientes, pari pœnâ plectentur. 5 Co. 80.—(Acting and consenting parties are liable to the same punishment.)

Aggravation, the increase of the enormity of crime; augmenting the injury of a wrong, or inflaming damages. As to aggravated assaults on females and boys under 17, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 43.

Aggregate, a collocation of individuals, units, or things, in order to form a whole.

Aggressor, the beginner of a quarrel or dispute.

Agild [sine mulctâ, Lat.], free from penalties, not subject to customary fines or impositions. Blount.

Agiler [fr. a gilt, Sax. without fault], an observer or informer.—Ibid.

Agillarius, an hey-ward, herd-ward, or keeper of cattle in a common field, solemnly sworn at the lord's court. There were two sorts, one of the town or village, another of the lord of the manor.—Ken. Paroch. Antiq. 534, 576.

Agio [aggio, Ital. an exchange of money for a premium], a term used to express the difference in point of value, between metallic and paper money, or between one sort of metallic money and another.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Agiotage, a speculation on the rise and fall of the public debt of states, or the public funds. The speculator is called agioteur.

Agist [fr. gisement, Fr. a bed or resting place], to take in and feed strangers' cattle in the Royal Forest, and to collect the money due for it.—Mann. Forest Laws, c. 11 to 80.

Agistatio animalium in foresta, the drift or numbering of cattle in the forest.—Ibid.

Agisters, or Gist Takers (called also Agistators), officers appointed to look after cattle, &c.—Ibid.

Agistment [fr. jacere, Lat., gésir, Fr. to lie, whence giste, a lodging], the taking in of other men's cattle into pasture-land, at a certain rate per week; so called, because the cattle are suffered agiser, i. e. to be levant et couchant there. Many great farms are employed for this purpose. Also the profit of such feeding. Agistment of sea banks [terræ agistatæ, Lat.], where lands are charged with a tribute to keep out the sea.—Spel. Wats. c. 50.

Agitators, persons chosen to manage a business.

Agius [fr. ἅγιος, Gr.], holy.—Mon. Ang. 15, 17.

Agnates, agnati, or adgnati, relations derived per virilis sexus personas, i.e. relations by the father's side as distinguished from cognati, relations by the mother's. An agnate is related by generation; thus, my son, brother, paternal uncle, and their children, as also my daughter and sister, are agnated to me.—See Smith's Dict. of Antiq.—Cognate.

Agnation, kinship by the father's side.

Agnomen, a name derived from some notable personal circumstance.—Cum. C. L. 170, and Smith's Dict. Nomen. of Antiq.

Agnomination, a sir-name.

Agnus Dei (Lat.), a piece of white wax, in a flat, oval form, like a small cake, stamped with the figure of a lamb, and consecrated by the Pope.—Cowel.

Agraria Lex. The Agrarian law was enacted to distribute among the Roman people all the lands which they had gained by conquest, and to limit the quantity of land possessed by each person to a certain number of acres.—Cicero pro Leg. Agr.; Smith's Dict. of Antiq.; Harrington's Oceana.

The following passage relating to this subject occurs in Dr. Arnold's Rome, vol. I. c. ix. p. 156. Second edition:

If, amongst Niebuhr's countless services to Roman history, any single one may claim our gratitude beyond the rest, it is his explanation of the true nature and character of the agrarian laws. Twenty-four years have not yet elapsed since he first published it, but it has already overthrown the deeply-rooted false impressions which prevailed universally on the subject; and its truth, like Newton's discoveries in natural science, is not now to be proved, but to be taken as the very corner-stone of all our researches into the internal state of the Roman people. I am now to copy so much of it as may be necessary to the right understanding of the views and merits of Spurius Cassius.

It seems to have been a notion generally entertained in the ancient world, that every citizen of a country should be a landholder, and that the territory of a state, so far as it was not left unenclosed or reserved for public purposes, should be divided in equal portions amongst the citizens. But it would almost always happen that a large part of it was left unenclosed; the complete cultivation of a whole country, without distinction of soil, being only the result of an excess of population, and therefore not taking place till a late period. The part thus left out of cultivation was mostly kept as pasture, and a revenue was raised from it, not only from every citizen who had turned out sheep or cattle upon it, but also from strangers, who, although incapable of buying land, might yet rent a right of pasture for their flocks and herds. But when a new territory was gained in war, the richer parts of it already in cultivation were too valuable to be given up to pasture; while, on the other hand, if they were divided, the division would only follow the general rule, and allot an equal portion to every citizen. In these circumstances, it was the practice at Rome, and doubtless in other states of Italy, to allow individuals to occupy such lands, and to enjoy all the benefits of them, on condition of paying to the state the tithe of the produce as an acknowledgment that the state was the proprietor of the land, and the individual merely the occupier. With regard to the state, the occupier was merely a tenant-at-will; but with respect to other citizens, he was like the owner of the soil, and could alienate the land which he occupied either for a term of years or for ever, as much as if he had been its actual proprietor.

This public land, thus occupied, was naturally looked to as a resource on every admission of new citizens. They were to receive their portion of freehold land according to the general notion of a citizen's condition; but this land could only be found by a division of that which belonged to the public, and by the consequent ejectment of its tenants-at-will. Hence, in the Greek states, every large accession to the number of citizens was followed by a call for a division of the public land; and as this division involved the sacrifice of many existing investments, it was regarded with horror by the old citizens as an act of revolutionary violence. For although the land was undoubtedly the property of the state, and although the occupiers of it were in relation to the state mere tenants-at-will, yet it is in human nature that a long undisturbed possession should give a feeling of ownership, the more so, as while the state's claim lay dormant, the possessor was in fact the proprietor, and the land would thus be repeatedly passing by regular sale from one occupier to another. And if there was no near prospect of the state's claiming its right, it is manifest that the piece of land thus occupied would, after some years of undisturbed possession, be nearly equal to that of an actual freehold.

Under such circumstances, the English law, with its characteristic partiality to individual and existing investments, would no doubt have decided, as it did in the somewhat similar case of copyhold, that the occupier could not be ejected so long as he continued to pay his tithe to the state. The Roman law, on the other hand, in a spirit no less characteristic, constantly asserted the utterly precarious tenure of the occupier, whenever the state might choose to take its property into its own hands. And, accordingly, most of the kings of Rome are said to have carried an agrarian law, that is, to have divided a portion, more or less, of the public land, amongst those whom they admitted to the rights of citizenship. Yet it was understood that these new citizens, the Roman commons, although they received their portion of land as freehold whenever the public land was divided, had still no right to occupy it while it lay in the mass unallotted; while the old burghers, who enjoyed exclusively the right of occupation with regard to the undivided public land, had no share in it whatever when it was divided, because they already enjoyed, from ancient allotment, a freehold property of their own. Thus the public land was wholly unprofitable to the commons so long as it was undivided, and became wholly lost to the burghers when it was divided.

Now, twenty-four years after the expulsion of Tarquinius, there must have been at least as great need of an agrarian law as at any former period of the Roman history. The loss of territory on the right bank of the Tiber, and all those causes which had brought on the general distress of the commons, and overwhelmed them hopelessly in debts, called aloud for a remedy; and this remedy was to be found, according to precedent, no less than abstract justice, in an allotment of the public land. For, as the burghers who occupied this land had even grown rich amidst the distress of the commons, so they could well afford to make some sacrifice; while the reservation to them of the exclusive right of occupying the public land, till it was divided, held out to them the hope of acquiring fresh possessions so soon as the nation, united and invigorated by the proposed relief, should be in a condition to make new conquests.

Spurius Cassius accordingly proposed an agrarian law for the division of a certain proportion of the public land, while from the occupiers of the remainder he intended to require the regular payment of the tithe, which had been greatly neglected, and to apply the revenue thus gained to paying the commons whenever they were called out to serve as soldiers. Had he been king he would have carried the measure without difficulty, and would have gone down to posterity invested with the same glory which rendered sacred the memory of the good King Servius. But his colleague, Proculus Virginius, headed the aristocracy in resisting his law, and in maligning the motives of its author. His treaties with the Latins and Hernicans were represented as derogating from the old supremacy of Rome; and this cry roused the national pride even of the commons against him, as four centuries afterwards a similar charge of sacrificing the rights of Rome to the Italian allies ruined the popularity of M. Drusus. Still it is probable that the popular feeling in favour of his law was so strong, that the burghers yielded to the storm for the moment, and consented to pass it. They followed the constant policy of an aristocracy, to separate the people from their leaders, to pacify the former by a momentary resignation of the point in dispute, and then to watch their time for destroying the latter, that so, when the popular party is deprived of its defenders, they may wrest from its hands that concession which it is then unable to retain.

When, therefore, the year was over, and Spurius Cassius was no longer consul, the burghers knew that their hour of vengeance had arrived. Ser. Cornelius and Quintus Fabius were the new consuls; Kæso Fabius, the consul's brother, and Lucius Valerius, were the inquisitors of blood, quæstores parricidii, who as they tried all capital offences subject to an appeal to the burghers or commons, were also empowered to bring any offender at once before those supreme tribunals, instead of taking cognisance of his case themselves. Cassius was charged with a treasonable attempt to make himself king, and the burghers, assembled in their curiæ, found him guilty. He shared the fate of Agis and of Marino Falieri; he was sentenced to die as a traitor, and was, according to the usage of the Roman law, scourged and beheaded, and his house razed to the ground.

An agrarian law was clearly developed in the regulations of the Jewish lawgiver, who, following the example of the Egyptians, made agriculture the basis of the state. He accordingly apportioned to every citizen a certain quantity of land, and gave him the right of tilling it himself, and of transmitting it to his heirs. The person who had thus come into possession could not alienate the property for any longer period than the year of the coming jubilee—a regulation which prevented the rich from coming into possession of large tracts of land, and then leasing them out in small parcels to the poor. It was another law of Moses, that the vendor of a piece of land, or his nearest relative, had a right to redeem the land sold whenever they chose, by paying the amount of profits up to the year of jubilee.—Ruth. iv. 4; Jer. xxxii. 7; Jahn's Bib. Antiq.; Graves on the Pentateuch.

Agreed, this word in a deed creates a covenant.

Agreement [fr. gratus, Lat., acceptable; aggregatio mentium, Lat.], a joining together of two or more minds in anything done or to be done. Also, the effect of a joint-consent of two or more parties to a contract or bargain. There are three sorts:—(1) An agreement executed at once, as where money is paid for the matter agreed, or other satisfaction made, at the time it is entered into. (2) An agreement after an act done by another, as where one does a thing and another afterwards agrees to it, this is also called an executed agreement. (3) An agreement executory, or to be performed at some future time.—Termes de la Ley, 31; Plowd. 5.

Agri limitati, lands belonging to the state by right of conquest, and granted or sold in plots.—Sand. Just. 186.

Agusadura, in ancient customs, a fee, due from the vassals to their lord for sharpening their ploughing tackle. Anciently, the tenants in some manors were not allowed to have their agricultural implements sharpened by any but those whom the lord appointed; for which an acknowledgment was paid, called agusadura or agusage, which some take to be the same with what was otherwise called rullage, from the ancient French reille, a ploughshare.—Encyc. Lond.

Agweddi [ag-gwedd, conjunction], a portion given with a bride.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Aiders, advocates, abettors. See ACCESSARY.

Aid of the King [auxilium regis, Lat.], the king's tenant prays this, when rent is demanded of him by others. A city or borough, holding a fee-farm from the king, if anything be demanded which belongs to such fee-farm, may pray in 'aid of the king,' and the king's bailiffs, collectors or accountants, shall have aid of the king. The proceedings are then stayed until the crown-counsel are heard, but this aid will not be granted after issue joined, because the Crown cannot rely upon the defence made by another.—Jenk. Cent. 64.

Aid prayer, formerly made use of in pleading for a petition in court, praying in aid of the tenant for life, &c., from the reversioner or remainder-man, when the title to the inheritance was in question. It is a plea in suspension of the action.—Com. Dig. 'Aide' B. 5; 2 Bos. and Pul. 384; 3 Bl. Comm. 300.

Aids [fr. aides, Fr.; auxilia, Lat.], originally mere benevolences granted by a tenant to his lord, in times of distress, but at length the lords treated them as a matter of right, and not of discretion. They were principally three: (1) To ransom the lord's person, if taken prisoner; (2) To make the lord's eldest son and heir apparent a knight; (3) To give a suitable portion to the lord's eldest daughter on her marriage. Abolished by 12 Car. II., c. 24. Also, extraordinary grants to the Crown by the House of Commons, and which were the origin of the modern system of taxation.

Aiel or aile [fr. aïeul, Fr.; avus, Lat., a grandfather], a writ which lay when a man's grandfather, or great grandfather (called besaile), died seised of lands in fee-simple, and on the day of his death the heir was dispossessed of his inheritance by a stranger.—F. N. B. 222.

Aillt [aill, other], a villain.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Air, one of the elements; it is publici juris. As to the right to the enjoyment of air free and unpolluted, see Gole on Easements, 289, 290.

Airway, a passage for the admission of air into a mine. To maliciously fill up, obstruct, or damage, with intent to destroy, obstruct, or render useless the airway to any mine, is a felony punishable by penal servitude or imprisonment at the discretion of the Court. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 28.

Al, or ald [eald, Sax., age], this syllable prefixed to the names of places denotes antiquity, as Aldborough, i. e. Old Borough, Aldeburgh, Aldworth, Aldgate, &c.—Blount.

Ala Campi, Wingfield.

Alæ ecclesiæ, the wings or side aisles of a church.—Blount.

Alæmis, the river Ax, in Devonshire.

Alanerarius, a manager and keeper of dogs for the sport of hawking; from alanus, a dog known to the ancients. A falconer.—Blount.

Alauna, Alnwick in Northumberland; also Alcester in Warwickshire.

Alba, a surplice or white sacerdotal vest, anciently worn by the officiating priests. Blount.

Alba Firma. When quit rents payable to the Crown by freeholders of manors were reserved in silver or white money, they were called white-rents or blanch-farms, reditus-albi, in contradiction to rents reserved in work, grain, &c., which were called reditus-nigri, black-mail.—2 Inst. 19.

Alba marla, Albemarle.

Albeneio De, De Albeneto, D'Aubeney, Albiney.

Albergenium, an habergeon, a defence for the neck.—Hoveden, 6 b.

Albinatus jus, the droit d'aubaine in France, whereby the king, at an alien's death, was entitled to all his property, unless he had peculiar exemption. Repealed by the French laws in June, 1791.

Albo Monasterio, De, Whitchurch.

Albrea and Albericus, Aubrey.

Album, white rent paid in silver. See ALBA FIRMA.

Albus Liber, an ancient book containing a compilation of the law and customs of the City of London. It has lately been reprinted by order of the Master of the Rolls.

Alcade, a judicial officer in Spain.

Alcavala, a tax on the transfer of property in Spain.

Alder, the first, as alder best, is the best of all; alder liefest, the most dear.—Blount.

Alder carr, land covered with alders.—Norfolk phrase.

Alderman [ealdorman, Ang.-Sax., fr. eald old, ealdor a parent, hence a ruler], originally a dignity of the highest rank, both hereditary and official, nearly synonymous with that of king. In the Sax. Chron., Cerdic, founder of the kingdom of Wessex, and his son Cynric, are denominated 'aldormen.' They were also governors of provinces, and, in that capacity, presided in the Hundred Court. After the breaking up of the Heptarchy, we find them, under the supremacy of Wessex, occupying the place of kings, in the conquered kingdoms of Mercia and East Anglia. In the latter days of Anglo-Saxon sovereignty, under those miserable princes Ethelred and his son Edward, the dignity of ealdorman seems to have reached its highest point, from which it rapidly descended, their functions being either suppressed or exercised by officials under other denominations, until the once great name remained alone to that civic magistrate, of whom the earliest traces are, perhaps, to be found in the time of Edward the Confessor. Sic transit, &c. Aldermen at this day are associates to the civil magistrate of a city or town corporate. Spel. Glos.

Alderney, one of the islands in the English Channel, which formed part of the Duchy of Normandy, and was annexed to the English Crown by the first princes of the Norman line. These islands are governed by their own laws, chiefly collected in the book called 'Le Grand Coustumier.'

Alditheleia, De, Audley.

Alea, the chance of gain or loss in a contract.—Civil Law.

Aleatory contract, an agreement of which the effects, with respect both to the advantages and losses, whether to all the parties, or to some of them, depend on an uncertain event. Ibid.

Alecinarium, a hawk, called also a lanner.

Ale-conner or Ale-kenner [gustator cervisiæ, Lat.], one who kens or knows what good ale is; an officer appointed at a court-leet, who is sworn to look at the assize and goodness of ale and beer within the precincts of the lordship. Kitch. 46. There are four ale-conners, chosen by the liverymen of the city of London, in Common Hall, on Midsummer-day, whose office it is to inspect the measures used in public houses.—Encyc. Lond.

Ale-founder. See ALE-CONNER.

Ale-house, a place where ale, beer, &c., are drunk.—Burn's Justice. As to the licensing ale-houses, consult 9 Geo. IV. c. 61; and as to the sale of beer on Sundays, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 118.

Ale-silver, a rent or tribute paid annually to the Lord Mayor of London, by those who sell ale within the liberty of the city.—Antiq. Purvey, 183.

Ale-stake, a maypole or long stake driven into the ground, with a sign on it for the sale of ale.—Cowel.

Ale-taster. See ALE-CONNER.

Alfet, a cauldron or furnace, into which boiling water was poured, in which a criminal plunged his arm up to the elbow and there held it for some time, as an ordeal.—Du Cange.

Algarum maris, probably a corruption of Laganum maris, lagan being a right, in the middle ages, like jetson and flotsam, by which the goods thrown from a vessel in distress became the property of the king or the lord on whose shores they were stranded.—Spel. Jacob, and Du Cange.

Alia enormia [Lat.] (other wrongs). A declaration in trespass sometimes concludes thus:—'and other wrongs to the plaintiff then did,' &c. This is technically called an allegation of alia enormia.

Aliamenta, a liberty of passage, open way, water-course, &c., for the tenants' accommodation.—Kitch.

Alias (otherwise), a second or further writ, which is issued after a first writ has expired without effect, and containing this clause, 'We command you, as we formerly have commanded you (sicut alias præcepimus).'—Cowel.

Alias dictus (otherwise called), a second name belonging to a person besides that which may have been already expressed.—Dyer, 50.

Alibi (for ali-ubi, elsewhere). It is a defence resorted to in criminal prosecutions, where the party accused, in order to prove that he could not have committed the crime with which he is charged, offers evidence that he was in a different place at the time the offence was being committed.—Encyc. Lond.

Alien [fr. alienigena, alibi natus, Lat.], a person born in a foreign country, out of the allegiance of the British Crown. Consult the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66, which relaxes the law of aliens in their favour. The 10 & 11 Vict. c. 83 relates to the colonies. As to tracing descent through an alien, see 12 & 13 Wm. III. c. 6, and 25 Geo. II. c. 39.

Alien ami or amy, a subject of a nation which is at peace with this country.

Alien enemy, a subject of a nation which is at war with this country.

Alien née, a man born an alien.

Alienage, the state of an alien.

Alienate or aliene, to transfer property.

Alienation, a transferring property to another.—Co. Litt. 118.

Alienigena est alienæ gentis, seu alienæ ligeantiæ, qui etiam dicitur peregrinus, alienus, exoticus, extraneus, &c. 7 Co. 16.—(An alien is of another nation or another allegiance, who is also called a stranger, foreigner, &c.)

Alienatio, i. e. alienum facere; vel, ex nostro dominio in alienum transferre; sive, rem aliquam in dominium alterius transferre. Co. Litt. 118.—(Alienation, that is, to make alien, or to transfer from our ownership to that of another, or to transfer anything into the power of another.)

Alienatio licet prohibeatur, consensu tamen omnium, in quorum favorem prohibita est, potest fieri, et quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto. Co. Litt. 98.—(Although alienation be prohibited, yet by the consent of all in whose favour it is prohibited, it may take place; for it is in the power of any man to renounce a law made in his own favour.)

Alienatio rei præfertur juri accrescendi. Co. Litt. 185.—(The alienation of property is preferred to the right of survivorship.)

Alienation office, a place to which all writs of covenants and entries were carried for the recovery of fines levied thereon.

Alienee, one to whom a transfer of property is made.

Alieni juris, under another's authority.

Aliunde, from another place or person.

Alienor, one who transfers property.

Aliment [fr. alimentum, Lat.], a fund for maintenance.—Scotch Term.

Alimentorum appellatione venit victus, vestitus, et habitatio. 2 Inst. 17.—(Under the expression of aliments come food, clothes, and lodging.)

Alimony [fr. alimonia, Lat.], the allowance made to a wife out of her husband's estate for her support, either during a matrimonial suit or at its termination, when she proves herself entitled to a separate maintenance, and the fact of a marriage is established. But she is not entitled to it if she elope with an adulterer, or wilfully leave her husband without any just cause for so doing.

It is of two kinds: (a) In causes between husband and wife. Upon the principle that the whole property is supposed by law to devolve upon the husband, he is generally obliged to pay the expenses on both sides, and to allow his wife alimony during the suit, and this whether the suit be commenced by or against him, and whatever its nature may be. It is usually about one-fifth of the husband's net annual income. The alimony will be reduced according to the fluctuations of the husband's income. If the husband's circumstances should alter, if he be lapsus facultatibus, he should, without delay, apply to have the alimony reduced, his means having diminished; and the wife may apply for an increase if his means have improved. (b) Permanent alimony, which is allotted to a wife upon a judicial separation being decreed on account of the husband's conduct. This alimony is more ample than alimony pending a suit; it is generally a third, and is larger in proportion to a small than a great income. Where a husband meditates a departure from this country in order to evade its payment, the Court of Chancery will grant its prerogative writ of ne exeat regno, under which he will be arrested.

Alimony is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial causes. The 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 24, enacts that the Court may direct its payment either to the wife herself or to any trustee on her behalf. With regard to permanent provision for a wife after a decree dissolving the marriage has been pronounced, s. 32 enacts that the Court may, on a decree for dissolving marriage, order the husband to secure to the wife such gross sum of money, or such annual sum of money for any term not exceeding her own life, as having regard to her fortune (if any), to the ability of the husband, and to the conduct of the parties it shall deem reasonable, and for that purpose may refer it to any one of the conveyancing counsel of the Court of Chancery to settle and approve of a proper deed or instrument to be executed by all necessary parties; and the said Court may in such case, if it shall see fit, suspend the pronouncing of its decree until such deed shall have been duly executed.

A l'impossible nul n'est ténu.—(There should not be any obligation to the impossible.)

Aliquid conceditur ne injuria remaneat impunita, quod alias non concederetur. Co. Litt. 197. (Something is conceded, which otherwise would not be conceded, lest an injury should remain unpunished.)

Aliquis non debet esse judex in propriâ causâ, quia non potest esse judex et pars. Co. Litt. 141. (A person ought not to be judge in his own cause, because he cannot act as judge and party.)

Aliter (otherwise).

Aliter puniuntur ex eisdem factionibus servi, quam liberi; et aliter qui quidem aliquid in dominum, parentemve commiserit, quam in extraneum; in magistrum, quam in privatum. 3 Inst. 220.—(Slaves and freemen are punished differently for the same offences; he who has committed an offence against a master or parent, is punished otherwise than if he had committed it against a stranger; against a magistrate, than if against a private person.)

Aliud est celare, aliud tacere.—(To conceal is one thing, to be silent another.)

Aliud est possidere, aliud esse in possessione. Hob. 103.—(It is one thing to possess, it is another to be in possession.)

Allaunds [fr. alanis, Scythiæ gente, Lat.], hare-hounds.—Cowel.

Allay, or Alloy [fr. lex, Lat. lega, It. loi, alloi, Fr. law or rule], the mixture of base metals with silver or gold, to increase the weight, in order to defray the charge of coinage, and to make it more fusile to cast. A pound weight of gold, by the present mint standard, is twenty-two carats fine and two carats allay. A carat weighs four grains. A pound of silver consists of eleven ounces two pennyweights of fine silver, and eighteen pennyweights of allay.—Lowdnes's Essay on Coins, p. 19. From signifying the proportion of base metal in the coin, the term alloy was applied to the base metal itself. Wedgw.

Allegans contraria non est audiendus. Jenk. Cent. 16.—(A person making contradictory allegations is not to be heard.)

Allegans suam turpitudinem non est audiendus. 4 Inst. 279.—(A person alleging his own infamy is not to be heard.)

Allegari non debuit quod probatum non relevat. 1 Chan. c. 45.— (That which if proved would not be relevant, ought not to be alleged.)

Allegata, a word anciently subscribed at the bottom of rescripts and constitutions of the Roman emperors, as signata or testata under other instruments.—Encyc. Lond.

Allegata and probata, assertions and facts.

Allegation of faculties, the statement of a person's means. A term formerly used in the Ecclesiastical Courts in proceedings for Alimony.

Allegation [fr. alleguer, Fr. legare, allegare, Lat. to depute], an asserted fact; the adduction of reasons or witnesses in support of an argument.

Allegiance [fr. ligo, Lat.], the natural, lawful and faithful obedience which every subject owes to the supreme magistrate who oversteps not his prerogatives. It is either natural and perpetual, where one is a subject born, or has been naturalized, or local and temporary, where one is merely a resident in the British dominions.—1 Inst. 129 a. It is also either implied, so soon as the relationship of sovereign and subject is created; or express, which is the formal declaration of it.

Allegiance, Oath of, the substituted oath for the old oath of allegiance is provided for by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 48; and the form of affirmation for Quakers and others by 22 Vict. c. 10.

Allegiare, to defend or justify by due course of law.—Spel.

Aller, superlatively, as aller good is the greatest good.—Blount.

Aller san jour, to go without day, i. e., to be finally dismissed from the Court, because there is no further day assigned for appearance. Kitch. 146.

Alleviare, to levy or pay an accustomed fine. Cowel.

All fours. A case agreeing in all its circumstances with another case is sometimes said to be on all fours with it.

Alliance [fr. alleanga, It. alianca, Sp. alliance, of allier, Fr. of alligo, Lat. to tie or unite together], the state of connection with another by confederacy; a league. In this sense our histories of Queen Anne mention the grand alliance; relation by marriage; relation by any form of kindred; the act of forming or contracting relation to another; the act of making a confederacy the persons allied to each other.

The forms or ceremonies of alliance have been various in different ages and countries. Among us, signing and swearing are the chief; anciently, eating and drinking together, and offering sacrifices together were the customary rites of ratifying an alliance. Among the Jews and Chaldeans, heifers or calves; among the Greeks, bulls or goats; and among the Romans, hogs were sacrificed on this occasion. Among the ancient Arabs, alliances were confirmed by drawing blood out of the palms of the hands of the two contracting princes with a sharp stone, dipping therein a piece of their garments, and therewith smearing seven stones, at the same time invoking the gods Vrotalt and Alilat, i. e., according to Herodotus, Bacchus and Urania. Among the people of Colchis, the confirmation of alliance is said to be effected by one of the princes offering his wife's breasts to the other to suck, which he was obliged to do till there issued blood.—Encyc. Lond.

Allision, the running of one vessel against another.

Allocation, an allowance made upon accounts in the Exchequer, or rather a placing or adding to a thing.—Encyc. Lond.

Allocatione facienda, a writ allowing to an accountant such sums of money as he has lawfully expended in his office; it is addressed to the Lord Treasurer and the Barons of the Exchequer.—Reg. Orig. 206.

Allocato comitatu, in proceedings in outlawry, when there were but two County Courts holden between the delivery of the writ of exigi facias to the sheriff and its return, a special exigi facias, with an allocato comitatu issued to the sheriff in order to complete the proceedings. See Bac. Abr. OUTLAWRY, and Fitz. Exig. 14.

Allocatur (it is allowed). The certificate of the allowance of costs by the master on taxation. Jacob.

Allocatur exigent, a writ which is issued when an outlaw has not been exacted five times under the exigi facias, in order to complete the number of exactions.

Allodarii, tenants having as great an estate as subjects can enjoy.

Allograph, a document not written by any of the parties thereto.

Allotment, partition, the distribution of land under an enclosure act, or shares in a public undertaking.

Allotment system, the practice of dividing land in small portions for cultivation by agricultural labourers and other cottagers at their leisure, and after they have performed their ordinary day's work. See 1 Mill's Pol. Econ. 440, et seq.

Allottee, a person to whom land under an enclosure act or shares in a public undertaking are allotted.

Allowance [fr. locare, Lat. allocare, allogare, It. alogar, Prov. louer, allouer, Fr. to place or assign], a deduction, an average payment, a portion.

Also in selling goods, or in paying duties upon them, certain deductions are made from their weights, depending on the nature of the packages in which they are enclosed, and which are regulated in most instances by the custom of merchants, and the rules laid down by public offices. These allowances, as they are termed, are distinguished by the epithets, draft, tare, tret, and cloff.

Draft is a deduction from the original or gross weight of goods, and is subtracted before the tare is taken off.

Tare is an allowance for the weight of the bag, box, cask, or other package, in which goods are weighed.

Real, or open tare, is the actual weight of the package.

Customary tare is, as its name implies, an established allowance for the weight of the package.

Computed tare is an estimated allowance agreed upon at the time.

Average tare is when a few packages only among several are weighed, their mean or average taken, and the rest tared accordingly.

Super-tare is an additional allowance or tare where the commodity or package exceeds a certain weight.

The remainder, after the allowance of tare, is called the suttle weight; but if tret be allowed, the remainder is called the net weight.

Tret is a deduction of 4 lbs. from every 104 lbs. of suttle weight. This allowance, which is said to be for dust or sand, or for the waste or wear of the commodity, was formerly made on most foreign articles sold by the pound avoirdupois; but it is now nearly discontinued by merchants, or else allowed in the price. It is wholly abolished at the East India warehouses in London, and neither tret nor draft is allowed at the Custom-house.

Cloff, or Clough, is another allowance that is nearly obsolete. It is stated in arithmetical books to be a deduction of 2 lbs. from every 3 cwt. of the second suttle, that is, the remainder after tret is subtracted; but merchants, at present, know cloff only as a small deduction, like draft, from the original weight, and this only in the case of two or three articles. See Kelly's Cambist, art. 'London,' and McCul. Comm. Dict.

Allowance to bankrupts. Under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, ss. 194, 195, the Court of Bankruptcy had power to order that an allowance should be made to a bankrupt out of his estate for the support of himself and his family, but by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, that power has been taken from the Court and vested in the creditors. By the 109th section at the first meeting of creditors after adjudication, 'A majority in value of the creditors present shall determine whether any or what allowance for support shall be made to the bankrupt up to the time of passing his last examination.' And by section 174 it is provided that at the dividend meeting 'the majority in value of the creditors present shall determine whether any and what allowance shall be made to the bankrupt out of his estate if he has obtained or shall obtain a discharge.' Under s. 196 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, which still remains in force, if a sufficient dividend has been paid upon the joint and separate estate of one of several partners who has obtained his discharge, he is entitled to his allowance, although the other partner may not be entitled to any allowance.

Allonge [Fr. an eking piece], a paper annexed to a bill of exchange or promissory note, when there are so many successive endorsements to be made that the original paper would not contain them.—Story on Bills, 225; Chit. on Bills, 158.

Alloy. See ALLAY.

Alltud [all-tud, other land], a person either from foreign parts or from another part of the island, in villenage under the king or freeholder. Anc. Inst. Wales.

Alluminor, one who anciently illuminated, coloured, or painted upon paper or parchment, particularly the initial letters of charters and deeds. The word is used in the 1 Ric. III. c. 9.

Alluvion [fr. alluo, Lat.], land imperceptibly gained from the sea or a river by the washing up of sand and soil, so as to form terra firma.—2 Bl. Com. 261; Res. Cotidianæ Dig. 40, tit. 1, s. 7. See ACCRETION.

Ally [fr. allier, Fr.; ligare, Lat. to tie, alligare, to tie to], a power in alliance with us.

Almanack [fr. al. Arab. and manah, Heb. to count or compute; or al, and μήν, Gr. a month; or, from a Teutonic original al and maan, the moon, an account of every moon or month], a book or instrument in which is recounted the days of the week, month, and year, both common and particular, distinguishing the fasts, feasts, terms, &c., from the common days by proper marks, pointing out also the several changes of the moon, tides, eclipses, &c. It is part of the law of England, of which the courts must take notice in the returns of writs, &c., but the almanack to go by is that annexed to the Book of Common Prayer. It is not evidence of the time of sunrise on a particular day.—6 Mod. 41, 81.

Almaria, the archives or muniments of a church or library.—Blount.

Almner, or Almoner, an officer of the royal household, whose business it is to distribute the royal alms. The lord almoner, who is usually now some bishop, had the disposition of the sovereign's dish of meat, after it came from the table, which he might give to whom he pleased. The Marquis of Exeter is hereditary Grand Almoner.—Fleta, lib. ii. c. 22; Co. Litt. 94 a.

Almodarii, the lords of free manors, lords paramount.—Old Records.

Almoin, a tenure of lands by divine service. Ancient Customs. See FRANKALMOIGNE.

Almonarium, a kind of safe or cupboard, in which broken victuals were laid up to be distributed among the poor.—Old Records.

Almonarius [corruption of eleemosynarius], a distributor of alms.

Almsfeoh, or Almesfeoh [Sax.], alms-money. It has been taken for Peter-pence, first given to the Pope by Ina, King of the West Saxons, and anciently paid in England on the first of August. It was likewise called romefeoh, romescot, and heorthpening.—Selden's Hist. Tithes, 217.

Almutium, a cap made of goats' or lambs' skin, the part covering the head being square, and the other part hanging behind to cover the neck and shoulders; worn by priests.—Monast. tom. iii. p. 36.

Alnage, or Aulnage [fr. aune, Fr., an ell], a measure, particularly the measuring with an ell.—Cowel.

Alnager, or Aulnager, formerly a public sworn officer of the king, who examined into the assize of cloth, and fixed seals to it, and also collected a subsiduary or aulnage duty on all cloths sold, 25 Edwd. III. st. 4, c. 1. There were afterwards three officers belonging to the regulation of clothing, viz., searcher, measurer, and aulnager.—4 Inst. 31. Alnage duties were abolished in England by 11 & 12 Wm. III. c. 20, and in Ireland by 57 Geo. III. c. 109.

Alnet, De, D'Auney.

Alnetum, a place where alders grow, or a grove of alder-trees.—Domesday Book; Co. Litt. 4 b.

Alodial, or Allodial, or Allodium [perhaps fr. ódal, Icel.; odel, Dan. Sw., a patrimonial estate. See Wedgw.], a holding of lands in absolute possession without acknowledging any superior lord, contradistinguished from Feudal lands, which are held of superiors. Cowel. There are not any alodial lands in England, according to Sir E. Coke.—Co. Litt. 93 a; 1 Hall. Mid. Ages, ch. 2. pt. i. p. 147.

Alodium. See ALODIAL.

Alody, inheritable land.

Aloverium, a purse.—Fleta, lib. ii. c. 82, par. 2.

Alsatia, formerly a cant name for Whitefriars, a district in London, between the Thames and Fleet Street, and adjoining the Temple, which, possessing certain privileges of sanctuary, became for that reason a nest of those mischievous characters who were generally obnoxious to the law. These privileges were derived from its having been an establishment of the Carmelites, or White Friars, founded, says Stow, in his survey of London, by Sir Richard Grey, in 1241. Edward I. gave them a plot of ground in Fleet Street to build their church upon. The edifice then erected was rebuilt by Courtney, Earl of Devonshire, in the reign of Edward I. In the time of the Reformation the place retained its immunities as a sanctuary, and James I. confirmed and added to them by a charter in 1608. Shadwell was the first author who made some literary use of Whitefriars, in his play of the Squire of Alsatia, which turns upon the plot of the Adelphi of Terence. Scott's Introd. to 'Fortunes of Nigel.'

Alta, De, ripa, Dantry.

Alta proditio, high treason; now simply called treason.

Altarage, offering made upon the altar; the profit arising to the priest by reason of the altar. Termes de la Ley, 39.

Alteration, changing. When witnesses are examined upon exhibits, &c., they (the exhibits) ought to remain in the place where the examination took place, and not to be taken back into private hands, by whom they may be altered. Hob. 254.

Alternat, a usage amongst diplomatists, by which the rank and places of different powers, who have the same rights and pretensions to precedence, are changed from time to time, either in a certain regular order, or one determined by lot. In preparing treaties and conventions, it is the usage of certain powers to alternate both in the preamble and the signatures, so that each power occupies, in the copy intended to be delivered to it, the first place. Wheat. Internat. Law, pt. ii. c. 3, s. 4.

Alternativa petitio non est audienda. 5 Co. 40. (An alternative petition is not to be heard.)

Alternative, the one or the other of two things.

Altius non tollendi, a servitude due by the owner of a house, by which he is restrained from building beyond a certain height.—Dig. 8, 2, 4, and 1, 12, 17, 25; Civil Law.

Altius tollendi, a servitude which consists in the right, to him who is entitled to it, to build his house as high as he may think proper. In general, however, every one enjoys this privilege, unless he is restrained by some contrary title.—Civil Law; Sand. Just. 209.

Alto et basso (high and low), an absolute submission of all differences.—Blount.

Altum mare (the high sea).

Alumnus, a child which one has nursed; a foster-child.—Dig. 40, 2, 14; Civil Law.

Amalphitan Code, a collection of sea-laws, compiled about the end of the eleventh century, by the people of Amalphi. It consists of the laws of maritime subjects which were or had been in force in countries bordering on the Mediterranean; and, on account of their being collected into one regular system, it was for a long time received as authority in those countries.

Amanuensis [a manu, Lat.], one who writes that which another dictates.

Amabyr, or Amvabyr, a custom in the honour of Clun, belonging to the Earls of Arundel.—Pretium virginitatis domino solvendum. Abolished.—Cowel.

Ambactus, a servant or client.—Cowel.

Ambassador [legatus, Lat.], a diplomatic minister sent by one sovereign power to another, with authority conferred on him by letters of credence, to treat on affairs of state. Ambassadors are either ordinary, who reside in the place whither they are sent, the protection of commerce being their greatest care; or, extraordinary, who are employed upon special matters, as condolements, congratulations, overtures of marriage, &c. The person of an ambassador is protected from civil arrest by 7 Anne, c. 12. Consult Bac. Abr. 'Ambassador,' or Com. Dig.

Ambassy, a committee sent with a state communication to a foreign potentate.

Amber, or Ambra, a measure of four bushels. Introd. Domesd. vol. i. p. 133.

Ambidexter, one who plays on both sides. A juror or embraceror, who takes bribes from both parties to influence his verdict.—Termes de la Ley, 38.

Ambigua responsio contra proferentem est accipienda. 10 Co. 59.—(An ambiguous answer is to be taken against him who offers it.)

Ambiguis casibus semper præsumitur pro rege. (In doubtful cases the presumption is always in favour of the king.)

Ambiguum placitum interpretari debet contra proferentem. Co. Litt. 303 b.—(An ambiguous plea ought to be interpreted against the party delivering it.)

Ambiguitas verborum latens verificatione suppletur; nam quod ex facto oritur ambiguum verificatione facti tollitur. Bacon.—(A hidden ambiguity of the words may be supplied by evidence; for whatever ambiguity arises from an extrinsic fact may be removed by extrinsic evidence.

Ambiguity, doubtfulness, double-meaning, obscurity. There are two species of ambiguity, viz. that which is apparent on the face of an instrument, and which cannot be rendered certain by the evidence of collateral facts and surrounding circumstances, admissible under the rules of construction; this is called ambiguitas patens; and that which, although apparently certain, and without ambiguity, for anything that appears upon the face of the deed or instrument, is rendered ambiguous by extrinsic and collateral matter out of the deed; this is called ambiguitas latens. The former ambiguity cannot be explained by parol evidence, because the law will not couple and mingle matter of specialty, which is of the higher account, with matter of averment, which is of inferior account, in law; but the latter can be explained by the actions of the parties previously to and contemporaneously with the contract. Ambiguity of language is, however, to be distinguished from unintelligibility and inaccuracy, for words cannot be said to be ambiguous, unless their signification seem doubtful and uncertain to persons of competent skill and knowledge to understand them. Story on Contracts, 272; Phillipps on Evidence.

Pleadings must not be ambiguous or doubtful in meaning, and when two different meanings present themselves, that construction shall be adopted which is more unfavourable to the party pleading. A pleading, however, is not objectionable as ambiguous or obscure, if it be certain and clear to a common intent, that is, if it be clear enough according to reasonable intendment or construction, though not worded with absolute precision. Ambiguity is ground for demurrer, but it is in general cured by verdict or by pleading over.—Steph. Plead. 415–422.

Amboglanna, Ambleside in Westmoreland, and Burdoswold in Cumberland.

Ambra, a Saxon vessel of measure for salt, butter, meal, or beer. See AMBER.

Ambrosii Burgus, Amesbury in Wilts.

Ambry, Aumbry, Aumber [fr. armoire, Fr.; armario, almario, Sp.; almer, Germ.; armaria, almaria, m. Lat.; a cupboard], a place where the arms, plate, vessels, and everything belonging to housekeeping were kept.—Cowel.

Ambulatoria voluntas (an absolute power).

Amenable [fr. amener, Fr., to lead unto], tractable, that may easily be led or governed; applicable to a wife who is governable by her husband. Also responsible or subject to answer, &c., in a court of justice.—Cowel.

Amende honorable [Fr.], an adequate reparation.

Amendment, a correction of any errors in the pleadings in actions, suits, or prosecutions. The power of amendment has been much extended by recent statutes, but it is never exercised to the prejudice of a party to the proceeding.—Consult 2 Ch. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1487; and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, ss. 1, 2, 3, & 25.

Amendment of a bill. After a plaintiff has filed his bill, he may, if he find it necessary, amend it, subject to certain restrictions, either by the correction of mistakes, or by the omission of impolitic admissions in the original; or by adding new parties; or by inquiring into additional facts; or by the further investigation of facts, which have been only partially disclosed; or by putting in issue new matter, stated in the answer. It is not now necessary to exhibit any supplemental bill, for the purpose only of stating or putting in issue facts or circumstances which may have occurred after the institution of any suit; but such facts or circumstances may be introduced by way of amendment into the original bill of complaint, if the cause is otherwise in such a state as to allow of such an amendment being made.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 53. If, however, the cause is not in such a condition the plaintiff may state such an amendment, and put it in issue by filing in the record and writ clerk's office a statement, either written or printed, to be annexed to the bill; and such proceedings, by way of answer, evidence, and otherwise, are to be had and taken upon the statement so filed, as if the same were embodied in a supplemental bill; but the court may make any order for accelerating the proceedings that may appear just and practicable.—Orders Hil. Term., 1860, xxii. 2.

Amendments are of two sorts—(1) those affecting the substance of the case; and (2) those relating to the parties.

The courts are very liberal in permitting the amendment of a bill. They will allow a bill to be converted into an information, or the statements of a bill to be altered so as to agree with the defendant's answer, or to present an entirely new case. Perhaps the conversion of a bill of discovery into a bill for relief by adding a prayer for relief, or a bill for relief into one for discovery only, by striking out the prayer for relief, will not be allowed. Should an amendment entirely change the original case of the plaintiff, the defendant may move for his taxed costs already incurred; and if an amendment strike out an important part of the bill, which compelled the defendant to incur costs, he may move for such costs to be taxed, and paid by the plaintiff. A defendant is of course entitled to make a new defence to any amendment of the plaintiff's bill.

Every amendment must be sanctioned by an order of the court. If an information require amendment, the sanction and signature of the Attorney-General to it must be obtained in the same manner as to an original information.

An order to amend may be applied for at any period of the suit; but whether the order should be as of course, or special, demands attention.

A plaintiff can obtain as many orders as he requires for leave to amend his bill at any time before answer, upon motion or petition, without notice. So an order for leave to amend a bill only for the purpose of rectifying some clerical error in names, dates, or sums, may be obtained at any time upon a like motion or petition. After answer, and before replication or undertaking to reply, a plaintiff (if not precluded from amending, or limited as to the time of amending by some former order) may obtain one order of course for leave to amend his bill at any time within four weeks after the answer of a sole defendant, or of several defendants, if they all join in the same answer, is to be deemed or is held to be sufficient, or within four weeks after the last of the answers of several defendants who do not join in the same answer, is to be deemed or is held to be sufficient.—Orders Hil. T. 1860, ix. 10 & 11. This order to amend is obtained on any day, whether in or out of term, either by a petition as of course impressed with a 7*s.* 6*d.* fee fund stamp, and lodged with the secretary of the Master of the Rolls, or by a hand-motion in the court to which the cause is attached.

If after the expiration of four weeks after the answer, or the last of several answers, is to be deemed or is held to be sufficient; or after filing, or undertaking to file a replication; or after having already obtained an order to amend after any sufficient answer has been filed, the plaintiff wish to amend his bill, he must apply for leave to do so specially.

A special order for leave to amend a bill is not to be granted without an affidavit to the effect, (1) that the draft of the proposed amendment has been settled, approved, and signed by counsel; and (2) that such amendment is not intended for the purpose of delay or vexation, but because the same is considered to be material for the case of the plaintiff. After the plaintiff has filed or undertaken to file a replication, or after the expiration of four weeks from the time when the answer or the last of the answers required to be put in is to be deemed or is held to be sufficient, a special order for leave to amend a bill is not to be granted without a further affidavit, shewing that the matter of the proposed amendment is material, and could not with reasonable diligence have been sooner introduced into the bill. These affidavits are to be made by the plaintiff and his solicitor, or by the solicitor alone, should the plaintiff from being abroad or otherwise be unable to join therein. Orders Hil. T. 1860, ix. 14, 15 & 16. Where the general orders require an affidavit of the solicitor, an affidavit of the solicitor's clerk is not sufficient; but in cases where the facts to be deposed to are within the personal knowledge of the clerk only, the court may perhaps require an affidavit from both.

A bill may be amended by striking out the name of a defendant at any time before he has answered; but after he has appeared, it can only be done upon payment of his costs. Such an amendment should be specified in the order, since the common form of the order giving liberty to amend as the plaintiff may be advised, does not authorise a plaintiff to strike out the name of a party to the record. Before the defendant has appeared, it is also a motion of course to strike out or to add the name of a plaintiff; but after appearance, a plaintiff's name can only be struck out by special application, and generally upon the terms of giving security for costs. The addition of a plaintiff, after answer, is quite discretionary with the judge, and it must be shewn that the person proposed is quite willing to become a co-plaintiff in the suit. If parties are added after witnesses have been examined, the depositions of those witnesses cannot be read against them, as they have not had any opportunity of cross-examining them; and if the parties are added after the closing of evidence, the cause as to those parties must be heard upon bill and answer. After the cause is set down, the plaintiff can only amend by adding parties, and cannot introduce new statements, or put a new material fact in issue, or raise a different case from that on which he had previously relied, and which was properly put in issue by the pleadings. The plaintiff cannot obtain an order of course for leave to amend his bill, after a defendant (being entitled to move) has served a notice of motion to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution.—Orders Hil. T. 1860, ix. 12. Nor can a plaintiff obtain the common order to amend pending an appeal from the overruling of a demurrer.

Special applications for leave to amend bills must be made by summons, 'for leave to amend the plaintiff's bill,' to the Master of the Rolls or a Vice-Chancellor in chambers, who may direct the matter to be heard in open court, should he think it ought to be so heard. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, s. 26–28. Sec. 35 repeals the 13th, 14th, & 15th ss. of the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 94.

The judge may order and direct whether the costs of the application shall be costs in the cause, or whether such costs, or any part thereof, shall be paid by any of the parties personally; and in the latter case the judge will either fix the sum to be paid for such costs, or direct the same to be taxed. The party to whom such costs are directed to be paid, may enforce their payment.

Should a plaintiff not require from a defendant a further answer to his amended bill, it must be expressly so stated in the order. The order having been obtained, a copy of it should be forthwith served on the defendant's solicitor, for it operates from the time of service only.

Where a plaintiff is directed to pay to the defendant the costs of the suit, then the costs occasioned to a defendant by any amendment of the bill shall be deemed to be part of such defendant's costs in the cause (except as to any amendment which may have been made by special leave of the court, or which shall appear to have been rendered necessary by the default of such defendant); but there shall be deducted from such costs any sum which may have been paid by the plaintiff, according to the course of the court, at the time of any amendment.

Where upon taxation a plaintiff who has obtained a decree with costs is not allowed the costs of any amendment of the bill, upon the ground of its having been unnecessarily made, the defendant's costs, occasioned by such amendment, shall be taxed, and the amount thereof deducted from the costs to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff.—Orders Hil. T. 1860, xl. 7 & 8.

The plaintiff having obtained an order for leave to amend his bill, has, in all cases in which no other time is limited by such order, fourteen days after the date of the order within which he may amend such bill. If he do not amend within the time limited by the order, or, if no time is limited, within fourteen days, the order to amend becomes void, and the cause as to dismissal stands in the same situation as if such order had not been made. Orders Hil. T. 1860, ix. 17 & 24.

The defendant's costs, which are payable when a further answer is required of him, should be paid to his solicitor at the time he is served with a copy of the order to amend; his acceptance of them waives every irregularity in the order.

After the proposed amendments have been settled and signed by counsel on the draft of the original bill (but, if amended by the same counsel who drew the bill, and a reprint is not necessary, counsel's name need not be repeated), they may be introduced by written alterations into the original printed bill as filed, and also by additions on the interleaved paper: this is done by the clerk of records and writs, the fee being 10*s.* payable by means of stamps, and 5*s.* for amending every office copy. When the amendments exceed two folios of ninety words each in one place, the bill must be reprinted. A bill cannot be amended partly in print and partly in writing. The original and amended bill constitutes but one record. It is not necessary that notice of the amendments having been made should be given to the defendant; and the practice of amending the defendant's copy of the bill is abolished; but a copy of an amended bill, whether upon an amendment by a reprint, or by such alterations and additions as already mentioned, is to be served upon the defendant or his solicitor: and such copy may be partly printed and partly written, if the amendment is not made by a reprint; but in every case the copy to be served is to be stamped with a 5*s.* stamp, by one of the clerks of records and writs, indicating the date of the filing of such amended bill.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 8.

The plaintiff, by amending his bill, generally loses all benefit of a previous order to take the bill pro confesso, or any prior proceedings of contempt issued against the defendant, either for want of his appearance or his answer; and it has the effect of obliging him to begin the same de novo, and entitles a defendant in custody to an ex parte order to be discharged, without either payment or tender of costs. A defendant, however, imprisoned under contempt for not answering, when the plaintiff is proceeding to take his bill pro confesso, is an exception to this rule.—1 Wm. IV. c. 36, rule 10.

An order to amend his bill substantially prevents a plaintiff from excepting to an answer already filed, unless it is specially obtained without prejudice to such a right. An order to amend as of course, pending a notice of motion for an injunction to stay an action, will operate as a waiver of such notice; but the amendment of a bill does not prejudice an injunction, nor discharge a writ of ne exeat regno, nor the recognizances of the sureties. See further 1 D. P. by H. 376–403; and Smi. Handb. 241, et seq.; and Morgan's Chancery Acts and Orders.

The times of vacation are not to be reckoned in the computation of the times appointed, or allowed, for the amending or obtaining orders for leave to amend bills.

Amends, satisfaction.

A mensa et thoro (from table and bed). A term used to describe a partial divorce, in cases in which the marriage was just and lawful, but for some supervenient cause, such as the commission of adultery or cruelty by the husband or wife, it became improper or impossible for them to live together. This divorce was effected by sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court. It caused the separation of the husband and wife, but did not dissolve the marriage, so that neither of them could marry during the life of the other.

A decree of judicial separation by the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes has been substituted for this kind of divorce by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 7.

Amentia, insanity.

Amercement, or amerciament, a punishment by the purse, a penalty assessed by the peers or equals of the party amerced for an offence, by the commission of which he had placed himself at the mercy of the lord. The difference between amercements and fines is as follows:—The latter are certain, and are created by some statute; they can only be imposed and assessed by courts of record; the former are arbitrarily imposed by courts not of record, as a court-leet.—Termes de la Ley, 40.

Amhiniogau tir (land borderers), witnesses in a court in suits respecting landed property, whose lands bordered on that in dispute.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Ami. See AMY.

Amicia, a cap, made of goat's or lamb's skin. See ALMUTIUM.

Amictus, or Amesse, the uppermost of the six garments worn by priests. It is tied round the neck and covers the breast and heart. The other five garments are alba, cingulum, stola, manipulus, and planeta.—Cowel.

Amicus curiæ (Lat. friend to the court), a stander by, who informs the court when doubtful or mistaken.—2 Co. Litt. 178.

Amita, a paternal aunt; the sister of one's father.

Amita magna, a great aunt.

Amittere legem terræ, or liberam legem, to lose the liberty of swearing in any court. But by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, persons who were previously excluded from giving evidence by incapacity arising from crime or interest, are made competent witnesses, their credibility being left to the jury. A person outlawed is said to lose his law; i. e. to be put without its protection, so that he cannot sue, although he may be sued.—Glanvil, lib. ii.

Ammobragium, a service, or poll-money, like chevage.—Spel.

Ammodwr [am-bod-wr], a compactor, one before whom a compact is made, and who is therefore admissible as a witness to prove the terms of it.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Amnery, an almshouse.

Amnesty [fr. ἀμνηστία, Gk., non-remembrance], an act of pardon or oblivion, by which crimes against the government up to a certain date are so obliterated that they can never be brought into charge.

Amnitum insulæ, isles upon the west coast of Britain.—Blount.

Amobh [fr. am-gobr, fee], the fee paid to a lord on the marriage of a female.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Amortization, or amortizement, an alienation of lands in mortmain to any corporation, guild or fraternity and their successors, i. e. to some community that never is to cease. Encyc. Lond.

Amortize, to alienate lands in mortmain, which cannot be done without licence from the Crown.—Ibid.

Amotion, a putting away, a removing, deprivation of possession.—Scott.

Amove, to remove from a post or station.

Amoveas manus, or Ouster le main, a livery of land to be amoved out of the king's hands on a judgment obtained upon a monstrans de droit, to restore the land, its effect being the same as a judgment that the party should have his land again. Abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Ampliation, an enlargement, a deferring of judgment till the cause be further examined. Cowel.

Amputation of right hand, the punishment for a stroke or blow given in a superior court; or for assaulting a judge sitting in the court. 4 Steph. Com. 291.

Amrygoll [am-rhy-coll, total loss], loss of property.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Amy, or ami [fr. amicus, Lat.], usually called prochein amy, the next friend (as distinguished from the guardian), suing on behalf of an infant or orphan. Infants sue by prochein amy, or guardian, and defend by guardian. Cowel.

An, jour, et waste, year, day, and waste. A forfeiture of the lands to the Crown incurred by the felony of the tenant, after which time the lands escheat to the lord.—Termes de la Ley, 40.

Anacoenosis [fr. ἀνακοινώσις, Gk.], a rhetorical figure, whereby we seem to deliberate and argue the case with others upon any matter of moment.—Encyc. Lond.

Anacoluthon, or anacoluthus [fr. ἀκόλουθος, Gk.], a rhetorical figure, when a word that is to answer another is not expressed.—Ibid.

Anacrisis [fr. ἀνάκρισις, Gk.], an investigation of truth, interrogation of witnesses, and inquiry made into any fact, especially by torture.—Ib.; Civ. Law.

Anagraph, a register, or inventory.

Analogism, an argument from the cause to the effect.

Analysts. By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 84, s. 2. In the city of London and the liberties thereof the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London and the liberties thereof, and in all other parts of the metropolis the vestries and district boards acting in execution of the Act for the better Local Management of the Metropolis in England and Ireland, the Court of Quarter Sessions of every county, and the town council of every borough having a separate Court of Quarter Sessions, and in Scotland the Commissioners of Supply at their ordinary meetings for counties, and town councils within their several jurisdictions, may, from time to time for their respective city, districts, counties, or boroughs, appoint and remove one or more persons possessing competent medical, chemical, and microscopical knowledge as analysts of all articles of food and drink purchased within the said city, metropolitan districts, counties, or boroughs, and may pay to such analysts such salary or allowances as they may think fit; but such appointments and removals shall at all times be subject in Great Britain to the approval of one of Her Majesty's principal secretaries of state, and in Ireland to that of the Lord Lieutenant.

Anarchy [fr. ἀναρχία, Gk., absence of government], that state of commotion that arises when a government has lost its power.

Anathematize, to pronounce accursed by ecclesiastical authority, to excommunicate. Encyc. Lond.

Anatocism [fr. ἀνά and τόκος, Gk.], taking usurious interest for the loan of money; when compound interest is extorted, or the interest of several years are added together as principal, upon which interest is required. Interest upon interest. This is the worst kind of usury, and has been severely condemned by the Roman law, as well as by the law of most other nations.

Anatomy act, 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 75.

Ancestor, one that has gone before in a family; it differs from predecessor, in that it is applied to a natural person, and his progenitors, while the latter is applied to a corporation, and those who have held offices before those who now fill them.—Co. Litt. 78 b.

Ancestral, or ancestrel, that which has relation to ancestors.—Blount.

Anchor, a measure containing ten gallons. Lex Merc.

Anchorage, a duty taken from the owners of ships for the use of the havens where they cast anchor.—MS. Arth. Trevor Ann.

Ancient [fr. ante, Lat.; antes, Prov.; anzi, It.; before; whence anziano, anuen, belonging to former times] demesne, a tenure existing in certain manors, which, though now granted to private persons, were in the actual possession of the Crown, in the times of Edward the Confessor and William the Conqueror, and appear to have been so by the great survey in the Exchequer called Domesday-Book, and, therefore, whether lands are ancient demesne or not, is to be tried only by this book, called in consequence Liber Judicatorius; but the question must be tried by a jury whether lands be parcel of a manor, which is ancient demesne, being a question of fact. It is a species of copyhold, which differs, however, from common copyholds in certain privileges, but yet must be conveyed by surrender, according to the custom of the manor. There are three sorts—(1) where the lands are held freely by the king's grant; (2) customary freeholds, which are held of a manor in ancient demesne, but not at the lord's will, although they are conveyed by surrender, or deed and admittance; (3) lands held by copy of court-roll at the lord's will, denominated copyholds of base tenure. Consult Watkins or Scriven on Copyholds.

Ancient lights, the enjoyment of light for twenty years and upwards.

Ancient writings, documents upwards of thirty years old.

Ancients, gentlemen of the Inns of Court and Chancery. In Gray's Inn the society consists of benchers, ancients, barristers, and students under the bar; and here the ancients are of the oldest barristers. In the Middle Temple, those who have passed their readings, are termed ancients. The Inns of Chancery consists of ancients and students or clerks; from the ancients a principal or treasurer is chosen yearly.

Ancienty, eldership or seniority.

Ancillary [fr. ancilla, Lat.], that which depends on, or is subordinate to, some other decision.—Enc. Lond.

Ancwyn, a stated allowance of provision allotted to the officers of the court in their lodgings; the term appears to be put in opposition to cwynos (cœna) supper, as being a privileged private allowance for that meal; the cwynos being the public evening meal. Ancwyn is translated cœna in some Latin copies of the ancient Welsh laws.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Andaga, or Andæg, a day or term appointed for hearing a cause: hence Andagian, to appoint the day.—Anc. Inst. England.

Andena, a swath or line of grass or corn in mowing, or as much ground as a man can stride over at once.—Jacob.

Anderida, Newenden in Kent.

Andreapoits, St. Andrew's in Scotland.

Andria mulier, a female hermaphrodite.

Androcoetesis [fr. ἀνδροκοίτεω, Gk.], the infamous act of sodomy.

Androgynus [fr. ἀνήρ, ἀνδρός, Gk., man, and γυνή, woman], a hermaphrodite.

Androlepsy, the taking by one nation of the citizens or subjects of another, in order to compel the latter to do justice to the former.

Anelacius, a short knife or dagger.—Mat. Paris, 277.

Anfeldtyhde, or Anfealtihle, a simple accusation.—Saxon.

Angaria [fr. ἀγγαρεία, Gk.], personal service, which tenants were obliged to pay to their lords. Impressing of ships.—Blount.

Angel, an ancient English coin of the value of ten shillings.—Jacob.

Angelica vestis, a monkish garment which laymen put on a little before death, in order to have the benefit of the monks' prayers. Monast. tom. i. 632.

Anghyvarch [fr. an, cyvarch, unquestionable], a term used for the articles which were exclusively the property of a man or woman, and not subject to division upon a separation ensuing. A fine for committing certain actions without permission.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Angidllarianum Monasterium, the city of Ely in Cambridgeshire. It is the only city in England not represented in Parliament.

Angild [fr. an, one, and gild, payment, mulct, or fine, Sax.], the single valuation or compensation of a criminal. Twigild was the double, and trigild the treble, mulct or fine. Laws of Ina, c. 20.

Angliæ jura in omni casu libertatis dant favorem. Fortesc. c. 42.—(The laws of England in every case of liberty are favourable.)

Anglican Church, the established Protestant Church of England and Ireland.

Angylde, the rate fixed by law, at which certain injuries to person or property were to be paid for; in injuries to the person, it seems to be equivalent to the 'wer,' i. e. the price at which every man was valued. It seems also to have been the fixed price at which cattle and other goods were received as currency, and to have been much higher than the market price, or ceap-gild.—Anc. Inst. England.

Anhlote, a single tribute or tax, paid according to the custom of the country, as scot and lot.—Leges Wm. I. c. 64.

Anichiled, annulled, cancelled, or made void. Blount.

Aniens or Anient, void, of no force or effect. F. N. B. 214.

Animalia fera, si facta sint mansueta, et ex consuetudine eunt et redeunt, volant et revolant ut cervi cygni, &c., eo usque nostra sunt, et ita intelliguntur quamdiu habuerunt animam revertendi.—7 Co. 16.—(Wild animals, if they be made tame, and are accustomed to go out and return, fly away and fly back, as stags, swans, &c., are considered to belong to us so long as they have the intention of returning to us.)

Animals may be divided into—

(1) Domestic animals, or animals not naturally mischievous, such as dogs or oxen.

(2) Animals mansuetæ naturæ, such as sheep and cows.

(3) Animals that are naturally dangerous and ferocious, such as lions, bears, &c.

(4) Animals feræ naturæ (which are unreclaimed), such as hares, pheasants, partridges, &c.—Browne's Actions, 369.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 40, the unlawful and malicious killing, maiming or wounding of cattle is a felony, punishable by penal servitude for a term not exceeding fourteen and not less than three years, or imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.

By s. 41, the unlawful and malicious killing, maiming or wounding any animal not being cattle, but being the subject of larceny at common law, or being ordinarily kept in a state of confinement, or for any domestic purpose, is an offence punishable on summary conviction by imprisonment and fine in addition to the amount of the injury done.

By 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92 (amended by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60), if any person shall cruelly beat, ill-treat, over-drive, abuse, or torture any horse, mare, &c., &c., or any other domestic animal, he shall forfeit 5*l.* for every such offence, recoverable before a justice of the peace in a summary way; and if by such misconduct he injures the animal, or any person or property, a further sum of 10*l.* to the owner or person injured.

The act also contains provisions imposing penalties against conveying such animals in such manner or position as to subject them to unnecessary pain or suffering; against bull-baiting and cock-fighting. It contains, also, provisions for the regulating of the business of slaughtering of horses and other cattle not intended for butchers' meat; and also for supplying food and water to animals impounded.

Animus, an intent.

Animus cancellandi, the intention of destroying or cancelling.

Animus furandi, the intention of stealing.

Animus manendi, the intention of remaining.

Animus morandi, the intention of remaining.

Animus recipiendi, the intention of receiving.

Animus revertendi, the intention of returning.

Animus revocandi, the intention of revoking.

Animus testandi, the intention of willing.

Animus ad se omne jus ducit.—(Intention attracts all law to itself.)

Animus hominis est anima scripti. 3 Bulst. 67.—(The intent of a man is the soul of his writing.)

Ann or annat, half year's stipend, over and above what is owing for the incumbency, due to a minister's relict, child, or nearest of kin, after his decease.—Scotch Law.

Anna, a piece of money, the sixteenth part of a rupee.—Indian.

Annales, yearlings or young cattle from one to two years old.—Cowel.

Annats, or Annates [fr. primitiæ, Lat.], first fruits of a spiritual living.—Termes de la Ley, 40.

Annealing of tile [fr. onælan, Sax.; accendo, Lat.; or rather fr. niello, It.; nigellum, m. Lat.; a kind of black enamel on gold and silver], burning or hardening tiles, which are made of burnt clay, and are used for covering houses. 17 Edw. IV. c. 4.

Annexation, the union of lands to the Crown and declaring them inalienable. Also the appropriation of church-lands by the Crown, and the union of land lying at a distance from the kirk to which they belong, to a kirk to which they are contiguous.—Scotch Law.

Anniented, abrogated, frustrated, or brought to nothing.—Litt. c. 3, s. 741.

Anni nubiles, marriageable years of woman, i. e. 12 years.—2 Co. Litt. 434.

Anniversary days, solemn days appointed to be celebrated yearly in commemoration of the death or martyrdom of saints; or the days, whereon, on the return of every year, men were wont to pray for the souls of dead friends, according to the custom of the Roman Catholics, mentioned in the statute of 1 Edw. VI. c. 14; Lib. Rames, s. 134. It is a day annually observed at our two Universities, in gratitude to their founders and benefactors. It was anciently called year-day or mind-day. Jacob.

Anno Domini (abbreviated A.D.), the Christian computation of time, from the incarnation of our Saviour Jesus Christ, which is generally inserted in the dates of public writings, and private assurances, together with the year of the sovereign's reign, although both are not necessary. It is called the 'Vulgar Æra.' Scaliger, a high authority in chronology, classes the date of the Nativity of the Saviour among the mysteries that will never be discovered. Gresswell advances as a conjecture, that the day of the Nativity is that on which the Paschal Lamb was set apart preparatory to the sacrifices, that is on the tenth of Nisan, answering to the 5th of April, in the year of Rome 750, four years before the vulgar æra. The Romans began their æra from the building of Rome, 753 B. C.; the Greeks computed time by Olympiads, first observed by the Idæi Dactyli, B. C. 1453.—Lempriere; Macbride's Diatessaron.

Annoisance, or Annoyance [fr. annoiare, It.; ennuyer, Fr.], any hurt done to a place, public or private, by placing anything thereon that may breed infection, or by encroachment, or such like means. It is the same as noisance or nuisance.—22 Hen. VIII. c. 5.

Annonæ civiles, rents paid to monasteries.

Annotation, the designation of a place of deportation; the citing of an absentee; the prince's answer on a doubtful point of law. Civil Law.

Annual pension, a yearly profit or rent. Scotch Law.

Annua pensione, an ancient writ to provide the king's chaplain, if he had no preferment, with a pension.—Reg. Orig. 165, 307.

Annuale, the yearly rent or income of a prebendary.—Cowel.

Annualia, a yearly stipend assigned to a priest for celebrating an anniversary, or for saying continued masses for the soul of a deceased person.—Blount.

Annuity, properly so called, is merely personal property, and not at all connected with realty, although it is frequently ranged under incorporeal hereditaments, issuing out of land, and even the legislature treats it sometimes as a rent-charge, from which it materially differs. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 21. The words 'annuity' and 'rent charge' are frequently used as convertible terms.

An annuity is a periodical payment of money either bequeathed as a gift, or secured by the personal covenant or bond of the payer. It is mostly charged upon personalty.

Although an annuity may be made a personal hereditament by granting it to the payee and his heirs, upon whom it will descend, if not disposed of, though totally unconnected with realty; yet, not being a tenement, it cannot be entailed, nor can there be a remainder of it. If, then, an annuity be granted to A, and the heirs of his body, it is a conditional personal fee, and may be alienated by A after issue is born to him.—Co. Litt. 20 a. An annuity to A 'for ever' will pass to A's personal, not his real, representatives.—11 Sim. 158.

It is not now usual to grant inheritable or perpetual annuities; because if a person grant that he and his heirs will pay a yearly sum to A and his heirs; or covenant or give a bond that he and his heirs will pay such an annuity, the heirs will not be liable unless they inherit sufficient descendable lands or hereditaments.—Co. Litt. 144 b. But the executors or administrators will be bound so far as they have assets, whether they are named or not.—Co. Litt. 209 a. And Equity would compel the personal representatives, so far as they have assets, to set aside a sufficient fund to answer such an annuity, the annuitant having the absolute disposition of such fund. Smith v. Pybus, 9 Ves. 574. As to the personal representatives of an heir, who had real assets by descent from the ancestor who created the personal annuity, Equity would compel them to set aside so much of the heir's personal estate as would be sufficient to answer the personal annuity, so far as the value of the real assets descended to the heir would extend. They are generally created for life, pour autre vie, or for a certain number of years determinable upon given lives, and thence called contingent annuities, or for a term of years, and so are annuities certain.

A perpetual annuity granted in consideration of a sum of money advanced, differs from a loan at interest in this—that the grantee has no right to demand back his principal, which is entirely sunk, but must be content to receive the annuity which he has purchased, as long as it shall please the other party to continue it: but the annuity is in its nature redeemable at the option of the grantor, who is thus at liberty to discharge himself from any further payments by returning the money which he has borrowed. It may, however, be agreed between the parties that the redemption shall not take place for a certain number of years.

An annuity for life or years is not redeemable in the same manner; but it may be agreed by the parties to the contract that it shall be redeemable on certain terms; or it may afterwards be redeemed by consent of both parties. Equity will decree a redemption upon the ground of fraud or gross inadequacy.

An annuity may be bequeathed. It may be either created by, or, if already existing, may be transmitted by, will. A created annuity is a general legacy, and will abate with the other legacies upon a deficiency of assets. A personal annuity of inheritance will pass under a general bequest.—Aubin v. Daly, 4 B. & A. 59.

An annuity is frequently resorted to as a means of borrowing money, where the borrower has not any available security; the borrower undertaking to pay an annuity during his own life, instead of interest and the return of the loan. The borrower is the grantor, and the lender is the grantee, of such annuity.

Again, a person desirous of increasing his income, and having, perhaps, no relations for whom he wishes to provide, may sink the capital he possesses, and purchase an annuity for his life. While the Government offers the best and safest security for the due payment of a purchased annuity, joint-stock companies and private speculators hold out higher rates of interest, which, however, are not always preferable, seeing that certainty of payment is the grand desideratum. See 10 Geo. IV. c. 24, 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 59, and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 49, as to annuities granted by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt; and 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 14, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 83, ss. 8 & 9, as to such grants by Savings' Banks. Stock in the public funds is a species of annuity, regulated by particular Acts of Parliament.

An annuity cannot be created or assigned or released inter vivos without a deed.—Gerard v. Boden; Hetl. 80; Maund's Case, 7 Co. 28 b.

While the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 90, wholly repealed from the 10th of August, 1854, the 53 Geo. III. c. 141, except so much thereof as repealed the 17 Geo. III. c. 26; the 18 Vict. c. 15, after reciting that by reason of the repeal of this act, purchasers were no longer enabled to ascertain by search what life-annuities or rent-charges may have been granted by their vendors or others, enacted by sec. 12 as follows:—Any annuity or rent-charge granted after 26th of April, 1856, otherwise than by marriage settlement, for one or more life or lives, or for any term of years or greater estate determinable on one or more life or lives, shall not affect any lands, tenements or hereditaments as to purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors, unless and until a memorandum or minute containing the name, and the usual or last known place of abode, and the title, trade or profession of the person whose estate is intended to be affected thereby, and the date of the deed, bond, instrument, or assurance whereby the annuity or rent-charge is granted, and the annual sum or sums to be paid shall be left with the senior master of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, who shall forthwith enter the particulars aforesaid in a book in alphabetical order by the name of the person whose estate is intended to be affected by the annuity or rent-charge, together with the year and the day of the month when every such memorandum or minute is so left with him; and he shall be entitled for every such entry to the sum of two shillings and sixpence, and all persons shall be at liberty to search the same book, together with the other books or registers in the office, on payment of the sum of one shilling.

The 14th section excepts annuities or rent-charges given by will from the act.

As to bankruptcy of the grantor of an annuity, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, ss. 175, 176; as to his insolvency, see 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 80.

The most expeditious remedy to recover the arrears of a personal annuity is an action of debt upon the deed. An action of covenant will lie; and if judgment by default be recovered, a reference to the master to compute the arrears is obtained. Where there is a bond, an action for its penalty may be brought, and a scire facias issued upon the judgment as the arrears become due from time to time.

Annuities of teinds, i. e. tithes, are 10*s.* out of the boll of teind wheat, 8*s.* out of the boll of beer, less out of the boll of rye, oats, and peas, allowed to the Crown yearly out of the teinds not paid to bishops, or set apart for other pious uses.—Scotch Law.

Annuity-tax, an impost levied annually in Scotland for the maintenance of the ministers of religion. It is abolished in Edinburgh and Montrose by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 50, which introduces a new scheme.

Annulum et baculum, a ring and pastoral staff or crosier, the delivery of which by the prince was the ancient mode of granting investitures to bishoprics.—1 Bl. Com. 377.

Annus deliberandi, the year allowed by the Scottish law for the heir to deliberate whether he will enter upon his ancestor's lands and represent him. Entry has very serious effects, and, therefore, this time is given for consideration; it commences at the ancestor's death, unless in the case of a posthumous heir, and then from his birth.—Scotch Law.

Annus, dies, et vastum [Lat.] (Year, day, and waste). See AN JOUR ET WASTE.

Annus luctus, the year of mourning, during which the widow, by the ordinances of the civil law, could not marry, to prevent the inconvenience of a widow bearing a child, which, by the period of gestation, might be the child either of her deceased or her present husband.—Cod. 5, 9, 2.

Anomy [fr. ἀνομία, Gk.], lawlessness, breach of law.

Anrhaith [an-rhaith, lawless], spoil.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Anrhaith-oddev, spoliation, sufferance. A term used when a person's goods were confiscated and seized by the lord.—Ibid.

Anrhaith-gribddail, pilfering, spoliation. A term for the graver spoliation to be exercised towards a homicide.—Ibid.

Ansel, or Ansul, an ancient mode of weighing by hanging scales or hooks at either end of a beam or staff, which, being lifted by the middle, showed the equality or difference between the weight at one end, and the thing weighed at the other.—Termes de la Ley, 66.

Answer [fr. andswarian, A.-S.; andswer, Goth.; antwoord, Belg.], reply, counter-speech.

Answer in Chancery. When a defendant is advised to take the judgment of the Court upon the whole case, or any part of it, as made by the parties on both sides, he files an answer (for further details see Mit. Pl. 15, 123, 127, 357–381; Sto. Eq. Pl. c. xviii.; 1 D. P. by H. 675–760, and Smi. Handb. 199–240) either to the whole bill or to such parts of it as are not covered by a demurrer or plea, where a combined defence is resorted to.

An answer to a bill seeking relief consists of two parts—(1) The defence or several defences to the case made by the bill, in order to apprise the plaintiff of the nature of the matter intended to be set up, and to enable the defendant to take advantage of it; for a defendant cannot avail himself of any defence not stated in his answer. (2) The examination for discovery as to which interrogatories are filed. See INTERROGATORY. It is desirable (if practicable) to keep these parts distinct and separate from one another. An answer must not contain inconsistent defences, or an alternative of inconsistent defences, for that would be to deprive the defendant of the benefit of either, and to entitle the plaintiff to a decree.

An answer either traverses, i. e. denies, or confesses and avoids the statements of the bill, and alleges matter shewing the defendant's rights in the subject of the suit, or it admits the truth of such statements, and, alleging additional circumstances or otherwise, submits the case as thus made to the judgment of the Court.

The general rule is, that if a defendant submit to answer, he must answer fully; but a defendant is not bound to answer any statement or charge in the bill, unless specially and particularly interrogated thereto; nor is a defendant bound to answer any interrogatory, except those interrogatories which such defendant is required to answer; and where a defendant answers any statement or charge in the bill, to which he is not interrogated, only by stating his ignorance of the matter so stated or charged, such answer will be deemed impertinent.—General Orders, March 6, 1860, xv. 3. A defendant may, however, answer any matter tending to the strengthening of his defence to which he is not interrogated. The answer of a defendant may contain, not only his answer to the plaintiff's interrogatories, but such statements material to the case as he may think it necessary or advisable to set forth therein; and the answer must be divided into paragraphs numbered consecutively, each paragraph containing, as nearly as may be, a separate and distinct statement or allegation.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 14.

The general rule, just mentioned, is narrowed in its operation by Gen. Ord. March 6, 1860, xv. 4, which directs that a defendant may by answer decline answering any interrogatory, or part of an interrogatory, from answering which he might have protected himself by demurrer; and that he may so decline, notwithstanding his answering other parts of the bill, from which he might have protected himself by demurrer.

This order applies only to cases where a defendant could have protected himself from answering by a demurrer, but a defendant is not bound to answer to matters which are scandalous, or impertinent, or immaterial, or irrelevant, or which may subject him to any penalty, forfeiture, or punishment, or which would involve a breach of professional confidence, or disclose facts as to his own title. In these cases, if a defendant do not defend himself from a discovery by a demurrer or plea, he is permitted by answer to insist that he is not obliged to make the discovery; but the plaintiff may except to the defendant's answer as sufficient, whereupon it will be determined by the Court whether the defendant is, or is not, obliged to make the discovery.—Sto. Eq. Pl. s. 846. The defendant, if he had raised the defence at the hearing of the cause, will generally be entitled to the same advantage by this mode of defence, as he would have had by demurring or pleading.—1 D. P. by H. 680.

A defendant must answer positively as to a fact charged to be within his own knowledge, unless it took place more than seven years ago, when he may answer it as to his remembrance or belief only. If a fact be not within his own knowledge, the defendant must answer as to his information and belief.

An answer must be full and perfect, stating facts and not indulging in arguments, and be certain in its allegations so far as it is practicable.

It must be direct and not evasive, for an evasive answer is in effect no answer, and will be liable to be taken off the file of the court. An answer must be particular, precise, and full to all the material inquiries of an interrogatory; but if the inquiry be immaterial, i. e. if the defendant's admission would neither assist the plaintiff's equity, nor advance his claim to relief, it needs not be answered. It is not enough merely to answer the charges (if any) literally, but the substance of each charge must either be confessed or traversed.

Where a defendant has in his power the means of acquiring the information necessary to enable him to give the discovery called for, he is bound to make use of such means, whatever pains or trouble it may cost him.

If a defendant deny a fact, he must traverse it directly, and not by way of negative pregnant, i. e. such a form of negative expression as may imply, or carry within it, an affirmative (see NEGATIVE PREGNANT); and if he have received any part, he must set forth what part. Preparatory to Lord Bacon's interview with James I. upon his disgrace (A.D. 1621), he made some notes, which are preserved, of the topics he was to use:—'The law of nature teaches me to speak in my own defence. With respect to this charge of bribery, I am as innocent as any born on St. Innocent's Day; I never had bribe or reward in my eye or thought when pronouncing sentence or order.' A clear negative pregnant, admitting that the bribes had been received, although he was not influenced by them in giving judgment.—2 Camp. Lives of the Chancellors, 404.

It is, however, the general practice, where an interrogatory requires the defendant to set forth a general account, or to answer as to monies received, or as to documents in his possession, to set forth the account or a list of the sums, or documents, in one or more schedules annexed to the answer, which the defendant prays may be taken as part of his answer, and such practice is very convenient, and in many cases indispensable. It may also be resorted to by the defendant, for the purpose of shewing the nature of his own case, or of strengthening it, even though there is not anything in the bill itself, or in the interrogatory, which may render a schedule necessary.

Instructions for the preparation of an answer are laid before counsel. They consist of a copy of the bill, a copy of the plaintiff's interrogatories in half margin on the right hand of the paper, and the defendant's proposed answers written opposite to the several interrogatories, with any additional facts, which are deemed essential in aid of the defence. The draft, drawn, settled, and signed by counsel, should be read to the defendant, and should any material alterations suggest themselves, it should be again submitted to counsel for revision.

The form of an answer is set forth in Schedule C to Gen. Ord. March 6, 1860, which is to be adopted with such variations as the nature and circumstances of each particular case may require.—Ord. xvi.

Whether the plaintiff in any suit commenced by bill does or does not require any answer from the defendant, or any one or more of the defendants to the bill (in case of an amended bill, the time will run from service of a copy of it pursuant to Order ix. 20), such defendant or defendants, may, without any leave of the Court, put in an answer or a demurrer (see DEMURRER), or a plea (see PLEA), to the plaintiff's bill within the time now allowed to the defendant for demurring alone to a bill (i. e. 12 days), or within such other time as may be fixed by any general order of the Lord Chancellor (no order has yet been promulgated); but after that time a defendant or defendants not required to answer the plaintiff's bill cannot put in an answer, or demurrer, or plea, without leave of the Court, whose power to grant further time for answering a bill remains in full force, and is not in anywise prejudiced or affected by the new law. When the Court grants further time to a defendant for answering the bill, the plaintiff's right to move for a decree is in the meantime suspended.

A defendant required to answer a bill must file his answer or demurrer, not demurring alone, or plea, within twenty-eight days from the delivery to him, or his solicitor, of a copy of the interrogatories (see INTERROGATORY) which he is required to answer; the Court having however full power to enlarge such period, from time to time, upon application being made to a Judge at chambers for such purpose. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 13, and Gen. Ord. March 6, 1860, xxxvii. 4 & 8.

The day on which an order that the plaintiff give security for costs is served, and the time thenceforward, until and including the day on which such security is given, is not to be reckoned in the computation of time allowed to a defendant to plead, answer or demur, or otherwise to make his defence.—Ord. xxxvii. r. 14.

The application for further time must be made to the Judge at chambers to whose Court the cause is attached, unless it be during vacation, when the vacation Judge acts for the others. The form of application is by a summons, prepared by the defendant's solicitor, impressed with a 3*s.* stamp, and sealed by the Judge's clerk. A copy of this must be served upon the plaintiff's solicitor two clear days before its return, and another copy unstamped left in chambers. The evidence in support of the application may be by affidavit, the office copy of which, and not the original, is read in chambers, and it should shew a case of diligence on the part of the applicant, and that the time allowed was insufficient for the preparation of the answer. Previous notice of reading the affidavit should be given to the plaintiff's solicitor; and, if required by him, a copy must be furnished, he paying for it at the rate of 4*d.* per folio. On the first application further time is granted, almost, of course, even without an affidavit. The solicitor should be prepared with a form of order on a 5*s.* stamp, as, if the application be granted, the order may be drawn up immediately after the hearing. But by special leave the return may be earlier. When the opposite party does not attend, there should be an affidavit of service; but this may be produced at any time during the day. It is, however, sometimes dispensed with. The costs are in the discretion of the Judge.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, ss. 26, 28, 35; Order xxxv., rr. 5, 7, 27, 32; and xxxvi.

If a defendant do not answer within these respective times, as the case may be, and do not procure an enlargement of the time, he is subject to the following liabilities:—

(1) An attachment may be issued against him.

(2) He may be committed to prison and brought to the bar of the Court.

(3) The plaintiff may file a traversing note to this effect, 'The plaintiff intends to proceed with his cause as if the defendant had filed an answer traversing the case made by the bill,' or proceed to have the bill taken pro confesso against him.—Order xiii. r. 1.

The engrossed answer on parchment must be signed by the defendant or his guardian ad litem or committee (if any); but when an answer is put in under a power of attorney, it is thought better to take the answer without any signature, than that the person to whom the power is given should sign it in the name of the defendant. The power of attorney should be recited in the order, which authorises the answer to be put in under it.—Bayley v. De Walkiers, 10 Ves. 441 (1805).

Before an answer is sworn, a jurat should be written at the end of it, which must be signed by the person administering the oath.

An answer is put in upon the defendant's or his committee's or guardian's oath, administered to him in the form consonant with his religion; but a peer or bishop merely wages his honor, and a Quaker or Moravian solemnly affirms in lieu of an oath. A corporation aggregate puts in an answer under their common seal, while a corporation sole appears and answers like a private person. A foreigner, not conversant with English, so as to answer in our vernacular language, may obtain an order as of course upon motion or petition, for an interpreter, and the answer being engrossed in his own tongue, an English translation of it is made by such interpreter upon parchment and annexed. The foreigner is then sworn to his answer; the interpreter attending having been previously sworn both to interpret truly, and convey to the foreigner the language and meaning of the oath, and that the translation is true and just, to the best of his ability; the jurat being adapted thereto. The same course of proceeding seems proper where the defendant is deaf and dumb. Where a defendant is blind, some other person must swear that he has truly, distinctly, and audibly read the contents of the answer to the defendant. The defendant must also swear to the answer.

If a defendant be illiterate, he is sworn, and makes his mark upon, instead of signing, the answer, which mark requires to be attested by a witness, who swears that he has truly, distinctly, and audibly read the contents of the answer to such defendant, and that he saw him make his mark thereto; it is better, although not necessary, for the jurat to express that the defendant, being illiterate, appeared to understand the answer.—Hill v. Earl of Bute, 2 Fowl. Ex. Pr. 10. See a form of jurat in the case of a heathen or disbeliever, Ramkissenseat v. Barker, 1 Atk. 19.

If a defendant be imbecile, the Court will appoint a guardian ad litem to answer for him, and not permit his answer to be received without oath or signature.—Wilton v. Clifton, 2 Hare, 536.

If a wife join in one defence with her husband, relative to her own property, it is considered the defence of the husband. A wife is entitled to put in an answer separate from her husband on these grounds:—(1) If the husband and wife are made defendants in right of the wife, and she claims an interest adverse to him; (2) If the husband and wife live separately and apart; (3) If the husband is out of the jurisdiction; and (4) Where she disapproves of the defence her husband intends to make. In order to answer separately, an order of the Court must be obtained for the purpose upon a motion or petition as of course. The answer of a married woman, who is under age, cannot be taken either separately or jointly with her husband, until she has had a guardian ad litem assigned.

When the Attorney-General is made a defendant, it is entirely in his discretion whether he will file a full answer, or a general answer, stating merely that he is a stranger to the matters contained in the bill, and that he hopes the interest of the Crown will be taken care of. His answer is merely signed by him.

If a defendant be in town, he is sworn or affirms, or attests upon honor before a clerk of records and writs (1*s.* 6*d.* being paid for the oath by means of a stamp, Table of Fees, &c., January 30, 1857), or before a London Commissioner to administer oaths, and take declarations, affirmations, and attestations of honor in Chancery, the fee being 1*s.* 6*d.* (16 & 17 Vict. c. 78, s. 2.)

If he reside in the country, then he swears his answer with the same formalities as an affidavit before a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery in England, who can also take affirmations and attestations of honor, the fee being 2*s.* 6*d.* (16 & 17 Vict. c. 78, s. 1, and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 21, which abolishes commissions to take pleas, answers, disclaimers and examinations, within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery.)

It may be here remarked, that all pleas, answers, disclaimers, examinations, affidavits, declarations, affirmations, and attestations of honor in causes or matters depending in Chancery, and also acknowledgments required for the purpose of enrolling any deed in Chancery, are also sworn and taken in the same manner. An answer is sworn and taken in Scotland or Ireland, or the Channel Islands, or in any colony, island, plantation, or place under the dominion of her Majesty in foreign parts, before any Judge, Court, Notary Public, or person lawfully authorized to administer oaths in such country, colony, island, plantation, or place respectively, or before any of her Majesty's consuls or vice-consuls in any foreign parts out of her Majesty's dominions; and the Judges and other officers of the Court of Chancery must take judicial notice of the seal or signature, as the case may be, of any such Court, Judge, Notary Public, person, consul, or vice-consul attached, appended, or subscribed to any such plea, answer, or other document.

All persons swearing, declaring, affirming, or attesting before any person authorized to administer oaths and take declarations, affirmations, or attestations of honor, will be liable to all such penalties, punishments, and consequences for any wilful and corrupt false swearing, declaring, affirming, or attesting contained therein, as if the matter sworn, declared, affirmed, or attested had been sworn, declared, affirmed, or attested before any Court or persons now by law authorized to administer oaths, and take declarations, affirmations, or attestations upon honor.

If any person forge the signature or the official seal of any Judge, Notary Public, or other person lawfully authorized to administer oaths, or tender in evidence any answer with a false or counterfeit signature or seal of any such Judge, Court, Notary Public, or other authorized person attached or appended thereto, knowing the same signature or seal to be false or counterfeit, every such person will be guilty of felony, and liable to the same punishment as any offender under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 113, intituled, 'An Act to facilitate the Admission in Evidence of Certain Official and other Documents.'

An answer, plea, disclaimer or examination, whether taken by commission out of the jurisdiction of the Court, or otherwise, is now filed without the oath of the messenger, and any alterations made therein previously to its being taken, must be authenticated according to the practice now in use with respect to affidavits, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, ss. 22, 23, 24, 25.

If a plaintiff will consent upon perusing the draft answer, and the Court will grant an order (which is obtained upon motion or petition of course, and properly passed and served), the oath or affirmation, or attestation of honor, and the defendant's signature as well may be dispensed with; and this is frequently done in amicable suits, and where the oath and signature cannot be obtained without delay and expense. No exceptions, however, can be taken to an answer thus filed.

The answer is left with the Clerk of Records and Writs, in whose division the suit happens to be, properly endorsed with the solicitor's name and address, who duly files it. Notice of it must be given on the same day to the plaintiff's solicitor.

Antagoge, a figure in rhetoric, charging an adversary, whose accusation is unanswerable, with the same or other crimes.—Encyc. Lond.

Antanaclasis [Lat., fr. ἀνταναϰλάω, Gk., to repercuss], a figure in rhetoric, when the same word is repeated in a different, if not in a contrary signification; as, In thy youth learn some craft, that in old age thou mayest get thy living without craft. It is also a returning to the matter at the end of a long parenthesis, as, Shall that heart (which does not only feel them, but hath all motion of his life placed in them), shall that heart, I say, &c.—Ibid.

Antanagoge [fr. ἀντὶ, against, and ἀνάγω, Gk., to take up], in rhetoric, a reply to an accusation by way of recrimination.—Ibid.

Antedate, to date a document before the day of its execution.

Antejuramentum, or præjuramentum, an oath taken by the accuser and accused before any trial or purgation. The accuser swore that he would prosecute, and the accused was to swear on the day of ordeal that he was innocent.—Leg. Athelstan apud Lambard, 23.

Ante litem motam [Lat.] (Before litigation commenced).

Antenati, those born before a certain period, e. g. before marriage.

Ante-nuptial, before matrimony.

Anthorismus, in rhetoric, denotes a contrary description or definition of a thing from that given by the adverse party. Thus, if the plaintiff urge, that to take anything away from another without his knowledge or consent is a theft, this is called ὅρος, or definition. If the defendant reply, that to take a thing away from another without his knowledge or consent, provided it be done with a design to return it to him again, is not theft, this is an ἀνθορισμὸς.—Ibid.

Antichresis [fr. ἀντίχρησις, Gk.], in the civil law, a covenant or convention, whereby a person borrowing money of another engages or makes over his lands or goods to the creditor, with the use and occupation thereof, for the interest of the money lent. This covenant was allowed by the Romans, among whom usury was prohibited; it was afterwards called Mort-gage, to distinguish it from a simple engagement, where the fruits of the ground were not alienated, which was called Vif-gage, i. e. vivum vadium.—Encyc. Lond. The obsolete Welsh mortgage bears a resemblance to this kind of pledge.—1 Domat, b. iii. tit. I. s. i. art. 28; Story on Bail, 310.

Anticipation, doing or taking a thing before the appointed time.

Antient demesne. See Ancient Demesne.

Antigrapher, the keeper of the —

Antigraphy, a copy or counterpart of a deed.

Antigua. See 22 & 23 Vict. c. 13.

Anti-manifesto, the declaration of a belligerent shewing that the war, as far as he is concerned, is defensive.

Antinomy [fr. ἀντὶ, against, and νομός, Gk., law], a contradiction between two laws or two articles of the same law.—Encyc. Lond.

Antipelargia, an ancient and righteous law, whereby children were obliged to furnish necessaries to their aged parents. The ciconia, or stork, is a bird famous for the care it takes of its parents, when grown old. Hence, in some Latin writers, this is rendered lex ciconiaria, or the stork's law.—Ibid.

Antiqua customa, a duty which was collected on wool, wool-felts, and leather.

Antiqua statuta, the Acts of Parliament from Richard I. to Edward III.

Antistitium, a monastery.—Blount.

Antithetarius, or anthetarius, the recriminating upon the accuser of the same crime, which he has charged against the accused. Canutus, c. 47.

Antivestæum, the Land's End, in Cornwall.

Antona, the river Avon, in Warwickshire.

Antrustions, companions-in-arms of a German feudal chief.

Apatisatio, an agreement or compact. Upton, lib. 2, c. 12.

Apertura testamenti, a form of proving a will in the Civil Law by the witnesses acknowledging before a magistrate their having sealed it.—1 Wm. Exs. 292, n. (t).

Apiacum, Pap Castle, in Cumberland.

Apices juris non sunt jura.—Co. Litt. 304. (Fine points of law are not laws.) The ingenuity of special pleaders would frequently sacrifice the spirit of our laws upon the altar of technicality, were it not for this maxim, which prevents subtle exceptions diverting the stream of justice. The Courts frequently regret the occurrences of technical objections to the pleadings, depriving parties of their just and moral rights, but perhaps, upon the whole, it would be a subject of deeper regret, if, in order that supposed justice should be done, a remedy should be applied to a particular hardship, unsettling the established rules of pleading, and introducing laxity and uncertainty.—Galloway v. Jackson; 3 Scott, N. R. 773. Recent statutes have exploded a mass of pleading technicality.

Apograph, a copy, an inventory.

Aporiare, to bring to poverty, to shun or avoid.—Wals. in R. 2.

Apostacy, a total renunciation of Christianity, by embracing a false religion, or not any religion at all.—4 Bl. Com. 43.

Apostare, to violate, break, or transgress. Blount; Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 35.

Apostata capiendo, a writ formerly issued against an apostate, or one who had violated the rules of his religious order. It was addressed to the sheriff to deliver the defendant into the possession of the abbot or prior.—Reg. Orig. 71, 267.

Apostles [fr. ἀπόστολος, Gk., one sent], brief letters of dismission given to an appellant from an Admiralty Court. They state the case and declare that the record will be transmitted. Civil Law.

Apothecaries [fr. apothicaire, Fr.; fr. ἀποθήκη, Gk.], persons who prepare medicines according to a physician's prescription. Their practice in England and Wales is regulated by 55 Geo. III. c. 194. See also 21 & 22 Vict.

c. 90; 22 Vict. c. 21; 23 Vict. c. 7; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 66; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 91.

Appanage, or Apanage [fr. panis, Lat., bread, whence panar, apanar, Prov., to nourish], the provision of lands or feudal superiorities assigned by the kings of France for the maintenance of their younger sons, and also the allowance assigned to the prince of a reigning house for a proper maintenance out of the public chest.—1 Hall. Mid. Ages, c. 1, p. ii. p. 88.

Apparator, or Apparitor, a messenger, who cites and arrests offenders, and executes the decrees of the judges of the Spiritual Courts. Gowel.

Apparator comitatus, an officer formerly so called, for whom the sheriffs of Buckinghamshire had a considerable yearly allowance. Hales' Sher. Acco. 104.

Apparel, excess in, the penal laws against this luxury were repealed by 1 Jac. I. c. 25.

Apparent heir, or appearand heir, also sometimes called heir presumptive, a person who is next in the line of succession to real property, to whom it will descend if he outlive the present owner, e. g. the eldest son of a man seised of real estate, to whom it will descend, if he outlive his parent dying intestate. In the Scotch Law, he is the person to whom the succession has actually opened. He is so called until his regular entry on the lands by service or infeftment on a precept of dare constat.—Scotch Dict.

Apparlement [fr. pareillement, Fr., in like manner], a resemblance or likelihood.—2 Ric. II. st. 1, c. 6.

Apparura, furniture and implements. Blount.

Appeach, to accuse or bewray.

Appeal [fr. appellatio, Lat.; appeller, Fr.], the removal of a cause from an inferior to a superior court, for the purpose of testing the soundness of the decision by the inferior court. Criminally, it was an accusation by one private subject against another of some heinous crime, demanding punishment on account of the particular injury suffered, rather than for the offence against the public. Criminal appeals were either capital or not capital: capital were subdivided into (1) appeals of death or murder; (2) appeals of larceny or robbery; (3) appeals of rape; (4) appeals of arson, which are all obsolete and superseded by 59 Geo. III. c. 46; not capital were de pace, de plagis, de imprisonamento, and mayhem, superseded by actions of trespass.—Leach's Hawk. P. C. ii. 285. Appeal to Rome, abolished by 24 Hen. VIII. c. 12, and 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19, 21.

Appearance, personal presence, a being present in Court. When a person is served with a summoning process from a Court he generally comes into such Court to defend himself by entering an appearance with the proper officer.

There are several modes for a defendant to appear:—

(1) in person.
(2) by attorney.
(3) by guardian.
(4) by committee.

1. A defendant, who intends to resist the plaintiff's suit in Chancery, and take the Court's decision upon the subject litigated, should enter an appearance at the Record and Writ Clerk's Office, Chancery Lane, London, within eight days after service of the printed or written copy of the bill, either in person or by his solicitor, which latter is the safer and more usual course. A general authority to act for his client is sufficient for a solicitor to defend a suit, since it needs not be a special authority for the purpose.—Wright v. Castle, 3 Mer. 12. When a husband and wife are defendants, the husband should appear for himself and wife. Infants, idiots, and lunatics appear by a guardian ad litem.

There are six kinds of appearances:—

(1) Gratis, when a defendant appears before he is cited, upon learning that a bill has been filed against him. This anticipatory appearance is resorted to, when a defendant desires to make an immediate application to the Court. A defendant may also appear gratis at the hearing, and submit to be bound by the decree; but, if he be not named in the bill, the Court cannot hear him, unless all parties consent thereto, and his name is inserted in the record. A gratis appearance does not prevent a motion ex parte for an injunction; nor does it disentitle the defendant to such costs as the Court may award.

(2) Voluntary, when a defendant duly appears upon being cited; whereupon a written notice of it must be given to the plaintiff, if he sue in person, or to his solicitor on the same day before eight o'clock in the evening. Gen. Ord., March 1860, iii. r. 9.

(3) Compulsory (when a defendant, being duly cited, does not appear), which is:—

(a) Substituted (appearance sec. reg.), when the appearance is entered by the plaintiff for the defendant, pursuant to Gen. Ord. March 6, 1860, x. r. 4, which provides thus: —If any defendant, not appearing to be an infant or a person of weak or unsound mind, unable of himself to defend the suit, is, when within the jurisdiction of the Court, duly served with a copy of the bill, and refuses or neglects to appear thereto within eight days after such service, the plaintiff may, after the expiration of such eight days, and within three weeks from the time of such service, apply to the Record and Writ Clerk to enter an appearance for such defendant; and, no appearance having been entered, the Record and Writ Clerk is to enter (as of course) such appearance accordingly, upon being satisfied by affidavit that the copy of the bill was duly served (upon such defendant personally, or at his dwelling-house or usual place of abode); and after the expiration of such three weeks, or after the time allowed to such defendant for appearing has expired, in any case in which the Record and Writ Clerk is not hereby required to enter such appearance, the plaintiff may apply to the Court for leave to enter such appearance for such defendant; and the Court, being satisfied (by affidavit) that the copy of the bill was duly served, and that no appearance has been entered for such defendant (proved by a certificate of no appearance from the Record and Writ Clerk) may, if it so think fit, order the same accordingly. Affidavits filed for the purpose of proving the service of a copy of the bill upon any defendant are to state when, where, and how the same was served, and by whom such service was effected.—Order x. 8.

(b) Personal, when a defendant is taken and brought up upon an attachment, and compelled to enter an appearance for himself. Although a plaintiff has the option of enforcing a personal appearance by process of contempt instead of adopting the substituted appearance, yet as it has become almost obsolete in practice, on account of its being a more expensive, inconvenient, and a more oppressive course than that under the Orders of March 1860, it is not necessary to detail the proceedings.

(c) By order, the defendant being out of the jurisdiction. If, upon the expiration of the time limited by the order of the Court for appearing after the service of a bill on a defendant out of the jurisdiction, it appears to the satisfaction of the Court (upon affidavit) that such defendant was duly served with a copy of the bill, and a copy of the order, the Court may, upon the application of the plaintiff (producing a certificate of no appearance from the Record and Writ Clerk), order an appearance to be entered for such defendant. Ord. x. r. 7.

(4) Special, without citation, the defendant having absconded. Where the Court is satisfied by sufficient evidence that any defendant has been within the jurisdiction of the Court at some time not more than two years before the bill was filed, and that such defendant is beyond the seas, or that upon inquiry at his usual place of abode (if he had any), or at any other place or places where, at the time when the bill was filed, he might probably have been met with, he could not be found so as to be served with a copy of the bill, under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 3, and that, in either case, there is just ground to believe that such defendant is gone out of the realm, or otherwise absconded, to avoid being served with such copy of the bill, or with other process, then the Court may order that such defendant do appear at a certain day, to be named in the order; and a copy of such order, together with a notice thereof to the effect set forth below, may, within fourteen days after such order made, be inserted in the London Gazette, and be otherwise published as the Court shall direct; and where the defendant does not appear within the time limited by such order, or within such further time as the Court may appoint, there, on proof made of such publication of the said order, the Court may order an appearance to be entered for the defendant on the application of the plaintiff.

Notice.—'A. B., take notice, that if you do not appear pursuant to the above order, the plaintiff may enter an appearance for you, and the Court may afterwards grant to the plaintiff such relief as he may appear to be entitled to on his own showing.'—Gen. Ord. March 6, 1860, x. r. 6.

(5) Optional, which is:—

(a) Common. Where a party served with a copy of the bill under the 11th Rule of the Order desires the suit to be prosecuted against himself in the ordinary way, is entitled to have it so prosecuted; and in that case he must enter an appearance in the common form, and the suit will then be prosecuted against him in the ordinary way. But the costs occasioned thereby must be paid by the party so appearing, unless the Court otherwise directs.—Order x. r. 4.

(b) Special. Where a party is served with a copy of the bill under the 11th Rule of Order x., and desires to be served with a notice of the proceedings in the cause, but not otherwise to have the same prosecuted against himself, he may enter a special appearance in the following form (that is to say):—'A. B. appears to the bill for the purpose of being served with notice of all proceedings therein.' And thereupon, the party entering such appearance shall be entitled to be served with notice of all proceedings in the cause, and to appear thereon. But the costs occasioned thereby must be paid by the party entering such appearance, unless the Court otherwise directs.—Order x. r. 15.

No party is to enter either a common or special appearance under the 14th or 15th Rules of Gen. Ord. x., after the expiration of twelve days from the service of the copy of the bill, without first obtaining an order of the Court for that purpose, such order to be obtained on notice to the plaintiff, and to be granted, if the Court think fit, upon such terms as are just; and any party so entering such common or special appearance is bound by all the proceedings in the cause prior to such appearance being entered, unless the Court otherwise directs.—Order x. r. 16.

(6) Subsequent or secondary. A defendant, notwithstanding that an appearance may have been entered for him by the plaintiff, may afterwards enter an appearance for himself in the ordinary way; but such appearance by such defendant is not to affect any proceeding duly taken or any right acquired by the plaintiff under or after the appearance entered by him, or prejudice the plaintiff's right to be allowed the costs of the first appearance. Order x. r. 9.

It has been suggested, that, perhaps, the practice under this order will be, not to enter a second appearance, but simply to give to the plaintiff notice that the defendant will defend the suit by his own solicitor.

If a defendant at Common Law do not appear within eight days after service of a copy of the writ of summons, then, if the writ be specially endorsed, the plaintiff may, on filing an affidavit of service of a copy of the writ or a judge's order to proceed without service, sign final judgment, and issue execution after eight days from the last day for appearance; the defendant may, however, be let in to defend by leave of a judge, upon disclosing a defence upon the merits; but if the writ be not specially endorsed, the plaintiff then files a declaration endorsed with a notice to plead in eight days, and may sign judgment if no plea be delivered within such time. The defendant may appear at any time before judgment, either in person or by attorney.

Where the writ is specially endorsed and there are several defendants, and some make default, judgment may be signed against them, but if execution be issued, the plaintiff will be held to have abandoned his proceedings against the other defendants, to avoid which he should declare against the defendants who have appeared, suggesting the judgment as to the others.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, ss. 27—33, and Ord. 2, H. T. 1853. A defendant has twelve days to appear under the Bills of Exchange Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 67.

In ejectment the defendant has sixteen days to appear. A person not named in the writ may obtain an order to appear upon an affidavit showing that he is in possession of the land, either by himself or by his tenant.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, ss. 169—177, and Ords. 112—114, H. T. 1853.

An appearance should be entered to a citation from the Probate Court within the time limited in the citation, which, if the party cited is within the jurisdiction, is eight days from personal service of a copy of it, and should be accompanied by an address within three miles of the General Post Office, where pleadings and other proceedings not requiring personal service may be left.

If the party cited does not appear within the time limited in the citation, the cause proceeds in default; nevertheless, the party cited may enter an appearance at any time before a proceeding has been taken in default, or afterwards by leave of the judge or of one of the registrars. All appearances are entered in the Principal Registry, in a book provided for that purpose, and kept by the Clerk of the Papers.—See Rules 20, 26, 27, and 29 of Contentious Business Rules, 1862.

In default of the appearance of a respondent or co-respondent in the Divorce Court within the time limited in the citation, an affidavit of service and of non-appearance must be filed before any further proceedings can be taken by a petitioner. Every entry of an appearance is to be accompanied by an address within three miles of the General Post Office in London, at which it shall be sufficient to leave all notices, instruments, and other proceedings. See Rules and Orders, 1858, rr. 9, 12.

A defendant cited in the Ecclesiastical Court may appear either in person or by proctor; but if a defendant intend to object to the Court's jurisdiction, he should appear under protest, to save his contumacy, and then show cause against the citation upon petition and affidavits, upon which the Court either allows the protest and dismisses the defendant, or overrules it, and assigns the defendant to appear absolutely.

In indictments for felony, the accused must always appear and plead in person, and likewise in appeal or on attachment; but in indictments or informations in the Court of Queen's Bench for misdemeanors, the accused may appear by attorney; and in misdemeanors generally, after the accused has once appeared, the trial may proceed in his absence.—2 Hawk. P. C. c. 22, s. 1; Cro. Jac. 462; 4 Steph. Comm. 474.

Appearance sec. stat. (i. e. secundum statutum), which was entered at law by a plaintiff for a defaulting defendant under 12 Geo. I. c. 29, and 2 Wm. IV. c. 39, is abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 26.

Appellant, the party appealing; the party resisting the appeal is called Respondent.—Encyc. Lond.

Appellate jurisdiction the power of a superior Court to review the decision of an inferior Court.

Appellatione fundi, omne ædificium et omnis ager continetur.—4 Co. 87. (Under the word 'fundus' every building and every field is comprehended.)

Appellee, one who is appealed against or accused.—Encyc. Lond.

Appellor, an accuser; a criminal who accuses his accomplices, one who challenges a jury, &c.—Ibid.

Appendant, a thing of inheritance belonging to another inheritance which is more worthy: as an advowson, common, &c., which may be appendant to a manor, common of fishing to a freehold, a seat in a church to a house, &c. It differs from appurtenance, in that appendant must ever be by prescription, i. e. a personal usage for a considerable time, while an appurtenance may be created at this day, for if a grant be made to a man and his heirs, of common in such a moor for his beasts levant or couchant upon his manor, the commons are appurtenant to the manor and the grant will pass them.—Co. Litt. 121 b.

Appenditia, pertinances of an estate.—Blount.

Appennage, or apennage, a child's part or portion. It is properly the portion of the king's younger children in France, where, by a fundamental law, called the law of appennages, the king's younger sons formerly had duchies, counties, or baronies granted to them and their heirs, &c., the reversion being reserved to the Crown, as well as all matters of legality as to coinage and levying taxes in such territories. Spelm.; Cowel. See APPANAGE.

Appensura, the payment of money at the scale or by weight.—Spelm.

Applicatio est vita regulæ.—2 Buls. 79. (Application is the life of a rule.)

Application, a request, a motion to a court or judge; the disposal of a thing.

Appodiare, to lean on or prop up anything. Wals. 1271; Mat. Paris Chron.

Appointee, a person selected for a particular purpose; also the person in whose favor a power of appointment is executed.

Appointment [fr. appoincter, Fr. to pronounce fitting], direction, designation, the selection of a person for an office.

Appointment of new trustees. Every assurance which creates a trust and nominates trustees, should contain a power to appoint new trustees, and this power should be comprehensive, and should provide for all the usual contingencies. Such a power must be strictly exercised. A trustee who transfers the trust property to another, without an express power to do so, does not thereby pass the trust, for the office, with all its powers and responsibilities, is still vested in him, and he places himself in this predicament, his liability is retained, whilst he has deprived himself of his control over the property.

In the absence of a power to appoint new trustees, the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to nominate other trustees, pursuant to 12 & 13 Vict. c. 60, and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 55.

Appointment in exercise of a power concerning uses, an instrument which alters, abridges, or suspends a use limited by a prior assurance containing or reserving the power which sanctions such appointment. The seisin to serve the appointed use being transferred by the prior assurance, the appointment vests the legal estate in the appointee, who takes as though he were named in such prior assurance.

A deed of appointment should recite or refer to the power and be expressed, to be in exercise of it, as manifesting the intention of the appointor, or person executing the power, and also of every other authority enabling him in that behalf, so as to guard against any misrecital of the assurance creating the power. It should likewise state that the formalities required for the execution of the power are complied with, and the attestation should set forth that such formalities were observed.

The formalities required by the creator of a power should be few and simple, for many an appointment has failed because they have not been precisely attended to. When the consent of any person is required to the exercise of a power, it is generally a condition precedent, and an execution of the power without such consent is not cured by its subsequent acquisition. See Preston's Act, 54 Geo. III. c. 168, as to the attestation of appointments made prior to the 30th of July, 1814; and also see 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 10, as to appointments exercisable by will, and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 12, by deed.

Appointor, a donee of a power after he has executed it; also a person who nominates another for an office.

Apponere, to pledge or pawn.—Neubrig, l. 1, c. 2.

Apportionment, a division of a rent, common, encumbrance, fine, or other charge. The 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 15, apportions rent between the representatives of a deceased tenant for life, and the person succeeding in remainder; and this statute has been extended by Equity to the case of tenant-in-tail. The 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 22, was passed to obviate the doubts which had arisen upon the 11 Geo. II. c. 19. It enacts that rents reserved on leases determining on the death of the person making them (though not strictly tenant for life), or on the death of tenant pur autre vie shall be considered as within the provisions of 11 Geo. II. c. 19 (s. 1.) All rents-service reserved on any lease by a tenant-in-fee, or for any life interest, or by any lease granted under any power, and which leases shall have been granted after the passing of this act (June 16th, 1834), and all rents-charge, and other rents, annuities, pensions, dividends, moduses, compositions, and all other payments of every description, payable, or coming due at fixed periods, under any instrument executed after the passing of this act, or being a will or testamentary instrument, coming into operation after the passing of this act, shall be apportioned, so that on the death of any person interested in any such rents, annuities, &c., or in the estate, fund, office, or benefice, from or in respect of which the same shall be issuing or derived, or on the determination by any other means whatsoever of the interest of any such person, he or she, and his or her, executors, administrators, or assigns shall be entitled to a proportion of such rents, annuities, &c., according to the time which shall have elapsed from the commencement, or last period of payment thereof respectively, including the day of the death of such person, or of the determination of his or her interest, all just allowances and deductions in respect of charges on such rents, annuities, &c., being made (s. 2). The statute then gives the same remedies at Law and in Equity for the apportioned part as for the entire rent, &c., and provides that the Act shall not invalidate any express provision against apportionment (s. 3).—2 Chit. Stat. 801. And see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 97, ss. 10—14.

By 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 3, where the reversion upon a lease is severed, and the rent or other reservation is legally apportioned, the assignee of each part of the reversion shall, in respect of the apportioned rent or other reservation allotted or belonging to him, have and be entitled to the benefit of all conditions or powers of re-entry for non-payment of the original rent or other reservation, in like manner as if such conditions or powers had been reserved to him as incident to his part of the reversion in respect of the apportioned rent or other reservation allotted or belonging to him.

Apportum, the revenue or profit which a thing brings to the owner. It is commonly applied to a corody or pension.—Blount.

Apposal of sheriffs, charging them with money received upon the account of the Exchequer.—22 & 23 Car. II. c. 22.

Apposer, an officer of the Exchequer.

Appostille [Fr.], an addition or annotation to a document.

Appraisers [fr. appréciateurs, Fr.], persons employed to value goods, repairs, labour, &c. By 55 Geo. III. c. 184, they are required to take out an annual license. According to an old statute, 11 Edw. I. stat. Acton Burnel, appraisers valuing goods too highly are compelled to take them at their own valuation.

Appraisement [fr. apprécier, prix, Fr. pretium Lat.], the act of valuing property, goods, furniture, &c.

Apprehending offenders, persons active in so doing are allowed compensation in certain cases specified in 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 28.

Apprehension [fr. prehendere, Lat. to catch hold of, apprehendere, to seize], the capture of a person upon a criminal charge. As to apprehending offenders in the Colonies escaping into the United Kingdom, and è converso, see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 34.

Apprendre, a fee or profit.—Cowel.

Apprentice [fr. apprendre, Fr. to learn], a person bound by indentures of apprenticeship to a tradesman or artificer, who covenants to teach him his trade or mystery. Consult Bird or Chitty on the Laws of Apprentices, &c.

'Apprenticeships were altogether unknown to the ancients. The reciprocal duties of master and apprentice make a considerable article in every modern code. The Roman Law is perfectly silent with regard to them. I know no Greek or Latin word (I might venture, I believe, to assert that there is none) which expresses the idea we now annex to the word apprentice, a servant bound to work at a particular trade for the benefit of a master, during a term of years, upon condition that the master shall teach him that trade.'—Smith's Wealth of Nations, b. i. c. x.

Apprentice en la ley (A student of Law).

Apprizing, an action by which a creditor formerly carried off the estates of his debtor in payment of debts due to him, in lieu of which adjudications are now resorted to.—Scotch Law.

Approbate or reprobate, a person who takes advantage of one part of a deed and rejects the rest.—Scotch Law.

Appropriation, the annexing of some ecclesiastical benefice to the proper and perpetual use of some religious house, &c., just as impropriation is the annexing a benefice to the use of a lay person or corporation. Appropriation may be severed and the church become disappropriate, if a patron or appropriator present a clerk, who is properly instituted and inducted, for he would then become complete parson; also, if a corporation, possessing the benefice, is dissolved, the parsonage becomes disappropriate at common law.—2 Burn's Eccles. Law, 347.

Appropriation of payments, the application by a creditor to one of several debts of a sum of money paid by a debtor on a general account.

Appropriare communiam, to discommon and enclose any parcel of land which was before open common.—Paroch. Antiq. 336.

Appropriator, a spiritual corporation entitled to the profits of a benefice.

Approve, to augment a thing to the utmost. 2 Inst. 474.

Approvement, i. e. improvement. Profits of land; also, where there exists a right of common on a lord's waste, and the lord encloses part of such waste, leaving sufficient common. Cromp. Juris. 152; Reg. Jud. 8, 9.

Approver, or Prover [fr. probus, Lat. probare, approbare; approver, Fr. to consent unto], a criminal offender who accuses others of the same offence, and is admitted as a witness at the discretion of the Court to give evidence against his companions in guilt. He is vulgarly called 'Queen's evidence.' A criminal who has pleaded 'not guilty' cannot be such witness. This testimony must necessarily be of an unsatisfactory nature, as the approver's hopes of lenity and pardon must materially depend upon the conviction of his confederates. It is, therefore, seldom used without offering confirmatory evidence, unless in misdemeanours, when a conviction may ensue upon the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice. If an accomplice act fairly and openly, and discover the whole truth, although he is not entitled of right to a pardon, yet the usage and practice and lenity of the Court is to stop the prosecution against him, and he has an equitable title to a recommendation to the royal mercy, which holds out a hope that accomplices so conducting themselves and bringing others to justice, shall themselves escape punishment and be pardoned. Cowp. 33. But this course of admitting approvers has been long disused, for the truth is, as Sir Matthew Hale observes, that more mischiefs have arisen to good men by these kinds of approvements upon false and malicious accusations of desperate villains, than benefit to the public by the discovery and conviction of real offenders.—2 Hale, P. C. c. 29; 4 Bl. Com. 330. The practice now is to admit accomplices to give evidence for the Crown, under an implied promise of pardon, on condition of their making a full and fair confession of the whole truth.

Approvers, bailiffs of lords in their franchises. Sheriffs were called the King's approvers in 1 Edw. III. c. 8.—Termes de la Ley, 49.

Appruare, to take to one's use or profit. Cowel.

Apprysing, when, by letters, a debitor is charged to appear before a messenger (who, in that case, represents the sheriff), to hear the land specified in the letter apprysed by inquest and declared to belong to the creditor for payment of his debts.—Scotch Law.

Appurtenances, belonging to another thing, as hamlets to a manor, and common of pasture, turbary, &c., liberties and services, out-houses, yards, orchards, and gardens are appurtenant to a messuage, but lands cannot properly be said to be appurtenant to a messuage.—Com. Dig. tit. Appendant and Appurtenant.

Appurtenant, pertaining or belonging to.

A prendre [Fr.], (to take or seize a thing), such as exercising the right of common.

A principalioribus seu dignioribus est inchoandum. Co. Litt. 18.—(We are to begin with the more worthy and principal parts.)

A priori. All arguments may be divided according to the relation of the subject-matter of the premises to that of the conclusion, into (α) à priori (from the antecedent to the consequence), or those of such a nature that the premises would account for the conclusion, were that conclusion granted, which is the Aristotelic method of reasoning; and (β) à posteriori (from the consequence to the antecedent), or those whose premises could not have been used to account for the conclusion, which is the Baconian method of reasoning. The former class is manifestly arguments from cause to effects, since to account for anything signifies to assign the cause of it. The latter class comprehends all other arguments.

Archbishop Whately (Rhetoric, chap. ii. s. 2), thus distinguishes these two kinds of arguments:—'The only decisive test by which to distinguish the arguments which belong to the one and to the other of these classes, is, to ask the question, "Supposing the proposition in question to be admitted, would this statement here used as an argument serve to account for and explain the truth, or not?" It will then be readily referred to the former or to the latter class, according as the answer is in the affirmative or the negative; as, e. g. if a murder were imputed to any one on the grounds of his "having a hatred to the deceased, and an interest in his death," the argument would belong to the former class; because, supposing his guilt to be admitted, and an inquiry to be made how he came to commit the murder, the circumstances just mentioned would serve to account for it, but not so with respect to such an argument as his "having blood on his clothes," which would, therefore, be referred to the other class.'

Aqua cedit solo. (Water passes with the soil.)

Aqua currit et debet currere. (Water flows and ought to flow.)

Aqua frisca, de, Freshwater.

Aquatic rights, those that are exercisable in running or still water.

Aqua pontanus, Bridgewater, in Somersetshire.

Aquæ calidæ, Aquæ solis, Akeman-cester, Bath, in Somersetshire.

Aquædon, Ediure, vulgò Eatoun.

Aquæ ductus, two servitudes, one a right to carry a water course through another's ground, the other to water cattle at a river, well, or pond.—Scotch Law.

Aquædunensis saltus, Waterdon.

Aquædunum, Aieton.

Aquage, or Aquagium, a watercourse, or toll paid for water carriage.—Blount.

Aquæudensis pons, Eiford.

Arabant, applied to those who held by the tenure of ploughing and tilling the lord's lands within the manor.—Cowel.

Arace, to rase or erase.—Blount.

Araho, to make oath in the church or some other holy place. All oaths were made in the church upon the relics of saints, according to the Ripuarian Laws.—Cowel.

Aratia, arable grounds.—Blount.

Aratrum terræ, as much land as can be tilled by one plough. A term applied to a service rendered by a tenant to his lord. Cowel.

Arbeia, Ireby, in Cumberland.

Arbiter, [Ad-biter fr. the old Latin bëto, to go; or perhaps fr. arpa, Fin. a lot, symbol, divining-rod — Wedgw.] a private extrajudicial judge; an arbitrator, or referee; a witness.

Arbitrament, the award or decision of arbitrators upon a matter of dispute, which has been submitted to them.—Termes de la Ley, 50.

Arbitrary, a discretion to act at pleasure to a certain extent.

Arbitrary punishment, such as is left to the discretion of a judge.

Arbitrate, to judge, to make an agreement.

Arbitration, the submitting of a matter in dispute to the judgment of one, two, or more persons, called arbitrators. — Whart. Angl. Sacr. 1, 772.

I. The matters which may be referred to arbitration are these:—Disputes concerning any personal chattel or personal wrong; differences touching realty; pure questions of law; suits and actions, excepting, perhaps, actions upon penal statutes by common informers; claims barred by a mere rule of practice; the future conduct of parties as to the enjoyment of property, in matters beyond the power of any Court to prescribe; matters referred by statute; price and compensation for lands taken for undertakings of a public nature; expenses of prisoners; disputes between masters and workmen; disputes relating to savings' banks and friendly societies; bankrupts' and insolvents' estates; joint-stock-companies' affairs; sums borrowed for houses and glebe; small debts by a county court judge; civil proceedings at quarter sessions; and misdemeanours confined to personal injury, and for which an action of damages would lie, the offence not being of a public nature.

II. The parties who may refer to arbitration are these:—Persons capable of disposing of their rights; husband and wife; partners and parties with joint interests; corporations, churchwardens, and overseers; authorised agents; attorneys and solicitors; counsel (but see Swinfen v. Swinfen, 24 Beav. 549, and 18 C. B. 485) executors and administrators; trustees; committees of lunatics with consent of the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices of Appeal; public officers; assignees of bankrupts and insolvents; trustees of savings' banks and friendly societies; promoters of public undertakings and railways; ecclesiastical and collegiate corporations concerning their lands; masters and workmen concerning their trade; and counties and boroughs concerning prisoners' expenses.

III. No formal submission, either verbal or written, is necessary. The several modes, however, of submitting matters to arbitration are these:—

(1.) By parol, which, however, is not advisable, as it is open to dispute as to the exact terms used, and besides, an award made in pursuance of it cannot be enforced by attachment, since a parol submission cannot be made a rule of Court. Such a submission is ineffectual so far as it comprehends realty.

A covenant or agreement to refer future disputes to arbitration, is not effectual, unless an arbitrator is named, or the manner of his appointment is particularly provided for.

Courts of Equity will not enforce the specific performance of an agreement to refer any matters in controversy between adverse parties, deeming it against public policy to exclude from the appropriate judicial tribunals of the country any persons who, in the ordinary course of things, have a right to sue therein. Neither will they, for the same reason, compel arbitrators to make an award; nor, when they have made an award, will they compel them to disclose the grounds of their judgment. The latter doctrine stands upon the same principle of public policy as the others, that is to say, on the one hand, not to compel a resort to these domestic tribunals, and, on the other hand, not to disturb their decisions, when made, except upon very cogent reasons.

Submissions in an action at Common Law are made, either—

(5.) By judge's order or rule of court, upon a consent signed by the attornies on both sides. And the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125 (C. L. P. A. 1854) enacts that if it appear, at any time after the issuing of the writ, to the satisfaction of the court or a judge, upon the application of either party, that the matter in dispute consists wholly or in part of matters of mere account which cannot conveniently be tried in the ordinary way, it shall then be lawful for such court or judge to decide such matter summarily, or to order that such matter, either wholly or in part, be referred to an arbitrator appointed by the parties, or to an officer of the court, upon such terms as to costs and otherwise as shall be reasonable; and the decision or order of such court or judge, or the award or certificate of such referee, shall be enforceable by the same process as the finding of a jury upon the matter referred.—(s. 3.)

If it appear that the allowance or disallowance of any particular item or items in such account depends upon a question of law fit to be decided by the court, or upon a question of fact fit to be decided by a jury, or by a judge upon the consent of both parties, it shall be lawful for such court or judge to direct a case to be stated, or an issue or issues to be tried; and the decision of the court upon such case, and the finding of the jury or judge upon such issue or issues, shall be taken and acted upon by the arbitrator as conclusive.—(s. 4.)

The 21 & 22 Vict. c. 74, s. 5, repeals the power to refer any cause to the judge of any county court.

(6) By order of Nisi Prius, drawn up on the consent of the parties, with or without a verdict taken for the damages. But if, upon the trial of any issue of fact by a judge under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, it shall appear to the judge that the questions arising thereon involve matter of account which cannot conveniently be tried before him, it shall be lawful for him, at his discretion, to order that such matter of account be referred to an arbitrator appointed by the parties, or to an officer of the court, upon such terms as to costs and otherwise, as such judge shall think reasonable; and the award or certificate of such referee shall have the same effect as is provided as to the award or certificate of a referee before trial; and it shall be competent for the judge to proceed to try and dispose of any other matters in question, not referred, in like manner as if no reference had been made.—(s. 6)

(7) By order of a Court of Equity.

Whenever the parties to any deed or instrument in writing, or any of them, shall agree that any then existing or future differences between them or any of them shall be referred to arbitration; and any one or more of the parties so agreeing, or any person or persons claiming through or under him or them, shall nevertheless commence an action at Law, or suit in Equity against the other party or parties, or any of them, or against any person or persons claiming through or under him or them in respect of the matters so agreed to be referred, or any of them, it shall be lawful for the court in which such action or suit is brought, or a judge thereof, on application by the defendant or defendants or any of them, after appearance and before plea or answer, upon being satisfied that no sufficient reason exists why such matters cannot be or ought not to be referred to arbitration according to such agreement, and that the defendant was at the time of the bringing of such action or suit, and still is, ready and willing to join and concur in all acts necessary and proper for causing such matters so to be decided by arbitration, to make a rule or order staying all proceedings in such action or suit, on such terms as to costs and otherwise as to such court or judge may seem fit: Provided always that any such rule or order may at any time afterwards be discharged, or varied, as justice may require. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 11.

If in any case of arbitration the document authorising the reference provide that the reference shall be to a single arbitrator, and all the parties do not, after differences have arisen, concur in the appointment of an arbitrator; or if any appointed arbitrator refuse to act, or become incapable of acting, or die, and the terms of such document do not shew that it was intended that such vacancy should not be supplied, and the parties do not concur in appointing a new one; or if, where the parties or two arbitrators are at liberty to appoint an umpire or third arbitrator, and such parties or arbitrators do not appoint an umpire or third arbitrator; or if any appointed umpire or third arbitrator refuse to act or become incapable of acting, or die, and the terms of the document authorising the reference do not shew that it was intended that such a vacancy should not be supplied, and the parties or arbitrators respectively do not appoint a new one; then in every such instance any party may serve the remaining parties or the arbitrators, as the case may be, with a written notice to appoint an arbitrator, umpire, or third arbitrator respectively; and if, within seven clear days after such notice shall have been served, no arbitrator, umpire, or third arbitrator be appointed, it shall be lawful for any judge of any of the superior Courts of Law or Equity at Westminster, upon summons to be taken out by the party having served such notice as aforesaid, to appoint an arbitrator, umpire, or third arbitrator, as the case may be, and such arbitrator, umpire, or third arbitrator respectively shall have the like power to act in the reference and make an award as if he had been appointed by the consent of all parties.—(s. 12.)

When the reference is or is intended to be to two arbitrators, one appointed by each party, it shall be lawful for either party, in the case of the death, refusal to act, or incapacity of any arbitrator appointed by him, to substitute a new arbitrator, unless the document authorising the reference shew that it was intended that the vacancy should not be supplied; and if, on such a reference, one party fail to appoint an arbitrator either originally or by way of substitution as aforesaid, for seven clear days after the other party shall have appointed an arbitrator; and shall have served the party so failing to appoint with notice in writing to make the appointment, the party who has appointed an arbitrator may appoint such arbitrator to act as sole arbitrator in the reference, and an award made by him shall be binding on both parties as if the appointment had been by consent; provided, however, that the court or a judge may revoke such appointment on such terms as shall seem just.—(s. 13.)

When the reference is to two arbitrators, and the terms of the document authorising it do not shew that it was intended that there should not be an umpire, or provide otherwise for the appointment of an umpire, the two arbitrators may appoint an umpire at any time within the period during which they have power to make an award, unless they be called upon by notice as aforesaid to make their appointment sooner.—(s. 14.)

Every agreement or submission to arbitration by consent, whether by deed or instrument in writing not under seal, may be made a rule of any one of the superior courts of Law or Equity at Westminster, on the application of any party thereto, unless such agreement or submission contain words purporting that the parties intend that it should not be made a rule of court; and if in any such agreement or submission it is provided that the same shall or may be made a rule of one in particular of such superior courts, it may be made of that court only; and if, when there is no such provision, a case be stated in the award for the opinion of one of the superior courts, and such court be specified in the award, and the document authorising the reference have not, before the publication of the award to the parties, been made a rule of court, such document may be made a rule only of the court specified in the award; and when, in such case, the document authorising the reference is or has been made a rule or order of any one of such superior courts, no other of such courts shall have any jurisdiction to entertain any motion respecting the arbitration or award.—(s. 17.)

The Court of Chancery, in regard to its equitable jurisdiction, is not a Court of Record, but so far as concerns its Common Law jurisdiction, it is a Court of Record, and as such, it is apprehended (for there does not appear to be any decision on the point), that an application may be made to the Lord Chancellor to make a submission a rule of court; unless it be so, the language of the second section of 9 & 10 Wm. III. c. 15, would be unintelligible.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1560; 2 Story's Equity Juris.; Maddock's Equity, vol. ii., title, 'Arbitration;' and Russell on Arbitration, part i.

Arbitration of Exchange, where a merchant pays his debt in one country by a bill of exchange upon another.— 2 Mill's Pol. Econ. 168.

Arbitrator, or Arbiter, a disinterested person, to whose judgment and decision matters in dispute are referred.—Termes de la Ley, 50.

The civilians make a difference between arbiter and arbitrator, though both found their power in the compromise of the parties; the former being obliged to judge according to the customs of the law: whereas the latter is at liberty to use his own discretion, and accommodate the difference in that manner which appears most just and equitable.

An arbitrator ought to be an indifferent person between the disputants, and should be incorrupt and impartial.

An arbitrator's powers and duties are conferred and imposed by the submission. He is generally the final judge of law and facts; and although frequently a dictator, yet he should endeavour to arrive at his conclusions upon the same rules and principles which would have actuated the court for which he is substituted in coming to a decision. He is bound by the rules of law, and cannot award anything contrary thereto.

The submission determines the matters which are within an arbitrator's authority. His authority commences from the time of the agreement to refer being signed by all the parties.

An arbitrator upon any reference where the submission is or may be made a rule or order of any of the superior Courts of Law or Equity at Westminster, if he shall think fit, and if it is not provided to the contrary, may state his award, as to the whole or any part thereof, in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court, and when an action is referred, judgment, if so ordered, may be entered according to the opinion of the Court (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 5).

The proceedings upon any arbitration under the above act shall, except otherwise directed thereby or by the submission or document authorising the reference, be conducted in like manner, and subject to the same rules and enactments, as to the power of the arbitrator and of the Court, the attendance of witnesses, the production of documents, enforcing or setting aside the award, and otherwise, as upon a reference made by consent, under a rule of court or judge's order.—(s. 7.)

In any case where reference shall be made to arbitration, the court or judge shall have power at any time, and from time to time, to remit the matters referred, or any or either of them, to the reconsideration and redetermination of the arbitrator, upon such terms, as to costs and otherwise, as to the court or judge may seem proper.—(s. 8.)

The arbitrator must make his award under his hand (unless the submission or order contain a different limit of time) within three months after he shall have been appointed and shall have entered on the reference, or shall have been called upon to act by a notice in writing, from any party, but the parties may, by consent in writing, enlarge the term for making the award; and it shall be lawful for the superior court of which the submission, document, or order is or may be made a rule or order, or for any judge thereof, for good cause to be stated in the rule or order, for enlargement, from time to time to enlarge the term for making the award; and if no period be stated for the enlargement in such consent or order for enlargement, it shall be deemed to be an enlargement for one month; and in any case where an umpire shall have been appointed, it shall be lawful for him to enter on the reference in lieu of the arbitrators, if the latter shall have allowed their time or their extended time to expire without making an award, or shall have delivered to any party or to the umpire a notice in writing, stating that they cannot agree.—(s. 15.) See 1 & 2 Vict. c. 98, ss. 16 & 17, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, ss. 23 & 31.

As soon as the award is made, the arbitrator's authority is at an end.

The authority of the arbitrator cannot be revoked without the leave of the Common Law Court (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 39); but a submission by order of a Court of Equity is revocable at the will of either party. Marriage and death frequently operate a revocation, unless it be specially provided for, either in the submission or by the particular statute under which the arbitrator is acting.

It lies entirely with the arbitrator to regulate the proceedings in the reference, and the mode in which they are to be conducted; he must take care to perform any condition precedent to his entering upon the arbitration. Witnesses are compulsorily summoned by rule or order, and are duly sworn. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, ss. 40 & 41; and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 16; and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 7.

While an arbitrator can delegate a ministerial act, yet he cannot his judicial authority.

An arbitrator should always have a special authority given to him as to the costs.—Russ. on Arbitration, part ii.

Dr. Wilkins enlarged this collection in his work entitled Leges Anglo-Saxonicæ, containing all the Saxon laws extant, together with those ascribed to Edward the Confessor, in Latin; those of William the Conqueror, in Norman and Latin; and of Henry I., Stephen, and Henry II., in Latin.

Archbishop [fr. ertz-bischoff, Teut., archevêque, Fr., archiepiscopus, Lat., ἀρχίεπισκοπος, Gk., of ἄρχων, chief, and ἐπίσκοπος, bishop, of επισκοπεω, to take care of]. The chief of the clergy in his province; he has supreme power, under the Queen, in all ecclesiastical causes, and superintends the conduct of other bishops his suffragans. The archbishops are said to be inthroned, when they are vested in the archbishopric, whereas bishops are said to be installed. England has two archbishops, Canterbury and York. The Archbishop of Canterbury is styled Primate of all England, and the Archbishop of York Primate of England. Ireland has four, Armagh, Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam, of whom the former is Primate of all Ireland.—1 Bl. Com. 381.

Archdeacon [fr. ἄρχων, chief, and διακονέω, Gk., to minister], a substitute for the bishop, having ecclesiastical dignity and jurisdiction over the clergy and laity next after the bishop, either throughout the diocese or in some part of it only. He visits his jurisdiction once every year, and has a Court where he may inflict penance, suspend or excommunicate, and hear ecclesiastical causes, subject to an appeal to the bishop, by 24 Henry VIII. c. 12. He examines candidates for holy orders, and inducts clerks, upon receipt of the bishop's mandate. Wood's Inst. 30. The Law styles him the bishop's vicar or vicegerent.

Archery, a service of keeping a bow for the lord's use in the defence of his castle.—Co. Litt. 157.

Arches Court [fr. curia de arcubus, Lat.], a court of appeal belonging to the Archbishop of Canterbury, the judge of which is called the Dean of the Arches, because his court was anciently held in the church of Saint Mary-le-Bow (Sancta Maria de arcubus), so named from the steeple, which is raised upon pillars, built archwise, like so many bent bows. It was until recently held, as also were the other principal spiritual courts, in the hall belonging to the College of Civilians, commonly called Doctors' Commons. It is now held in Westminster Hall. Its proper jurisdiction is only over the thirteen peculiar parishes belonging to the archbishop in London, but the office of Dean of the Arches having been for a long time united to that of the archbishop's principal official, the Judge of the Arches, in right of such added office, receives and determines appeals from the sentences of all inferior ecclesiastical courts within the province. There was formerly an appeal to the King in Chancery, or to a Court of Delegates, appointed under the Great Seal by 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19, as supreme head of the English church, instead of to the Bishop of Rome, who originally exercised the jurisdiction; but now the appeal is to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, under 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 92, and 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 41. A suit is commenced in the Ecclesiastical Court by citing the defendant to appear, and exhibiting a libel containing the complaint against him, to which he answers. Proofs are then adduced, and the judge, upon hearing the arguments of advocates, pronounces his decree, which is then carried into effect. Consult Burn's Ecclesiastical Law.

Archives [fr. arca, Lat. a chest, or ἀρχεῖον, Gk. a council-house], a chamber or place where ancient records, charters, and evidences belonging to the Crown, the Courts of Chancery and Exchequer, or to a community, city, or family, &c., are kept. It is sometimes used for the writings themselves, thus we say the archives of a college, a monastery, &c. Cowel.

A rescriptis valet argumentum. Co. Litt. 11. (An argument drawn from rescripts is sound.) A rescript is a decision of the Pope or Emperor on a difficult or doubtful point of law.

Argadia or Argathalia, Argyleshire in Scotland.

Argent, silver, sometimes called Luna in the Arms of Princes, and Pearl in those of peers. As silver soon becomes tarnished, it is generally represented in painting by white. In engraving it is known by the natural colour of the paper.—Heral. Term.

Argentarius, a money dealer or banker.

Argentum Album, white money, silver coin, or pieces of bullion which anciently passed for money.—Spelm.

Argentum Dei, God's money, i. e. money given in earnest upon the making of any bargain, hence arles, earnest.—Blount.

Argil or Argoil [fr. argilla, Lat.], clay, lime, and sometimes gravel, also the lees of wine gathered to a certain hardness.—Law Fr.

Argument, in rhetoric and logic, an inference drawn from premises, the truth of which is indisputable, or at least highly probable. In reasoning, Locke observes that men ordinarily use four sorts of arguments. The first is to allege the opinions of men, whose parts and learning, eminency, power, or some other cause, have gained a name, and settled their reputation in the common esteem, with some kind of authority; this may be called argumentum ad verecundiam. The second is to require the adversary to admit what they allege as a proof, or to require a better; this he calls argumentum ad ignorantiam. The third is to press a man with consequences drawn from his own principles or concessions; this is known by the name of argumentum ad hominem. The fourth the using proofs drawn from any of the foundations of knowledge or probability; this he calls argumentum ad judicium, and he observes that it is the only one of all the four that brings true instruction with it, and advances us in our way to knowledge.

Argumenta ignota et obscura ad lucem rationis proferunt et reddunt splendida. Co. Litt. 395.—(Arguments bring things hidden and obscure to the light of reason, and render them clear.)

Argumentativeness, reasoning in a pleading or affidavit.

Argumentosus, ingenious. Neub. l. i. c. 14.

Argumentum ab impossibili plurimum valet in lege. Co. Litt. 92.—(An argument deduced from an impossibility greatly avails in law.)

Argumentum ab auctoritate est fortissimum in lege. Co. Litt. 254.—(An argument from authority is most powerful in law.)

Argumentum ab inconvenienti est validum in lege; quia lex non permittit aliquod inconveniens. Co. Litt. 258.—(An argument from that which is inconvenient is good in law; because the law will not permit any inconvenience).

Argumentum à divisione est fortissimum in jure. 6 Co. 60.—(An argument from division is most powerful in law.)

Argumentum à majori ad minus negativè non valet; valet è converso. Jenk. Cent. 281.—(An argument from the greater to the less is of no force negatively, affirmatively it is.)

Argumentum à simili valet in lege. Co. Litt. 191.—(An argument from a like case avails in law.)

Ariconium, Kenchester, near Hereford.

Arida Villa de, Drayton, or Dreydon, in Shropshire.

Arierban or Arriere-Ban [according to Casseneuve, ban denotes the convening of the noblesse or vassals, who held fees immediately of the Crown, and arriere, those who only held of the Crown mediately], an edict of the ancient kings of France and Germany, commanding all their vassals, the noblesse, and the vassals' vassals, to enter the army, or forfeit their estates on refusal.—Spelm.

Arietum levatio, an old sportive exercise, supposed to be the same with running at the quintain.—Cowel.

Aristocracy [fr. ἄριστος, greatest, and κρατέω, Gk. to govern], a form of government which is lodged in a council composed of select members or nobles, without a monarch, and exclusive of the people; also a privileged class of persons or political party in a state.—Paley's Polit. Phi.; Brougham's Polit. Phi.

Aristo-democracy, a form of government composed of nobles and commonalty.

Arles, earnest.

Arma in armatos sumere jura sinunt. 2 Jus. 574.—(The laws permit the taking up of arms against armed persons.)

Arm of the Sea, a bay, road, creek, cove, port, or river, where the water, whether salt or fresh, ebbs and flows.

Arma dare, to dub or make a knight. The word 'arma' is here rendered a sword, although a knight was sometimes made by giving him the whole armour.—Ken. Paroch. Antiq. 288.

Arma libera (free arms). When a servant was set free, a sword and lance were usually given to him.—Leg. Wil. c. 65.

Arma moluta (arma emolita), sharp weapons that cut, in contradistinction to such as are blunt which only break or bruise.—Fleta, 1. 1, c. 33. par. 6.

Arma mutare, to change arms, a ceremony observed in confirmation of a league or friendship.—Blount.

Arma reversata, reversed arms, a punishment for a traitor or felon.—Cowel.

Armaria. See ALMARIA.

Armiger, an esquire. A title of dignity belonging to gentlemen who bear arms.—Ken. Paroch. Antiq. 576.

Armiscara, an ancient mode of punishment, which was to carry a saddle at the back as a token of subjection.—Spelm.

Armistice, a cessation of hostilities between belligerents.

Armorial bearings, a device depicted on the (now imaginary) shield of one of the nobility, of which gentry is the lowest degree. The criterion of nobility is the bearing of arms or armorial bearings received from ancestry. There is nothing, however, to prevent persons assuming arbitrary insignia and armorial bearings to which they are not entitled; and all persons entitled to bear arms can register their genealogies and families at the Herald's College, Bennet's Hill, London, on payment of a moderate fee, the heralds being the examiners of these matters and the recorders of genealogies. The 43 Geo. III. c.c161, imposes an assessed tax upon armorial bearings, whether borne on plate, carriages, seals, or in any other way. The present tax is as follows:—Any person using or wearing any armorial bearing where such person shall be chargeable with the duty for any carriage, at the rate of 3*l.* 10*s.* to pay annually 2*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.*, where such person shall not be so chargeable, 13*s.* 2*d.*—See Planche's Pursuivant of Arms.

Armorum appellatione, non solum scuta et gladii, et galeæ, sed et fustes et lapides continentur. Co. Litt. 162.—(Under the name of arms are included not only shields and swords and helmets, but also clubs and stones.)

Armour, and Arms, things which a person wears for defence, or takes in hand, or uses in anger, to strike or cast at another. Arms are also insignia, i. e. ensigns of honor, which were formerly assumed by soldiers of fortune, and painted on their shields to distinguish them, the ancient coat of mail not being a mark of distinction from its covering the whole body. King Richard I., during his crusade, made arms hereditary. Every subject in this realm has a right, springing from the indigenous principle of personal liberty, to carry arms for defence suitable to his condition and degree, and allowed by law, and this right is embodied in the Bill of Rights, 1 W. & M. c. 2, s. 2. The 2 Edw. III. c. 3, prohibits persons going armed under circumstances which may tend to terrify the people or indicate an intention of disturbing the public peace. The 60 Geo. III. c. 1, prohibits the training of persons without lawful authority to the use of arms, and authorises any justice of the peace to disperse any assembly of persons that he may find engaged in such occupation, and to arrest any of the persons present. Power is vested in the Crown, by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 104, to prohibit the exportation of arms, ammunition, and gunpowder out of this kingdom, and to license the importation of gunpowder for the use of the royal stores. As to arms in Ireland, see 1 W. IV. s. 44, and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 74.

Army, [fr. armée, Fr.], the military force of a country. The first instance of a standing army in Europe are the Companies of Ordonnance of Charles VII. of France. History teaches us that it is in the nature of sovereigns to love power, and of armies to obey sovereigns. Hence the constitutional jealousy of the military power of the Crown, and the safeguard provided by our great charters against any attempt by ill-advised sovereigns to destroy the liberties of their country. It is invariably announced by the Annual Mutiny Act, that the raising and keeping of a standing army within the United Kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with the consent of Parliament, is against law, 1 W. & M. s. 2, c. 2. Thus, while the sovereign has the sole prerogative of raising and regulating our fleets and armies, the Parliament retains the power of voting the supplies, without which they could could not be maintained. The Act of the last session upon this subject is 25 & 26 Vict. c. 5, which recites that it is adjudged necessary (and it has been necessary ever since A.D. 1689) that a body of forces shall be continued for the safety of the United Kingdom, the defence of the possessions of Her Majesty's Crown, and the preservation of the balance of power in Europe, and that the whole number of such forces should consist of 145,450 men, exclusive of 6,688 officers and men, being the depôts of regiments in India stationed in Great Britain, and exclusive of the officers and men belonging to the regiments and other corps employed in Her Majesty's East Indian possessions, but including the officers and men of the troops and companies recruiting for those regiments and corps. As to the limit of European troops of the Indian army, see 22 & 23 Vict. c. 27, & 23 & 24 Vict. c. 100, & 25 Vict. c. 5. Consult M'Arthur or Simmons on Courts Martial.

Arnaldia, a disease that makes the hair fall off, otherwise called alopecia, because foxes are subject to it.—Rog. Hoved. 693.

Arnalia, arable grounds.—Domesday, tit. Essex.

Aromatarius, a word often used for a grocer, but not held good in law proceedings.—1 Vent. 142.

Arpen or Arpent, an acre or furlong of ground. According to Domesday-Book 100 perches make an arpent.—Blount.

Arpentator, a measurer or surveyor of land. Cowel.

Arquebuss [fr. haeck-buyse, haeck-busse, Du., properly a gun fired from a rest, from haeck, the hook or forked rest on which it is supported, and busse; Germ., büchse, a fire-arm. From haecke-busse, it became harquebuss, and in It., archibuso or arcobugia, as if from arco, a bow. In Scotch it was called a hagbut of croche; Fr. arquebus à croc., Jamie., Wedgw.], a short-hand gun, a caliver or pistol mentioned in some of our ancient statutes.—Fr. Law.

Arrack, a spirit procured from distillation of the cocoa-nut tree, rice, or sugar-cane, and imported from India, upon which a duty is payable.

Arraiatio peditum, arraying of foot soldiers. 1 Edw. II.

Arraiers, officers who had the care of the soldiers' armour, and whose business it was to see them duly accoutred. Commissioners were afterwards appointed for the same purpose. Blount.

Arraign, [fr. arraisonner, aresner, aregnir, arraigner, old Fr. i. e. ad rationem ponere, Lat. to call one to account], to bring a prisoner to the bar of the court to answer the matter charged upon him in the indictment. The arraignment of a prisoner consists of three parts, (1) calling on him by name to hold up his hand or otherwise making it appear that he is the party indicted. Holding up the hand is a mere ceremony, and is frequently dispensed with, it being only necessary for the prisoner to admit that he is the person indicted. (2) Reading the indictment to him distinctly in English, that he may fully understand the charge. (3) Demanding whether he be guilty or not guilty, and entering his plea, and then demanding how he will be tried, the common answer to which is, By God and my country. The pleas upon arraignment are either the general issue i.e. not guilty, or a plea in abatement or in bar, or the prisoner may demur to the indictment, or he may confess the fact, upon which the Court proceeds immediately to judgment, 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 1. But if the prisoner 'shall stand mute of malice, or will not answer directly to the indictment or information, in every such case it shall be lawful for the Court, if it shall so think fit, to order the proper officer to enter a plea of "not guilty" on behalf of such person, and the plea so entered shall have the same force and effect as if the person had so pleaded the same.' (s. 2.)—2 Hale's P. C. 151; 4 Bl. Com. 322; Hawk. P. C. c. 28, s. 1.

Arrameur, an ancient port-officer, whose business was to load and unload vessels.

Arrangements between Debtors and Creditors, 7 & 8 Vict., c. 70, amended by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 147.

Arras, a marriage portion.—Spanish.

Array [fr. arredare, It. to get ready], to rank or set forth a jury of men impanelled upon a cause. To challenge the array of the panel is at once to except against all persons arrayed or impanelled, in respect of partiality or some default in the sheriff.—Co. Litt. 156. If the sheriff be of affinity to any of the parties, or if any one or more of the jurors are returned at the nomination of either party, or for any other partiality, the array shall be quashed.

Array, military commission of. Previous to the reign of Henry VIII., in order to protect the kingdom from domestic insurrections or the prospect of foreign invasions, it was usual from time to time for our princes to issue commissions of array, and send into every county officers in whom they could confide, to muster, array, or set in military order the inhabitants of every district; the form of the commission was settled by 5 Hen. IV., so as to prevent the insertion therein of any new penal clauses. Rushworth, pt. 3, pp. 662, 667.

Arrears, or Arrearages, money unpaid at the due time; as rent behind; the remainder due after payment of a part of an account; money in the hands of an accounting party. Cowel.

Arrectatus, one suspected of a crime.—Offic. Coronat.

Arrected, reckoned, considered.—1 Inst. 173 b. & n.

Arrenatus, arraigned, accused.—Rot. Parl. 21 Edw. I.

Arrendare, to let lands yearly.

Arrentation, [fr. arrendar, Span.], licensing the owner of lands in a forest, to enclose them with a low hedge and small ditch, according to the assize of the forest, under a yearly rent. Saving the arrentations, is reserving a power to give such licences.—Ordin Forestæ, 34 Edw. I. s. 5.

Arrest [fr. restare, Lat. arrestare, It. arrester, Fr. to bring one to stand], the restraining of the liberty of a man's person in order to compel obedience to the order of a court of justice, or to prevent the commission of a crime, or to ensure that a person charged or suspected of a crime may be forthcoming to answer it. Arrests are either in civil or criminal cases; civil arrests must be effected, in order to be legal, by virtue of a precept or writ issued out of some Court, but every person has authority to arrest criminals without warrant or precept.—Termes de la Ley, 52. The abuses of gaolers and sheriffs' officers towards prisoners are guarded against by 32 Geo. III. c. 28; the chief provisions of which are that an officer shall not carry a prisoner to any tavern, &c., without his consent, nor charge him for any liquor but such as he shall freely call for, nor demand for caption or attendance any other than his legal fee, nor exact any gratuity-money, nor carry his prisoner to gaol within twenty-four hours after his arrest, unless the prisoner refuse to go to some safe house (except his own), of his own choosing. Nor shall any officer take for the diet, lodging, or expenses of a prisoner, more than shall be allowed by an order of Sessions. Bailiffs must show a copy of the writ to the prisoner, and permit perusal of it, and the prisoner may send for his own victuals, bedding, &c. The two great statutes for securing the liberty of the subject against unlawful arrests and suits are Magna Charta and Habeas Corpus Act, 31 Car II. c. 2, which is amended and enforced by 56 Geo. III. c. 100. As to those persons who are privileged from arrest, read 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 683, et seq. The 22 & 23 Vict. c. 57, limits the power of arrest by County Court Judges.

Arrest of judgment. An unsuccessful defendant may move that the judgment for the plaintiff be arrested or withheld, notwithstanding a verdict given, on the ground that there is some substantial error appearing on the face of the record which vitiates the proceedings. Judgment may be arrested for good cause in criminal cases, if the indictment be insufficient.—3 Inst. 210; Step. Plead. 106. If the judgment be arrested each party pays his own costs.

By 15 & 16 Vict. c. 77, ss. 143, 144, when a motion in arrest of judgment is made, the plaintiff, by leave of the court, may enter a suggestion of matter which, if true, would remedy the defect in the record, to which the defendant may plead. The issue so raised may be tried as in ordinary cases.

Arrest of inquest, pleading in arrest of taking the inquest upon a former issue, and showing cause why an inquest should not be taken.—Bro. tit. 'Repleader.'

Arrestandis bonis ne dissipentur, a writ which lay for a person whose cattle or goods were taken by another, who, during a contest, was likely to make away with them, and who had not the ability to render satisfaction.—Reg. Orig. 126.

Arrestando ipsum qui pecuniam recepit, a writ which issued for apprehending a person who had taken the king's prest money to serve in the wars, and then hid himself in order to avoid going.—Ibid. 24.

Arrestee, the person in whose possession a debt or property has been attached by arrestment.—Scotch Law.

Arrester, the person who procures an arrestment.—Ibid.

Arrestment, a process of attachment prohibiting a person, in whose hands a debitor's moveables are, to pay or deliver up the same to such debitor, till a creditor, who has procured an arrestment to be laid on, be satisfied, either by caution, i. e. security or payment, according to the grounds of arrestment.—Ibid.

Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causâ, a process to bring a foreigner within the jurisdiction of the Courts of Scotland, for a foreigner owes no obedience to the decisions of these courts, and, therefore, unless his person or effects be within such jurisdiction, a judgment of such court would be ineffective. This warrant then attaches a foreigner's person or arrests his goods, and these will not be released unless caution or security be given that the foreigner shall appear at all diets of court.—Ibid.

Arresto facto super bonis mercatorum alienigenorum, a writ against the goods of aliens found within this kingdom, in recompense of goods taken from a denizen in a foreign country, after denial of restitution.—Reg. Orig. 129. The ancient civilians called it clarigatio, but by the moderns it is termed reprisalia.

Arret [Fr.], a judgment, decree, or sentence.

Arretted, charged, imputed, or laid unto. The convening a person charged with a crime before a judge.—Staundf. Pl. Cr. 45. It is used sometimes for imputed or laid unto; as, no folly may be arreted to one under age.—Cowel.

Arrha, short for arrhabo [fr. ἀρράβων, Gk.], carnest, pledge, evidence of a completed bargain.—Jacob.

Arriage and Carriage, indefinite services formerly demandable from tenants, abolished by 20 Geo II. c. 50.

Arriere fee or fief, a fee dependent on a superior fee. These fees originated when dukes and counts, rendering their governments hereditary, distributed to their officers parts of the domain, and permitted those officers to gratify the soldiers under them in the same manner.—Encyc. Lond.

Arriere vassal, the vassal of a vassal.

Arrogation, the adoption of a person of full age, while adoption properly so called was of a person under full age.—Sand. Just. 124–126.

Arrows [fr. ör, gen. aurra Icel., ör-varnar, missiles, probably from their whirring through the air], all heads of, were to be well brazed and hardened at the point with steel, on pain of forfeiture and imprisonment, and marked with maker's name.—7 Hen. IV. c. 7.

Arrura [fr. ἄρουρα, Gk.], a day's ploughing. Paroch. Antiq. p. 41.

Arsenals [fr. arzana, darzena, tarzana, It.], dockyards, magazines, and other public stores. The wilful firing or destroying them is punished by death.— 12 Geo. III. c. 24.

Arsenic, regulating sale of.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 13.

Arser in le main, burning in the hand. The punishment of criminals, who had the benefit of clergy, which benefit was abolished by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28.—Termes de la Ley.

Ars fit quod à teneris primum conjungitur annis.—3 Inst. Epil.—(That becomes an art which is joined to us from our tender years.)

Arson [fr. ardeo, Lat., to burn], the malicious firing of a house or other building. The law upon this subject is to be found in 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 1–8. As to maliciously setting fire to ships, see ss. 42–4. See Leach's Hawk. P. C. i. c. 39; 1 Hale's P. C. 569; Archb. Consolid. Crim. Statutes, 341; and Greaves' Criminal Acts, 1861, 209 and 243.

Arsur in le main, burning in the hand, the punishment of criminals that had the benefit of clergy.—Termes de la Ley; Fr. phrase.

Arsura, the trial of money by fire, after it was coined.—Blount.

Art and Part, said of a person who has committed a crime, and was a contriver of it and acted his part in it. In the negative it is neither art nor part (nec artifex nec particeps), neither contriver nor partaker.—Scotch Law.

Art Unions, legalising.—9 & 10 Vict. c. 48, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 102. For protecting works of art, see 8 & 9 Vict. c. 44.

Arthel, Ardhel, or Arddelio, to avouch, as if a man were taken with stolen goods in his possession, he was allowed a lawful arthel, i.e. vouchee, to clear him of the felony, but provision was made against it by 28 Hen. VIII. c. 6.—Blount.

Article [articulus, Lat.], a complaint exhibited in the Ecclesiastical Court by way of libel.—3 Bl. Com. 109.

Articled Clerk, a pupil of an attorney or solicitor, who undertakes, by articles of clerkship, containing covenants, mutually binding, to instruct him in the principles and practice of the profession. As to the articles of service, their registration and enrolment, the mode of service, examination, admission, and fees, see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 86; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 88; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 73; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 63; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 81; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 39; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127; also Wharton's Manual for Articled Clerks, 9th ed.

Articles, divisions and paragraphs of a document or agreement. It is a common practice for persons to enter into articles of agreement, preparatory to the execution of a formal deed, whereby it is stipulated that one of the parties shall convey to the other certain lands, or release his right to them, or execute some other disposition of them.

Articles are therefore considered as a memorandum or minute of an agreement to make some future disposition or modification of real property. Such an instrument will create a trust or equitable estate, and a specific performance of it will be decreed in Chancery.

Articles are usually entered into for the purchase and sale of lands, for the taking and granting of leases, for making mortgages and settlements on marriage, and for forming partnerships. See IMPEACHMENT.

Articles, Lords of, a committee of the Scottish Parliament, which, in the mode of its election, and by the nature of its powers, was calculated to increase the influence of the Crown, and to confer upon it a power equivalent to that of a negative before debate. This system appeared inconsistent with the freedom of Parliament, and at the Revolution, the convention of estates declared it a grievance, and accordingly it was suppressed by the Act 1690, c. 3.

Articles of the Peace, a complaint exhibited either in the Queen's Bench at Westminster, Court of Oyer and Terminer, or Sessions of the Peace, when any one has just cause to fear that some one will burn his house, do him some corporal hurt, or procure a third person to perpetrate it. Upon articles setting forth the fact being sworn to by the complainant, sureties of the peace are taken for such a length of time as the Court shall think necessary, not being confined to a twelvemonth.—1 T. R. 696; Bac. Ab. tit. 'Surety of the Peace.'

Articles of Religion, commonly called the 39 Articles, a body of divinity drawn up by the convocation in 1562, and confirmed by James I. Consult Burnet on the 'Articles.' The 17 & 18 Vict. c 81, ss. 43, 44, has rendered unnecessary subscription to these articles, or any oath on matriculating or on taking a degree in the University of Oxford; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 88, ss. 45, 46, has enacted the same as to Cambridge.

Articles of Roup, the conditions under which property is exposed to sale by auction.—Scotch Law.

Articles of War, a code of laws for the regulation of the land forces, made in pursuance of the several annual acts against mutiny and desertion. Formerly there were also Articles of the Navy for the government of the royal fleet, embodied in 22 Geo. II. c. 33; but that statute and others amending it were repealed by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 123, 'The Naval Discipline Act, 1861.'

Articulate, to set down articles or conditions of agreement.

Articulate adjudication, used where there are more debts than one due to the adjudging creditor, when it is usual to accumulate each debt by itself, so that in case of an error in ascertaining or calculating one of the debts, the error may not reach any other debt.—Scotch Law.

Articuli cleri, statutes containing certain articles relating to the church, clergy, and causes ecclesiastical, made at Lincoln.—9 Edw. II. st. 1; 2 Reeves, c. xii. p. 290.

Articuli super chartas, the 28 Ed. I., st. 3. s. 2; Reeves, c. ix. p. 103; and c. xi. p. 233.

Artificers, persons who are masters of their art, and whose employment consists chiefly in manual labour.—5 Geo. IV. c. 97, and 6 Geo. IV. c. 105; Cunningham.

Artificial person, a corporation, a body of men, a company.

Artillery Ranges Act, 1862.—25 & 26 Vict. c. 36.

Arundel, the Earl of, the only peer who holds his earldom by prescription.

Arundinetum [fr. arundo, Lat.], a ground or place where reeds grow.—1 Inst. 4.

Arundinis vadum, the ancient name of Redbridge, in Hampshire.

Aruntina vallis, the ancient name of Arundel, in Sussex.

Arvil-supper, a feast or entertainment made at a funeral in the north of England; arvil bread is bread delivered to the poor at funeral solemnities, and arvil, arval, or arfal are the burial or funeral rites.—Cowel.

Arvonica, the ancient name of Carnarvonshire.

Arura, a day's work at plough.—Old Records. See ARRURA.

As, a pound weight, a unit, the whole of an inheritance. As to its divisions, see Sand. Just. 286; Cum. C. L. 139 n. (1); and Tayl. C. L. 491.

Ascendants, the progenitors of a family.

Ascesterium, a monastery.—Du Cange.

Ascriptitius, a naturalized foreigner.—Civ. Law.

Ash-Wednesday, the first day of Lent. It was anciently called Caput Jejunii, the head of the fast; or Dies Cinerum, the day of ashes. It took its name from an old custom of casting ashes upon penitents, and then thrusting them from the church.—Wheatley on the Com. Pray. c. v. s. 11.

Asper, a Turkish coin value 5 farthings.

Asphyxia [fr. ά not and σφύξις, Gk., pulse], suspended animation produced by the non-conversion of the venous blood of the lungs into arterial.—Dunglison.

Asportation, carrying away or removing goods. In all larcenies, there must be both a taking and a carrying away (cepit et asportavit).—4 Bl. Com. 431; Arch. Consolid. Crim. Stat. 153.

Assach, or Assath, a custom of purgation formerly used in Wales, by which an accused party cleared or purged himself of the accusation by the oaths of three hundred men. Abolished by 1 Hen. V. c. 6. Consult 27 Hen. VIII. c. 7.—Spelm.

Assart, or Essart [fr. Assartum in Lat.], an offence committed in the forest, by pulling up the trees by the roots, that are thickets and coverts for deer, and making the ground plain as arable land. It differs from waste, in that waste is the cutting down of coverts which may grow again, whereas assart is the plucking them up by the roots and utterly destroying them, so that they can never afterward grow. This is not an offence if done with license to convert forest into tillage ground. Consult Manwood's Forest Laws, part 1, p. 171.

Assassination [Hashish is the name of an intoxicating drug, prepared from hemp, in use among the natives of the East. Hence Arab 'Haschischin,' a name given to the members of a sect in Syria, who wound themselves up by doses of hashish to perform, at all risk, the orders of their Lord, known as the Sheik, or Old Man of the Mountain. As the murder of his enemies would be the most dreaded of these behests, the name of Assassin was given to one commissioned to perform a murder.—Wedgw.], murdering a person by lying in wait for hire.—Jacob.

Assault [fr. salire, Lat., to leap; saillir, assaillir, Fr., to assail; insultus, Lat.], an attempt or offer, with force and violence, to do a corporal hurt to another, as by striking at him with or without a weapon. No words, how provoking soever they be, will amount to an assault. Assault does not always necessarily imply a hitting or blow; because in trespass for assault and battery, a person may be found guilty of the assault, but not guilty of the battery. But battery always includes an assault.—1 Hawk. P.C. c. lxii. s. 1. As to aggravated assaults, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 43.

Assay [fr. exigere, Lat., to test] of weights and measures, the examining of weights and measures by clerks of markets, &c.—Blount.

Assayer of the King, an officer of the Mint, who tried the silver: he was indifferently appointed by the Master of the Mint and the Merchants, who carried silver thither for exchange.—Ibid.

Assayers, persons who test or prove metals, &c.

Assaysaire, to associate or take as fellow judges; used in old charters.—Cowel.

Assecurare, to secure by pledges; a solemn interposition of faith.—Hov. 1174.

Assedation, possession by a tack or lease, &c.—Scotch Law.

Assembly [fr. simul, Lat., together; hence ensemble, assembler, Fr., to draw together], General, the highest ecclesiastical court in Scotland, composed of a representation of the ministers and elders of the church, regulated by the Act 5th, Assembly, 1694.

Assembly, Unlawful, a meeting of three or more persons to do an unlawful act—3 Inst. 9; 1 Hawk. 155. See OFFENCE.

Assent, or Consent, agreeing to, or recognising a matter, as an executor's assent to a legacy, or the assent of a corporation to bye-laws, &c. See ROYAL ASSENT.

Assertory Covenant, an affirming promise under seal.

Assess [fr. assessum, Lat., setting a tax], to rate or ascertain.

Assessed taxes, duties charged upon persons in respect of articles in their use or keeping, as houses, servants, carriages, horses, dogs, hair-powder, armorial bearings, and game certificates. They are under the management of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.—12 & 13 Vict. c. 1, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, s. 9.

Assessor, an associate in judgment.

Assessors, literally those who sit by the side of another; persons appointed to ascertain and fix the value of taxes, rates, &c. Also persons sometimes associated with judges of courts to advise and direct the decisions of such judges.

Assets [fr. assetz, Nor.-Fr. i. e. satis, Lat.; assez, Fr., sufficient; in Old English it was commonly written asseth], the property of a deceased person, which is chargeable with, and applicable to, the payment of his debts and legacies.

Assets are either per descent, or real; or enter maines of an executor, or personal.

The following kinds of property, descended from a person seised in fee, are real assets:—freeholds; ancient demesnes; gavelkind; Borough-English; land descended from an ancestor, between whom and the heir there is an intermediate descent; lands descended on the part of the father and of the mother; a trust estate in fee-simple; tithes in the hands of laymen; advowson in fee appendant to a manor; advowson in fee in gross; whether the descent is of a trust estate, or the legal estate, equity will decree a sale, for the payment of judgment, and specialty debts; an estate pur autre vie limited to the ancestor and his heirs (1 Vict. c. 26, s. 6); a reversion in fee descended.—Ram on Assets, c. ix. s. 2.

The following kinds of property are personal assets:—an estate pur autre vie in freehold land and limited to the testator merely, or to him, his executors and administrators; a rent-charge pur autre vie, and limited to the grantee merely, without naming his heirs, executors, or administrators; an estate pur autre vie by a lease limited to A. and his heirs, and in a settlement made by A. converted into a personal estate, and afterwards devised by him; the right of the next presentation to a church, which is full, and which right has been granted to a person, who dies possessed of it; timber growing on the estate of a lunatic, and cut under an order of the Court of Chancery, founded on the report, that it would be for the benefit of the lunatic, and sold, the produce of the sale being paid into court on account of the lunatic; damages recovered by an executor in an action of trespass or trespass on the case (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 2); all personal property which devolves upon executors.—Ram on Assets, c. ix. s. 1.

Again, assets are distributed into legal and equitable; a distinction which is of importance, where there are specialty and simple contract debts, and the assets are insufficient to pay all the creditors in full; for there it becomes necessary to determine whether the assets are legal or equitable; as, in the former case, specialty creditors are entitled to priority; in the latter case, they will only be paid rateably with simple contract creditors.

The distinction is this—the property of a deceased person, which is in the hands of an executor or administrator virtute officii, and which can be reached for the purpose of satisfying a creditor by an action at law, is commonly termed legal assets, and will be applied, both at law and in equity, in the ordinary course of administration, which gives debts of a certain nature a priority over others; where, however, the assets are such as are recognised only in equity, they are termed equitable assets, and according to the well-known maxim that equality is equity, will, after satisfying those who have liens on any specific property, be distributed amongst the creditors of all grades equally, i.e. pari passu; or should the funds fall short, then rateably by way of dividend, without any regard to legal priority, all debts being equal when conscientiously considered. Equitable assets are of three kinds:—(1) those created by the acts of the testator, by charging or devising his land for payment of debts; (2) those which, not being recognised or attainable at law, are created in equity—such as an equity of redemption or the separate estate of a deceased wife; and (3) those so declared by statute.

The order in which Equity administers assets, partly legal and partly equitable, is this:—

(1st) Personalty, not exempted by a testator either by express words or manifest intent, from the payment of debts or not specifically bequeathed. Neither a charge upon land, nor a direction to sell, nor the creation of a term for payment of debts, will, however, exempt the personal estate.—Duke of Ancaster v. Mayer, 1 Bro. C. C. 454 (1783–1785); 1 White and Tudor's Lead. Cases, 415-439. The question, then, in each particular case resolves itself into this: Does there appear upon the whole testamentary disposition taken together an intention on the part of the testator so expressed as to convince a judicial mind that it was meant not merely to charge the real estate, but so to charge it as to exempt the personal estate? for it is not upon an intention to charge the real, but an expressed intention also to discharge the personal estate, that the question is to be decided, and every testator must be presumed to have been cognizant of the law.

This being legal assets, is to be applied in a course of administration for the payment of debts and legacies, according to their legal priorities.

After the exhaustion of the unexempted personalty, which is the natural and first fund for the payment of debts, then

(3rd) Real estates, devised or ordered to be sold for payment of debts, not merely charged with such payment, and whether the inheritance, or a term carved out of it, be so limited.

These being equitable assets are to be applied in the payment of debts, pari passu. And in case the creditors are paid out of the personal estate, in payment of legatees pro tanto, whether specific or otherwise.

(4th) Real estates descended, whether freehold or copyhold, and whether in the possession of the devisor at the date of his will, or subsequently acquired.

These being legal assets are to be applied to the payment of debts, and then of legacies pari passu, whether specific or pecuniary.

(5th) Realty or personalty devised or bequeathed, charged with and subject to the payment of debts, and specifically disposed of subject to such debts.

These being equitable assets are to be applied in payment of debts pari passu, and should the creditors be paid out of the personal estates, in payment of legatees pro tanto. Personalty given charged with debts seems equally liable with realty given so charged, in favor of general legatees, but as legal assets.

As to what amounts to a charge of debts, it is a rule, that a mere general direction by a testator, that his debts should be paid, effectually charges them upon his real estate. To this rule there are two exceptions: (1) Where the testator, after a general direction for payment of his debts, has specified a particular fund for the purpose; because the general charge by implication is controlled by the specific charge made in the subsequent part of the will; (2) Where the debts are directed to be paid by executors; for, in that case, it will be presumed, unless land be devised to them, that the debts are to be paid exclusively out of the assets which come to them as executors.

Where a testator gives his real estate to A. and his heirs, charged with his (the testator's) debts; that is a devise for a particular purpose, but not for that purpose only. If, however, the devise be, on trust to pay the testator's debts, that is a devise for a particular purpose, and nothing more. The wide difference of effect is this:—the first mode is a devise of an estate of inheritance for the purpose of giving the devisee the beneficial interest, subject to a particular purpose; the latter is a devise for a particular purpose with no intention to give him any beneficial interest. When, therefore, the whole legal interest is given for the purpose of satisfying trusts expressed, and those trusts do not exhaust the whole, so much of the beneficial interest as is not exhausted belongs to the heir; but where the whole legal interest is given for a particular purpose, with an intention to give to the devisee of the legal estate the beneficial interest, if the whole be not exhausted by the particular purpose, the surplus goes to the devisee, as it was intended to be given to him.—1 Hov. on Frauds, 360.

(7th) Real estate devised, not charged with debts, and personal estate specifically or demonstratively bequeathed, each contributing rateably, unless one is made primarily liable.

The 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 104, provides that when any person shall die seised of or entitled to any estate or interest in lands, tenements, or hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, or other real estate, whether freehold, customary-hold, or copyhold, which he shall not by his last will have charged with or devised subject to the payment of his debts, the same shall be assets to be administered in Equity for the payment of the just debts of such persons, as well debts due on simple contract as on specialty; and that the heir or heirs-at-law, customary heir or heirs, devisee or devisees of such debtor, shall be liable to all the same suits in Equity at the suit of any of the creditors of such debtor, whether creditors by simple contract or by specialty, as the heir or heirs-at-law, devisee or devisees of any person or persons who died seised of freehold estates was or were before the passing of the act liable to in respect of such freehold estates at the suit of creditors by specialty in which the heirs were bound: provided always, that, in the administration of assets by Courts of Equity under and by virtue of this act, all creditors by specialty in which the heirs are bound shall be paid the full amount of the debts due to them before any of the creditors by simple contract or by specialty in which the heirs are not bound shall be paid any part of their demands.

These assets are not administered in payment of legacies.

(8th) Realty and Personalty, which the testator had power to appoint, and which he has appointed by his will.

Where assets are partly legal, and partly equitable, though equity cannot take away the legal preference on legal assets, yet, if one creditor have been paid out of such legal assets, when satisfaction comes to be made out of equitable assets the court will postpone him till there is an equality in satisfaction to all other creditors, out of the equitable assets, proportionable to so much as the legal creditor has been satisfied out of the legal assets pursuant to the maxim that he who seeks equity shall do equity.

In commerce the term is used to designate the stock in trade and the entire property of all sorts, belonging to a merchant, or to a trading association.

Asseveration [fr. assevero, Lat., to affirm earnestly, fr. severus, serious], an appeal to a witness for the truth of a representation.

Assewiare, to draw or drain water from marsh grounds.—Cowel.

Assidere, or Assedare, to tax equally. Sometimes used in the sense of assigning an annual rent to be paid out of a particular farm, &c.—Mat. Par. anno 1232.

Assign, variously applied; generally, to set over a right to another, or appoint a deputy; specially, to set forth or point at, as to assign error, false judgment, &c. The judges are said to be assigned to take assizes.

Assignation, anything simply ceded, yielded, and assigned to another.—Scotch Law.

Assignatus utitur jure auctoris.—(The assignee makes use of the right of his assignor.)

Assignee, or Assign, a person appointed by another to do any act or perform any business; also a person, who takes some right, title, or interest in things by an assignment from an assignor. They are divided into: (1) assignees by deed, as when a lessee of a term sells or assigns it to another; and, (2) assignees by law, as when property devolves upon an executor, without any specific appointment, the executor is assignee in law to the testator. Assignees in Bankruptcy are those persons in whom the property of a bankrupt vests by virtue of their appointment. They are either official assignees, officers appointed by the Lord Chancellor, one of whom is nominated by the Court of Bankruptcy to act in each particular case, or creditors' assignees, elected by the creditors who prove debts under the bankruptcy to the value of 10*l.* or upwards, at the first public sitting, and confirmed by the commissioners. As to their duties, rights, and liabilities, consult Archbold's Law of Bankruptcy; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106; and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. As to assignees of insolvents, see 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 45, et seq.; and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 3.

Assignment, a transfer of the whole of a particular estate, the operative verbs being 'assign, transfer, and set over.' An assignee is liable for the breach of all covenants running with the land broken during the subsistence of the assignment, but he may assign over to a mere beggar to get rid of his continuing liability under such covenants; although he cannot thus escape from liability on his covenant for indemnity.

Assignment of dower, the ascertaining and setting out of a widow's portion of her deceased husband's realty for her thirds or dower.

Assignment of errors, the formal statement of the objection or error in the record complained of. See ERROR.

Assignor, a person who transfers or makes over property to another.

Assimulare, to connect highways.—Leg. Hen. I. c. 8.

Assisa, a law.—1 Reeves, c. iv., p. 215.

Assisa cadere, to be nonsuited, as when there is such a plain and legal insufficiency in an action, that the plaintiff cannot successfully proceed any further in it.—Fleta, lib. 4, c. xv.; Bracton, lib. 2, c. vii..

Assisa cadit in juratam, to submit a controversy to trial by jury.—Ibid.

Assisa continuanda, an ancient writ addressed to the justices of assize for the continuation of a cause, when certain facts put in issue could not have been proved in time by the party alleging them.—Reg. Orig. 217, and Termes de la Ley 'Continuance.'

Assisa Panis et Cerevisiæ, the power or privilege of assizing or adjusting the weight and measure of bread and beer.—51 Hen. III.; Cowel; 2 Reeves, c. viii. p. 56. Repealed by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 37.

Assisa proroganda, an obsolete writ, which was directed to the judges assigned to take assizes, to stay proceedings, by reason of a party to them being employed in the king's business.—Reg. Orig. 208.

Assisa utrum. See ASSISE DE UTRUM.

Assise, or Assize [fr. assideo, Lat. to sit together, whence assire, O. Fr. to set, assis, set, seated, sealed], a jury, who sit together for the purpose of trying a cause, or rather a court or jurisdiction, which summons a jury by a commission of assize to take the assizes. Hence the judicial assemblies held by the Queen's commission in every county as well to take indictments as to try causes at Nisi Prius, are commonly termed the assizes. There are two commissions. (I.) General, which is issued twice a year to the judges of the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster; two of whom are assigned to every circuit. See CIRCUITS. The judges have four several commissions: (1) Of oyer and terminer, directed to them and many other gentlemen of the county, by which they are empowered to try treasons, felonies, &c. This is the largest commission. (2) Of gaol delivery, directed to the judges and the clerk of assize associate, empowering them to try every prisoner in the gaol committed for any offence whatsoever, so as to clear the prisons. (3) Of Nisi Prius, directed to the judges, the clerks of assize and others, by which civil causes, in which issue has been joined in any one of the Superior Courts, are tried on circuit by a jury of twelve men of the county, in which the venue is laid, and on return of the verdict to the Court above, usually on the first day of the term following, the Court gives judgment on the fifth day after, allowing the four intermediate days to either party, if dissatisfied with the verdict, to move for a new trial. These causes by the practice of the courts are usually appointed to be tried at Westminster in some Easter or Michaelmas Term, by a jury returned from the county, in which is laid the venue, but with this proviso—'Nisi Prius' (unless before) the day appointed the judges of assize come into the county in question. This they are sure to do in the preceding vacation, and the trial is there had instead of at Westminster. (4) A commission of the peace, by which all justices are bound to be present at their county assizes, besides the sheriffs, to give attendance to the judges, or else suffer a fine. There used to be another commission, that of assise, directed to the judges and clerk of assise, to take assises and do right upon writs of assize brought before them, by such as were wrongfully thrust out of their possessions. These writs are abolished, and recourse is had to an action of ejectment, tried at Nisi Prius. (II.) The other division of commissions is special, granted to certain judges to try certain causes and crimes.—Bracton, lib. 3; 3 Bl. Com. 60, 269.

Assise of Arms, 27 Hen. II. A.D. 1181.

Assise of Bread, the sealed rate for the sale of bread.

Assise of Darrein Presentment, or last presentation; it lay when a person, or his ancestors, under whom he claims, had presented a clerk to a benefice, who was duly instituted, and afterwards, upon the next avoidance, a stranger presents a clerk, thus disturbing the right of the lawful patron; upon this, the patron issued this writ, directed to the sheriff to summon an assise or jury, to inquire who was the last patron that presented to the church now vacant, of which the plaintiff complains that he is deforced by the defendant.—Termes de la Ley, 473. It is, however, abolished, and recourse must be had to the action of quare impedit.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Assise of Mort d'Ancestor, a writ which lay where a person's father, mother, brother, sister, uncle, aunt, &c. died, seized of land and a stranger abated. It is abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Assise of Novel Disseisin, an action similar in its nature to the one above, although it differed in many points. It is abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Assise of the Forest, a statute touching orders to be observed in the king's forests.—Manwood, 35. For the learning of assise generally, consult Com. Dig. tit. 'Assise.'

Assise de Utrum, an obsolete writ, which lay for the parson of a church whose predecessor had alienated the lands and rents of it.—F. N. B. 48.

Assiser, an officer who has the care and oversight of weights and measures.

Assises de Jerusalem, a monument of feudal jurisprudence, composed by Gottfried of Bouillon, for the government of the Holy City after its conquest by the crusaders. It was revised in the 13th and 14th centuries for the use of the Latin kingdom of Cyprus.—1 Colq. R. C. L. s. 80, p. 86; 1 Hall. Lit. Hist. Eur. 28.

Assisors, Scottish jurors.

Assistance, Writ of, appears to have been first employed in the reign of James I.; from that time, though in general parlance it is said that the decree of the Court of Chancery acts only in personam, yet, if the possession of lands be decreed or ordered and the defendant refuse to perform the decree, the Court directs this writ of execution to the sheriff, to enforce its decree.—Consolid. Ord. xxix. r. 5.

Assistant-Judge of Middlesex Sessions, appointed by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71, may appoint a deputy.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, s. 14. See 22 & 23 Vict. c. 4.

Assistant Overseers, appointed by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 84 and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, ss. 61, 62.

Assisus, rented or farmed out for such an assize or certain assessed rent in money or provisions.—Blount.

Assithment [fr. ad and sithe, Sax., vice], a weregeld or compensation by a pecuniary mulct.—Cowel.

Assize. In the practice of the criminal courts of Scotland, the fifteen men who decide on the conviction or acquittal of an accused person are called the assize, though in popular language and even in statutes they are called the jury.

Associate, an officer in each of the Courts of Common Law. He is appointed by the chief judge of the court, and holds his office dum bene se gesserit (15 & 16 Vict. c. 73). His duties are to superintend the entry of causes; to attend the sittings at Nisi Prius, and there receive and enter verdicts; to draw up the posteas, and any orders of Nisi Prius.

Association, a writ or patent sent by the Crown to the justices appointed to take assizes to have others (serjeants-at-law, for instance) associated with them; it is usual where a judge becomes unable to attend to his circuit duties or dies.—Reg. Orig. 201. Also a public company or partnership.

The association of the people formed by 7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 27, s. 3, for the protection of the king and government, was put an end to by 1 Anne, st. 1, c. 22, s. 3.

Associations, Unlawful. See SOCIETIES.

Assoile [fr. absolvere, Lat.; absolver, absoiller, assoiller, O. Fr.], to deliver from excommunication; to acquit or absolve.—Staundf. Pl. Cr. 72.

Assoilzie, to acquit a defendant, or to find a person not guilty of a crime.—Scotch Law.

Assuetude, custom.

Assumpsit [fr. assumo, Lat. to take upon oneself]. The action of assumpsit, or, as it is usually denominated in practice, of promises, was originally a kind of action of trespass on the case; but in modern times it is treated as a substantive and independent species of action. It lies for the recovery of damages for loss or injury sustained by reason of the breach or non-performance of a promise, either expressed or implied, the promise not being under seal, but yet founded on a proper consideration.

The ordinary division of this action is into (1) common or indebitatus assumpsit, brought for the most part on an implied promise; and (2) special assumpsit, founded on an express promise.—1 Selw. N. P. 42; Steph. Plead. 18, 40.

Assumption, the day of the death of a saint, quia ejus anima in cælum assumitur (because his soul is taken into heaven).—Du Cange. Also a usurpation.

Assurance. See INSURANCE.

Assurances, the legal evidences of the transfer of property, called common assurances, by which every man's property is secured to him, and controversies, doubts, and difficulties prevented and removed.—2 Bl. Com. 294.

Assured, a person insured or indemnified against certain events.

Assurer, an insurer against certain perils and dangers; an underwriter; an indemnifier.

Assysers (jurors), persons who, in an inquest, serve a man, heir, or judge, the probation in criminal causes.—Scotch Law.

Assythment, a reparation made for mutilation or slaughter.—Ibid.

Assyth the King, to cause malefactors to pay a modified fine.—Ibid.

Asteism [fr. ἀστεῖος, Gk.], in rhetoric, an ingenious irony, or polite way of deriding another.

Aster, or homo aster, a resident.—Brit. 151.

Astipulation [fr. astipulor, Lat.], a mutual agreement, assent and consent between parties; also a witness or record.

Astrarius hæres [fr. astre, Fr., the hearth of a chimney], an heir apparent, who has been placed, by conveyance, in possession of his ancestor's estate, during such ancestor's lifetime.—Co. Litt. 8.

Astriction [fr. astrictio, Lat.] to a mill, a servitude, by which grain growing on certain lands or brought within them, must be carried to a certain mill to be ground, a certain multure or price being paid for the same.—Jacob.

Astrihilibet, a forfeiture of double the damage.

Astrum, a house or place of habitation.—Cowel.

A summo remedio ad inferiorem actionem, non habetur ingressus, neque auxilium.—Fleta, 1, vi.—(From the highest remedy to the lower action there is neither ingress nor assistance.)

Asyle, a sanctuary, or place of refuge for offenders to fly into.

Asylum [fr. Ἄσυλον, Gk., a place free from violence], a sanctuary of refuge, also a place set apart for the treatment and habitation of persons of unsound mind. See 16 & 17 Vict. cc. 96, 97; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 105; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 87.

Atains du fet [Fr.], convicted of the fact, caught by it, having it brought home to one.—Roquef; Wedgw.

Atavia, a great grandmother's grandmother.

Atavus, the great grandfather's or great grandmother's grandfather; a fourth grandfather. The ascending line of lineal ancestry runs thus:—Pater, Avus, Proavus, Abavus, Atavus, Tritavus, the seventh generation in the ascending scale will be Tritavi-pater, and the next above it Proavi-atavus.—Juv. Sat. iii. 312.

Ategar [fr. aeton, Sax., to throw, and gar, a weapon], a hand-dart.—Spelm.

Athanation, the ancient name of the island of Thanet, in Kent.

Athe, atha, or ath [Sax.], an oath.—Blount.

Athe, or adda, a privilege of administering an oath in cases of right and property.—Ibid.

Atheism, the disbelief of a God. The Scottish Law ranks it under the head of blasphemy, and punishes it with death.

Atheling. See ÆTHELING.

Athesis fluvium, the ancient name of the river Tees, in Cumberland.

Atia, an ancient writ of inquiry whether a person be committed to prison on just cause of suspicion.—Cowel; Ash.

Atilia, utensils or country implements.—Blount.

Atonement, an agreement, union, or reconciliation. The word seems to be compounded of at and one, as it were a making at one, and thence to have acquired the meaning of suffering the pains of whatever sacrifice is necessary to bring about a reconciliation.

Atrium, a court before a house, or a churchyard.—Cowel.

Attach [fr. attaccare, It., to fasten], to take or apprehend by commandment of a writ or precept. It differs from arrest, because it takes not only the body, but sometimes the goods, whereas an arrest is only against the person; besides, he who attaches keeps the party attached in order to produce him in court on the day named, but he who arrests lodges the person arrested in the custody of a higher power, to be forthwith disposed of.—Fleta, lib. 5, c. xxiv.

Attaché, a person associated with a foreign legation.

Attachiamenta bonorum, a distress formerly taken upon goods and chattels, by the legal attachiators or bailiffs, as security to answer an action for personal estate or debt.—Blount.

Attachiamenta de spinis et boscis, a privilege granted to the officers of a forest to take to their own use thorns, brush, and windfalls, within their precincts.—Kenn. Par. Antiq. 209.

Attachment, a process from a Court of Record, awarded by the judges at their discretion on a bare suggestion, or on their own knowledge, against a person guilty of a contempt, who is punishable in a summary manner. Contempts may be thus classed: (1) Disobedience to the Queen's Writs; (2) Contempts in the face of a court; (3) Contemptuous words or writings concerning a court; (4) Refusing to comply with the rules and awards of a court; (5) Abuse of the process of a court; and, (6) Forgery of writs, or any other deceit tending to impose on a court.—Leach's Hawk. P. Cr. c. xxii. s. 33.

Attachment, foreign, a process under which the goods of foreigners found in some liberty are taken to satisfy creditors.—Com. Dig. tit. 'Attachment, Foreign.' Also a judicial proceeding, by means of which a creditor may obtain the security of the goods or other personal property of his debtor, in the hands of a third person, for the purpose, in the first instance, of enforcing the appearance of the debtor to answer an action; and afterwards, upon his continued default, of obtaining the goods or property in satisfaction of the demand. It is also called garnishment.

Attachment of the Forest, one of the three courts formerly held in forests. The highest court was called Justice in Eyre's seat; the middle, the Swainmote; and the lowest, the Attachment.—Manwood, 90, 99.

Attachment of Privilege. When a person by virtue of his privilege, calls another into that court to which he himself belongs, to answer some action as an attorney, &c. It is also a power to apprehend a person in a privileged place.—Termes de la Ley, 59. The 2 Wm. IV. c. 39 (commonly called the Uniformity of Process Act), virtually abolished this proceeding, and the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, enacts that all personal actions in any of the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster shall be commenced by writ of summons.

Attainder [fr. attaindre, Fr. (attainder, O. Fr.—Roquef), attingo, Lat., which signify the apprehension of the object of a chase], the stain or corruption of the blood of a criminal capitally condemned: it is the immediate inseparable consequence by the common law, sentence of death being pronounced, or of outlawry for a capital offence. The criminal then becomes dead in law, technically called civiliter mortuus. It differs from conviction, in that it is after judgment, whereas, conviction is upon the verdict of guilty, but before judgment pronounced, and may be quashed upon some point of law reserved, or judgment may be arrested. The consequences of attainder are forfeiture of property and corruption of blood.—4 Bl. Com. 380.

A descendant may now trace through an attainted ancestor; for 'when the person from whom the descent of any land is to be traced shall have had any relation who, having been attainted, shall have died before such descent shall have taken place, then such attainder shall not prevent any person from inheriting such land who would have been capable of inheriting the same, by tracing his descent through such relation, if he had not been attainted, unless such land shall have escheated in consequence of such attainder, before the 1st of January, 1834.'—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, s. 10.

Attainte d'une cause [Fr.], the gain of a suit.

Attaint, Writ of, issued to inquire whether a jury of twelve men gave a false verdict, that so the judgment following thereupon might be reversed. This writ was abolished by 4 Geo. IV. c. 50, ss. 60, 61. A corrupt juror is punishable by fine and imprisonment, upon an indictment or information.

Attainture, legal censure.

Attal sarisin [i. e. the leavings of the Sarasins, Sassins, or Saxons], an old deserted mine, so called by the Cornish miners.—Cowel.

Attegia, a little house.—Blount.

Attempt [fr. tentare, Lat.; tenter, temter, tempter, O. Fr., to try], an endeavour to commit a crime or unlawful act.

Attendant, one who owes a duty or service to another, or depends upon another.—Termes de la Ley, 61.

Attendant Term, terms for years in real property are created for many purposes, e. g. to furnish money for the payment of debts, to secure rent-charges or jointures, to raise portions for younger children, daughters, &c. Now although the purpose for which the term was originally created has been satisfied or has failed, yet, not being surrendered, it continued to exist, the legal interest remaining in the trustees, to whom it was at its creation limited, or, if deceased, in their personal representatives, but the person entitled to the inheritance then became, according to equitable principle, entitled to the beneficial interest in such term, and the termor was held to be such person's trustee. This beneficial interest was subordinate to and merely attendant upon the higher estate possessed by the owner of the inheritance, and yet completely consolidated with it, following the inheritance in all the various modifications and changes to which it might be subjected by act of law or arrangements of the owner. The advantage of preserving these terms and assigning them to trustees (thus preventing the legal presumption of surrender), with an express declaration that they shall attend upon the inheritance was this: If it had at any time appeared that prior to the purchase or mortgage, but posterior to the creation of the term, there had been an intermediate alienation or incumbrance of the fee in favour of another person, to which the then trustee of the term had not been a party, and of which the purchaser or mortgagee had had no notice when he paid the purchase or mortgage-money, he would be protected against it, through the medium of the term so assigned, which being the elder title would have taken the priority in point of legal effect. Hence the expression 'protecting against mesne (middle) incumbrances.' The estate was thus defended from being defeated or injured by such titles or charges, however valid they might have been, or by any subsequent disposition of the vendor or mortgagor; it thus conduced to the safety of honest purchasers or mortgagees, to whom it afforded a protection not very unlike that of the Registry Acts; whereas, if he neglected to take such assignment he exposed himself to the risk of some other person (whose title or interest might even have been acquired subsequently to his own) obtaining the assignment of the term, and using such benefit to his detriment. Besides, by such assignment he could in many instances carry back his title to the possession for a much longer period than he could show a clear title to the inheritance, and thus a defective title might have been cured. It was sometimes usual, where an assignment of a term had been generally in trust to attend upon the inheritance, and the old trustees were approved of, and the new purchaser or mortgagee had the possession of all the title-deeds, to rely upon a declaration of trust of such term, but this was a dangerous practice, and for this simple reason:—a mere declaration of trust would not protect the inheritance against a subsequent bonâ fide purchaser or mortgagee without notice of it, who procured a proper assignment of the term to his own trustees. As to the point of notice of intermediate incumbrances, it was not necessary that a person should be unaffected with notice, when he procured an assignment of an outstanding term, if he had been without notice at the time of his purchase, mortgage, or other charge, for Equity allowed him in such case to avail himself of any protection against defect of title or charge, which he might have subsequently discovered; an outstanding term or legal estate being considered tabula in naufragio, to the full benefit of which the first who acquired it was entitled. There were instances in which a term became attendant on the inheritance by equitable construction, the great principle governing which was, that where a legal and equitable estate became vested in the same person, the one a term of years, and the other an estate of inheritance, though there could be no merger (as that can only occur upon the union of two estates of the same nature, i. e. both legal or both equitable, in the same person, in the same right, without any intermediate estate), yet, by analogy to the Common Law doctrine of merger, the term would have been considered in Equity as attendant, in the absence, of course, of any sufficient indication that the contrary was intended by the parties. For the authorities and arguments upon this subject, consult 3 Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers, tit. 'Assignment of Terms,' 10th edit.; Burt. Comp. pl. 914; 1 Step. Com. 378; 1 Saunders on Uses and Trusts; 316; and Watkins's Prin. of Conv. c. ii. As to the assignment of attendant terms, see 8 & 9 Vict. c. 112, which renders it unnecessary by abolishing them.

Attentates, proceedings in a court of judicature, pending suit, and after an inhibition is decreed and gone out. Those things which are done after an extra-judicial appeal may be styled Attentates.—Ayliffe.

Attermining, granting time for payment of a debt.—Blount; 27 Edw. I.

Attestation, testimony, evidence, justification, the execution of a deed or will in the presence of witnesses.—2 Bl. Com. 307.

Attestation clause, the sentence subscribed to a written instrument signed by the witnesses to its execution, stating that they have witnessed it.

Attested copy, a verified transcript of a document.

Attesting Witness, a person who has seen a party execute a deed, or sign a written agreement. He then subscribes his signature for the purpose of identification and proof at any future period.

Attic, Laws of Descent. For a notice of these, see Hale's History, p. 294.

Attile, the rigging or furniture of a ship.—Fleta, lib. 1, c. xxv.

Attornare rem, to turn over money or goods, i. e. to assign or appropriate them to some particular use or service.—Ken. Par. Antiq. 283.

Attornato faciendo vel recipiendo, an obsolete writ, which commanded a sheriff or steward of a county or hundred court to receive and admit an attorney to appear for the person who owed suit of court.—F. N. B. 156.

Attorney [fr. tournée, Fr.; or fr. attornatus, Mid. Lat., substituted], one who is appointed by another to do something in his absence, and who has authority to act in the place and turn of him by whom he is delegated. He is of two kinds.

(1) Attorney at Law, a public officer belonging to the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster, who conducts legal proceedings on behalf of others, called his clients, by whom he is retained: he answers to the Solicitor in the Courts of Chancery, and the Proctor of the Admiralty, Ecclesiastical, Probate, and Divorce Courts. It is a popular error (entertained, however, by many) that the term 'Solicitor' is more honourable than or superior to 'Attorney.' The late Lord Tenterden repeatedly animadverted upon the absurdity of using the term 'Solicitor' when applied to any one conducting an action or other proceeding in Courts of Law.

There is not any distinction whatever in the degree of respectability between them; in fact, both the terms are generally found combined in the same gentleman. Consult Merrifield's Law of Attornies; 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. c. v. tit. 'Attornies;' and especially the Attornies and Solicitors' Act, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.

(2) Attorney in Fact, including all agents employed in any business or to do any act in pais for another; also a person acting under a special agency, whose authority must be expressed by deed, commonly called a power of attorney.—1 Bac. Abr. tit. 'Attorney.'

Attorney of the Duchy Court of Lancaster, the second officer in that Court next to the Chancellor, whose assessor he is.—Blount. He is styled 'Attorney-general.'

Attorney of the Wards and Liveries was the third officer of the Duchy Court.—Ibid.

Attorney-General, a great officer of state, appointed by letters-patent, and the legal representative of the Crown in the Courts of Law and Equity. He exhibits informations, prosecutes for the Crown in criminal matters, files bills in the Exchequer in revenue causes, and informations in Chancery, where the Crown is interested.—Termes de la Ley, 63; 4 Reeves, c. xxv. p. 122. The Prince of Wales and a Queen-Consort have each an Attorney-General.

Attorneyship, the office of an agent or attorney.—4 Reeves, c. xxxii. p. 574.

Attornment [fr. tourner, Fr., to turn], the acknowledgment of a new lord on the alienation of land, and the assent or agreement of the tenant to attorn, as 'I become tenant to the purchaser.'—Co. Litt. 309. The 4 Anne, c. 16, ss. 9, 10, enacted that all grants and conveyances of manors, lands, rents, reversions, &c. should be good without the attornment of the tenants, but notice of the grants must be given to the tenants, before which they shall not be prejudiced by the payment of any rent to the grantor, or of breach of the condition for non-payment; and by 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 11, attornments made by tenants to strangers claiming title to the estate of their landlord shall be null and void, and their landlord's possession not affected thereby; but it does not extend to vacate any attornment made pursuant to a judgment at law, or with the consent of the landlord, or to a mortgagee on a forfeited mortgage.—Woodf. Land and Ten. by Horn, 221.

Attraper, taken or seized.—Law Fr.

Attrebatii, the ancient name of the inhabitants of Berkshire.

Avage, or Avisage, a rent or payment by tenants of the manor of Writtle, in Essex, upon St. Leonard's day, the 6th of November, for the privilege of pannage in the lord's woods.—Blount.

Avail [fr. valoir, Fr.; valere, Lat., to be worth], profit of land.

Avail of Marriage [fr. valor maritagii, Lat.], the right of marriage, which the lord or guardian in chivalry had of disposing of his infant ward in matrimony. A guardian in socage had also the same right, but not attended with the same advantage.—1 Step. Com. 194.

Avails, profits or proceeds.

Aval [Fr.], surety for payment.

Avalonia, the ancient name of Glastonbury, in Somersetshire.

Avalum, a written guarantee.

Aubaine. See DROIT D'AUBAINE.

Au besoin (in case of need).

Auca, de, the ancient name of Orve.

Auctionariæ, catalogues of goods for public sale or auction.

Auctionarii, sellers, regraters, retailers, more properly brokers.—Jacob.

Auctioneers, licensed agents appointed to sell property and to conduct sales or auctions. Consult St. Leon, Vend. and Pur. 34, et seq., for the extent of their power and authority as to real property. They differ from brokers, in that the latter may both buy and sell, whereas auctioneers can only sell; also brokers may sell by private contract only, and auctioneers by public auction only. Auctioneers can only sell goods for ready money, but factors may sell upon credit.

An auctioneer is deemed the agent of both parties; he can bind virtute officii the seller and the purchaser of realty by his memorandum of the sale under the Statute of Frauds; but he is only the agent of the seller at the sale.

The 8 Vict. c. 15, repeals the duties of excise on sales by auction, and imposes a new duty on auctioneers' licenses in the United Kingdom. The 1st sec. repeals all existing duties, and a duty of 10*l.* is imposed on all auctioneers' licenses throughout the kingdom, which are to be renewed annually (ss. 2—4). The 6 Geo. IV. c. 81, s. 8, is repealed by s. 6, which substitutes one uniform license. Sec. 7 enacts, that every auctioneer, before he commences any sale, shall affix, in some conspicuous part of the auction-room, a ticket or board, containing his full Christian and surname and place of residence, otherwise to forfeit 20*l.* He must produce his license on demand, or make a deposit of 10*l.* on pain of one month's imprisonment.

Auction, signifies generally an increasing, an enhancement, and hence is applied to a public sale of property usually conducted by biddings, which augment the price. A spear used to be raised by the Romans as the sign of a public auction.—Livy, xxiii. 37; Smith's Dict. of Antiq. See DUTCH AUCTION.

Auctor, a seller, or vendor.

Auctoritates philosophorum, medicorum, et poetarum, sunt in causis allegandæ et tenendæ.—Co. Litt. 264.—(The opinions of philosophers, physicians, and poets, are to be alleged and received in causes.)

Aucupia verborum sunt judice indigna.—Hob. 343.—(Catching at words is unworthy of a judge.)

Audience, a hearing; an interview.

Audience Court, belonging to the Archbishop of Canterbury, having the same authority with the Court of Arches, but inferior to it in dignity and antiquity. The Dean of the Arches is the official auditor of the Audience. The Archbishop of York has also his Audience Court.—Termes de la Ley, 63.

Audiendo et terminando, a writ or commission to certain persons to appease and punish any insurrection, or great riot.—F. N. B. 110.

Audit, an examining of accounts.

Auditâ querelâ defendentis [Lat.] (so called because a plaintiff cannot have it) is a writ commencing an equitable action after an adverse judgment recovered, for the purpose of preventing the unconscientious demand of a double satisfaction. It is in the nature of a trespass, and seems to have been invented, lest in any case there should be an oppressive defect of justice, where the party has a good defence, but had not, nor has any other means to take advantage of it. It is directed to the court, stating that the complaint of the defendant hath been heard (auditâ querelâ defendentis), and then setting out the matter of the complaint, it enjoins the court to call the parties before it, and, having heard their allegations and proofs, to cause justice to be done between them. It does not lie, where there is any other remedy at law, either by plea or otherwise; and only the party grieved can bring it, which he can do of common right, and ex debito justitiæ. The writ is sometimes judicial, issuing out of the same court in which the record, upon which it is founded, remains; and sometimes original, issuing out of Chancery, and returnable into such court.

The process in auditâ querelâ, when it is grounded on a matter of fact, or the party is not in execution, or it is issued quia timet, is a venire facias, distringas, alias and pluries distringas, and if non est inventus or nihil be returned, the plaintiff in the writ may have a capias against the defendant in the writ. But when the writ is founded on a record, or the party is in execution, the process is scire facias, and bail must be given when the party in prison seeks to be discharged. An auditâ querelâ not preventing the issuing of execution, a supersedeas should be forthwith moved for. Where the defendant confesses the matter alleged, the plaintiff has judgment and discharge by confession; but if the defendant deny it, the parties proceed to issue in fact or in law, as in other cases. It is said that costs are not recoverable in this action. By the indulgence of the courts, a summary relief upon motion is in most cases of evident oppression granted, and this occasioned the remedy by auditâ querelâ to be seldom resorted to.—2 Saund. 137 n., et seq.; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 84. By Rules H. T. 1853, r. 79, no writ of auditâ querelâ is allowed, unless by rule of court or order of a judge.

Auditor [Lat.], one who examines accounts and evidences of expenditure; an officer of the Royal household, or of some other great establishment, who examines the accounts of all under officers, and keeps a general book, shewing the difference between their receipts and charges and their several allowances, commonly called allocations; as the auditors of the Exchequer take the accounts of the receivers, who collect the revenues.—4 Inst. 106. Receivers-general of fee-farm rents, &c., are also termed auditors, and hold their audits for adjusting the accounts at certain times and places. There are also auditors assigned by the Court of Audit, and also to settle accounts in actions of account, &c.—1 Brown, 24.

Auditor of the Receipts, an officer of the Exchequer, who files the teller's bills, and having made an entry of them, he gives the Lord Treasurer, &c., a weekly account of the money received.—4 Inst. 107; 46 Geo. III. c. 1.

Auditores, the catechumens, or those newly-instructed in the mysteries of the Christian religion before admission to baptism. Auditorium, now called the nave, is the place in the church where they stand to hear and be instructed.—Blount.

Auditors of the Imprest, officers in the Exchequer, who formerly had the charge of auditing the accounts of the customs, naval and military expenses, &c., now performed by the Commissioners for auditing public accounts. Prac. Exc. 83.

Avenage, a certain quantity of oats paid by a tenant to his landlord as a rent or in lieu of some other duties.—Blount.

Avenor, an officer belonging to the royal stables, who provided oats for the horses.—13 Car. II. c. 8.

Aventuræ, adventures or trials of skill at arms; military exercises on horseback.—Brady's Append. Hist. Eng. 250.

Aventure, or Adventure, a mischance causing the death of a man, as where a person is suddenly drowned or killed by any accident, without felony.—Co. Litt. 391.

Aver [fr. avoir, Fr.; habere, Lat., to have; or haber, Sp.], a beast of the plough; money.

Aver (to) [fr. avérer, Fr.; fr. verus, Lat.], to maintain as true.

Avera, a day's work of a ploughman, formerly valued at 8*d.*—Domesday Book.

Average, a medium, a mean proportion, used in five senses:—

(2) A contribution, which merchants and others make towards their losses, when they have their goods cast into the sea, for the safety of a ship, or of the other goods and lives of persons during a tempest. It is apportioned and allotted after the rate of every man's goods carried. So if goods insured for a voyage reach their destination, but are in some degree injured by any of the accidents insured against, this is an average loss, and the insurers are bound to compensate the insured in the proportion which the average loss bears to the whole insurance.—Park on Insurance. In this sense average is derived fr. haferei, Germ., sea-damage, fr. haf, hav, Scan., the open sea. This in Fr. became avaris, decay of merchandise; avarie, damage suffered by a ship. Avaria, Ital., is the calculation and distribution of the loss arising from goods thrown overboard.—Wedgw.

(3) Also a small duty paid to masters of ships, when goods are sent in another man's ship, for their care of the goods over and above the freight.—2 Sel. Nisi Prius, 952.

(4) Stubble, or remainder of straw and grass left in corn fields after harvest. In Kent it is called gratten, and in other parts roughings.

(5) Average prices, such as are computed on all the prices of any article sold within a certain period or district.

A verbis legis non est recedendum.—5 Co. 118. (From the words of the law there should not be any departure.)

This maxim directs the construction to be put upon Acts of Parliament, against the express letter of which the Courts will not sanction any interpretation, for the meaning of the Legislature cannot be so well explained as by its own direct words, since index animi sermo (language conveys the intention of the mind), and maledicta expositio quæ corrumpit textum (an exposition which corrupts the text is bad). 4 Co. 35.

Avers, draught cattle; carthorses.

Aver-Corn, a reserved rent in corn paid to religious houses.—Blount.

Aver-Land, that which tenants ploughed and manured for the proper use of a monastery or the lords of the soil.—Mon. Angl.

Aver-Penny (or average penny), money paid towards the king's averages or carriages, and so to be freed thereof.—Rastal.

Aver-Silver, a custom or rent formerly so called.—Cowel.

Averia, cattle, which was the principal possession in early times.—Spelman. Also chattels generally.

Averia carrucæ, beast of the plough.

Averia elongata, cattle eloigned, i.e. carried off.

Averiis captis in Withernam, a writ granted to one whose cattle were unlawfully distrained by another and driven out of the county in which they were taken, so that they could not be replevied by the sheriff.—Reg. Orig. 82.

Averium, the best live beast due to the lord as an heriot on his tenant's death.—2 Bl. Com. 424.

Averment [fr. verificatio, Lat.], an advancement or affirmation of any new matter in a pleading, and when new matter was introduced the pleading concluded with a verification, except in the anomalous case of the general plea of bankruptcy under 6 Geo. IV. c. 16. Verifications or averments were of two kinds: common and special. Common were applied to ordinary cases, and were in the following form:—'And this the plaintiff (or defendant) is ready to verify.' Special were used where the matter pleaded was intended to be tried by record or by some other method than a jury. They were in the following forms:—'And this the plaintiff (or defendant) is ready to verify, by the said record,' or, 'And this the plaintiff (or defendant) is ready to verify, when, where, and in such manner as the Court here shall order, direct, or appoint.' Consult Steph. Plead. as to the origin of this rule, &c., p. 479.

Needless averments are not now permitted in pleadings, and a formal conclusion is no longer necessary.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, ss. 49 & 67.

Averrare, a duty required from some customary tenants, to carry goods in a waggon or upon loaded horses.—Blount.

Avetting (or abetting), helping or assisting. Scotch Law.

Augea, a cistern for water.—Blount.

Augmentation, the name of a court (now abolished), erected 27 Hen. VIII., to determine suits and controversies relating to monasteries and abbey-lands.—Termes de la Ley, 68.

Augmentation of Stipends. In order to secure a better provision for the reformed clergy of the Church of Scotland, the Court of Sessions has power to modify or increase stipends to the clergy out of the teinds of the parish in which the minister officiates.—Scotch Law.

Augusta, the ancient name of London.

Augusta legibus soluta non est.—(The wife of the emperor is not exempted from the laws.)

Avia, a grandmother.

A vinculo matrimonii (from the chain of wedlock). It was a total divorce obtained from the Ecclesiastical Court, on some canonical impediment existing before marriage and not arising afterwards, for the marriage was declared void, as having been absolutely unlawful ab initio, and the parties were, therefore, separated, pro salute animarum (for the safety of their souls), the issue (if any) were illegitimate, and the parties might have contracted another marriage.

Though this divorce could not have been obtained in the regular course of law, where the marriage was not void ab initio, yet it was frequently granted on the ground of adultery by a private Act of Parliament; as it had become the practice of the Legislature to exercise its authority in this matter by way of extraordinary relief to the injured party. The proceeding originated in the House of Lords, and, to prevent collusion, the petitioner for a divorce bill must have attended upon its second reading, to be examined at the bar; the adultery was proved by witnesses. Evidence must also have been given in committee on the bill, that a sentence of divorce had been obtained in the Spiritual Court, and (where the husband was the petitioner) that judgment had been given for the husband in some Court of Law, in an action for damages brought by him against the seducer. Where no such proceedings had taken place, Parliament required some satisfactory reason to be given for the omission, as that the husband had been unable to discover the adulterer, or that he died before a verdict could be obtained against him. In passing the bill, the Legislature usually made some provision for the wife out of the husband's estate. A dissolution of marriage by the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes has superseded this kind of Divorce.—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 27.

Aula, de, Hall.

Aula Regis or Regia, a court established by William the Conqueror in his own hall: it was composed of the great officers of state, resident in the palace, and followed the King's household in all his expeditions. The trial of common causes in it was, on this account, very burdensome to the people, and accordingly the 11th chapter of Magna Charta thus enacted:—'communia placita non sequantur curiam nostram sed teneantur in aliquo loco certo.' This certain place was established in Westminster Hall, where it has ever since continued under the name of the Court of Common Pleas, or Common Bench.—Brac. L. 3, tr. 1, c. 7; 3 Bl. Com. 39.

Aula ecclesiæ, a nave or body of a church where temporal courts were anciently held.—Eadm. lib. 6, p. 141.

Aulnager [fr. ulna, Lat., an ell], an ancient officer appointed by the king, whose business it was to measure all woollen-cloth made for sale, that the Crown might not be defrauded of customs and duties.—Termes de la Ley, 37.

Aumeen, trustee, commissioner; a temporary collector or supravisor, appointed to the charge of a country on the removal of a zemindar, or for any other particular purpose of local investigation or arrangement.—Indian.

Aumil, agent, officer, native collector of revenue; superintendent of a district or division of a country, either on the part of the government, zemindar, or renter.—Ibid.

Aumildar, agent; the holder of an office; an intendant and collector of the revenue, uniting civil, military, and financial powers, under the Mahomedan government.—Ibid.

Aumone, Service in, where lands are given in alms to some church or religious house, upon condition that a service or prayers shall be offered at certain times for the repose of the donor's soul.—Brit. 164.

Auncel weight, an ancient manner of weighing by the hanging of scales or hooks at either end of a beam or staff, which, when suspended by the middle, discovered the equality or difference between the weight at one end and the thing weighed at the other. This weighing being subject to great deceit, was prohibited, and the even balance commanded in its stead. But, notwithstanding, it is still used in some parts of England, and what are now called stilliards, which show the pounds by certain notches on a beam, are very similar to the auncel weight.—Termes de la Ley, 66.

Aunciatus, antiquated.—Blount.

Auncient Demesn. See ANCIENT DEMESNE.

Aunt [fr. amita Lat.], the sister of one's father or mother, and a relation in the third degree, correlative to niece or nephew.

Avocat, a French barrister, or advocate.

Avoidance [fr. vuide, vide, Fr., empty, wide, free from], when a benefice is void of an incumbent, in which sense it is opposed to plenarty.—Jacob. Also an evitation or making void, by new matter, an opponent's pleading.

Avoidance of a decision. When a motion has been made in parliament, upon which the house happens to be unwilling to come to a vote, there are formal modes of avoiding a decision, amongst which are, passing 'to the other orders,' or moving 'the previous question.'

The former means that the house should, casting aside and taking no further notice of the matter then before it, proceed to the other business appointed for that day; the latter, that a vote be previously taken as to the expediency of coming to any decision on the question raised. If 'the previous question' of expediency be negatived, the motion to which it referred is only got rid of for the time, whereas a direct negative to the motion itself would be a proscription of it for the remainder of the session, as well as a denial of its principle. With respect to a bill, moving that it 'be read this day six months,' or 'this day three months,' is a mode of throwing it out without coming to an express declaration against the principle of the measure.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

Avoir-du-poise, avoirs-de-pois, or Aver-du-pois [O. Fr.], (to have full weight), a certain method of weighing goods, allowing 16 ounces to the pound, whilst Troy-weight allows but 12.

Avona, the ancient name of Bungay, in Suffolk, and Hampton Court.

Avonæ Vallis, the ancient name of Avondale, or Oundale, in Northamptonshire.

Avoucher, the calling upon a warrantor to fulfil his undertaking.

Avoué, a French attorney.

Avow. See ADVOW.

Avowant, one who makes an avowry.

Avowee. See ADVOWEE.

Avowry, or Advowry, a pleading in the action of replevin, which states the nature and merits of the defence, and justifies or avows taking the distress in his (the defendant's) own right, which, if established, will entitle him to a judgment de retorno habendo. An avowry is in the nature of a declaration, the avowant being a plaintiff (actor). In an avowry for rent, the landlord-defendant need not set out his title by 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 22; but this does not extend to damage feasant.—Woodf. Land and T. by Horn, 681, et seq.

Avowterer, Avouterer, an adulterer. The crime being called Avowtry.

Aureney, Aurney, Aurigny, the ancient name of Alderney, an island in the English Channel.

Aureo Vado, de, the ancient name of Guldeford, or Guildford, in Surrey.

Aures, a Saxon punishment by cutting off the ears, inflicted on those who robbed churches, or were guilty of any other theft.—Fleta, lib. 1, c. xxxviii. par. 10.

Auricularius, a secretary.—Mon. Ang. 10.

Aurum Reginæ, queen's gold. A royal revenue belonging to every queen consort during her marriage with the king, and due from every person who has made a voluntary offering or fine to the king, amounting to ten marks or upwards, for and in consideration of any privileges, grants, licenses, pardons, or other matters of royal favour conferred upon him by the king. It is due in the proportion of one-tenth part over and above the entire offering or fine made to the king, and becomes an actual debt of record to the queen's majesty by the mere recording of the fine.—2 Step. Com. 455.

Auscultare, to hear monks read and to direct them how and in what manner they should do it with a graceful tone of accent to make an impression on their hearers. This was required before they were admitted to read publicly in the church.

Australian Colonies, see 13 & 14 Vict. c. 59; and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 56; and 25 Vict. c. 8.

Australia (South), see 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 95; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 60; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 61; and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 56.

Australia (Western), see 10 Geo. IV. c. 22; and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 35.

Austurcus, and Osturcus, a goshawk, whence a falconer keeping such kind of hawks is called ostringer. Unum austurcum used to be reserved as a rent to the lord, as may be seen in some ancient deeds.—Blount.

Auter, or Autre, action pendant [O. Fr.], (another action pending).

Auter, or Autre droit, in right of another, e. g. a trustee holds trust-property in right of his cestui que trust. A prochein amy sues in right of an infant.—2 Bl. Com. 176.

Authentic, an undoubted original.

Authentic Act, that which has been executed before a notary or other public officer, duly authorised, or which is testified by a public seal, or has been rendered public by the authority of a competent magistrate, or which is certified as being a copy of a public register.—Civil Law.

Authentication, an attestation made by a proper officer by which he certifies that a record is in due form of law, and that the person who certifies it is the officer appointed so to do.

Authentics, a collection of the Novels of Justinian, made by an anonymous author. So called on account of its authority.—Civil Law.

There is another collection so called, compiled by Irnier, of incorrect extracts from the Novels, and inserted by him in the Code, in the places to which they refer.

Authorities, the citations which are made of laws, acts of the Legislature, precedents, and decided cases, and opinions of elementary writers.

Authority, a right; an official or judicial command; also a legal power to do an act given by one man to another. Consult Vin. Abr. tit. 'Authority,' and Sugden on Powers.

Autochiria, Autoctonia, Autophonia, suicide.—Dunglison.

Autocracy, an irresponsible monarchy, such as that of Russia.

Autograph, the real hand-writing of any penman or author.

Autonomasy [fr. αὐτός, self, and ὄνομα, Gk., name], in rhetoric a word of general signification, used for the name of a particular thing.

Autrefois [Fr.], formerly; at some other time.

Autrefois acquit (formerly acquitted), a plea in criminal cases; when a person is indicted for an offence and acquitted, he cannot be afterwards indicted for the same offence, provided the first indictment were such that he could have been lawfully convicted on it; and if he be thus indicted a second time, he may plead autrefois acquit, which will be a good bar to the indictment. The true test by which the question, whether such a plea is a sufficient bar in any particular case, may be tried, is, whether the evidence necessary to support the second indictment would have been sufficient to procure a legal conviction upon the first.—R. v. Emden, 9 East, 437; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 28.

Autrefois attaint (formerly attainted), a plea in criminal cases. Before 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 4, if a man were attainted of treason or felony, whilst the attainder remained in force, he could not, with certain exceptions, be indicted for another felony, whether such other felony were committed before or after his attainder; because, being already attainted, and, therefore, dead in contemplation of law, and his property forfeited, a prosecution for any other offence was considered useless. But now attainder is no bar, unless for the same offence as that charged in the indictment, and in effect this plea is at an end.—4 Bl. Com. 337.

Autrefois convict (formerly convicted). Before 6 Geo. IV. c. 25, a man convicted of a clergyable felony, and who had prayed the benefit of clergy, might plead such conviction and prayer of clergy in bar of any subsequent indictment, either for the felony of which he was convicted, or for any other clergyable felony committed by him previously to his conviction. This statute restricted the benefit of the allowance of clergy to the charge upon which it was allowed, and now a previous conviction can only be pleaded in bar of any subsequent indictment for the felony of which the defendant has previously been convicted. The 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 6, abolished the benefit of clergy in all cases of felony; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 28.

Autre vie, tenant pur (tenant for another's life). An estate for the life of another is an estate of freehold, though it is the lowest or least estate of freehold which the law acknowledges. An estate for the life of another is not so great as an estate for one's own life. See Watkins's Principles of Conveyancing, c. iv.

Autumn, the decline of summer. Some continental nations compute their years by autumns; but the Anglo-Saxons by winters.

Autumnalia, fruits that ripen during the autumnal harvest.

Avulsion [fr. avulsio, Lat.], lands torn off by an inundation or current from property to which they originally belonged, and gained to the estate of another; or where a river changes its course, and instead of continuing to flow between two properties, cuts off part of one and joins it to the other property. The property of the part thus separated continues in the original proprietor, in which respect avulsion differs from alluvion, i. e. where an addition is insensibly made to a property by the gradual washing down of the river, for such an addition becomes the property of the owner of the lands to which it is made.

Avunculus, an uncle by the mother's side.

Avunculus magnus, a great uncle.

Avus, a grandfather.

Auxesis [fr. αὔξησις, Gk.], a figure in rhetoric, by which anything is magnified too much.

Auxilium ad filium militem faciendum et filiam maritandam, an ancient writ which was addressed to the sheriff to levy compulsorily an aid towards the knighting of a son and the marrying of a daughter of the tenants in capite of the crown.—Abolished.

Auxilium curiæ, a precept or order of Court citing and convening a party, at the suit and request of another, to warrant something.—Ken. Paroch. Antiq. 477.

Auxilium facere alicui in curia regis, to become another's friend and solicitor in the Queen's Courts, an office undertaken for and granted by some courtiers to their dependents in the country.—Ibid. 126.

Auxilium regis, the King's aid or money levied for the royal use and the public service, as taxes granted by Parliament.—1 Bl. Com. c. viii.

Auxilium vicecomiti, a customary aid or duty anciently payable to sheriffs out of certain manors, for the better support of their offices.—Mon. Angl.

Await [fr. awaiti, Wall., to watch, waiti to look], waylaying, a lying in wait to execute some mischief.—13 Ric. II. st. 2.

Award [the primative sense of ward is shown in the It. guardare, Fr. regarder, to look. Hence, Prov. Fr. eswarder (answering in form to award), to inspect goods, and, incidentally, to pronounce them good and marketable; eswardeur, an inspector.—Hecart. An award is, accordingly, in the first place, the taking a matter into consideration and pronouncing judgment upon it; but in later times the designation has been transferred exclusively to the consequent judgment.—Wedgw.], a document containing the determination of commissioners, under an Inclosure Act, or other public statute; also an instrument embodying an arbitrator's decision on a matter submitted to him. It must follow the submission, but need not be necessarily in writing, unless prescribed. A parol award, however, is objectionable. Joint arbitrators should execute the award at the same time and in the presence of each other. An award is generally considered as published as soon as the arbitrator has done some act whereby he becomes functus officio, and has declared, and can no longer change, his final mind. As soon as the award is executed, notice thereof should be given to all the parties that it is made and ready to be delivered; and if the submission direct that it be delivered to the parties by a certain day, in order to be valid it must be so delivered accordingly. It is usual for an arbitrator to keep the award until his costs are paid. The award must be duly stamped.

Any words expressive of a decision is an award. Recitals are unnecessary. The award must be entire, final, on all the matters referred, or it will be void in toto; unconditional, but it may be alternative; without reservation or delegation, except as to ministerial acts; certain, mutual, possible, and consistent, without palpable mistake; when partly good and partly bad, the good part, if separable from the bad, will be valid.

An award is a final and conclusive judgment as between the parties, on all matters referred by the submission, and a court has not any power to alter or amend it. The award should be performed by all the parties within a reasonable time.

An award may be enforced by an action at law, which is the only remedy for disobedience thereto, where the submission cannot be made a rule of court, and no statute provides for a special mode of enforcement. Assumpsit lies when the submission is not under seal; and debt on award of money, and on an arbitration bond. Covenant will lie when the submission is by deed for the breach of any part of the award; and case for the non-performance of a duty awarded.

Equity will enforce specific performance of an award, when there is not any complete remedy at Common Law.

When the submission has been made a rule of court, the party who refuses or neglects to perform what the award orders is considered as disobedient to the rule of court, as much as if the award were part of the rule, and is consequently guilty of a contempt of that court by which the rule has been made. The process, therefore, by which the courts punish contempts, called an attachment, will be issued against him to compel his obedience to the directions of the arbitrator, under the penalty, in ordinary cases, of imprisonment until he comply.

The 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 18, gives to a rule of court for the payment of money the effect of a judgment, and affords a simple and summary method of obtaining execution for the amount awarded.

Where a cause is referred, the award may be enforced by issuing execution in the cause for the money or costs awarded. In this case, a personal demand of payment is not necessary, as it is in proceeding for an attachment or a rule, under the statute of Victoria, on the award itself.

Any award made on a compulsory reference, under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, may, by authority of a judge, on such terms as to him may seem reasonable, be enforced at any time after seven days from the time of publication, notwithstanding that the time for moving to set it aside has not elapsed (s. 10).

When any award made on any submission, document, or order of reference, directs that possession of any lands or tenements capable of being the subject of an action of ejectment, shall be delivered to any party, either forthwith or at any future time, or that any such party is entitled to the possession of any such lands or tenements, it shall be lawful for the court of which the document authorising the reference is or is made a rule or order to order any party to the reference who shall be in possession of any such lands or tenements, or any person in possession of the same, claiming under, or put in possession by him since the making of the document authorizing the reference, to deliver possession of the same to the party entitled thereto, pursuant to the award, and such rule or order to deliver possession shall have the effect of a judgment in ejectment against every such party or person named in it, and execution may issue, and possession shall be delivered by the sheriff, as on a judgment in ejectment (s. 16).

All applications to set aside any award made on a compulsory reference, under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, shall and may be made, within the first seven days of the term next following the publication of the award to the parties, whether made in vacation or term; and if no such application is made, and if no rule is granted thereon, or if any rule granted thereon is afterwards discharged, such award shall be final between the parties (s. 9).

Where a rule to show cause is obtained to set aside an award or annuity, the several objections thereto, intended to be insisted upon at the time of moving, to make such rule absolute, shall be stated in the rule to show cause.—General Rules, 169.

Costs may be taxed on an award, notwithstanding the time for setting aside the award has not elapsed.—General Rules, 170.

The grounds for setting aside an award are these:—

(1) When the conduct of the arbitrator is corrupt or irregular;

(2) When the award discloses a mistaken decision in law or fact;

(3) When the award is a nullity;

(4) When it is not final;

(5) When it is uncertain;

(6) When the arbitrator has exceeded his authority;

(7) When a party or a witness is in fault, or new matter has been discovered.

Equity has jurisdiction to set aside an award, on any of the enumerated grounds, when the submission cannot be made a rule of a Common Law Court.

When an action has been referred, and the reference fails, the action proceeds.—Russell on Arbitration, pt. iii.

Away-going crops, crops sown during the last year of a tenancy, but not ripe until after its expiration. The right which an outgoing tenant has to take an away-going crop is sometimes given to him by the express terms of the contract, but where that is not the case, he is generally entitled to do so by the custom of the county: such custom or usage has been held reasonable and valid, and to apply equally to tenants by parol agreement as well as by deed or written contract of demise, and this for the benefit and encouragement of agriculture.—Woodf. Land. and Ten. by Horn, 534. See Wigglesworth v. Dallison, Doug. 201; and 1 Smi. L. C. 453–469. For the customs of the various counties in England, respecting the most important of the rights and liabilities which exist between an outgoing and incoming tenant, consult the Table of Customs given in Woodf. Land. and Ten. by Harrison, p. 513–518.

Awm, Aume, or Awame, a measure of Rhenish wine containing forty gallons, mentioned in some old statutes.—Blount.

Awnhinde. See THIRD-NIGHT AWNHINDE.

Axelodunum, the ancient name of Hexham, in the bishopric of Durham.

Ayant cause, a receiver; also a successor or one to whom a right has been assigned, either by will, gift, sale, exchange, or the like.—French Law.

Aye [fr. ἀεί, Gk., always], an affirmative particle synonymous with yea or yes; a Lacedemonian oration, spoken sometimes all at once by two-thirds of the House of Commons, who seldom say anything more.—Pear. Pol. Dict.

Ayle [fr. avus, Lat.], a grandfather. See AIEL.

Ayuntamiento, Justicia, Concejo, Cabildo, Regimiento, the names given in Spain to the councils of the towns and villages; also a congress of officials.

Azaldus, a poor horse or jade.—Blount.

Azure [fr. azzurro, azzuolo, It.; azul, Sp., Port., Fr.; Pers. lazur, whence lapis lazuli, the sapphire of the ancients.—Diez.], bright blue, sometimes called Inde, from the sapphire, which is found in the East. Heralds who blazon by planets call it Jupiter, and when the names of jewels are employed, it is called Sapphire. Engravers represent it by an indefinite number of horizontal lines.—Heraldic Term.

B a Certificate granted by the Court of Bankruptcy to the assignees or a creditor, when it had refused any further protection to a bankrupt, or had refused or suspended his certificate, which had the effect of a judgment until the certificate was allowed, and was enforcable by a ca. sa. It was cancelled by the allowance of the certificate, and called B a, because the form is contained in schedule B a of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106; see s. 257. This certificate was abolished by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134.

Baca, an iron hook, a line with a hook at the end of it.—Old Records.

Baccinium, or Bacina, a basin or vessel to hold water for washing the hands. There was formerly a service of holding the basin, or waiting at the basin, on the day of the King's coronation.

Bachelacanæ Sylvæ, the woods of Bagley.

Bacheleria, commonalty or yeomanry, in contradistinguishment to baronage.—Old Records.

Bachelor [a word of uncertain etymology; Junius derives it from βάκηλος, Gk., foolish, whence the Italian, Baccalare, a coxcomb; Menage, from bas chevalier, Fr., a knight of the lowest rank; Spelman, from baculus, Lat., a staff; Cujos, from buccella, an allowance of provision; others from bacca-laureus, Lat., the berry of a laurel or bay, because anciently bachelors had their heads adorned with a garland of bay berries; but the most probable derivation seems to be from bachgen, Wel., a boy, fr. bach, little, and probably geni, to be born. One would suspect that the word might be of Basque origin.—Wedgw.], a man who takes the degree of apprentice or student of arts, but not yet a master, at the Universities, introduced in the 13th century by Pope Gregory IX.—Encyc. Lond. Also, an unmarried man.

Backadation, a consideration given to keep back the delivery of stock when the price is lower for time than for ready money.—Stock Exchange.

Backberinde, Backverinde, or Backberend, bearing upon the back or about a man. Where a thief is apprehended with the things stolen in his possession, also called being taken with the mainour, as having the goods in his hand.—2 Inst. 188. It was one of the four circumstances wherein a forester might have arrested the body of a trespasser in a forest; viz. dog-draw, i.e. drawing after a deer that he has hurt; stable-stand, i.e. at his standing with a knife, gun, bow, or greyhound, ready to shoot or course; back-berend, i.e. carrying away upon his back the deer which he had killed; bloody-hand, i.e. when he had shot or coursed, and was imbrued with blood.—4 Inst. 294.

Back-bond, a deed, which in conjunction with an absolute disposition, constitutes a trust. It expresses the nature of the right actually held by a person to whom the disposition is made. It is equivalent to the English deed of declaration of trust.—Scotch Term.

Backgammon [fr. batcke, Dan. (also batcke-bord) a tray, and gammen, a game.—Wedgw.] a lawful game.—4 Step. Com. 339.

Backing a warrant of a justice of the peace. Where a warrant which has been granted in one jurisdiction is required to be executed in another, as where a felony has been committed in one county, and the offender is lurking in another county, then, on proof of the handwriting of the justice who granted the warrant, a justice in such other county endorses or writes his name on the back of it, and then gives authority to execute the warrant in such other county.—23 Geo. II. c. 26, s. 11; 24 Geo. II. c. 55; 13 Geo. III. c. 31; 44 Geo. III. c. 92. See also 6 & 7 Vict. c. 34; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42; ss. 11 to 15, and c. 43; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55; and 16 & 17 Vict. 118.

Backside, a term formerly used in conveyances and even in pleadings, and still adhered to with reference to ancient descriptions in deeds, in continuing the transfer of the same properties; it imports a yard at the back part of or behind a house, and belonging thereto; but though formerly used in pleading, it is now unusual to adopt it, for the word 'yard' is preferred.—Exodus, iii. 1; 1 Chit. Gen. Prac. 177; and Hale's Hist., c. i. p. 12.

Baco, a bacon hog, used in old charters.

Badge [fr. bode or bade, a messenger, corrupted from badage, the credential of a messenger.—Junius. Or from baghe, Dut., a jewel; or bague, Fr., a ring.—Skinner and Minshew. It seems to come from bajulo, Lat., to carry. See Wedgw.], a mark or cognizance worn to shew the relation of the wearer to any person or thing; the token of any thing; a distinctive mark of office or service.—Encyc. Lond.

Badger [fr. bagage, Fr., a bundle, whence bagagier, a carrier of goods; or fr. bladier, Fr., a corn-dealer.—Wedgw.], a person who buys corn or victuals in one place, and carries them to another to sell and make profit by them. The 5 Eliz. c. 12, empowered magistrates to license badgers for one year, upon their entering into certain recognisances. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24, abolished the offence of badgering, and repealed the statutes passed in relation to it, as being pernicious and in restraint of trade.

Badiza, an ancient name of Bath, in Somersetshire.

Badonicus mons, an ancient name of Barnes Down, near Bath.

Bædling (mollis), 'Molles (inquit Alcuinus de Offic. Divin.) sunt effeminati, qui vel barbas non habent, sive qui alterius fornicationem sustinent.' These are the μαλακοί mentioned by St. Paul, 1 Corinth. vi. 9, οὔτε μαλακοὶ, οὔτε ἀρσενοκοῖται, κ. τ. λ. The derivation of the Saxon term is very uncertain.—Theod. Lib. Pœnit. xxxviii. 3; Ecgb. Pœnit. iv. 68; Anc. Laws of England.

Bag [fr. balg, bolg, bag, Gael., a wattel], a certain and customary quantity of goods and merchandise in a sack.—Lex. Merc.

Baga, a bag or purse. Thus there is the Petty-Bag-Office in the Common Law Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, because all original writs relating to the business of the crown were formerly kept in a little sack or bag, in parvâ bagâ.—1 Madd. Prin. Chan. 4.

Bagavel, Edward I. granted to the citizens of Exeter, by charter, the collection of a certain tribute or toll upon all manner of wares brought to that city to be sold, to be applied towards the paving of the streets, repairing the walls, and maintaining the city, which was commonly called in old English, begavel, bethugavel, and chipping-gavel.—Antiq. of Exeter.

Bahadum, a chest or coffer.—Fleta, lib. 2, c. xxi.

Bajardour, a bearer of any weight or burden.—Old Records.

Bail [fr. bailler, Fr., to hand over; fr. bajulare, in the sense of making one a bail or keeper of the thing handed over, giving it into his bail or control], to set at liberty a person arrested or imprisoned, on security being taken for his appearance on a day and at a place certain, which security is called bail, because the party arrested or imprisoned is delivered into the hands of those who bind themselves for his forthcoming, in order that he may be safely protected from prison. Bail and mainpernors are often confounded, but there is this marked distinction between them:—mainpernors are merely a person's sureties who cannot imprison him themselves to secure his appearance, but bail may, for they are regarded as his gaolers, to whose custody he is committed, and therefore, they may take him upon a Sunday and confine him until the next day, and then render him to the proper prison. The word 'bail' is never used with a plural termination.

There are several kinds of bail at Common Law:—

(1) Common bail, or bail below, is given to the sheriff, after arresting a person, on a bail bond, entered into by two sureties, on condition that the defendant appear at the day and in such place as the arresting process commands.

(2) Special bail, or bail above, or bail to the action, are persons who undertake generally that if the defendant be condemned in the action, he shall satisfy the debt, costs, and damages, or render himself to the proper prison, or that they will do it for him.

(3) Bail in error: upon any judgment to be given in any action, execution shall not be stayed or delayed by proceedings in error, or supersedeas thereupon, without the special order of the court or a judge, unless the person in whose name such proceedings in error be brought, with two, or, by leave of the court or a judge, more than two sufficient sureties, such as the court (wherein such judgment is or shall be given) or a judge shall allow of, shall, within four clear days after lodging the memorandum alleging error, or after the signing of the judgment, whichever shall last happen, or before execution executed, be bound unto the party for whom any such judgment is or shall be given, by recognizance to be acknowledged in the same court, in double the sum adjudged to be recovered by the said judgment (except in case of a penalty, and in case of a penalty in double the sum really due, and double the costs), to prosecute the proceedings in error with effect, and also to satisfy and pay (if the said judgment be affirmed, or the proceedings in error be discontinued by the plaintiff therein) all and singular the sum or sums of money and costs adjudged or to be adjudged upon the former judgment, and all costs and damages to be also awarded for the delaying of execution, and shall give notice thereof to the defendant in error or his attorney. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 151. The recognizance of bail in error is conditioned, not alternatively, to pay or to render the principal, but if the judgment should be affirmed, or error discontinued, to pay the amount adjudged upon the former judgment, together with the costs and damages. Bail in error, then, unlike any other bail, cannot render their principal in discharge of liability, but must, in the event of his not paying, pay the amount recovered with costs. Bail in error may be taken in the country by 22 Vict. c. 16, s. 5.

(4) Bail on an attachment. When a defendant is arrested upon a writ of attachment, he is brought before a court or a judge and sworn to answer interrogatories, and then committed, unless, by leave of a court or a judge, he enter into a recognizance with sureties, for his appearance in court from day to day, to answer interrogatories concerning such matters as may be objected against him. An attachment for non-payment of money or non-performance of an award is not bailable.

(5) As to bail in actions of ejectment brought by landlords, see 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, ss. 213, 215, and 216.

(6) As to bail on appeals against decisions of the courts refusing or granting new trials, see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 38.

(7) As to bail upon the removal of a cause from an inferior court, see 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. pt. v. c. v. p. 1261, et seq.

In the Court of Chancery, equitable bail can be given by a defendant upon his being arrested on a writ of ne exeat regno, and the sheriff may take bail in cases of attachment for not appearing or answering.

In all cases of felony, and in certain misdemeanors, the magistrates may take bail at the time of the examination; and in all cases where a person charged with an indictable offence is committed to prison to take his trial for the same, it is lawful at any time afterwards, and before the first day of the sessions or assizes at which he is to be tried, for the magistrate who signed the warrant for his commitment to admit him to bail. The justices, however, have no power to admit any person to bail for treason, nor shall bail in that case be allowed, except by order of a secretary of state, or by the Court of Queen's Bench, or a judge thereof in vacation, while, on the other hand, they are bound to admit to bail in all cases of misdemeanor, except such as the Act of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 23, particularly enumerates; and as to all felonies, as well as to the misdemeanors so enumerated, they have a discretionary power either to admit to bail, or to commit to prison.

The Court of Queen's Bench, or any judge thereof in time of vacation, may bail for any crime whatever.

Bail-Bond, an instrument prepared in the sheriff's office after an arrest, executed by two sufficient sureties and the person arrested, and conditioned for his causing special bail to be put in for him in the court out of which the arresting process issued.—Bayley's Prac. 357.

Bail Court, now called the Practice Court, attached to the Court of Queen's Bench. It hears and determines ordinary matters, and disposes of common motions.

Bailable. An arresting process is said to be bailable when bail can be given, and the person arrested may obtain his liberty in consequence, e. g. a capias on mesne process is bailable; a capias ad satisfaciendum is non-bailable.

Bailee, a person to whom goods are entrusted for a specific purpose.

Bailies, magistrates of burghs, possessed of certain jurisdictions and having the same powers within them as sheriffs of counties. Also officers or persons named by proprietors to give infefftment.—Scotch Law.

Bailiff, a keeper or protector, an officer who puts in force an arresting process, a land-steward. There are several kinds of bailiffs, whose offices and employments greatly differ from one another, yet they agree in that the keeping or protection of something belongs to them all.—Encyc. Lond.

Bailiff-errant, a bailiff's deputy. See OUTRIDER.

Bailis, letters to raise fire and sword.—Scotch Law.

Bailiwick [fr. bailli, Fr., and wic, Sax.], the jurisdiction of a bailiff. A county. A liberty exempted from a sheriff, over which a bailiff is appointed by the lord of the liberty or franchise, with such powers within his precinct as an under-sheriff exercises under a sheriff.—Wood's Inst. 206.

Bailment [fr. bailler, Fr. to deliver], a compendious expression to signify a contract resulting from delivery. Sir William Jones has defined bailment to be 'a delivery of goods on a condition, express or implied, that they shall be restored by the bailee to the bailor, or according to his directions, as soon as the purpose for which they are bailed shall be answered.' He has again, in the closing summary of his essay, defined it in language somewhat different, as, 'A delivery of goods in trust, on a contract expressed or implied, that the trust shall be duly executed and the goods re-delivered, as soon as the time or use for which they were bailed shall have elapsed or be performed.' Each of these definitions seems redundant and inaccurate, if it be the proper office of a definition to include those things only which belong to the genus or class. Both of these definitions suppose that the goods are to be restored or re-delivered. But in a bailment for sale, as in the case of a consignment to a factor, no re-delivery is contemplated between the parties. In some cases, no use is contemplated by the bailee; in others, it is of the essence of the contract; in some cases, time is material to terminate the contract; in others, time is necessary to give a new accessorial right. Mr. Justice Blackstone has defined a bailment to be 'a delivery of goods in trust, upon a contract expressed or implied, that the trust shall be faithfully executed on the part of the bailee;' and in another place, as a 'delivery of goods to another person for a particular use.' It may perhaps be doubted, whether (although generally true) a faithful execution (if by faithful be meant a conscientious diligence or faithfulness, adequate to a due execution) or a particular use (if by use be meant an actual right of user by the bailee), constitutes an essential or proper ingredient in all cases of bailment. Mr. Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, has blended, in some measure, the definitions of Jones and Blackstone. Without professing to enter into a minute criticism, it may be said that a bailment is a delivery of a thing in trust for some special object or purpose, and upon a contract express or implied, to conform to the object or purpose of the trust.

In the celebrated case of Coggs v. Bernard (Ld. Raym. 909; 1 Smi. L. C. 147–184), Lord Holt divided bailments thus:—

(1) Depositum, or a naked bailment of goods, to be kept for the use of the bailor.

(2) Commodatum. Where goods or chattels that are useful are lent to the bailee gratis, to be used by him.

(3) Locatio rei. Where goods are lent to the bailee to be used by him for hire.

(4) Vadium. Pawn.

(5) Locatio operis faciendi. Where goods are delivered to be carried, or something is to be done about them, for a reward to be paid to the bailee.

(6) Mandatum. A delivery of goods to somebody, who is to carry them, or do something about them, gratis.

Bailments are properly divisible into three kinds:—(1) Those in which the trust is exclusively for the benefit of the bailor, or of a third person, when the bailee is liable for gross negligence only. (2) Those in which the trust is exclusively for the benefit of the bailee, who is then bound to the very strictest diligence; and (3) Those in which the trust is for the benefit of both parties, or of both or one of them, and a third party; when the bailee must exercise an ordinary and average degree of diligence. The first embraces deposits and mandates; the second, gratuitous loans for use; and the third, pledges or pawns, and hiring and letting to hire.—Story's Bailments.

Bailor, or Bailer, a person who commits goods to another party (the bailee) in trust for a specific purpose.

Bail-piece, a piece of parchment containing the names of special bail, with other particulars, which, being signed by a judge, is filed in the court in which the action is pending, and notice of the bail having justified is then given to the opposite party.—Bayley's Prac. 361.

Bair-man, a poor insolvent debtor, left bare and naked, who was obliged to swear in court that he was not worth more than five shillings and five pence.—Obs.

Bairns' part, a third part of a defunct's free movables, debts deducted, if his wife survive, and a half if she do not, due to his children.—Scotch Law.

Bala-ghaut, above the ghauts, in contradistinction to Payeen-ghauts, below the ghauts. The terms are generally applied to the high table-land in the centre of India, towards its southern extremity.

Balance, that which expresses the difference between the debtor and creditor sides of an account; also used commercially to express the difference between the value of the exports from and imports into a country. The balance is said to be favorable, when the value of the exports exceeds that of the imports, and unfavorable when the value of the imports exceeds that of the exports.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Balance-sheet, a statement of an account or business between merchants and others.

Balance of power. When a number of separate and sovereign states have grown up beside each other, the entire system which they constitute may be conceived to be evenly balanced, so long as no single state is in a condition to interfere with the independence of any of the rest. But as in such a system of states there are generally a few which may be considered as leading powers, it is by these being made to counterpoise each other that the balance is maintained. It is in this way only that the safety of the smaller states can be secured. See Hume's Essays, 7, part ii.

Balcanifer, or Baldakinifer, [fr. baldanum, low Lat.], the standard-bearer of the Knights Templars.

Balconies, [fr. bâla khaneh, Pers., an upper chamber], small galleries of wood or stone on the outside of houses. The erection of them is regulated in London by the Building Acts.

Bale [fr. bal, Sw.; balla, Ital.; balle, bal, Fr.], a pack or certain quantity of goods or merchandise, wrapped or packed up in cloth and corded round very tightly, marked and numbered with figures corresponding to those in the bills of lading for the purpose of identification.

Balenger, a barge or water-vessel, a man-of-war.

Baleuga, a territory or precinct.

Balistarius, a balister or cross-bow man.

Balistics, the science of throwing missive weapons by means of an engine.

Balk [fr. valicare, Ital., to pass over.—Skinner], a ridge of land left unploughed between the furrows or at the end of a field.—Encyc. Lond.; 2 Selw. N. P. 1297 note (t).

Ballare, to dance.

Ballastage, a toll paid for the privilege of taking up ballast from the bottom of a port or harbour.

Balliers (inutilis sarcina), or bail-load (bag-læs, Prov. Dan.), persons who, standing on a balk or ridge of ground, give notice of something to others.

Balliva, a bailiwick or jurisdiction.—Old Records.

Ballivo Amovendo, an ancient writ to remove a bailiff from his office for want of sufficient land in the bailiwick.—Reg. Orig. 78.

Ballot [fr. balla, It.; bala, Sp.; balle, Fr.], a little ball or ticket used in giving votes.

Ballot, to vote for or choose a person into an office by means of little balls of several colors, which are put into a box privately, according to the inclination of the chooser or voter, or by writing the name or names of the candidates upon small pieces of paper and rolling them up, so that they cannot be read, which are put into a box, and when the time limited for the voting is over, are taken out one by one by an indifferent person. The names are then read over, and the number of votes taken, and the candidate who has the majority of votes in his favour is declared duly elected. The ballots for the militia are further suspended by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 15, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 120.

The ballot rule of building societies provides that when there is a balance at the banker's beyond a certain amount, which is not wanted for advances or other claims, the directors may require the investing members of the society to withdraw, by ballot, the value of as many shares as will be sufficient to exhaust such portion of the money in hand as they shall think proper. The investing members on whom the ballot falls, will receive the value of their shares, including compound interest at the rate on which the society has been formed.

The effect of this rule is to keep the money, as it accumulates, constantly employed in the most advantageous manner for the benefit of the members of the society, and more especially for those who are borrowers. Indeed the ballot rule operates as a safety-valve to dispose of the surplus funds when necessary.—Stone's Build. Soc. 34.

Ballot-box, a case made of wood for receiving ballots.

Balnearii, stealers of the clothes of persons bathing in the public baths.—Civil Law.

Ban, or Bann [Teut.], a proclamation or public notice, or summons or edict, whereby a thing is commanded or forbidden. It is most especially used in the publication of intended marriages, which must be done on three several Sundays, immediately after the second lesson, previous to the marriage, to the end that if any can shew just cause against such marriage, they may have opportunity to make their objections. But the Spiritual Judge, by a license, may dispense with the formality of publication. If any persons be married without either publication of banns or license, the marriage will be void, and the officiating minister is liable to transportation.—26 Geo. II. c. 33.

Banc, Sittings in [fr. bancus, Lat., a seat or bench of justice]. Thus Bancus Reginæ, or Bank la Reine, is the Queen's Bench. Bancus Communium Placitorum, or Bench le Common Pleas, is the Court of Common Pleas, or the Common Bench. The meeting of four of the judges of a Common Law Court.—11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, s. 1, and Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 95.

Bancale, a covering of ease or ornament for a bench or other seat.

Banco [Ital.], a commercial term, used to distinguish bank money from the common currency; also, a seat or bench of justice.

Bancus Superior, abbrev. Banc. Sup. [Lat.], the Upper Bench, the King's Bench was so called during the Protectorate.

Bandit, a man outlawed, put under the ban of the law.

Bane, [fr. banja, Goth., a blow, a wound; bana, O. Fl. G., death-blow; bane, Mid. Fl. G., destruction; bana, A. S., murderer; bana, Icel., to slay, bana-sott, death-sickness, bana-sar, death-wound, &c.; ben, a death-wound, now a wheal. Referred by Diefenbach to the root bang, a blow; banga, banka, Icel., to strike. So the verb schlagen, which in G. signifies to strike, becomes in Eng. to slay. Drepa, Icel., to slay, seems identical with Eng. drub, to beat; vega, to slay, with whack], destruction, overthrow. 'I will be the bane of such a person' is a popular saying. When a person receives a mortal injury by anything, such thing is his bane. He who is the cause of another's death, is le bane, i. e. malefactor.

Baneret, or Banneret [Fr.], a knight made in the field, by the ceremony of cutting off the point of his standard, and making it, as it were, a banner. Knights so made are accounted so honorable that they are allowed to display their arms in the royal army, as barons do, and may bear arms with supporters. They rank next to barons; and were sometimes called vexillarii.

Bani, deodands.

Banishment [fr. bannire, bandire, M. Lat., to proclaim, denounce, was formed the O. Fr. compound fer-bannir (bannire foras), to publicly order one out of the realm, and the simple bannir was used in the same sense.—Wedgw.], a forsaking or quitting the realm; a kind of civil death inflicted on an offender. It is of two kinds:—one, voluntary and upon oath, called abjuration, the other upon compulsion for some offence. For the Greek and Roman Laws on this subject, consult Smith's Dict. of Antiq. tit. 'Banishment.'

Bank, commercially it is a place where money is deposited for the purpose of being let out to interest, returned by exchange, disposed of to profit, or to be drawn out again as the owner shall call for it. See 7 & 8 Vict. c. 32, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, s. 5; and also Joint-stock Banks and Limited Liability.

The three great national banks are (1) the Bank of England, regulated by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 98; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 32; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 20; and see 21 Vict. c. 1, and 24 Vict. c. 3. The Bank of England conducts the whole banking business of the British Government. It acts not only as an ordinary bank, but as a great engine of state. It receives and pays the greater part of the annuities which are due to the creditors of the public; it circulates Exchequer bills, and it advances to Government the annual amount of the land and malt taxes, which are frequently not paid until some years thereafter. As to its origin, see 3 Hall. Const. Hist. p. 135. (2) The Bank of Scotland, established by Wm. III. Parl. 1, s. 5; 44 Geo. III. c. 23; 9 Geo. IV. c. 65. (3) The Bank of Ireland.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Bank-book, a book kept by a customer of a bank, shewing the state of his account with it.

Bank-credits, accommodations allowed to a person on proper security given to a bank, to draw money on it to a certain extent agreed upon.

Bank-notes, or Bank-bills, written or printed promises for money, to be paid by a banking company. They are uniformly made payable on demand. They are not like bills of exchange, mere securities or documents for debt, nor are they so esteemed, but are treated as money in the ordinary course and transactions of business by the general consent of mankind, and on payment of them, whenever a receipt is required, it is always given as for money, not as for securities or notes. Per Lord Mansfield, Miller v. Race, 1 Burr. 457. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, s. 11. Bank of England notes were made a legal tender by the 5th sec. of 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 98, everywhere, except at the Bank and its branches, for all sums above five pounds.

Bankable, discountable, receivable at a bank, as bills of exchange, &c.

Banker, one who receives money in trust to be drawn again as the owner has occasion for it. As to embezzlement and frauds by bankers, see 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54.

Bankers' cash notes, formerly called goldsmiths' notes, because bankers were originally goldsmiths. Written promises given by bankers to their customers as acknowledgments of having received money for their use. They are payable to bearer on demand and considered as money, and transferable from one person to another by delivery. They are now seldom made except by country bankers, their use having been superseded by the introduction of cheques.

Bankers' cheques, or Drafts, written orders or requests, addressed to persons carrying on the business of bankers, and drawn upon them by a party having money in their hands, requesting them to pay on presentment to a person therein named, or to bearer, a certain sum of money.

A stamp duty of one penny is chargeable by 21 and 22 Vict. c. 20, upon 'all drafts or orders for the payment of any sum of money to the bearer on demand, which being drawn upon any banker, or any person or persons acting as a banker, and residing or transacting the business of a banker within fifteen miles of the place where such drafts or orders are issued, have been hitherto exempt from stamp duty.'

It will be prudent to draw all cheques payable to 'order,' since the payee must endorse his signature, which then becomes tantamount to a receipt for the money.

The 21 & 22 Vict. c. 79, enacts that 'whenever a cheque or draft on any banker, payable to bearer, or to order, on demand, shall be issued, crossed with the name of the banker, or with two transverse lines with the words "and company," or any abbreviation thereof, such crossing shall be deemed a material part of the cheque or draft, and, except as hereafter mentioned, shall not be obliterated or added to or altered by any person whomsoever, after the issuing thereof; and the banker upon whom such cheque or draft shall be drawn shall not pay such cheque or draft to any other than the banker with whose name such cheque or draft shall be so crossed, or if the name be crossed as aforesaid without a banker's name, to any other than a banker' (s. 1). 'Whenever any such cheque or draft shall have been issued uncrossed, or shall be crossed with the words "and company," or any abbreviation thereof, and without the name of any banker, any lawful holder of such cheque or draft, while the same remains so uncrossed, or crossed with the words "and company," or any abbreviation thereof, without the name of any banker, may cross the same with the name of a banker; and whenever any such cheque or draft shall be uncrossed, any such lawful holder may cross the same with the words "and company," or any abbreviation thereof, with or without the name of a banker; and any such crossing as in this section mentioned shall be deemed a material part of the cheque or draft; and shall not be obliterated or added to or altered by any person whomsoever after the making thereof; and the banker upon whom such cheque or draft shall be drawn, shall not pay such cheque or draft to any other than the banker with whose name such cheque or draft shall be so crossed as last aforesaid' (s. 2). 'If any person shall obliterate, add to, or alter any such crossing with intent to defraud, or offer, utter, dispose of, or put off with intent to defraud, any cheque or draft on a banker, whereon such fraudulent obliteration, addition, or alteration has been made, knowing it to have been so made, such person shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be transported (sic.) beyond the seas for life, or to such other punishment as is enacted and provided for those guilty of forgery of bills of exchange, in the statute in that case made and provided' (s. 3). 'Any banker paying a cheque or draft which does not at the time when it is presented for payment plainly appear to be or to have been crossed as aforesaid, or to have been obliterated, added to, or altered as aforesaid, shall not be in any way responsible or incur any liability, nor shall such payment be questioned by reason of such cheque having been so crossed as aforesaid, or having been so obliterated, added to, or altered as aforesaid, and of his having paid the same to a person other than a banker, or other than the banker with whose name such cheque or draft shall have been so crossed, unless such banker shall have acted malâ fide, or been guilty of negligence in so paying such cheque' (s. 4).

This Act of Parliament was occasioned by the case of Simmonds v. Taylor (2 C. B. (N. S.) 528), which ruled that the enactment in 19 & 20 Vict. c. 25, that the additions, in that statute mentioned, across the face of a draft on a banker, shall have the force of a direction to the bankers, that the same is to be paid only to or through some banker, did not apply to the time when the draft was issued, but to the time when it was presented. Therefore where a crossing made by the drawer was before presentment fraudulently erased, and the bankers without negligence paid it over the counter, and not to or through a banker, they were held entitled to debit the amount to the drawer. It also decided that the crossing was no part of the cheque, and therefore the erasure of it did not amount to a forgery of another and different cheque.

Banking, a trading in money.

Bankrupt [fr. bancus, or banque, the table or counter of a tradesman, and ruptus, Lat., broken, denoting thereby one whose shop or place of trade is broken and gone.] A debtor who does certain acts, tending to defeat or delay his creditors, may be adjudged bankrupt, and so made liable to the bankruptcy laws. Before the 'Bankruptcy Act, 1861,' 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, traders only were liable to be made bankrupts. That act has, however, rendered non-traders, in certain cases, liable to be made bankrupts. See ACT OF BANKRUPTCY.

With respect to traders, the statutory general description of persons liable to the Bankrupt Laws, is this:—All persons using the trade of merchandize by way of bargaining, exchange, bartering, commission, consignment, or otherwise, in gross or by retail; and all persons who, either for themselves, or as agents or factors for others, seek their living by buying and selling, or by buying and letting for hire; or by the workmanship of goods and commodities. (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 65.) The particular traders specified by the statute are:— Alummakers, apothecaries, auctioneers, bakers, bleachers, brokers, brickmakers, builders, calenderers, carpenters, carriers; cattle, or sheep salesmen, coach proprietors, cowkeepers, dyers, fullers, keepers of inns, taverns, hotels or coffee-houses, lime-burners, livery-stable keepers, market-gardeners, millers, packers, printers, shipowners, shipwrights, victuallers, warehousemen, wharfingers; persons using the trade or profession of a scrivener, receiving other men's monies or estates into their trust or custody; persons insuring ships, or their freights, or other matters, against perils of the sea (s. 65). Peers and members of Parliament, if traders within the meaning of the Bankrupt Laws, although they are privileged from arrest, except for felonies or misdemeanors, are liable to be made bankrupt (s. 66). And so are aliens and denizens (s. 277), unmarried women, wives of convicted felons, or trading independently of their husbands, according to the custom of London; executors or other persons carrying on business as trustees in pursuance of a will of a deceased trader, in respect of such business; infants, holding themselves out as adults and sui juris, and trading as such; lunatics, if act of bankruptcy committed during a lucid interval; servants of foreign ambassadors; clergymen (for although their trading is prohibited by 57 Geo. III. c. 99, yet they cannot take advantage of the breach of one law, to exempt themselves from the liabilities of another); public officers, if traders; attornies or solicitors, acting as money-brokers; and a man retired from business, in respect of debts contracted during or before trading.

The cases decide the following trades to be within the spirit of the Bankrupt Laws:— Brewers, shipbrokers, pawnbrokers, butchers, clothiers, goldsmiths, shareholders in any joint-stock company carrying on a trade which would subject the shareholders, if individually carrying on such trade, to the Bankrupt Laws, such companies not being incorporated by charter or Act of Parliament (but the shares must not have been purchased for the purpose of founding a bankruptcy); lodging-house keepers, if they be in the habit of supplying their lodgers, and making a profit; newsmen, if they buy newspapers, and sell them at a profit on their own account; papermakers, plumbers, shoemakers, smiths, sugarbakers, tailors, and tanners. The illegality of the trading makes no difference, for a smuggler or unlicensed horse-dealer can be bankrupted. The trading will be sufficient if carried on to instead of in England. A mere buying only, or selling only, will not suffice; but a buying with intent to sell will, and so will a single instance of trading, when an intent to trade generally is proved. The following persons are not liable to be made bankrupt:—Farmers, graziers, common labourers, or workmen for hire; receivers-general of the taxes, or members of or subscribers to any incorporated, commercial, or trading company, established by charter or Act of Parliament as such (s. 65). Also, according to the cases, the following:—Commissioners of the navy, excise officers, as such; farmers of the customs, fishermen who only sell what they catch, schoolmasters, owners of mines, and an owner of land making bricks upon it for sale.

The Bankrupt Law is a system of positive statute regulations, its character being peculiar and anomalous, and designed for the special benefit of persons with whom debts are contracted in the course of trade. It is distinguished from the ordinary law between debtor and creditor, as involving these three general principles:—(1) a summary and immediate seizure of all the debtor's property; (2) a distribution of it among the creditors in general, instead of merely applying a portion of it to the payment of the individual complainant; and (3) the discharge of the debtor from future liability for the debts then existing.

The execrable atrocity of the early Roman laws, with respect to bankruptcy, is well known. According to the usual interpretation of the law of the twelve tables, which Cicero has so much eulogised (De Orat. l. 1), the creditors of an insolvent debtor might, after some preliminary formalities, cut his body in pieces, each of them taking a share proportioned to the amount of his debt; and those who did not choose to resort to this horrible extremity were authorised to subject the debtor to chains, stripes, and hard labour, or to sell him, his wife and children, to perpetual foreign slavery, trans Tyberim. This law, and the law giving fathers the power of inflicting capital punishments on their children, strikingly illustrate the ferocious and sanguinary character of the early Romans.

There is reason to think, from the silence of historians on the subject, that no unfortunate debtor ever actually felt the utmost severity of this barbarous regulation; but the history of the Republic is full of accounts of popular commotions, some of which led to very important changes, that were occasioned by the exercise of the power given to creditors of enslaving their debtors and subjecting them to corporal punishments. The law, however, continued in this state till the year of Rome 427, 120 years after the promulgation of the twelve tables, when it was repealed. It was then enacted, that the persons of debtors should cease to be at the disposal of their creditors, and that the latter should merely be authorised to seize upon the debtor's goods, and sell them by auction, in satisfaction of their claims. In the subsequent stages of Roman jurisprudence further changes were made, which seem generally to have leaned to the side of the debtor, and it was ultimately ruled, that a man who had become insolvent, without having committed any fraud, should upon making a cessio bonorum, or a surrender of his entire property to his creditors, be entitled to an exemption from all personal penalties.—Terasson, Hist. de la Jurisp. Romaine, 117.

Bankruptcy, the state or condition of a bankrupt.

Bank-stock, shares in the property of a bank.

Bannimus, the form of an expulsion of a member from the University of Oxford, by affixing the sentence in some public place, as a denunciation or promulgation of it.

Banning, an exclamation against, or cursing of another.

Bannire ad placita, ad molendinum, to summon tenants to serve at the lord's cots, to bring corn to be ground at his mill.

Bannition, expulsion.

Bannitus, or Banniatus, an outlaw; a banished man.

Bannock, a thick cake of oatmeal, being a perquisite of a mill-servant in thirlage.

Bannum, or Banleuga, the utmost bounds of a manor or town.—Seld. Hist. of Tithes, 75.

Banyan, a Hindoo merchant or shopkeeper. The word is used in Bengal to denote the native who manages the money-concerns of a European, and sometimes serves him as an interpreter. At Madras the same description of person is called Dubash, which signifies one who can speak two languages.

Baptism [fr. βάπτισμα, Gk.] See BIRTHS.

Bar, a place set apart in a Court of Law or Equity for the barristers to plead; also the place where criminals stand or sit during their trial.

Bar-fee, a payment taken by a sheriff from an acquitted prisoner.

Bar, Plea in, a pleading shewing some ground for barring or defeating an action at Common Law. A plea in bar is, therefore, distinguished from all pleas of the dilatory class, as impugning the right of action, altogether, instead of merely tending to divert the proceedings to another jurisdiction, or suspend them, or abate the particular writ or declaration. It is, in short, a substantial and conclusive answer to the action. It follows from this property, that, in general, it must either deny all, or some essential part of the averments of fact in the declaration, or, admitting them to be true, allege new facts which obviate or repel their legal effect. In the first case the defendant is said, in the language of pleading, to traverse the matter of the declaration; in the latter, to confess and avoid it. Pleas in bar are consequently divided into (1) pleas by way of traverse, and (2) pleas by confession and avoidance.— Step. Plead. 57.

In Equity, a plea in bar is a defence, resorted to when there is no defect apparent on the face of the plaintiff's bill, alleging affirmative matter, and reducing the case to a particular point, seeking to displace the plaintiff's equity.

Pleas in bar may be ranked under three heads:—

(1) Pleas founded on some bar created by statute, subdivided into:—

(α) The Statutes of Limitations.

(β) The Statute for the Prevention of Frauds and Perjuries, 29 Car. II. c. 3.

(γ) Any other statute, public or private, which has created a bar, as the ship-registry acts for example.

(δ) The plea of a statute fine and non-claim.

(2) Pleas founded on matter of record, or as of record, in some court, divided into:—

First, Matters of record, technically so called; subdivided into:—

(α) A common recovery.

(β) The plea of a judgment at law in a Court of Record.

Second, Matters as of record, subdivided into:—

(α) The sentence or judgment of a foreign court.

(β) A decree of a Court of Equity, signed and enrolled, for the same matter, and substantially between the same parties.

(3) Pleas of matter purely in pais, as it is termed, that is, upon matter of fact, not of record. Pleas of this sort go sometimes both to the discovery sought and to the relief prayed by the bill, or to some part of it; sometimes only to the discovery, or part of the discovery, and sometimes only to the relief, or a part of the relief. The principal of them are:—

(α) A release.

(β) A stated account.
(γ) A settled account.
(δ) An award.
(ϵ) A purchase for a valuable consideration.
(ζ) Title in the defendant, generally founded on a will, conveyance, or long, peaceable, and adverse possession.—Story's Equity Plead. ch. xiv.

Bar, trial at, the trial of a difficult cause before the four Judges of the Superior Court in which the action commenced, instead of at Nisi Prius. It is entirely discretionary with the Court to grant it at all, unless the Crown be actually and immediately interested, when the Attorney-General may demand it as of right. It is moved for after issue joined, and ten days' notice of trial must be given to the parties after notice to the masters of the Court. A special jury of the county in which the venue is laid, is impanelled, unless the Court imposes the terms of trying by a Middlesex or Surrey jury, or the parties consent to the contrary. Paper books of the issue are delivered to the Judges four days before trial.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 355.

Barber-chirurgeons, a corporation of London, instituted by Edw. IV. The barbers were separated from the surgeons by 18 Geo. II. c. 15, and the latter were erected into a royal college of surgeons at the commencement of the present century.—Dunglison.

Barbican [fr. barbacane, M. Lat.], a watch-tower or bulwark.

Barbicanage, money given towards the maintenance of a barbican; a tribute for repairing or building a bulwark.

Barcarium, a sheep cote; a sheep walk.

Bargain and sale [the word bargain is from barguigner, O. Fr., to chaffer, bargain, or more properly (says Cotgr.) to wrangle, haggle, brabble in the making of a bargain. The proper meaning of the word is contest, debate, and it was frequently used in O. E. and Sc. in the sense of fight, skirmish], a species of conveyance.

It is of two kinds:—

(1) Improper. This is a Common Law conveyance, and is resorted to in order to execute a Common Law power or authority to sell or mortgage realty, given to an executor by a will, or to carry out a power to dispose of property conferred by statute. The operative words are 'bargain and sell.' The estate passes by force of the will or statute, the bargain and sale merely nominating the transferee, and thus ascertaining a purchaser. It does not require enrolment, unless specially directed. See 2 Hayes's Com. 80, n. (64), and 5 Eliz. c. 26, as to Bargains and Sales of Lands in Lancashire, Chester and Durham; 25 Geo. III. c. 35, as to extended lands of Crown-debtors; and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, ss. 208, 209, and 210, as to a bankrupt's entails and copyholds.

(2) Proper. This is an equitable conveyance by which the bargainee, who is entitled to the use, becomes immediately seised of the possession or legal estate pursuant to the Statute of Uses, without any other ceremony than the delivery of the deed. There must be a pecuniary, although it may be but a nominal, consideration to raise a use upon this assurance. The appropriate operative words are 'bargain and sell.' A bargain and sale of freeholds must be enrolled within six lunar months from its date, in one of the Courts of Record at Westminster, or with the custos rotulorum of the county, under the 27 Hen. VIII. c. 16, which does not, however, extend to any hereditaments lying within any city, borough, or town corporate, wherein the mayors, recorders, or other officers have authority to enrol deeds. An examined copy of the enrolment of the bargain and sale is admissible in evidence, notwithstanding the existence of the original (10 Anne, c. 18, s. 3). A bargain and sale of chattel interests does not require enrolment, and when a bargain and sale is adopted as a disentailing assurance (which by the way is not advisable, since it does not transmute the seisin), such assurance although not enrolled within the time prescribed by 27 Hen. VIII. c. 16, will, if enrolled in Chancery within six calendar months of its execution, be good and valid (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 41). A chief difference between a proper and an improper bargain and sale, is that in the former a use cannot be limited upon the legal estate in the bargainee, so as to be executed and become a legal estate by the statute, for it must be a trust; but in the latter a seisin is raised, on which uses, which the statute will execute, may be limited.—2 Sand. Uses, 53, and Watkins's Conv. c. xii.

Bargainee, a person to whom a bargain and sale is made.

Bargainer, or Bargainor, a person who makes a bargain and sale.

Barkary, a tan-house, or a place to keep bark in for the use of tanners.

Barleycorn, the third of an inch.

Barmote, Barrmote, or Barghmote, a court, not of record, within the Hundred of the Peak in Derbyshire, for the regulation of groves, possessions, and trade of the miners, and lead.

Baron [fr. beorn, a S. noble], the fifth and lowest degree of nobility next to a viscount, and above that of a knight or baronet. In the Salic Law it signifies free born. The present barons are—(1) by prescription; for that they and their ancestors have immemorially sat in the Upper House. (2) Barons by patent, having obtained a patent of this dignity to them and their heirs male, or otherwise. (3)

Barons by tenure, holding the title as annexed to land; it is said that it is the possession of their ancient landed territories which imparts the barony to the bishops, thereby giving them a place in the Upper House, although they hold by succession, not by inheritance; but it is rather thought that they sit in the Upper House by immemorial usage. There are also Barons by office, as the Barons of the Exchequer, the Judges of the Court of Exchequer. They were formerly Barons of the realm, but now are persons learned in the laws, who preside in the common law court, called 'The Exchequer of Pleas' at Westminster; their office is also to look into the Crown accounts, for which reason they have auditors under them. See EXCHEQUER, COURT OF.

Barons of the Cinque Ports, members of the House of Commons, elected by those ports, two for each.

Baron Court. See COURT BARON.

Baron and feme [Fr.], husband and wife. A wife being under the protection and influence of her Baron, lord, or husband, is styled a feme-covert (fœmina viro cooperta), and her state of marriage is called her coverture. By marriage, the husband and wife are one person in law, that is, the very being or legal existence of the woman is suspended during the marriage; or at least is incorporated into that of her husband, under whose protection and cover she acts; therefore, if an estate be granted or conveyed to a husband and wife, and their heirs, they do not take by moieties, as other joint-tenants, but the entire estate is in both; and if an estate be granted to a husband and wife and another person, the husband and wife have but one moiety, and the other person the other moiety. For the law of Husband and Wife, consult Roper or Bell on the subject.

Baronet [fr. Baron, Fr. and et, diminutive termination], the holder of a dignity of inheritance created by letters-patent, and descendible to the issue male. He has precedency before all knights, except Knights of the Garter; and would even take precedency of them, were it not that Knights of the Garter are always privy counsellors. The order was instituted in 1611, by James I., who conferred the dignity in consideration of the payment of 1,000*l.* to the Crown, the money so raised being applied to pay the troops sent to quell an insurrection in the province of Ulster in Ireland. The number was at first 200, but has since much increased. Baronets are allowed to charge their coat with the arms of Ulster, which are a sinister hand, erect, open, and couped at the wrist, gules (red), in a field argent (white). The title 'Sir' is prefixed to their name. The first baronet ever created was Sir Nicholas Bacon, of Redgrave in Suffolk, whose successor is therefore styled Primus Baronetorum Angliæ.—1 Bl. Com. 403.

The feudal tenants next below the degree of a baron were called baronetti, baronuli, baronculi, baroncelli, but as the same class of tenants were also termed bannerets, the two names, from their resemblance, were sometimes confounded, and in several instances, where baronetti is written in the printed copies, Spelman found bannereti in the MS. rolls of Parliament. Still he shows conclusively, by early examples, that baronettus is not a mere corruption of bannerettus, but was used in the sense of a lesser baron.—Wedgw.

Barony, or Baronage, the honor and territory which give title to a baron; also the body of barons and peers.

Barony of Land, a quantity of land amounting to 15 acres.

Barrator, or Barretor [fr. barrateur, Fr., a deceiver], a common mover of suits and quarrels in disturbance of the peace, either in courts or elsewhere; one who is himself never quiet, but is at variance with others, taking or detaining possession of houses and lands or goods by false invention, &c. He is the most dangerous oppressor in the law, for he oppresses the innocent by color of law, which was made to protect them from oppression. The punishment is fine and imprisonment; and if the offender belong to the profession of the law, he is disabled from practising for the future.—12 Geo. I. c. 29; 21 Geo. II. c. 3. No one can be a barrator in respect of one act only, it must be several.

Barratry, or Barretry [fr. barratrare, Ital., to cheat, or baret, Ang.-Nor., a quarrel], a quarrel or contention; the act of a barrator. It used to be applied to the obtaining benefits at Rome. In marine insurance, it is the commission of any fraud upon the owners or insurers of a ship by the master or crew, as deserting her, sinking her, or doing any act which may subject her to arrest, detention, loss, or forfeiture, &c. It is the practice in most countries to insure against barratry. Many foreign jurists hold, that it comprehends every fault which the master and crew can commit, whether it arise from fraud, negligence, unskilfulness, or mere imprudence. But in this country it is ruled, that no act of the master or crew shall be deemed barratry, unless it proceed from a criminal or fraudulent motive.—Park on Insurance, c. v.; Marshall on Insurance, b. 1. c. xii. s. 6; Arnould on Insurance.

In Scotland, it is the crime of a judge who is induced, by bribery, to pronounce a judgment; and it is also applied to the simony of clergymen, going abroad to purchase benefices from the see of Rome.—Jamieson.

Barrel, a measure of 36 gallons.

Barren money, money not put out at interest.

Barrister, or Barrastor, a councillor or advocate learned in the law, admitted to plead at the bar, and there to take upon himself the protection and defence of clients. He is termed jurisconsultus and licentiatus in jure. As to his fees in the 15th century, see 3 Hall. M. A. p. 371.

A counsel can maintain no action for his fees, which are given not as a salary or hire, but as a mere honorarium or gratuity, which a barrister cannot demand without doing wrong to his reputation. Even an express promise by a client to pay money to counsel for his advocacy is not binding. See Kennedy v. Brown, 9 Jurist N. S. 119, where the whole law on the subject of counsels' fees is elaborately discussed. Hence the employment of counsel would be called in the civil law a mandate. Moreover, the payment of a fee does not depend upon the event of a cause; and for the purpose of promoting the honor and integrity of the bar, it is expected that all their fees should be paid when their briefs are delivered. On the other hand he is not liable to an action for negligence or unskilfulness.

In order to encourage due freedom of speech in the lawful defence of clients, and at the same time to give a check to unseemly licentiousness, a counsel is not answerable for any matter by him spoken relative to the cause in hand and suggested in his client's instructions, although it should reflect upon the reputation of another, and even prove absolutely groundless; but, if he speak an untruth of his own invention, or even upon instructions, if it be impertinent to the cause in hand, he is then liable to an action by the party injured. It is a great principle, that no action can be maintained for slander, uttered by counsel in the course of judicial proceedings, if it be pertinent to the subject-matter of discussion.

Barristers are either utter or outer barristers, who plead without the bar; or Queen's counsel and serjeants-at-law, who plead within the bar.

Domat remarks (2 Dom. b. 2, tit. 6, c. ii.), that the duties of advocates may be comprehended in two maxims: (1) Never to defend a cause which is unjust. (2) Never to defend just causes, but by the dictates of truth and justice. See Hutchinson v. Stephens, 1 K. 668.

Barrow [fr. beorg, Sax., a heap of earth], a large hillock or mound, found in many parts of England, said to be a Roman tumulus, or sepulchre.—Encyc. Lond.

Barter [fr. baratar, Sp., to overreach or circumvent], to exchange one commodity for another, or truck wares for wares.

Barton, Berton, or Burton [fr. beretun, berteun, bere wic, A. S., a court-yard, corn-farm; fr. bere, barley, and tun, inclosure, or wic, dwelling. A. S.—Bosw.], demesne lands of a manor, a great farm, a manor-house, out-houses, fold-yards, a court-yard.

In the 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 82, barton lands and demesne lands are used as synonymes. Blount says it always signified a farm distinct from a mansion; and bertonarii were farmers or husbandmen who held bartons at the will of the lord. In the west of England they call a great farm a barton, and a small farm a living.—Encyc. Lond.

Bas-Chevaliers, low or inferior knights, holding military fees by a base tenure, as distinguished from bannerets, chief or superior knights. Simple knights are called knights bachelors, bas-chevaliers.

Base-court, an inferior court, not of record, as a court-baron, court-leet, &c.

Base-estate, lands held by base tenants, who performed villeinous services to their lords; but there is a difference between a base estate, and villenage, for to hold in pure villenage is to do all that the lord commands; and if a copyholder have but a base estate, he not holding by the performance of every commandment of his lord, cannot be said to hold in villenage.—Kitch. 41.

Base-fee, this species of inheritable freehold is marked, as to its duration or time of continuance, by an event beyond which it is not to endure. The event is the qualification which gives a name to this estate, and ascertains its determination. A fee qualified is frequently called a fee-base, i. e. impure, defective, and circumscribed. There is hardly any event, provided it be lawful, and do not violate the rule against perpetuity, which may not be made the cause of the determination of this fee.

The following events are specimens of qualifications, which may be expressly annexed to this estate.

A limitation to A. and his heirs;

(1) Peers of the realm;

(2) Lords of the manor of Blackacre;

(3) Tenants of the manor of Dale;

(4) During the time whilst a particular tree shall stand;

(5) Till the marriage of a certain person takes place;

(6) Till certain debts be paid;

(7) Till default be made in payment of a given debt, at a certain time;

(8) Until a minor shall attain his majority.

When these events terminate, or the acts are done or omitted to be done, according to the meaning of the given restrictions, the fee-qualified will cease; but it may possibly, as is obvious, continue for ever, in those instances especially where the qualification is not certain to take place. The estates will then continue to all eternity, precisely in the same manner, as if no collateral event, giving to the estate a determinate character, had been annexed to it. A base-fee may arise in the absence of any express qualification when it is made determinable by construction of law, on a certain event. As where a tenant-in-tail, with remainder to a stranger, conveys the fee-simple to another in the property entailed upon him, such other takes a qualified fee by legal construction, determinable on the death of the tenant-in-tail, and failure of the issue under the entail. Another example of such an estate is, when a tenant-in-tail, not being himself entitled to the immediate remainder or reversion in fee, conveys without the consent of the protector of the settlement, he then transfers a base-fee, determinable on the failure of his issue in tail (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 34). A qualified fee is confined in its extent, and confers a limited power of alienation, entitling the owner to give an interest of the same extent and continuance only to another person which he has in himself. So that the estate will, notwithstanding the transfer, be determinable, and into whose hands soever it may come, will cease on the happening of the event upon which such qualified fee depends.

Base-infeftment, a disposition of lands by a vassal, to be held of himself.—Scotch Law.

Base-rights, those by which a granter creates a subinfeudation in favor of a vassal, to be held of himself.—Ibid.

Baselard, or Basillard, a weapon, a poignard.—Speight's Chaucer; 12 Ric. II. c. 6.

Basels, coins abolished by Hen. II. A.D. 1158.

Basileus [Gk.], a king.

Basilica, imperial constitutions.—Civil Law.

Basket tenure, lands held by the service of making the king's baskets.

Basnetum, a helmet.

Bassa tenura, a base tenure, was a holding by villenage or other customary service, opposed to alta tenura, the highest tenure in capite, or by military service.

Basset, an unlawful game.

Bassinet, a skin used by soldiers for coverings.

Bastard [fr. βασσαρίς, Gk., a concubine; or bastaerd, Brit., nothus, spurius; or bastard, fr. bas, low, and start (steort, A. S.), risen, upstart, or fr. baos, Gael., fornication], a child not born in lawful wedlock (i. e. whose parents are not married to one another), or not born within a competent time after the determination of wedlock by judicial dissolution or death. A bastard, by the law of England, is incapable of inheriting land, being accounted filius nullius, the son of nobody.—1 Steph. Com. 440. See NATURAL CHILD.

Bastardy, the state of a person not born in lawful wedlock.

Bastardy-bonds, to indemnify parishes as to natural children likely to be born, are made void by 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 76 s. 70.

Bastard eigné, an elder son born before marriage; thus, if a man have a natural son, and afterwards marry the mother, and by her have a legitimate son, the latter is called mulier puisné, and the elder son bastard eigné.—Watk. Descent, c. v.

Bastart, one born in concubinage, a bastard.

Baston, a staff or club.

Bas-ville, suburbs of a town.

Batable-ground, land that is in controversy, or about the possession of which there is a dispute, as the lands which were situated between England and Scotland before the Union.

Bath, Knights of the, a military order of knighthood, instituted by Richard II., who limited their number to four. Henry IV. increased them to 36. The order received its denomination from a formerly observed custom of bathing before the knights received the golden spur. The badge or symbol is a sceptre, rose, thistle, and three imperial crowns, conjoined within a circle, upon which is the motto—'Tria juncta in uno,' alluding to the three cardinal virtues—faith, hope, and charity. George I. revived the order by the solemn creation of a great number of knights. The order was newly regulated by a notification in the London Gazette of 25th May, 1847, and 16th Aug. 1850.

Batta, deficiency, discount, allowance to troops in the field.—Indian.

Battel, Wager of, a form of trial formerly used in military cases, arising in the court of chivalry and honour, in appeals of felony, in criminal cases, and in the obsolete real action called a writ of right. The question at issue was decided by the result of a personal combat between the parties, or, in the case of a writ of right, between their champions. See 4 Steph. Com. 496. Abolished by 59 Geo. III. c. 46; 1 Hall. M. A. c. ii. pt. 2, p. 242.

Battersea Park, see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 77.

Battersega, the ancient name of Battersea, in Surrey.

Battery [batterie Fr. fr. battre, to beat], beating and wounding. To beat, also, in the legal acceptation of the term, means not merely to strike forcibly with the hand, or a stick, or the like, but includes every touching or laying hold, however trifling, of another's person or clothes, in an angry, revengeful, rude, insolent, or hostile manner. It is a good defence to prove that the alleged battery happened by misadventure, or that it was merely an amicable contest, or that it was the correcting of a child by its parent, the correcting of a servant or scholar by his master, or the punishment of the criminal by a proper officer, or that the prosecutor assaulted or beat the defendant first, and that the defendant committed the alleged battery merely in his own defence. So a husband may justify a battery in defence of his wife, a wife in defence of her husband, a parent in defence of his child, a child in defence of his parent, a master in defence of his servant, and a servant in defence of his master, or that it was committed in defence of possession, or that the defendant, as an officer of justice, arrested the prosecutor by virtue of a certain writ or process, which is the alleged battery complained of; or that the complaint has been disposed of by two justices either by conviction or dismissal of the case, provided, in the former case, the defendant has paid the penalty, and suffered the imprisonment awarded; and, in the latter, the magistrates have dismissed the case, because it was justified, or so trifling as not to merit punishment, and this be forthwith certified under their hands. As to the criminal proceedings for battery, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 42 and 43.

Battlings [fr. batellus, Lat., a small measure, fr. batus, measure of allowance], an allowance of money, as "battles,' or 'battels,' is an allowance of provisions, and 'to battle,' to take that allowance.—Encyc. Lond.

Bawdy-house [lupanar, fornix, Lat., fr. bawd, dirt], a house of ill-fame, kept for the resort and commerce of lewd people of both sexes. It is a common nuisance. See 25 Geo. II. c. 36, made perpetual by 28 Geo. II. c. 19; 58 Geo. III. c. 70, ss. 7, 8; and 3 Geo. IV. c. 114.

Bay, or pen, a pond-head made up of a great height to keep in water for the supply of a mill, &c., so that the wheel of the mill may be turned by the water rushing thence, through a passage or flood-gate.—27 Eliz. c. 19. Also an arm of the sea surrounded by land except at the entrance.

Bazar, daily market or market-place.

Beacon [fr. beacen A. S., a sign, whence beckon, to nod], a light-house or sea-mark, formerly used to alarm the country, in case of the approach of an enemy, but now used for the guidance of ships at sea, by night as well as by day. The Trinity House is empowered to set up any beacons or sea-marks wherever they shall be deemed necessary.—8 Eliz. c. 13. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 2 & 389—416; and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 120, sch.

Beaconage, money paid towards the maintenance of beacons.

Bead [fr. bede, Sax., bead], a prayer; to say over beads is to say over one's prayers. They were most commonly in use before printing, when poor people could not afford to buy a manuscript book, though they are still used in Roman Catholic countries. They are not permitted to be brought into England, or any other superstitious things.—13 Eliz. c. 2.

Beadle [fr. beodan, A. S., to bid], a church-servant who is chosen by the vestry, and whose business is to attend the vestry, to give notice of its meetings, to execute its orders, to attend upon inquests, and to assist the constables.

Beam [fr. beam, Sax., tree], the part of a stag's head, whence the horns spring, like branches out of a tree. A common balance of weights in cities and towns.

Beams, and Balance, instruments for weighing goods and merchandize, mostly used in the city of London.

Bearer, a person who carries anything.

Bearers, persons who oppress others, usually called maintainers; justices have power to inquire into their actions, &c.—4 Edw. III. c. 11.

Bearrocsira, the ancient name of Berkshire.

Beasts of chase [feræ campestres, Lat.], there are five, viz. the buck, doe, fox, marten, and roe.—Co. Litt. 233.

Beasts of the forest are the hart, hind, hare, boar, and wolf. They are also called beasts of venary.—Ibid.

Beasts and fowls of the warren are the hare, coney, pheasant, and partridge.

Beau-pleader (to plead fairly), an obsolete writ upon the Statute of Marlbridge (52 Hen. III. c. 11), which enacts that neither in the circuits of the justices nor in counties, hundreds, or courts-baron, any fines shall be taken for fair-pleading, i. e. for not pleading fairly or aptly to the purpose; upon this statute, then, this writ was ordained, addressed to the sheriff, bailiff, or him who shall demand such fine, prohibiting him to demand it; an alias, pluries, and attachment followed.—Nat. Br. 596. It used to be had as well in respect of vicious as fair pleading, by way of amendment.—2 Inst. 122; 2 Reeves, c. viii. p. 70.

Bebba, the ancient name of Bamburgh, in Northamptonshire.

Beck [fr. becc, Sax.], a small brook.

Bed of justice [lit de justice, Fr.], the seat or throne upon which the King of France sat when personally present in Parliament; hence it signified the Parliament itself.

Bedel, or Beadle [fr. bydel, Sax.], a crier or messenger of a court, who cites men to appear and answer; an inferior officer of a parish or liberty. Many other kinds of subordinate officers are so called.

Bedelary, the jurisdiction of a bedel.

Bederepe, or Biderepe, a service which certain tenants were anciently bound to perform, as to reap their landlord's corn at harvest.

Bedeweri, banditti, profligate and excommunicated persons.

Bedford level, a tract of fenny land in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Northampton, and Lincoln; drained by the Earl of Bedford, in 1649. By the Bedford Level Act, 15 Car. II. c. 17, all conveyances and charges, except leases for seven years, are required to be registered. The practice is to register the instrument at length. The registry does not include wills; but conveyances omitted to be registered are valid for all purposes, except for entitling the grantees to the privileges conferred by the act on the owners of lands within the level. See 11 Geo. III. c. 78; 36 Geo. III. c. 73; and 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 64.

Beer [fr. the root pi, drink, extant in piti, Bohem., to drink, imper. pi, whence pievo, beer.—Wedgw.], a liquor compounded of malt and hops. The selling of it at beer-shops, &c. is principally regulated by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 79.

Bega, a land measure used in the East Indies. In Bengal it is equal to about a third part of an acre.

Beggars [fr. bag, Span.], persons who solicit alms. See 5 Geo. IV. c. 83; 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 5; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 38. See VAGRANTS.

Begging the question. See PETITIO PRINCIPII.

Begum, a lady, princess, woman of high rank.—Indian.

Behaving as heir, conduct by which an heir renders himself liable to the debts of his ancestor, as by taking possession of title-deeds, recovering rent, &c.—Scotch Law.

Behoof [fr. behofian, A. S., to be fit, beheve, advantage], use, service, profit, or advantage.

Belgæ, the ancient name of the inhabitants of Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and Hampshire; also of the city of Wells, in Somersetshire.

Belisama, the ancient name of Rhibelmouth, in Somersetshire.

Bella aqua, de, the ancient name of Bellew and Belleau.

Bella fide, de, the ancient name of Beaufoy.

Bellinus sinus, the ancient name of Billingsgate, in the city of London.

Bello campo, de, the ancient name of Beauchamp.

Bello fago, de, the ancient name of Beaufo.

Bello foco, de, the ancient name of Beaufeu.

Bello loco, de, the ancient name of Beaulieu, in Hampshire.

Bello marisco, de, the ancient name of Beaumarsh.

Bellomariscus, the ancient name of Beaumaris, the county town of Anglesey.

Bello monte, de, the ancient name of Beaumont, a town in the department of the Nord, France.

Bello prato, de, the ancient name of Beaupré.

Bello situ de, the ancient name of Bellasise.

Bello clivum, Bello desertum, Bellus locus, the ancient names of Beaudesert, in Staffordshire.

Bench [fr. bænce, A. S.], or Banc [Fr.], a tribunal of justice.

Bencher, a senior in the Inns of Court, entrusted with their government or direction. The benchers have the absolute and irresponsible power of punishing a barrister guilty of misconduct, by either admonishing or rebuking him, by prohibiting him from dining in the hall, or even by expelling him from the bar, called disbarring. They might also refuse admission to a student, or reject his call to the bar.

Bench warrant, an attachment issued by order of a criminal court against an individual, either for a contempt, or for the purpose of arresting a person accused, when a true bill has been found against him by a grand jury.

Bench warrant, one signed by a judge, or two justices of the peace to apprehend a prisoner charged with an offence.

Benefactis de, the ancient name of Benfield. Benedicta est expositio quando res redimitur à destructione.—4 Co. 26.—(Blessed is the exposition when anything is saved from destruction.)

Benefice [fr. beneficium, M. Lat., a kindness], an ecclesiastical living and promotion, a rectory or vicarage; all church preferments except bishoprics; also a fief in the feudal system.

Beneficiary, he that is in possession of a benefice; also a cestui que trust.

Beneficiary privileges, patent-rights and copyrights.

Beneficio primo ecclesiastico habendo, an ancient writ, which was addressed by the King to the Lord Chancellor, to bestow the benefice that should first fall in the royal gift, above or under a specified value, upon a person named therein.—Reg. Orig. 307.

Beneficium abstinendi, the power of an heir to abstain from accepting the inheritance. Sand. Just. 313; Cum. C. L. 156.

Beneficium cedendarum actionum, the privilege by which a surety could, before paying the creditor, compel him to make over to him the actions which belonged to the stipulator, so as to avail himself of them.—Sand. Just. 456.

Beneficium competentiæ, a right of certain persons which saves them from being condemned beyond such an amount as they can pay without depriving themselves of the necessaries of life.—Cum. C. L. 350.

Beneficium inventarii, the privilege which an heir had by an inventory of the testator's property to protect himself from the debts.—Cum. C. L. 159.

Beneficium ordinis, or excussionis, or discussionis, a privilege by which a creditor was bound to sue the principal debtor first, and could only sue the sureties for that which he could not recover from the principal.—Sand. Just. 456.

Beneficium separationis, the right to have the goods of an heir separated from those of the testator in favour of creditors.—Civil Law.

Beneficium non datum nisi propter officium.—Hob. 148.—(A remuneration not given, unless on account of a duty performed.)

Beneficium principis debet esse mansurum.—Jenk. Cent. 168.—(The benefit of a prince ought to be lasting.)

Benefit Building Societies, certain associations which have been established in different parts of the kingdom, principally amongst the industrious classes, for the purpose of raising by small periodical subscriptions a fund to assist the members thereof in obtaining a small freehold or leasehold property. The legislature has afforded encouragement and protection to such societies by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 32.

Benefit of Clergy [privilegium clericale, Lat.], an arrest of judgment in criminal cases. The origin of it was this: Princes and States, anciently converted to Christianity, granted to the clergy very bountiful privileges and exemptions, and particularly an immunity of their persons in criminal proceedings before secular judges. The clergy afterwards increasing in wealth, number, and power, claimed this benefit as an indefeasible right, which had been merely matter of royal favor, founding their principal argument upon this text of Scripture; 'touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm.' They obtained great enlargements of this privilege, extending it not only to persons in holy orders, but also to all who had any kind of subordinate ministration in the church, and even to laymen if they could read, and applying it to civil as well as criminal causes. In criminal proceedings the prisoner was first arraigned, and then he might have claimed his benefit of clergy, by way of declinatory plea, or, after conviction, by way of arrest of judgment. He was then, if a layman, burnt with a hot iron in the brawn of his left thumb, in order to shew that he had been admitted to this privilege, which was not allowed twice to a layman. If a clerk he was handed over to the ecclesiastical court, and after the solemn farce of a mock trial, he was usually acquitted, and was made a new and an innocent man. These exemptions at length grew so burthensome and scandalous, that the legislature, from time to time, interfered, until the 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 6, abolished benefit of clergy.—2 Hale's Hist. 323; 4 Steph. Com. 524, n.

Benefit Societies, friendly associations, chiefly among the industrious and lower classes of society for the purpose of affording each other relief in time of sickness, and their widows and children assistance at their death. Regimental Benefit Societies were dissolved by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 71. The 23 Vict. c. 13, provides that members of Benefit Societies shall not incur forfeiture by enrolment as volunteers or by service in any corps of yeomanry. See FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

Benefit of discussion, is that, whereby the antecedent heir, such as the heir of line in a pursuit against the heir of tailzie, &c. must be first pursued to fulfil the defunct's deeds and pay his debts. This benefit is likewise competent in many cases to cautioners.—Scotch Law.

Benerth, an ancient service which a tenant rendered to his lord with plough and cart.

Benevolence, a voluntary gratuity given by subjects to their king. It is now yielded with consent of the House of Commons, in pursuance of the petition of right, 3 Car. 1, and 1 W. & M. st. 2, s. 2. Also an aid granted by a tenant to his lord, in times of difficulty and distress, which is abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Benevolentia regis habenda, the form of purchasing the royal pardon and favor, in ancient fines and submissions, to be restored to estate, title, or place.—Paroch. Antiq. p. 172.

Benignè faciendæ sunt interpretationes, propter simplicitatem laicorum, ut res magis valeat, quam pereat; et verba intentioni, non è contra, debent inservire.—Co. Litt. 36.—(Constructions are to be made liberally, on account of the simplicity of the laity, that the thing may rather avail than perish; and words ought to serve the intention, not contrarywise.)

This maxim relates to the mode of interpreting written instruments. The judges will rather apply the words of a document to fulfil its lawful intent, than destroy such intent because of insufficient language, for to the intention, when once discovered, all technical forms of expression must give way. Words of art, which, in the understanding of conveyancers, have a peculiar meaning, are not to be scanned and construed too strictly, if, by so doing, one part of an instrument be made inconsistent with another, rendering the whole incongruous and unintelligible; the Courts will, therefore, treat such words as used in their popular sense, and interpret the language of the parties secundum subjectam materiem, referring particular expressions to the subject-matter of the agreement, in order to give to the whole full and complete force.

Benignior sententia in verbis generalibus seu dubiis, est præferenda.—4 Co. 15.—(The more favorable construction is to be placed on general or doubtful expressions.)

Bequeath [fr. becwæthan, fr. cwæthan, A. S., to say], to leave personalty by will to another.

Bequeathment, a legacy.

Bequest, a gift of personal property by will; a legacy.

Berbiage, a rent paid for the depasturing of sheep.—Cowel.

Berbicaria, a sheep down, or ground to feed sheep.

Bercaria, a sheep-fold, or other enclosure to keep sheep.

Berceia, Bercheria, the ancient names of Berkshire.

Berechingum, the ancient name of Barking, in Essex.

Berefellarii, the seven churchmen, who formerly belonged to the church of St. John of Beverley.

Berewicha, or Berewica, a village or hamlet belonging to some town or manor.—Domesday Book.

Berghmaster [fr. berg., Sax., a hill], a bailiff or chief officer among the Derbyshire miners, who also executes the office of coroner; a mountaineer or miner.

Berghmoth, or Berghmote [fr. berg., Sax., a hill, and gemote, an assembly], an assembly or court upon a hill, held in Derbyshire, for deciding pleas and controversies among the miners.—Squire on the Anglo-Saxon Government.

Beria, Berie, or Berry, a large open field. Those cities and towns in England which end with this word are built on plain and open places, and do not derive their names from boroughs, as Spelman imagines. Most of our glossographers, in the names of places, have confounded the word berie with that of bury and borough as the appellatives of ancient towns; whereas the true sense of the word berie is a flat wide campaign, as is proved from sufficient authorities by the learned Du Fresne, who observes that Beria Sancti Edmundi, mentioned by Mat. Paris, sub ann. 1174, is not to be taken for the town, but for the adjoining plain. To this may be added, that many flat and wide meads and other open grounds are called by the name of berries and berryfields; the spacious meadow between Oxford and Isley was in the reign of King Athelstan, called Bery, as is now the largest pasture ground in Quarendon, in the county of Bucks, known by the name of Beryfield: and, though these meads have been interpreted demesne, or manor meadows, yet they were truly any flat or open meadows contiguous to a villa or farm.—Encyc. Lond.

Bermundi Insula, the ancient name of Bermondsey, in Surrey.

Bernet [fr. byran, Sax.], to burn.

Berra, a plain open heath.

Berry, or Bury [fr. beorg, Sax., a hill or castle], a villa or seat of habitation of a nobleman; a dwelling or mansion house; a sanctuary.

Bersa, a limit or bound.

Bersare [fr. bersn, Ger.], to shoot or hunt.

Berwick-upon-Tweed, a town which was originally part of Scotland, but is now part of the realm of England, and bound by all Acts of the British Parliament, whether specially named or otherwise (20 Geo. II. c. 42, s. 3). It is a county of a town corporate, and is no part of the county of Northumberland. See Hale's Hist. p. 257.

Besaile, or Besayle [fr. besaïeul, Fr.], a father of a grandfather, i.e. a great grandfather.

Bescha [fr. bescher, Fr., to dig], a spade or shovel.

Besoin, need. See AU BESOIN.

Bestials, beasts or cattle of any sort.

Betaches, laymen using glebe lands.

Bethlehem, a royal lunatic hospital. See 16 & 17 Vict. c. 96, s. 35.

Better equity. It thus arises:—if a prior incumbrancer did not take a security which effectually protected him against any subsequent dealing to his prejudice by the party who had the legal estate, a second incumbrancer taking a security, which in its nature afforded him that protection, had 'the better equity.'—Deark v. Hall and others; 3 Russ. 1–65.

Betting-Houses, the act for the suppression of, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119.

Beverches, bed works, or customary services done at the bidding of the lord by his inferior tenants.

Bewared, expended. Before the Britons and Saxons had introduced the general use of money, they traded chiefly by exchange of wares.

Bewray [fr. vrohjan, Goth., to accuse; wrongia, wrogia, wreia, Fris.; vregan, vregian, A. S.; roja, Sw., to discover; rügen, G.], properly to accuse, and then to point out or discover.—Wedgw.

Biæum [fr. βίαιον, Gk.], in rhetoric, a kind of counter argument, whereby something alleged for the adversary is retorted against him and made to conclude a different way; for instance, Occidisti, quia adstitisti interfecto. Βίαιον, Immo quia adstiti interfecto, non occidi; nam si id esset, in fugam me conjecissem. 'You killed the person, because you were found standing by the body. Biæum, Rather, I did not kill him, because I was found standing by his body; since, if that had been so, I should have run away.'

In the Grecian law, it was an action brought against those who ravished women, or used violence to man.—Encyc. Lond.

Biathanatoi [fr. βία, Gk., violence, and θάνατος, death], suicides or persons who meet violent deaths.

Bice Vaisya, a man of the third Hindu cast, who by birth is a trader or husbandman.

Bid [fr. beidan, Goth.; bidan, abidan, A. S., to look for: sed qu.], an offer to give a price for an article about to be sold at an auction.

Bidal, or Bidall [fr. biddan, Sax., to pray or supplicate], an invite of friends to drink ale at the house of some poor man, who hopes thereby to be relieved by charitable contribution. It is something like 'house-warming,' i.e. a visit of friends to a person beginning to set up house-keeping.—26 Hen. VIII. c. 6.

Bidder, a person who makes an offer at an auction, which he may retract before acceptance, although there may be a condition prohibiting it.

Bidding of the beade, a charge or warning given by the parish priest to his parishioners at some special time, to come to prayers upon any festival or saint's day, according to the canons of the church; also asking the banns is called bidding.—Rubric.

Biddings, raising the price of a thing at a sale or auction. The French call this enchérir. It answers to what the Romans called licitari; they used to bid by holding up the hand or finger.

Bidentes, two yearlings, tags, or sheep of the second year.—Paroch. Antiq. 216.

Biduana, a fasting for the space of two days. Matt. West. 135.

Biens, property; this term comprehends not merely goods and chattels, as in the common law, but also real estate, according to the sense attached to it by the civilians and continental jurists.—Story's Conf. Laws, 13.

Biga, a cart, wain, or wagon; a chariot drawn by two horses, harnessed side by side; or, properly, a cart with two wheels, sometimes drawn by one horse.

Bigamus, a person guilty of the offence of bigamy.

Bigamus seu trigamus, &c. est qui diversis temporibus et successivè duas seu tres uxores habuit.—4 Inst. 88.—(A bigamus or trigamus, &c. is one who at different times and successively has married two or three wives.)

Bigamy, the felonious offence of a husband or wife marrying again during the life of the first wife or husband. It is not strictly correct to call this offence bigamy; it is more properly denominated polygamy, i.e. having a plurality of wives or husbands at once; while bigamy, according to the canonists, consists in marrying two virgins successively, one after the death of the other, or in once marrying a widow. The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57, provides that 'Whosoever, being married, shall marry any other person during the life of the former husband or wife, whether the second marriage shall have taken place in England or Ireland, or elsewhere, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years, and not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour; and any such offence may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determinated, and punished in any county or place in England or Ireland where the offender shall be apprehended or be in custody, in the same manner in all respects as if the offence had been actually committed in that county or place; provided that nothing in this section contained shall extend to any second marriage contracted elsewhere than in England or Ireland, by any other than a subject of Her Majesty, or to any person marrying a second time, whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years then last past, and shall not have been known by such person to be living within that time, or shall extend to any person who at the time of such second marriage shall have been divorced from the bond of the first marriage, or to any person whose former marriage shall have been declared void by the sentence of any court of competent jurisdiction.' A prosecution for this crime must be supported by evidence of the first and second marriages of the prisoner, and of the existence of the first wife or husband at the time of the second marriage. If the first marriage be void, an indictment for bigamy cannot be sustained. Thus, if a woman marry A, and in the lifetime of A, marry B, and after the death of A, and whilst B is alive, marry C, she cannot be indicted for bigamy in her marriage with C, because her marriage with B was a mere nullity. Proof, however, of a marriage which is voidable merely will support an indictment for bigamy. The first wife or husband is not a competent witness to prove any part of the case, but the second wife or husband is, after the first marriage is established, for she or he is not legally a wife or husband. See Roscoe's Crim. Law.

Bilagines, by laws of corporations, &c.

Bilanciis deferendis, an obsolete writ addressed to a corporation for the carrying of weights to such a haven, there to weigh the wool anciently licensed for transportation.—Reg. Orig. 270.

Bilateral contract, a contract in which both the contracting parties are bound to fulfil obligations reciprocally towards each other; as a contract of sale, where one becomes bound to deliver the thing sold, and the other to pay the price of it.—Civil Law.

Bilboes [fr. boja, Lat.; boia, Prov.; buie, O. Fr., fetters], a punishment at sea answering to the stocks on land.

Bilinguis, one who uses two tongues or languages; also a jury, part Englishmen and part foreigners, to try a foreigner for a crime.

Bill [fr. bulla, M. Lat., a seal], an account; also a document submitted to parliament, in which are contained certain propositions for its consideration. If approved of, it is passed, and becomes law in the shape of a statute.

The business which occupies nearly the whole attention of both Houses of Parliament (except the hearing of appeals by the Lords, and the trial of controverted elections by the Commons) is the passing of bills and the presentation of petitions. Bills are the drafts or skeletons of statutes. They are either (1) public, affecting the general interests of the state; or (2) private, enabling private individuals, associated together, to undertake works of public utility at their own risk, and, in a degree, for their own benefit; and also relating to naturalisation, change of name, or for perfecting titles to estates, &c. Public bills may originate in either house, unless they be for granting supplies of any kind, or unless they involve directly or indirectly the levying or appropriation of any tax or fine, for then they must be initiated in the Commons; so must all private bills, which authorise the levying of local tolls or rates. Estate, peerage, and naturalisation bills are commenced in the Lords. To bring a private bill into parliament, certain notices and advertisements must be given, and certain plans and documents deposited, according to the standing orders of the houses; a petition must then be presented by a member, which usually sets forth the object desired. This petition is referred to an officer, who reports to the house that the standing orders have been complied with, when leave is given to bring in the bill. A public bill is brought into the House of Commons upon motion made to the house for leave to bring it in; but in the House of Lords a previous permission is unnecessary. The bill is presented to the house and then printed. In the House of Lords, if the bill begin there, it is, when of a private nature, referred to two of the judges to examine and report the state of the facts alleged, to see that all necessary parties consent, and to settle all points of technical propriety. A public bill is read a first time, and, at a convenient interval, a second time; and, after each reading, the Speaker states when the next stage will be taken. The introduction of the bill may be opposed at once, as the bill itself may at any stage. If the opposition succeed the bill must be dropped for that session. After the second reading the bill is considered in committee of the whole house. It is there debated clause by clause, amendments may be made, the blanks supplied, and sometimes it is entirely remodelled. After it has gone through the committee the chairman reports it to the house, with such amendments as the committee have made, and then the house reconsiders the whole bill, and the question is put upon every amendment. When the house has agreed or disagreed to the amendments of the committee, and sometimes added new amendments of its own, the bill is ordered to be reprinted, after which it is read a third time, and amendments are sometimes even then made to it and further clauses added. The Speaker then puts the question whether the bill shall pass. If this is agreed to the title to it is settled. After this the bill as passed is printed, and a deputed member, attended by several more, carries it to the bar of the Lords, delivers it to their speaker, and desires their concurrence. It there passes through the same forms as in the other house, and, if rejected, no more notice of it is taken, but the matter passes sub silentio, to prevent unbecoming altercations. But if it be agreed to, the Lords send a message to the Commons that they have agreed to the bill. The bill remains with the Lords if they have made no amendment to it; but if any amendments be made such amendments are sent down with the bill to receive the concurrence of the Commons. If the Commons disagree to the amendments a conference usually follows between members deputed from either house, who, for the most part, settle and adjust the difference; but if both houses remain inflexible, the bill is then dropped. If the Commons agree to the amendments the bill is sent back to the Lords, by one of the members, with a message to acquaint them therewith. The same forms are observed, mutatis mutandis, when the bill begins in the House of Lords. And when both houses have done with the bill it is deposited in the House of Peers to wait the royal assent; except in the case of a bill of supply, which, after receiving the concurrence of the Lords, is sent back to the House of Commons, to be by them presented at the bar of the Lords to the Sovereign or the Royal Commissioners. Acts of amnesty are read only once in each house.

Bill of Adventure. See ADVENTURE, BILL OF.

Bill of Appeal, an abolished criminal prosecution.—59 Geo. III. c. 46.

Bill of Attainder, a bill declaring persons attainted and their property confiscated.

Bill-book, a book in which an account of promissory notes, bills of exchange, and other bills payable or receivable, is stated: it should show the date of the bill, the term it has to run before it becomes due, the names of all the parties to it, and the time of its becoming due, together with the account for which it was given.

Bill Chamber, a department of the Court of Session in Scotland.

Bill in Chancery, or Bill in Equity, a printed or written statement of a plaintiff's case, which is in the nature of a petition to the Court, praying for some redress. It was probably borrowed from the civil law or from the canon law (which is a derivative from the civil law), or from both.

Bills are distributable into two classes, thus:—

I. ORIGINAL, initiating a suit relating to matters not before litigated: divided into—

(a) Praying relief, such are bills—

(1) Seeking a decree as to some right claimed, or wrong done or threatened.
(2) Of Interpleader.
(3) Of Certiorari.
(4) Quia timet.
(5) Of Peace.

(b) Not Praying relief, such are bills—

(1) To perpetuate testimony, or to examine witnesses de bene esse.
(2) Of Discovery (technically so called).

II. Not ORIGINAL or SECONDARY, otherwise called IN THE NATURE OF ORIGINAL BILLS, for controverting, suspending, or reversing a decree or order, or carrying it into execution, or for cross litigation: such are bills—

(1) Of Review.
(2) In the nature of a Bill of Review.
(3) Supplemental, in the nature of a Bill of Review.
(4) Impeaching a decree for fraud.
(5) To suspend a decree or to avoid it for subsequent matter.
(6) To execute a decree in a former suit.
(7) Combining two or more of the qualities of the six former species.
(8) And those called Cross-bills.

The bills not original or secondary, which were an addition to or in continuance of an original bill, such as supplemental bills and bills of revivor, are virtually abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, ss. 52, 53. See Consol. Ord. 1860, xxxii. r. 2. See Mitford, Story, or Welford on Equity Pleading. For the descriptions of the several bills, see their distinctive names, as Bill of Peace. See PEACE, BILL OF.

The constituent parts of a bill which make up its form are these:—

(1) The title of the Court, the Judge, and the names of the plaintiffs and defendants.

(2) The address to the Lord Chancellor.

(3) The names, descriptions, and residences of the plaintiffs, in order to give notice to all parties of the place of access to them. An executor or administrator need not describe himself as such in this part of the bill, though the fact of his having proved the will or obtained administration from the proper court should appear in the stating part of the bill.

(4) The statement of the plaintiff's case. A bill must contain, as concisely as may be, a narrative of the material facts, matters, and circumstances on which the plaintiff relies; such narrative being divided into paragraphs, numbered consecutively, and each paragraph containing, as nearly as may be, a separate and distinct statement or allegation; it is not to contain interrogatories for the examination of any defendant (15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 10). The charging part of a bill is not prohibited by the new law; and although it is not very often introduced, as it frequently tends to repetition, yet, when its aim is to give an answer by anticipation to a probable defence of the defendant, it may be material and should be inserted.

(5) A bill should pray specifically for the relief which the plaintiff conceives himself entitled to, and also for general relief. The advantage of the general prayer is, that if the plaintiff fail to obtain the relief as specially prayed, he may still get relieved under the general prayer, provided it be consistent with and not contradictory to his specific prayer. The Court will sometimes permit the case to stand over, with liberty to the plaintiff to amend his prayer, if imperfect, when it appears to the Court that he is clearly entitled to some relief.

(6) The names of the defendants.

(7) Counsel's signature, in order to guard against bills containing scandal, impertinence, or irrelevant matter of which the records of the Court might otherwise be made the vehicle.

(8) A note containing the name and address of the plaintiff's solicitor, and his town agent, if any.

The bill is drawn by counsel from instructions laid before him by the solicitor of the plaintiff or plaintiffs, if more than one, who must cooperate and act together in all proceedings taken in the suit, and cannot adopt inconsistent proceedings, their interests being joint; they must also retain one and the same solicitor. The draft of the bill must be signed by counsel, who is responsible for its contents. The bill, having been duly prepared and settled, must be printed on writing royal paper, quarto, in pica type leaded (trifling alterations in writing, such as the correction of names, &c., being permitted); and the copy to be filed must be interleaved with paper of the same description, and stamped with a chancery fee fund stamp of 1*l*. It is then delivered to the Clerk of Records and Writs, in whose division the cause is, for the purpose of having it filed, so as to become a record of the Court. The Clerk marks the number and the year upon the bill, and such number is retained on all pleadings in the same suit, thereby affording a facility of reference.

There are three exceptions to the rule of filing in the first instance a printed bill, for it is provided that the Clerks of Records and Writs shall receive and file a written copy on paper (duly stamped) of a bill, praying either (1) a writ of injunction, or (2) a writ of ne exeat regno, or (3) filed for the purpose, either solely or among other things, of making an infant a ward of Court, upon the personal undertaking of the plaintiff or his solicitor, written at the foot of the bill, to file a printed copy of such bill, which needs not a further filing stamp, within fourteen days, which bill, so filed, is to be deemed and taken to have been filed at the time of filing the written copy of it. Should a printed copy not be filed, pursuant to this undertaking, the Clerk of Records and Writs will take the printed bill off the file; and the defendant can obtain his costs to be taxed by the Master, upon producing to him a certificate from the Clerk of Records and Writs that a printed bill has not been filed; and can recover them from the plaintiff in the ordinary manner, no order of the Court being necessary. A plaintiff will not, perhaps, adopt this practice, unless in a case of extreme urgency, since the costs of a written bill will not be allowed, unless the Court orders them, when disposing of the general costs of the cause (15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 6; Consol. Ord. 1860, ix. r. 4). At the time of filing his bill the plaintiff must elect the Court before which he desires his cause to be heard; and this is signified by his writing at or near the top of the bill, 'Master of the Rolls,' 'Vice-Chancellor,' and naming one of the vice-chancellors, and writing 'Lord Chancellor' above the name. The Lord Chancellor may remove a cause from one court to another by special order. Consult Smith, Daniell, or Ayckbourn's Chan. Prac.

Bill of Conformity, a bill filed by an executor or administrator, when the affairs of the deceased are so much involved that he cannot safely administer the estate, except under the direction of a Court of Chancery.

Bill of Costs, an account of the charges and disbursements of an attorney or solicitor, incurred in the conduct of his client's business. It must be delivered, signed, to the client one calendar month before an action can be brought to recover the amount thereof, in order to give the client an opportunity of taxing it. Conveyancing costs are taxable. An executor or administrator of an attorney or solicitor must also deliver a bill of costs, signed, before he can sue upon it. See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.

Bill of Credit, a license or authority given in writing from one person to another, very common among merchants, bankers, and those who travel, empowering a person to receive or take up money of their correspondents abroad.

Bill in Criminal Cases, an indictment for a crime or misdemeanour preferred to a grand jury; evidence in support of it is adduced; if the grand jury think it a groundless accusation, they indorse 'not a true bill,' or 'not found,' and then the party is discharged without further answer, but a fresh bill may afterwards be preferred to a subsequent grand jury. If they are satisfied of the truth of the accusation, they then endorse upon it 'a true bill;' the indictment is then said to be found, and the party stands his trial.—4 Steph. Com. 445.

Bill of Debt, or Bill Obligatory, when a merchant by his writing acknowledges himself in debt to another, in a certain sum, to be paid on a certain day, and subscribes it at a day and place certain. It may be under seal or not.—Com. Dig. Merchant, F. 2.

Bill of Entry, an account of the goods entered at the Custom-house, both inwards and outwards. It must state the name of the merchant exporting or importing, the quantity and species of merchandise, and whither transported, and whence.

Bill of Exceptions, an appeal. If a judge, at the trial of a cause at Nisi Prius, mistake the law, either in directing a judgment of nonsuit, or in refusing demurrers to evidence, rejecting or admitting challenges to jurors, and other matters, the counsel for the party dissatisfied with the ruling of the judge, may tender a bill of exceptions at any time before verdict, and require the judge to seal it. The case always goes to the jury, and as soon as the bill of exceptions is completed, and judgment has been given upon the verdict, the mode of proceeding is by bringing error on the judgment, and having the matter determined in a Court of Error, and not in the Court out of which the record issued for the trial. The practice, however, of granting new trials has limited the number of cases in which counsel deem it expedient to tender a bill of exceptions.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 420.

Bill of Exchange, a negotiable security in the form of an open letter of request, or an order from one person to another, desiring him to pay, on his account, a sum of money therein mentioned, to a third person. It is consequently an assignment to a third person of a debt due to the person drawing the bill, from the person upon whom it is drawn. It is a chose in action, but, for the encouragement of commerce, it is assignable, at common law, by mere endorsement, so that very many names are frequently attached to one bill, and each of them is liable to be sued upon the bill, if it be not paid in due time. The person who makes or draws the bill is called the drawer, he to whom it is addressed is before acceptance, the drawee, and after accepting it, the acceptor; the person in whose favour it is drawn is the payee, or holder; if he endorse the bill to another, he is called the indorser, and the person to whom it is thus assigned or negotiated, is the indorsee or holder, and so on ad infinitum. The earliest recorded bills of exchange according to Beckmann (Hist. Invent. iii. 430) are mentioned by the jurist Baldus, and bear date A.D. 1328. But they were by no means in common use till the next century.—1 Hall. Litt. Hist. pt. 1, c. i., p. 53, n. (r). Consult Chitty, Story, or Byles on Bills.

Bill of Gross Adventure, an instrument in writing which contains a contract of bottomry, respondentia, and every species of maritime loan.—Fr. Law.

Bill of Health, a certificate or instrument, signed by consuls or other proper authorities, delivered to the masters of ships at the time of their clearing out from ports or places suspected of being particularly subject to infectious disorders, certifying the state of health at the time that such ship sailed. A clean bill imports that at the time the ship sailed no infectious disorder was known to exist. A suspected bill, commonly called a touched patent or bill, imports that there were rumours of an infectious disorder, but it had not actually appeared. A foul bill, or the absence of a clean bill, imports that the place was infected when the vessel sailed.—McCull. Com. Dict.

Bill of Indemnity, an Act of Parliament, passed every session, for the relief of those who have unwittingly or unavoidably neglected to take the necessary oaths, &c. required for the purpose of qualifying them to hold their respective offices.

Bill of Lading, a memorandum, signed by masters of ships, in their capacity of carriers, acknowledging the receipt of merchants' goods; of which there are usually three parts—one kept by the consignor, one sent to the consignee, and one preserved by the master. It is the evidence of the title to the goods shipped; and by its endorsement and delivery, the transfer of the property in the goods specified therein is generally effected. By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, the rights of suit under a bill of lading vest in the consignee or endorsee without prejudice to any right of stoppage in transitu or of freight.

Bill of Middlesex, a fictious mode of giving the Court of Queen's Bench jurisdiction in personal actions, by arresting a defendant for a supposed trespass when he was considered to be in the custody of the marshal, and then waiving the trespass, and proceeding against such defendant for any other cause of action, upon the ground that when a person was once brought into court, and either in the actual or supposed custody of the marshal, he could not be charged even for any civil matter elsewhere. The 2 Wm. IV. c. 39, abolished this fiction; and now, by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, all personal actions in the Superior Courts of Law at Westminster must be commenced by writ of summons.—Bagley's Prac. 71.

Bill of Pains and Penalties, a special Act of the Legislature which inflicts a punishment, less than death, upon persons supposed to be guilty of treason or felony, without any conviction in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. It differs from a bill of attainder in this, that the punishment inflicted by the latter is death.—4 Steph. Com. 379.

Bill of Parcels, an account given by the seller to the buyer, containing particulars of the goods bought, and of their price.

Bill of Particulars, a statement of a plaintiff's cause of action, or of a defendant's set-off.

Bill of Rights, a declaration delivered by the Lords and Commons to the Prince and Princess of Orange, 13 February 1689, and afterwards enacted in Parliament, when they became King and Queen. It sets forth that King James did, by the assistance of divers evil counsellors, endeavour to subvert the laws and liberties of this kingdom, by exercising a power of dispensing with and suspending of laws; by levying money for the use of the Crown by pretence of prerogative, without consent of Parliament; by prosecuting those who petitioned the king and discouraging petitions; by raising and keeping a standing army in time of peace; by violating the freedom of election of members to serve in Parliament; by violent prosecutions in the Court of King's Bench, and causing partial and corrupt jurors to be returned on trials; excessive bail to be taken; excessive fines to be imposed, and cruel punishments to be inflicted; all which were declared to be illegal. The declaration concludes in these remarkable words, 'And they do claim, demand, and insist upon all and singular the premises, as their undoubted rights and liberties.' And the Act of Parliament itself (1 W. & M. st. 2, c. 2), recognises all and singular the rights and liberties asserted and claimed in the said declaration, to be the true, ancient, indubitable rights of the people of this kingdom.

Bill of Sale, an assignment by deed of chattels-personal. It is important that the purchaser should take possession of the chattels, since the continuance of their possession by the vendor is a badge or presumption of fraud. It being notorious that bills of sale are frequently resorted to for the purpose of defeating just claims, they are watched with considerable jealousy, and the question arises in every case, Is it an honest or a covenous transaction? It is, however, quite legal to protect property for the general body of creditors against the execution of a particular creditor.

If it be an absolute bill of sale, then, unless there have been a bonâ fide substantial change of possession of the goods, an execution creditor cannot be defeated by it; and it must be an exclusive possession under the assignment, and not a concurrent possession with the assignor, otherwise it is fraudulent and void against creditors by 13 Eliz. c. 5, made perpetual by 29 Eliz. c. 5. Where, however, the bill of sale is conditional by way of mortgage, and possession is postponed until default, or it is in settlement, there the absence of transmutation seems to be no evidence of fraud, if in accordance with the terms of the assurance. It becomes a frequent enquiry, when the assignor is a trader, whether the bill of sale is fraudulent and an act of bankruptcy. It is so considered if it be void under the statute of Elizabeth; and also if it be of his whole property in consideration of a pre-existing debt; and so an assignment of a part of his property would be, if made voluntarily and in contemplation of bankruptcy. A debtor may, however, prefer one creditor to the rest, and assign property to him even after the others have begun actions against him, so that it be not in anticipation of bankruptcy (See Twyne's case, 3 Co. 80 [44 Eliz.], and 1 Smi. L. C. 1–24, where the principal cases are collected). By the reputed ownership clause in the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 125, the personalty, except ships, fixtures, and other immovable chattels, in the order, power, and disposition of a trader at the time of his bankruptcy, with consent of their true owner, vest in the assignees, under an order of the Court, which direct such goods to be sold (See 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 57, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, ss. 17–21, as to insolvency). Let it be observed that the distinction between absolute and conditional bills of sale in reference to the Act of Elizabeth, has no application to Bankruptcy or Insolvency with regard to reputed ownership, unless perhaps the conditional nature of the possession is notorious, so as to repel the presumption of absolute ownership arising from possession of the chattels. The authorities establish the doctrine that where a trader is permitted by the actual owner to hold himself out to the world as the reputed owner of goods and chattels, such trader shall be deemed the real owner. The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, passed to prevent frauds upon creditors by secret bills of sale of personal chattels, provides that every bill of sale, or a copy thereof, must be filed in the Court of Queen's Bench within twenty-one days after its execution, together with an affidavit of the time of such bill of sale being given and a description of the residence and occupation of the deponent, and of every attesting witness of such bill of sale, otherwise it will be void as against assignees in bankruptcy or insolvency and creditors. The residence and occupation of the attesting witness should appear on the bill of sale and also in the affidavit. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 91, s. 34, no copy of such bill of sale may be filed unless the original be produced, duly stamped. When, therefore, the only description of the attesting witness was in the affidavit to accompany registration, and therein he was described as 'of Liverpool, gentleman,' the fact being that he was an attorney's clerk, it was held insufficient, and the bill of sale invalid.—Tuton v. Sanoner, 3 H & N. 280. The law of reputed ownership is not affected by the Bills of Sale Act. Per Turner, L. J. in Stansfield v. Cubitt, 27 L. J. N. S., c. 266. The earliest bill of sale we read of in history was that given to Abraham by the sons of Heth, Gen. xxiii. 20.

Bill of Sight. When a merchant is ignorant of the real quantities or qualities of any goods assigned to him, so that he is unable to make a perfect entry of them, he must acquaint the collector or comptroller of the circumstance; and he is authorised, upon the importer or his agent making oath that he cannot, for want of full information, make a perfect entry, to receive an entry by bill of sight for the packages by the best description which can be given, and to grant warrant that the same may be landed and examined by the importer in presence of the officers; and within three days after any goods shall have been so landed, the importer shall make a perfect entry, and shall either pay the duties or shall duly warehouse the same.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 52, s. 24.

In default of perfect entry within three days, such goods are to be taken to the Queen's warehouse; and if the importer shall not within one month make perfect entry and pay the duties thereon, or on such parts as can be entered for home use, together with charges of moving and warehouse rent, such goods shall be sold for payment of the duties.—McCull. Com. Dict.

Bill of Store, a license granted at the Custom-house to merchants, to carry such stores and provisions as are necessary for a voyage custom free.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 52.

Bill of Sufferance, a license granted to a merchant, to suffer him to trade from one English port to another, without paying custom.

Bill in Trade (both wholesale and retail, and among workmen), an account of merchandize or goods delivered, or of work done and performed, &c.

Billa vera, a true bill.

Billeting [dim. of bill, a short note] Soldiers, finding quarters for them. This is regulated by the Annual Mutiny Acts.

Billets of Gold, wedges or ingots of gold.—27 Edw. III. c. 27.

Billiard Licenses, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109.

Bills of Mortality, returns of the deaths which occur within a certain district.

It was with the view of communicating to the inhabitants of London, to the Court, and the constituted authorities of the city, accurate information respecting the increase or decrease in the number of deaths, and the casualties of mortality occurring amongst them, that the Bills of Mortality were commenced in London after a visitation of the plague. The object of their publication was to calm exaggerated rumours, and to warn those who could do so conveniently to leave London, whenever the pestilence became more fatal than usual. The bills were commenced in 1592, during a time when the plague was busy with its ravages; but they were not continued uninterruptedly until the occurrence of another plague in 1603, from which period, up to the present time, they have been continued from week to week; excepting during the Great Fire, when the deaths of two or three weeks were given in one bill.

In 1605, the parishes comprised within the Bills of Mortality included the ninety-seven parishes within the walls, sixteen parishes without the walls, and six contiguous out-parishes in Middlesex and Surrey.

In 1626, the city of Westminster was included in the bills; in 1636, the parishes of Islington, Lambeth, Stepney, Newington, Hackney, and Redriff. Other additions were made from time to time. At present the weekly Bills of Mortality include the ninety-seven parishes within the walls, seventeen parishes without the walls, twenty-four out-parishes in Middlesex and Surrey, including the district churches and ten parishes in the city and liberties of Westminster. The parishes of Marylebone and St. Pancras, with some others, which at the beginning of the last century had only a population of 9,150 persons, but now contain a rapidly increasing inhabitancy, were never included in the bills.

It is evident that the apprehension or existence of the plague conferred upon the Bills of Mortality their chief value and interest. The Lord Mayor every week transmitted a copy to the Court. The reports are still professed to be made weekly to the 'Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, and the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor.'

The Bills of Mortality are now utterly valueless. In 1832, they reported 28,606 deaths, and in 1842 only 13,142; while the population had been constantly increasing at a rapid rate. In 1833, out of 26,577 deaths, the causes of decease were returned as unknown in 887 cases, or 1 in 30; and in 1842, out of 13,142 deaths, 4,638 are returned in which the cause of decease was unknown, or less than 1 in 3. The Company of Parish Clerks might at least have expected to have been supplied with the returns of mortality from the clerks of the metropolitan churches, but this is not the case.

The parish of St. George's, Hanover Square, ceased to make returns in 1823; and in 1832 the parishes of All Saints, Poplar, and St. John's, Wapping, followed its example; and in 1834 the clerks of St. Bartholomew the Less, and St. George's, Queen's Square, became defaulters. The fact is, that instead of 13,142 deaths being reported annually, there should be a much greater number. Besides the contumacious parishes which refuse to contribute to the formation of correct Bills of Mortality for the metropolis, there are no means by which the Parish Clerks' Company can procure returns of the burials in cemeteries, and in the places of interment belonging to dissenters; and the defects from this cause, in Maitland's time, now above a century since, exceeded 3,000 a year.

At the foot of the Bill of Mortality of 1837, there was a notice to the following effect:—'By the operation of the New Registration Act, much difficulty has occurred in obtaining the reports of christenings and burials, in consequence of which, in some parishes, the reports have been wholly withheld; and in those of several other parishes, where the office of searcher has been discontinued, the disease of which deaths have taken place has been necessarily omitted.' They were added to the 'unknown causes.' In the bill for 1842, as already noticed, the difficulty here spoken of had increased. The only 'true bill,' therefore, is that prepared at the Registrar General's office. The first of these weekly bills was commenced Jan. 11, 1840, and the series has been continued from that time without interruption.—Knight's London, cxl.

Binomium, Vinocium, Brinomium, Vinovia, Binovia, ancient names of Binchester, in the bishoprick of Durham.

Bipartite, of two parts.

Birds [fr. brida, the young of birds], all creatures with wings and feathers, whether small or large, wild or tame. Stealing, or killing with intent to steal, birds ordinarily kept in a state of confinement, or for any domestic purpose, not being the subject of larceny at common law, or being in possession of any such bird, or the plumage thereof, knowing the same to have been stolen, or unlawfully and maliciously killing, maiming, or wounding any bird being the subject of larceny at common law, or being ordinarily kept in a state of confinement, or for any domestic purpose, are offences punishable on summary conviction by fine or imprisonment. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 21 & 22, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 41. As to unlawfully and wilfully killing or wounding house doves or pigeons under circumstances not amounting to larceny at common law, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 23.

Birretum, or Birretus, a thin cap fitted close to the shape of the head, the cap or coif of a judge or serjeant at law.

Birth [fr. beorth, A. S.; bord, Sw.; geburt, G.; fr. beran, A. S., to bring forth], the act of coming into life. The Roman law did not consider an infant legitimate which was born later than ten months after the death of the father, or the dissolution of the marriage. The Prussian code declares that an infant born 302 days after the husband's death shall be deemed legitimate. The French civil code declares that a child born in wedlock has the husband of its mother for its father. He may, however, disavow it, if he can prove that, from the 100th to the 180th day before its birth, he was prevented, either by absence or some physical impossibility, from cohabiting with his wife. An infant born 180 days after marriage cannot be disavowed by him in the following cases:—(1) When he had knowledge of his wife's pregnancy before marriage. (2) When he assisted at the act of birth, and signed a declaration of it. (3) When the infant is declared incapable of living. Lastly, the legitimacy of an infant born 300 days after the dissolution may be contested. The Scotch law is concise and decisive. 'To fix bastardy on a child, the husband's absence must continue till within six lunar months of the birth; and a child born after the tenth month is accounted a bastard.' The English law does not prescribe a precise time. Although it has been the practice in our courts to consider forty weeks as the more usual time, yet they exercise a discretion of allowing a longer time, when the opinions of the faculty, or the peculiar circumstances of the case, are in favour of a protracted gestation.—Beck's Med. Juris. 377.

Births, Burials, and Marriages, the three most important events that can happen to a person, as to which the only regular documentary proofs, in former times, were contained in the parish registers, which are in the nature of records; examined extracts from them are received in courts of justice, and certificates, under the hand of the minister of the parish, are resorted to for private purposes.

By 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 86, amended by 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 22, a General Register Office is provided for keeping a register of births, deaths, and marriages in England. The act repeals so much of the 52 Geo. III. c. 146, and 4 Geo. IV. c. 76, as relates to the registration of marriages (s. 1), but does not affect the registration of baptisms and burials as by law established (s. 49).

The form for general registration of births comprises the time of birth, name, and sex of the child; the name, surname, maiden surname, and profession of the parents; the signature, description, and residence of the informant (who must be the father or mother, or, in case of their inability, the occupier of the house, s. 20); the date of registration and signature of the registrar, and also the child's baptismal name (if any be given after registration, within six months).

That for deaths comprises the time of death, name, and surname, sex, age, profession, and cause of death of the deceased; the signature, description, and residence of the informant (who must be some person present at the death, or in attendance during the last illness, or else the occupier of the house, s. 25), with the date of registration and the signature of the registrar.

And the universal form for registration of marriages comprises the date of the marriage; the name and surname, age, condition, profession, residence, father's name and surname, and father's profession of each of the parties; together with the place and form of marriage; and the signatures of the person marrying the parties, and of two witnesses.

Searches may be made and certified copies obtained at the General Registrar Office, or at the Office of the Superintendent Registrar of the district, or from the clergyman, or registrar, or any other person who shall, for the time being, have the keeping of the register books.

By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 92, provision is made for depositing with the Registrar-General a number of non-parochial registers and records of births, baptisms, deaths, burials, and marriages, which had been collected by a commission appointed for that purpose, and for rendering such registers and records available as evidence. See 21 Vict. c. 25.

As to the registration of births, deaths, and marriages in Scotland, see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 80; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 29; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 85.

Bisantium, Besantine, Bezant, an ancient coin, first issued at Constantinople; it was of two sorts—gold, equivalent to a ducat, valued at 9*s.* 6*d.*; and silver, computed at 2*s.* They were both current in England.

Bi-scot, a fine of 2*s.* for not repairing banks, ditches, and causeways.

Bishop [fr. ἐπίσκοπος, Gk.; biscop, Sax.], an overseer or superintendent. The chief of the clergy in his diocese or jurisdiction in England, Wales, or Ireland, and the archbishop's suffragan or assistant. A bishop is elected by the Queen's congé d'élire, or license to elect the person named by the Queen, in a letter missive, addressed to the dean and chapter; and if they fail to make election in twelve days, the Queen, by letters-patent, may nominate whom she pleases. A bishop is said to be installed, and there are four things necessary to his complete title:—(1) election, which resembles the presentation of a clerk to an ecclesiastical benefice; (2) confirmation, resembling admission; (3) consecration, similar to institution; (4) installation, answering to induction. The bishops are the lords spiritual in parliament. There are twenty-five bishopricks in England, besides the bishoprick of Sodor and Man, the bishop of which is not a lord of parliament; and eighteen in Ireland (13 & 14 Vict. c. 94). A bishop has three powers:—(1) a power of ordination, gained on his consecration, by which he confers orders, &c. in any place throughout the world; (2) a power of jurisdiction throughout his see or his bishoprick; (3) a power of administration and government of the revenues thereof, gained on confirmation. He has, also, a Consistory Court, to hear ecclesiastical causes, and visits and superintends the clergy of his diocese. He consecrates churches and institutes priests, confirms, suspends, excommunicates, and grants licenses for marriages. He has his archdeacon, dean and chapter, chancellor, who holds his courts and assists him in matters of ecclesiastical law, and vicar-general. He grants leases for three lives, or twenty-one years, reserving the accustomed yearly rent; and he is addressed as 'My Lord,' being 'A Right Reverend Father in God by Divine permission Bishop of ——.'

Bishopfick, a diocese or see of a bishop.

Bis idem exigi bona fides non patitur; et in satisfactionibus, non permittitur ampliùs fieri quam semel factum est.—9 Co. 53.—(Good faith does not suffer the same thing to be exacted twice, and in giving damages, it is not allowed to give more than is given at once).

Bishop's Court, an ecclesiastical court, held in the cathedral of each diocese, the judge whereof is the bishop's chancellor, who judges by the civil canon law; and if the diocese be large, he has his commissaries in remote parts, who hold consistory courts, for matters limited to them by their commission.

Bissextile [fr. bis, Lat., twice, and sextilis, the sixth], leap year, consisting of 366 days, and happening every fourth year, by the addition of a day in the month of February, which, in that year, consists of twenty-nine days. Leap year is introduced in order to make up for the loss of the six hours by which the course of the sun annually exceeds the 365 days allowed for it in other years. The day thus added was by Julius Cæsar appointed to be the day before the 24th of February, which, among the Romans, was the sixth of the calends, and which, on this occasion, was reckoned twice; whence it was called the bissextile. By 21 Hen. III. to prevent misunderstanding the intercalary day and that next before it are to be accounted as one day. The supernumerary day, in leap years, is added to the end of February and called the 29th of that month.—Encyc. Lond.; 1 Reeves, c. v. p. 266. See CALENDAR, post.

Black [fr. blakowaé, to lose colour; bleknut, Russ., to wither; bleich, G., bleek, Du., pale, a total absence of all colour]. Black Act, 9 Geo. I. c. 22, so called because it was occasioned by the outrages committed by persons with their faces blacked or otherwise disguised, who appeared in Epping Forest, near Waltham, in Essex, and destroyed the deer there, and committed divers other enormities. Repealed by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27.

Black Acts, acts printed in the old black letter, during the dynasty of the Stewarts in Scotland.

Black book, a book kept in the Exchequer, and at the Admiralty.

Black game, heath fowl, in contradistinction to red game, as grouse.

Black mail [fr. maile, Fr., a small piece of money], a certain rent of money, coin, or other thing, anciently paid to persons upon or near the borders, who were men of influence, and allied with certain robbers and brigands for protection from the devastations of the latter; rendered illegal by 43 Eliz. c. 13. Also rent paid in cattle, otherwise called neat-gild; and all rents not paid in silver are called reditus nigri (black mail or rents), by way of distinction from the reditus albi (blanch-firmes, or white-rents).

Black Rod, Gentleman Usher of, a chief officer of the Queen, deriving his name from the Black Rod of office, on the top of which reposes a golden lion, which he carries. During the session of parliament he attends on the peers, and to his custody all peers impeached for any crime or contempt are first committed.—Black Book, 255.

Black ward, a subvassal, who held ward of the king's vassal.

Bladarius, a corn-monger, mealman, or corn-chandler.

Blade, fruit, corn, hemp, flax, herbs, &c.

Blanch firmes. In ancient times the crown rents were many times reserved in libris albis or blanch firmes, in which case the buyer was holden dealbare firmam, i. e. his base money or coin, below standard, was melted down in the Exchequer, and reduced to the fineness of standard silver, or, instead thereof, he paid twelve pence in the pound by way of addition.—Lowndes on Coins, 5.

Blanch holding, an ancient tenure of the law of Scotland, the duty payable being trifling, as a penny or a peppercorn, &c., if required.—20 Geo. II. c. 50; 25 Geo. II. c. 20.

Blancoforda, the ancient name of Blandford, in Dorsetshire.

Blancum Castrum, Blane Castle, in Monmouthshire.

Blank bar, common bar, the name of a plea in bar, which, in an action of trespass, is resorted to to compel the plaintiff to assign the place where a trespass was committed.

Blank bonds, Scotch securities, in which the creditor's name was left blank, and which passed by mere delivery, the bearer being at liberty to put in his name and sue for payment. Declared void by the Act 1696, c. 25.

Blank indorsement, when the name of the indorsee is not mentioned.

Blanks [fr. blanc, Fr., white; blanchir, to make white; fr. blinken, G., to glitter], a kind of white money (value 8*d.*), coined by Henry V. in those parts of France which were then subject to England; forbidden to be current in this realm by 2 Hen. VI. c. 9. Also, certain void spaces, sometimes left by mistake, in judicial proceedings, and which, if anything material be wanting, render the same void.

Blasphemy [fr. βλα΄πτω, Gk., to hurt, and φήμη, reputation; βλασφημέω, to speak impiously; blasphemo, Lat., to revile.—Wedgw.], an offence against God and religion, by denying to the Almighty his Being and Providence, or by contumelious reproaches of our Saviour Christ. Also, all profane scoffing at the Holy Scripture, and exposing it to contempt and ridicule. It is both a spiritual and temporal offence. It is an offence at Common Law, for the Scriptures are the common law, upon which all other laws are founded. It is not lawful to publish even a correct account of the proceedings in a court of justice, if such an account contain matter of a scandalous, blasphemous, and indecent nature. Punishable by fine and imprisonment, or corporal punishment.—1 Geo. IV. c. 8; 4 Bl. Com. 59; 2 Sam. xii. 14; Tit. ii. 5; Rev. xiii. 6.

Blatum bulgium, the ancient name of Bulness, in Cumberland.

Blaunpain, alias Blanepain, Whitbread.

Ble, sight, colour, &c.

Blench, Blench-holding. See ALBA FIRMA.

Blestium, the ancient name of Old Town, in Herefordshire.

Bleta [fr. blêche, Fr.], peat or combustible earth dug up and dried for burning.

Blinks, boughs broken down from trees and thrown in a way where deer are likely to pass.

Blockade [fr. bloccato, Ital., military term], the disposition of troops or armed vessels, so as to cut off all external communication with an enemy's port, fortress, city, &c. The term is now generally applied to the blockade of a port by armed vessels. The two essential circumstances necessary to make a good blockade, are—(1) that there be actually stationed at the place a sufficient force to prevent the entry or exit of vessels; and (2) that the party violating it shall be proved to have been aware of its existence. With regard to neutral vessels lying at the place where the blockade commences, the rule is, that they may retire freely after the notification of the blockade, taking with them the cargoes with which they may be already laden; but they must not take in any new cargo. The effect of a violation of blockade to the offending party, when captured, is the condemnation usually of both the ship and the cargo. If, however, it can be shown that the parties to whom the cargo belongs were not implicated in the offence committed by the master of the ship, the cargo will be restored. It has sometimes, on the contrary, happened that the owners of the cargo have been found to have been the only guilty parties, in which case the judgment has been for condemnation of the cargo and the restitution of the ship.

Blood [fr. bloed, Du.; blut, G.], kindred, lineage. It is a maxim that none shall claim as heir, who is not of the blood (i. e. kindred) of the purchaser.—Co. Litt. 12 a.

Bloodwit, or Bloudveit [fr. blod, Sax., blood, and wyte, Old Eng., pity], an amercement for bloodshed; a customary fine, paid as a composition and atonement for shedding or drawing of blood.—Paroch. Antiq. A riot wherein blood was spilled.—Scotch Law.

Bloody hand. See BACKBERIND.

Blossevilla, the ancient name of Bloville, Blofield.

Board [fr. berd, Du.; brett, G., a plank or table], an office under the control of the executive government, as the Board of Trade, the Board of Works, the Board of Admiralty, the Board of Ordnance, the Board of Health, the Board of Charities, the Poor Law Board, and the Board of Control, the business of which departments is conducted by officers specially appointed for that purpose; also an assembly of directors or officers for the despatch of business.

Boc, a charter.—Ang. Sax.

Bock-hord, or Book-hoard, a place where books, documentary evidence, or writings are kept.

Bock-land, Boc-land, or Book-land, one of the original modes of tenure of manor land, also called charter-land or deed-land, which was held by a short and simple deed under certain rents and free services, and in effect differed in no respect from the free-socage lands, whence have arisen most of the freehold tenants, who hold of particular manors, and owe suit and service to the same.—2 Bl. Com. 90.

It was land that had been severed by an act of government from the folcland, and converted into an estate of perpetual inheritance. It might belong to the church, to the king, or to a subject. It might be alienable and devisable at the will of the proprietor; it might be limited in its descent without any power of alienation in the possessor. It was often granted for a single life or for more lives than one, with remainder in perpetuity to the church. It was forfeited for various delinquencies to the state.

Estates in perpetuity were usually created by charter after the introduction of writing, and on that account bocland and land of inheritance are often used as synonymous expressions. But at an earlier period they were conferred by the delivery of a staff, a spear, an arrow, a drinking horn, the branch of a tree, or a piece of turf; and when the donation was in favour of the church, these symbolical representations of the grant were deposited with solemnity on the altar; nor was this practice entirely laid aside after the introduction of title-deeds. There are instances of it as late as the time of the Conqueror. It is not therefore quite correct to say that all the lands of the Anglo-Saxons were either folcland or bocland. When land was granted in perpetuity, it ceased to be folcland; but it could not with propriety be termed bocland, unless it was conveyed by a written instrument.

Bocland was released from all services to the public, with the exception of contributing to military expeditions, and to the reparation of castles and bridges. These duties or services were comprised in the phrase—trinoda necessitas, which was said to be incumbent on all persons, so that none could be excused from them. The church indeed contrived, in some cases, to obtain an exemption from them, but in general its lands, like those of others, were subject to them. Some of the charters granting to the possession of the church an exemption from all services whatever, are genuine; but the greater part of them are forgeries.

Bocland might, nevertheless, be subjected to the payment of an annual rent to the state by its original charter of creation. We have an instance of this among the deeds of Worcester Cathedral, collected by Heming. Æthelbald, King of the Mercians, had, it appears, granted to Eanulf, grandfather of Offa, an estate of inheritance, burthened with an annual payment of ale, corn, cattle, and other provisions to a royal vill; and this estate, with the rent-charge attached to it, Offa afterwards gave in remainder to the see of Worcester, after his own life and that of his sons. Bocland might be held by freemen of all ranks and degrees.

The estate of the higher nobility consisted chiefly of bocland. Bishops and abbots might have bocland of their own, in addition to what they held in right of the church.

The Anglo-Saxon kings had private estates of bocland, and these estates did not merge in the crown, but were devisable by will, gift, or sale, and transmissible by inheritance, in the same manner as bocland by a subject.

Bodotria, the ancient name of Edinburgh Firth.

Boduna, the people of Gloucestershire and Oxfordshire were formerly called so.

Body politic [fr. bodig, As.; bodhag, Gael.], the nation; also a corporation.

Boilary, water arising from a salt well belonging to a person who is not the owner of the soil.

Boiling to death, the punishment for poisoning inflicted by 22 Hen. III. c. 9, which was repealed by 1 Edw. VI. c. 12.

Bois, wood; sub-bois, underwood.

Bois saillis [Fr.], a coppice or copse. The latter words are derived from κόπαδες, Gk., fr. κόπτω, to cut; arbores cædere, Lat.

Bolerium prom. See ANTIVESTŒUM.

Bolhagium, or Boldagium, a little house or cottage.

Bolt, a long narrow piece of silk or stuff.

Bolting [fr. bolt, Sax., a house], a private arguing of cases in our inns of court.

Bombay, Bishopric of, founded by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 85.

Bona, this term, according to the civil law, includes all sorts of property, movable and immovable.—Story's Confl. Laws, 375.

Bona confiscata, property forfeited for crime to the fiscus or public treasury.

Bona fassato de, Goodrick.

Bonâ fide, with good faith, implying the absence of all fraud or unfair dealing or acting, whether it consists in simulation or dissimulation. This term frequently occurs in the Roman jurists. It can only be defined with reference to things opposed to it, namely mala fides and dolus malus, both of which phrases, and especially the latter, are often used in a technical sense.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Bonâ fide possessor facit fructus consumptos suos.—(A bonâ fide possessor makes the profits which have been consumed his own.)

Bona fides non patitur ut idem bis exigatur. (Good faith suffers not that the same thing should be twice exacted.)

Bonæ fidei possessor, in id tantum quod ad se pervenerit, tenetur.—2 Inst. 285.—(A tenant is bound to good faith in that only which may come to him.)

Bona forufacta, goods forfeited; called by the civilians bona confiscata, because they belonged to the fiscus, or imperial treasury.

Bona gestura, good behaviour.

Bona mobilia, movable effects and goods.

Bona notabilia, notable goods. They are fixed by express canon (excepting in London, where the sum is 10*l.*), to be legal personal estate to the value of 5*l.* or upwards; though if several personal things, each under the value of 5*l.* but collectively worth more than that sum, be disposed in several dioceses, they constitute bona notabilia. A mere claim in the nature of a debt, however difficult to recover, if by possibility it may exceed 5*l.* is bona notabilia, but not a devise for the payment of debts, that being merely equitable assets.—1 Chit. Gen. Prac. 523; and 1 Wms. Ex. 265, et seq. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95, which regulate the proceedings of the Probate Court, and abolished the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts as to wills and administration.

Bona patria, an assize of countrymen or good neighbours; it is sometimes called assiza bonæ patriæ, when twelve or more men are chosen out of any part of the country to pass upon an assize. The persons composing it are called juratores, because they are to swear judicially in the presence of the party, &c., according to the practice of Scotland.—Skene.

Bona peritura, perishable goods.

Bona vacantia, stray goods. Those things in which nobody claims a property, and which belong to the crown, by virtue of its prerogative.—1 Bl. Com. 298.

Bonaught, or Bonaughty, an exaction imposed on the people of Ireland, at the will of the lord, for relief of the knights called Bonaghti, who served in the wars.—Antiq. Hibern. 60.

Bona Villa, de, Bonevil.

Bona waviata, goods waved or thrown away by a thief in his flight, for fear of being apprehended. They are given to the crown by the law, as a punishment upon the owner for not himself pursuing the felon and taking away his goods from him.—1 Bl. Com. 296.

In the Roman law it was originally the property which a person left at his death, without having disposed of it by will, and without leaving any heres. Such property was open to occupancy; and so long as the strict laws of inheritance existed, such an event must not have been uncommon. A remedy was, however, found for this by the bonorum possessio of the prætor.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Boncha [fr. bonna or bunna, Old Lat.], a rising bank, the bounds of fields.

Bond [fr. bindan, band, bunden, A.S., to bind], a written acknowledgment or binding of a debt under seal. When a bond is given by a simple contract debtor to his creditor, the debt is merged in the specialty. No technical form of words is necessary to constitute a bond. The person giving the bond is called the obligor, and he to whom it is given the obligee. A bond is called single when it is without a penalty, and an obligation when it contains a penalty, which is generally double the amount of the principal sum secured, although only the sum actually owing, with interest, can be recovered. See 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, ss. 12 & 13; and 8 & 9 Wm. III. c. 11, s. 8. An infant may bind himself to pay for necessaries by a single bond, but not by an obligation with a penalty. The question as to what are necessaries depends upon the real circumstances of the infant, and not upon his ostensible situation.

If one of several obligees release the obligor, the rest are barred of their remedy. If a bond be given to three obligees jointly, two cannot sue thereon unless they shew that the third is dead; but where the obligation is several, each may maintain an action for his several debt.

If two or more bind themselves in a bond jointly and severally, the obligee may sue them all jointly, or he may sue any one of them, but if they are jointly and not severally bound the obligee must sue them jointly. For the purpose of enabling an obligee to sue two or more of the obligors alone without joining the others, there must be in the bond a severance of any four, three, or two of them, according to the number of the obligors.

The representatives of a deceased joint-obligor are discharged at law, but are liable in equity, where the bond, by mistake, was made joint only, or the joint-obligors were partners. Where, however, it appears on the face of the bond that the intention was to make it joint and several, it will be then so treated at law, though joint only in form. Where two or more persons are expressed to be jointly and severally bound, and one of them does not execute the bond, it is only the several bond of those executing it, unless there were a severance of the obligation, when it would be their joint and several bond.

A bond conditioned either to do something which is malum in se or malum prohibitum, or to omit the doing of something which is a duty, or to encourage such crimes and omissions, is void. A bond may be valid in part and void in part, if such parts are separable.

The 9 Geo. IV. c. 94, after reciting that it is expedient that certain bonds, covenants and other assurances, for resignation of ecclesiastical preferments should be valid, enacts, 'That every engagement by promise, grant, agreement, or covenant, which shall be really and bonâ fide made, given, or entered into, at any time after 28th July, 1828, for the resignation of any spiritual office, being a benefice with cure of souls, dignity, prebend, or living ecclesiastical, to the intent or purpose to be manifested by the terms of such engagement, that any one person whosoever, to be specially named and described therein, or one or (sic) two persons, to be specially named and described therein, each of them being by blood or marriage an uncle, son, grandson, brother, nephew, or grandnephew of the patron, shall be presented, collated, nominated, or appointed to such spiritual office, or that the same shall be given or bestowed to or upon him, shall be good, valid, and effectual in the law, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, and the performance of the same may also be enforced in equity. Provided always that such engagement shall be so entered into before the presentation, nomination, collation, or appointment of the party so entering into the same as aforesaid (ss. 1 & 2). The bond must be deposited within two calendar months of its date with the registrar of the diocese, or peculiar jurisdiction wherein the benefice is situated, paying him 2*s*. It can be there inspected, and a certified copy, which is admissible as evidence, obtained (s. 4, and see ss. 3, 5, & 6).

There are two kinds of post obit bonds: (1) Where the sum secured is greater than the sum borrowed, but to be payable only upon a contingency such as the obligor-expectant surviving his ancestor. (2) Where the sum secured is greater than the sum borrowed, but it is to be paid on the death of a particular person, whether the obligor be then alive or not, the time of payment being contingent only. The usury laws were abolished by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 90. See Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Ves. 125 (1751), and 1 Wh. & Tud. L. C. 344-405, as to the interference of Equity in the case of frauds upon expectant heirs.

Bonds to procure marriage (or marriage brocage bonds), or to restrain marriage, or for immoral considerations, such as future, but not past, cohabitation, and also in total, but not partial, restraint of trade are void.

Bondage, slavery; also a kind of tenure or occupation.

Bond-creditor, a creditor whose debt is secured by a bond.

Bondsman, a surety.

Bond-tenants, copyholders and customary tenants are sometimes so called.—Calthorp on Customs of London.

Boni judicis est ampliare jurisdictionem.—Chan. Prac. 329.—(It is the part of a good judge to enlarge jurisdiction.)

The late Lord Abinger, in Russell v. Smyth, 9 M. & Wels. 818, observed that 'the maxim of the English law is, to amplify its remedies, and without usurping jurisdiction, to apply its rules to the advancement of substantial justice.' When rules of law have been found to work injustice, they have been evaded instead of being repealed. Obsolete or unsuitable laws, instead of being removed from the statute-book, have been made to bend to modern usages and feelings. Instead of the legislature framing new provisions, as occasion has required, it has been left to able judges to invade its province, and arrogate to themselves the lofty privilege of correcting abuses and introducing improvements. The rules are thus left in the breasts of the judges, instead of being put upon a right footing by legislative enactment. Much of the evil is, no doubt, attributable to the supineness of the legislature, something to the narrowness of the rules of the Common Law; but the principal share, to the want of a proper understanding at what point interpretation ought to end, and legislation begin.—Dwarris on the Statutes, 792. Lord Wensleydale, then Mr. Baron Parke, in Mirehouse v. Renwell, 8 Bing. 515, on error in the House of Lords, thus expounds the true judicial feeling and determination in Westminster Hall:—'The precise facts stated by your Lordships have never, as far as we can learn, been adjudicated upon in any court, nor is there to be found any opinion of them of any of our judges, or of those ancient text-writers to whom we look up as authorities. The case, therefore, is in some sense, new, as are many others which continually occur; but we have no right to consider it because it is new, as one for which the law has not provided at all, and because it has not been decided, to decide it for ourselves, according to our own judgment of what is just and expedient. Our Common Law system consists in applying to new combinations of circumstances, those rules of law which we derive from legal principles and judicial precedents; and for the sake of attaining uniformity, consistency, and certainty, we must apply these rules when they are not plainly unreasonable or inconvenient, to all cases which arise; and we are not at liberty to reject them, and abandon all analogy to them, in those to which they have not hitherto been judicially applied, because we think that the rules are not as convenient or reasonable as we ourselves could have devised. It appears to me to be of great importance to keep this principle of decision steadily in view, not merely for the determination of the particular case, but for the interests of law as a science.'

Boni judicis est causas litium dirimere.—2 Inst. 306.—(It is the duty of a good judge to take away the occasions of litigation.)

Boni judicis est judicium sine dilatione mandare executioni.—Co. Litt. 289.—(It is the duty of a good judge to commit judgment to execution without delay.)

Boni judicis est lites dirimere; et interest reipublicæ ut sint fines litium.—4 Co. 15.—(It is the duty of a good judge to prevent litigations; and it concerns the public good that there be periods to legal strifes.)

These four maxims relate to the administration of justice and the prevention of strife. The principle of English law is to amplify its remedies, and, without usurping jurisdiction, to apply its rules to the advancement of substantial justice, while that system of law is best which confides as little as possible to the discretion of the judge; that judge the best, who relies as little as possible on his own opinion.—Russell v. Smyth, 9 M. & W. 818; 6 Scott, N. R. 180. 'And although the law should be vindicated by speedy execution, yet it is not to be applied to further litigation; for, 'componere lites'—the prevention of iniquitous litigation, is more the aim of an enlightened jurisprudence than 'discordias alere' —the stirring up of unjust strife.

Bonis non amovendis (that the goods be not removed), a writ addressed to the sheriff, where error is brought, commanding that the person against whom judgment is obtained be not suffered to remove his goods, till the error be tried and determined.—Reg. Orig. 131.

Bonitarian, the right of possession.—Civil Law.

Bonium, seu Bovium, Boverton, or Cowbridge, in Glamorganshire; also Bangor, in Flintshire.

Bono et malo (Writ de), an abolished writ of gaol delivery, which issued for every prisoner.

Bonum defendentis ex integrâ causâ, malum ex quolibet defectu.—11 Co. 68.—(The good of a defendant arises from a perfect case, his harm from some defect.)

Bonum necessarium extra terminos necessitatis non est bonum.—Hob. 144.—(Necessary good is not good beyond the bounds of necessity.)

Bonus, a premium, or advantage.

Bonus judex secundum æquum et bonum judicat, et æquitatem stricto juri præfert.—Co. Litt. 24.—(A good judge decides according to justice and right, and prefers equity to strict law.)

'I commend the judge,' said Lord Hobart (Hob. 125), 'who seems fine and ingenious, so it tend to right and equity; and I condemn them who, either out of pleasure to shew a subtle wit, will destroy, or out of incuriousness or negligence will not labour to support, the act of the party, by the art or act of the law.'

Book of Rates [fr. boc, As.], an account declaring the duties of customs.—Jacob.

Book of Responses, an account which the director of the Chancery keeps, particularly to note a seizure, when he gives an order to the sheriff to give it to an heir whose service has been returned to him. The form is respondeat vicecomes, &c.—Scotch Law.

Booting or Boting Corn [fr. bote or boot, Sax., compensation], rent-corn, anciently so called.

Borcovicus, and Borovicum, Berwick-upon-Tweed.

Bordagium. See BORDLODE.

Bordaria [fr. bord, Sax.; domus, Lat.], a cottage.

Bordarii, or Bordimanni [fr. bords, Old Gall., limits, borders], boors, husbandmen, cottagers.—Domesday.

Bord-brigch [fr. borg-bryce, or burg-brych, Sax.], a breach or violation of suretyship, pledge-breach, or breach of mutual fidelity.

Border Warrant [fr. bord, Fr., edge, margin], a process granted by a judge ordinary, on either side of the border between England and Scotland, for arresting the person or effects of an inhabitant of the opposite side, until he find security, judicio sisti.

Bord-halfpeny [fr. bord, Sax., a table, and halpeny, or half-penny], a customary small toll paid to the lord of a town for setting up boards, tables, booths, &c., in fairs or markets.

Bordlands, the domesnes which a lord keeps in his own hands for the maintenance of his board or table.—Bract. l. 4, t. 3, c. ix.

Bordlode, or Bordage, a service required of tenants to carry timber out of the lord's woods to his house, or it is said to be the quantity of food or provision which the bordarii or bordmen paid for their bord-lands. The old Scots had the term of burd and meet-burd for victuals and provisions, and burden-sack for a sack full of provender; whence probably came our word burden.—Spelm.

Bord-service, a tenure of bord-lands.

Borel-folk, country people, from the Fr. boure, floccus, a lock of wool, because they covered their heads with such stuff.—Blount.

Borgh-upon weir of law, a finding of caution to answer the requisitions of the law.—Scotch Dict.

Borlasius, Borlace.

Borough [fr. burg, Fr.; burgus, Lat.; borhoe, or burg, As.], originally a walled town or other fortified place, perhaps from πύργος, a castle, but now a town either corporate or not, that sends burgesses to Parliament. By the Reform Act, 2 Wm. IV. c. 45, s. 79, wherever the words 'city or borough,' or 'cities or boroughs' may occur throughout the act, those words shall be construed to include, except there be something in the subject or context manifestly repugnant to such construction, all towns corporate, cinque ports, districts or places within England and Wales, which shall be entitled, after this Act shall have passed, to return a member or members to serve in Parliament, other than counties at large, and ridings, parts and divisions of counties at large, and shall also include the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed.

As to the right of voting in boroughs, it may be here stated generally, that, independently of the old rights of voting in scot and lot boroughs, and corporation towns, the Reform Act confers a right of voting upon all occupiers, either as owner or tenant of any house or building of the clear annual value, either alone or with land, of 10*l.*, provided the party has been in occupation for twelve months before the 31st day of July preceding the registration, has resided for six months previously within the burgh, or seven miles from the same, has been rated to the poor during all the time of occupation, and has paid, before the 20th day of July, preceding, all rates and assessed taxes up to the 5th day of January preceding. The receipt of parochial relief forms a disqualification, but that provision does not extend to a county voter. See 2 Wm. IV. c. 45; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 90; and 14 & 15 Vict. cc. 14 and 39.

Borough-courts, private and limited species of tribunals, held by prescription, charter or Act of Parliament. They are erected in particular districts for the convenience of the inhabitants, that they may prosecute small suits, and receive justice at home.—19 Geo. III. c. 70; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 74; 1 Bl. Com. 80.

Borough-heads, borough-holders, bors-holders, or burs-holders.

Borough-English, or Postremo-geniture, a custom evidently of Saxon origin, and so named to distinguish it from the Norman customs. It is supposed to be derived from the Tartars, and may be a remnant of the pastoral state of the Germanic barbarians, described by Cæsar and Tacitus. By this custom, then, which is occasionally met with in burgage tenemental lands, if a person have many sons, and then die intestate, the youngest son shall inherit all the realty which belonged to his father situated within such borough. It is based on the assumption that the youngest son, on account of his tender age, is not so capable as the rest of his brethren to keep himself. Among the pastoral tribes, the sons, as soon as they attained the proper age, migrated from the paternal habitation, with an allotment of cattle, to seek a residence elsewhere; the youngest son usually continued with his father, and thus became the heir to his house. The vulgar notion that this custom arose out of the right of concubinage which the lord had with his tenants' wives on their wedding night, and that therefore the land descended not to the eldest son, but to the youngest, who was with greater probability the true child of the tenant, is altogether exploded, for there is no evidence of such a right having ever existed in England, although it certainly seems to have prevailed in Scotland, until it was abolished by Malcolm III. (Reg. Mag. l. 4, c. xxxi.), who commuted it for a fine, payable on the tenant's marriage, which payment is now known as Marcheta.

A posthumous son dispossesses his elder brother. The custom is found in freeholds and copyholds, but without any legal differences. The right of representation exists with this custom, for, should the younger son die in his father's lifetime, leaving a daughter, she will inherit the property. This custom extends to estates-tail, but not generally (as gavelkind does) to the collateral descent, so that where land held in Borough-English descended to the youngest son, and he died without issue, it was resolved that they did not go to the younger brother, for the custom did not take place in the descent between brothers, but the eldest brother inherited, unless as special custom expressly extended it to the collaterals. A custom is often annexed to lands in Borough-English, that the widow shall have all her husband's lands in dower, and the power of devising, in order that she may the better provide for the younger children, with the care of whom she is intrusted. These customs are special, and not properties of the general custom, which should be borne in mind, as many authors have treated them as integral parts of Borough-English. Borough-English, like gavelkind, the law takes particular notice of; there is no occasion, therefore, to prove that such custom actually exists, but simply that the lands in question are subject thereto. The extension, however, of the custom to the collateral line must be specially pleaded. This custom, like gavelkind, cannot be altered by any limitation of the parties; therefore where A. seised in fee of lands held in Borough-English, made a feoffment to the use of himself and his heirs male of his body, according to the course of the common law, the words 'according to the course of the common law' were held void; for customs, which go with the land, and fix and order the descent of inheritances, can only be altered by Act of Parliament. This custom obtains in the manor of Lambeth, Surrey, in the manors of Hackney, St. John of Jerusalem in Islington, Heston, and Edmonton in Middlesex, and in other counties.

Borough-sessions, courts established in boroughs under the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76, amended by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 105, and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 89). They are held by the recorders of the respective boroughs once a quarter, or oftener if they think fit, and at times to be fixed by them. The jurisdiction is over such offences as are cognizable by the County Sessions, whose powers extend to all boroughs which may not have petitioned for a separate court by virtue of s. 103 of the Municipal Corporations Act.

Borrowing [v. borg, boch, A.S., a surety, pledge, loan], contracting a loan on security; taking money on credit. For the rights and duties of borrowers, consult Story on Bailments, 231, 234, 280.

Borsholder, borough's ealder, or headborough, supposed to be the discreetest man in the borough, town, or tithing. By the Saxon laws there was a general custom of bail throughout the country, by which each man was answerable for his neighbour.

Bortmagad [fr. bord, Sax.; domus, Lat., and magad, ancilla], a housemaid.

Boscage [fr. bosco, Ital.; silva, Lat.], food which wood and trees yield to cattle, as mast, &c.

Boscaria, woodhouses or oxhouses, from bos, Lat.

Bosco, de, bois, boys.

Bosco arso, de, brentwood, or burntwood.

Bosco Boardi, de, Borhard.

Boscus [fr. bosco, Ital.; bois, Fr.], all manner of wood; boscus is divided into high wood or timber; hautboys, and coppice, or underwoods, sub-boscus, sub-bois: but the high wood is properly called saltus, and in Fleta we read it maeremium.

Bossinnus, a rustic pipe.

Bostar, an ox-stall.

Bote [fr. bot, A.S.; betan, to repair, synonymous with estovers, Fr.; estoffer, to furnish], necessaries for the maintenance and carrying on of husbandry. The owner of an estate for life or for years is entitled, unless expressly restrained by the terms of the conveyance or devise, to reasonable estovers or botes, i. e. necessary wood, such as house-bote, plough-bote, cart-bote, and hay-bote, or hedge-bote. House-bote is a sufficient allowance of wood from off the estate to repair or burn in the house, and sometimes termed fire-bote; plough-bote and cart-bote are wood to be employed in making and repairing all instruments of husbandry; and hay-bote or hedge-bote is wood for repairing of hays, hedges or fences.

There was also man-bote, which was a compensation or amends for a man slain, &c.—Lamb. c. xcix.

Boteless, or Bootless, a vain attempt, without emendation.

Botellaria, a buttery or cellar, in which the butts and bottles of wine and other liquors are deposited.

Botha, a booth, stall, or standing in a fair or market.—Mon. Angl. 2 par. fo. 132.

Bothagium, or Boothage, customary dues paid to the lord of a manor or soil, for the pitching or standing of booths in fairs or markets.—Paroch. Antiq. 680.

Bothna, or Buthna, a park where cattle are enclosed and fed; a barony, lordship, &c.—Skene.

Botiler of the King [pincerna regis, Lat.], an officer that provides the king's wines, who (according to Fleta, l. 2, c. xxi.) may, by virtue of his office, choose out of every ship laden with sale wines, one cask before the mast, and one behind.—25 Edw. III. st. 5, c. 21.

Bottomry Bond, or Contract, also Bottomree, or Bummaree, a species of mortgage or hypothecation of a ship, by which her keel or bottom is pledged (partem pro toto) as a security for the repayment of a sum of money. If the ship be totally lost, the lender loses his money, but if she return safely, he recovers his principal, together with the interest agreed upon. Such bonds are allowed as valid in all trading nations, for the benefit of commerce, and as a pretium periculi for the extraordinary hazard run.—Abbott on Shipping, p. 2, c. iii.; 2 Bl. Com. 457; and 1 C. L. R. 616.

Bovata Terræ, as much land as an ox can plough.—See OXGANG. 8 bovatæ make 1 carucate.

Bouche of Court, or Budge of Court, a certain allowance of provision from the king to his knights and servants, who attended him on any military expedition.

Boverium, or Boveria, an ox-house.

Bovettus, a young steer, or castrated bullock.

Bought and Sold Notes. The practice of licensed brokers is to keep books wherein they enter the terms of any contract they effect, and the names of the parties. Such entry, when signed by the broker, is a contract legally binding, as when the broker for a seller treats with a buyer, he is deemed the agent of both. It is the custom for the broker to deliver a transcript or memorandum of the entry in his book to each party, which is called a bought or sold note, the bought note being given to the seller, and the sold note to the buyer. But this is stated conversely in some of the books. As these notes contain the essential parts of the bargain, they will suffice in the absence of a corresponding entry in the broker's book; but if these notes describe the particulars differently or incorrectly, as one species of goods for another, or erroneously state the terms, no contract arises, and a variation of this nature cannot be corrected by a reference to the broker's book.—2 Selw. N. P. 873.

Bough of a Tree, a symbol which gave seisin of land, to hold of the donor in capite.

Bovicula, a heifer, or young cow.

Bound, or Boundary [fr. borne, bone, Fr., a limit], the utmost limits of land, whereby the same is known and ascertained. See ABUTTALS.

Boundaries of Counties, &c. See the Boundary Act, 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 64, as to the divisions of counties, and the limits of cities and boroughs in England and Wales, in so far as respects the election of members to serve in Parliament.

Bound-Bailiffs, officers who arrest debtors, &c., and who enter into bonds for their good behaviour. The vulgar phrase 'bum-bailiff' is, perhaps, a corruption of this word, which see.

Bounty, a premium paid by Government to the producers, exporters, or importers of certain articles, or to those who employ ships in certain trades, with a view of encouraging the establishment of some new branch of industry, or of fostering and extending a trade that is believed to be of paramount importance. Bounties have been generally abolished. The system of bounties has been shown to be erroneous by the best political economists.

Bounty of Queen Anne, a royal charter, which was confirmed by 2 Anne, c. 11, whereby all the revenue of first-fruits and tenths is vested in trustees for ever, to form a perpetual fund for the augmentation of poor livings. After the appropriation of the revenue arising from the payment of first-fruits and tenths to the augmentation of small livings, it was considered a proper extension of this principle to exempt the smaller livings from the incumbrance of those demands; and for that end, the bishops of each diocese were directed to enquire and certify into the Exchequer, what livings did not exceed 50*l.* a year, according to the improved value at that time; and it was further provided that such livings should be discharged from those dues in future. It has been still further regulated by subsequent statutes; viz. 5 Anne, c. 24; 6 Anne, c. 27; 1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 10; 3 Geo. I. c. 10; 43 Geo. III. c. 107; 45 Geo. III. c. 84, s. 4; 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 45; 1 & 2 Vict. cc. 20, 23, ss. 3, 4; c. 106, ss. 72 & 119; c. 107, s. 10; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 49; 3 & 4 Vict. cc. 20 & 113, s. 76; 4 & 5 Vict. c. 39, s. 4; and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37.

These trustees were erected into a corporation, and have authority to make rules and orders for the distribution of this fund. The principal rules established by them are, that the sum to be allowed for each augmentation shall be 200*l.* to be laid out in land, which shall be annexed for ever to the living; and that this donation shall be made, first, to all livings not exceeding 10*l.* a year, then to all livings not above 20*l.*, and so in order, whilst any remain under 50*l.* a year. But when any private benefactor advances 200*l.* the trustees give another 200*l.* for the advancement of any living not above 45*l.* a year, though it may not belong to that class of livings which they are then augmenting.

By the 46 Geo. III. c. 133, a very noble donation of 6,000*l.* a year was granted for the augmentation of small livings not exceeding 150*l.* a year. The statute enacts that all such livings may be discharged from the payment of the land-tax, without any consideration for it, provided the whole annual account shall not exceed 6,000*l.*—1 Bl. Com. 285; 2 Burn's Ec. L. 260.

Bow-bearer, an under officer of the forest, whose duty it is to oversee and true inquisition make, as well of sworn men as unsworn, in every bailiwick of the forest; and of all manner of trespasses done, either to vert or venison, and cause them to be presented without any concealment, in the next court of attachment, &c.—Crompt. Juris. 201.

Bowling, game of, legalised by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109.

Bowyers, manufacturers of bows and shafts. An ancient company of the city of London.—12 Edw. IV. c. 2; 33 Hen. VIII. c. 6; 8 Eliz. c. 10.

Bracelets, hounds or beagles of the smaller or slower kinds.

Bracenarius, a huntsman or master of the hounds.

Bracetus, a hound.—Mon. Ang. t. 2, p. 283.

Brachylogy [fr. βραχύς and λόγος, Gk.], the method of expressing a sentence or argument concisely.

Bracinum, a brewing; the whole quantity of ale brewed at one time, for which tolsestor was paid in some manors. Brecina, a brewhouse.

Bracton, the author of the treatise entitled De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ. Bracton's book, compared with that of Glanville, is a voluminous work. It is divided into five books, and these into tracts and chapters. See 2 Reeves' Hist. c. viii. p. 86, note (a), for an analysis of the several divisions of the chapters, and a complete digest of the contents of this venerable code. If this law-treatise had been printed with such divisions and notification of its contents as are given in the note referred to, the arrangement of the whole would have struck the eye as distinctly as it does the understanding upon perusal; it being, in truth, a comprehensive and particular account of the law, digested with a strict adherence to method and system. Consistently with the extensiveness and regularity of the plan, the several parts of it are filled with a copious and accurate detail of legal learning. The rules of property are explained; the proceedings in actions, through the minutest steps, are investigated and developed; while every proposition is supported by fair deduction, or corroborated by the authority of some adjudged case, so that the reader never fails of deriving instruction or amusement from the study of this scientific treatise on our ancient laws and customs. Bracton was deservedly looked up to as the first source of legal knowledge, even down to the time of Lord Coke, who seems to have made this author his guide in all enquiries into the foundation of our law.

The author of this work is usually styled Henry de Bracton; though he passed, as fancy or mistake may have dictated, by the names of Brycton, Britton, Briton, Breton. He is said to have lived at the latter part of the reign of Henry III. There is internal evidence that the book was written before the fifty-second year of this king; for it takes no notice of the writ of entry in the post, nor of the regulations about distresses, attachments, guardians in socage, and other points, made by the statute of Marlbridge; and as he quotes a case in the forty-sixth year of this king, it must follow that the book was written, or, at least, received the author's last hand, some time between that and the fifty-second year. It is said that Bracton was a judge, and, speaking of some judges of his time, he calls them insipientes, et minus doctos, qui cathedram judicandi ascendunt antequam leges didicerint. (Brac. I.)—Hales' Hist. p. 189. In Lincoln's Inn Library is an ancient MS. copy of Bracton, which is said to be more correct than the printed copies.

Brahmen, Brahmin, Brahman, or Bramin, a divine, a priest, the first Hindu caste.

Branding in the hand or face with a hot iron. A punishment inflicted by law for various offences, after the offender had been allowed benefit of clergy. Abolished by 3 Geo. IV. c. 38.

Brasiator [fr. brasium, Lat., malt], a maltster, a brewer.—Old Records.

Brasium, malt.

Brawling [fr. brailler, Fr., freq. of braire, to cry], the offence of quarrelling, or creating a disturbance in the church or churchyard. Therefore mere quarrelsome words, which are neither an affray nor an offence in any other place, are penal here. It was enacted by 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 4, that if any person shall, by words only, quarrel, chide, or brawl in a church or churchyard, the ordinary shall suspend him, if a layman, ab ingressu ecclesiæ (from the entrance of the church); and if a clerk in orders, from the ministration of his office during pleasure. And if any person in such church or churchyard proceed to smite or lay violent hands upon another, he shall be excommunicated ipso facto, or if he strike him with a weapon, or draw any weapon with intent to strike, he shall, besides excommunication, upon conviction by a jury, have one of his ears cut off, or, if he have no ears, be branded with the letter 'F' in his cheek. But this punishment was repealed by 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 1. With respect to the malicious or contemptuous disturbance of a congregation, or molestation of a minister during the celebration of divine service, see 1 M. c. 3; and 1 W. & M. c. 18; also 52 Geo. III. c. 155, s. 12; 4 Bl. Com. 145. By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, the jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Courts in England and Ireland, in suits for brawling, is abolished as against persons not in holy orders, and persons guilty of riotous, violent, or indecent behaviour in churches and chapels of the Church of England or Ireland, or in any chapel of any religious denomination, or in England in any place of religious worship duly certified under the provisions of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 81, or in churchyards or burial grounds, on conviction before two justices are liable to a penalty of not more than 5*l.*, or imprisonment for any term not exceeding two months.

Breach of close, an unwarrantable entry on another's land; for every man's land is in the eye of the law inclosed and set apart from his neighbour's, and that either by a visible and material fence, as one field is divided from another by a hedge, or by an invisible boundary, existing only in the contemplation of law, as when one man's land adjoins to another's in the same field. Every such entry or breach of a man's close carries necessarily along with it some damage or other; for, if no other special loss can be assigned, yet still the words of the writ itself specify one general damage, viz. the treading down and bruising his herbage.—Cro. Eliz. 420.

Breach of covenant, a violation of an agreement contained in a deed either to do or not to do some act: it is a civil injury.—3 Bl. Com. 155.

Breach of duty, the not executing any office, employment, trust, &c., in a proper manner; for every person who undertakes the duties of any office, &c., contracts with those who employ and trust him to perform it with integrity, diligence, and skill; and if by his want of either of those qualities any injury accrues to individuals, they have therefore their remedy in damages by an action.—3 Bl. Com. 163.

Breach of peace, offences against the public, which are either actual violations of the peace, or constructive violations, by tending to make others break it. Both of these species are either felonious or not felonious. The felonious breaches are: (1) The riotous assembling of twelve persons or more, and not dispersing upon proclamation. (2) The riotous demolishing of churches, houses, buildings, or machinery (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 11 and 12). (3) Maliciously sending, delivering or uttering, or directly or indirectly causing to be received, knowing the contents thereof, any letter or writing threatening to kill or murder any person (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 16). The remaining offences are not felonious. (4) Affrays. (5) Riots, routs, and unlawful assemblies, which must have three persons at least to constitute them. (6) Tumultuously petitioning, which was carried to an enormous height in the times preceding the great rebellion, wherefore by 13 Car. II. st. 1, c. 5, it is enacted that not more than twenty names shall be signed to any petition to the King or either House of Parliament for any alteration of matters established by law in church or state, unless the contents thereof be previously approved, in the country by three justices, or the majority of the grand jury at the assizes or quarter sessions, and, in London, by the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and common council; and that no petition shall be delivered by a company of more than ten persons, on pain in either case of incurring a penalty not exceeding 100*l.* and three months' imprisonment. (7) Forcible entry or detainer, which is committed by violently taking or keeping possession of lands or tenements with menaces, force, and arms, and without the authority of the law. (8) Riding, or going armed, with dangerous or unusual weapons, terrifying the good people of the land. (9) Spreading false news (12 Ric. II. c. 11). (10) False and pretended prophecies, with intent to disturb the peace, as they raise enthusiastic jealousies in the people, and terrify them with imaginary fears. These are the actual breaches of the peace; the remaining are constructive. (11) Challenges to fight, either by word or letter, or being the bearer of such challenges. (12) Libels, which, taken in their largest and most extensive sense, signify any writings, pictures, or the like, of an immoral or illegal tendency; but in the sense of a constructive breach of the peace, they are malicious defamations of any person, and especially a magistrate, made public by either printing, writing, signs, or pictures, in order to provoke him to wrath, or expose him to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule. Consult 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, amending the law respecting defamatory words and libels; 4 Bl. Com. c. 11; and 4 Steph. Com. cap. x.

Breach of pound, the breaking any pound or place where cattle or goods distrained are deposited, to rescue such distress; it is an indictable offence. See POUND BREACH.

Breach of prison, an escape by a prisoner lawfully in prison.

Breach of promise, a violation of one's word or undertaking, such as the breach of the condition of a bond, &c.

Breach of trust, a violation of duty by a trustee, executor, or other person in a fiduciary position. The Court of Chancery has adopted two principles in regard to the liability consequent upon a breach of trust: 1st. That with a view not to deter persons from undertaking a trust, the Court is extremely liberal, and will so determine as not to strike terror into persons acting for the benefit of others, and not for their own; and will endeavour to protect a trustee from any mischief that may happen from a misapplication of trust-money, and where executors intend fairly to discharge their duty, the Court will not hold them liable upon slight grounds. 2ndly. That care must be had to guard against an abuse of their trust.—13 Ves. 410. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54.

Breaking of arrestment, an action wherein it is narrated, that though arrestment was laid out, payment nevertheless was made; the pursuer, therefore, concludes that the breaker should refound him, and besides should be punished according to law.—Scotch Dict.

Brecca [fr. brèche, Fr.], a breach or decay.

Brecina. See BRACINUM.

Brede, broad, also deceit.—Bract.

Bredwite [fr. bread and wite, Sax.], a fine or penalty imposed for defaults in the assize of bread.—Paroch. Antiq. 114.

Brehon, the Irish name for a Judge.

Brehon law, a rule of right, unwritten, but delivered by tradition from one to another, in which oftentimes there appeared great show of equity in determining the right between party and party, but in many things repugnant quite, both to God's laws and man's. This law was formally abolished, 40 Edw. III., it being unanimously declared to be indeed no law, but a lewd custom crept in of later times.—Spenser's State of Ireland, p. 1513; Hale's Hist. p. 217; 1 S. S. 82.

Brenagium, a payment in bran, which tenants anciently made to feed their lords' hounds.

Brephotrophi, curators of places for receiving foundlings.

Bresina, wether-sheep.—Mon. Ang. t. 1, c. 406.

Bretoyse, or Bretoise, the law of the Welsh marches, observed by the Ancient Britons.

Bretwalda (wielder), ruler of the Britons.

Breve, a writ, by which a person is summoned or attached to answer an action, complaint, &c., or whereby anything is commanded to be done in the courts, in order to justice, &c. It is called breve, from the brevity of it, and is addressed either to the defendant himself, or to the Chancellors, Judges, Sheriffs, or other officers.—Skene, de verb 'Breve.'

Breve judiciale debet sequi suum originale, et accessorium suum principale.—Jenk. Cent. 292.—(A judicial writ ought to follow its original, and an accessory its principal.)

Breve ita dicitur, quia rem de quâ agitur, et intentionem petentis, paucis verbis breviter enarrat.—2 Inst. 39.—(A writ is so called because it briefly states, in few words, the matter in dispute, and the object of the party seeking relief.)

Breve judiciale non cadit pro defectu formæ.—

Jenk. Cent. 43.—(A judicial writ fails not through defect of form.)

An original writ (breve originale) is a mandatory letter issuing out of the common law jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery under the Great Seal, and in the Queen's name, addressed to the sheriff of the county where the injury is alleged to have been committed, containing a summary statement of the cause of complaint, and requiring him to command the defendant to satisfy the claim; and on his failure to comply, then to summon him to appear in one of the Superior Courts of Common Law, there to account for his non-compliance. In some cases, however, it omits the former alternative, and requires the sheriff simply to enforce the appearance. It was formerly essential to the due institution of all actions in the Superior Courts, that they should commence by original writ; in the case of real actions this is still necessary, but not so in personal actions (2 Wm. IV. c. 39), which commence by writ of summons as enacted by the second sec. of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110; neither is an original writ issued in the mixed action of ejectment, which is commenced by a writ pursuant to the C. L. P. Act, 1852. Judicial writs are those issued subsequently to the original writ out of a Court of Common Law, during the progress of an action. They issue under the seal of the Court, and not under the Great Seal of England, and are tested not in the Queen's name, but in that of the chief, or, if there be no chief, of the senior puisne judge.—3 Bl. Com. c. xix.

Breve perquirere, to purchase a writ or license of trial, in the King's courts, by the plaintiff, qui breve perquisivit; whence the usage of paying 6*s.* 8*d.* fine to the Crown where the debt is 40*l.*, and of 10*s.* where the debt is 100*l.*, &c., in suits and trials for money due upon bond, &c.

Breve de recto, a writ of right or license for a person ejected out of an estate, to sue for the possession of it when detained from him.

Brevet, a commission conferring on an officer a degree of rank immediately above that which he holds in his particular regiment; without, however, conveying a power to receive the corresponding pay. Brevet rank does not exist in the royal navy, and in the army it neither descends lower than that of captain, nor ascends above that of lieutenant-colonel.

Brevia Magistralia, official writs framed by the Clerks in Chancery to meet new injuries, to which the old forms of action were inapplicable.—4 Reeves, 426.

Brevia, tam originalia quam judicialia, patiuntur Anglica nomina.—10 Co. 132.—(Writs, as well original as judicial, bear English names.)

Brevia selecta, abbrev., Brev. Sel. [Lat.], choice writs or processes.

Brevia testata, written memoranda, introduced to perpetuate the tenor of a conveyance and investiture, when grants by parol became productive of dispute and uncertainty. To this end the persons who attended as witnesses were registered in the deed, and this was anciently done without their own signatures (writing not then being a general accomplishment), for they merely heard the deed read, and then the clerk added their names in a sort of memorandum, thus, 'hijs testibus, Johanne Moore, Jacobo Smith, et aliis ad hanc rem convocatis.'—The modern system of conveyancing is an elaborate extension of these brevia testata.—2 Bl. Com. 307.

Brevibus et rotulis liberandis, a writ or mandate to a sheriff to deliver to his successor the county, and the appointments, with the rolls, briefs, remembrance, and all other things belonging to his office.—Reg. Orig. 295.

Bribery [fr. briber, Fr., to devour or eat greedily], the taking by, or giving to, a person in a judicial or public office, of any fee, gift, reward, or brocage, to influence his behaviour in his office, or the taking or giving a reward for appointing another to a public position. As to bribery at elections for members of Parliament, see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, continued and amended by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 84; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87; and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 48.

Bribour [fr. bribeur, Fr.], a pilferer of other men's goods.—28 Edw. II. c. 1.

Bricks, the duties of excise on, were repealed by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 9.

Bricolis, an engine by which walls were beaten down.—Blount.

Bridewell, a house of correction, not under the sheriff's charge.

Bridge [γέφυρα, Gk.; pons, Lat.; bric, Sax.], a building of brick, stone, wood, or iron, erected across a river, ditch, valley, or other place, for the common ease and benefit of travellers. Public bridges, which are of general convenience, are of common right to be repaired by the whole inhabitants of that county in which they lie. If the bridge be within a city or town corporate, the inhabitants of such city and town corporate shall repair it; if within a riding, the inhabitants of the riding shall repair it. The inhabitants of a county, &c., are, therefore, bound to repair every public bridge within it; unless, when indicted for the non-repair of it, they can shew by their plea that some other person is liable, ratione tenuræ; and every bridge in a highway is, by 22 Hen. VIII. c. 5, deemed a public bridge for this purpose. If part of a bridge be within one county, &c., and the other part within another county, &c., each party shall repair that part of the bridge which is within it. Besides the bridge, the county is bound to repair 300 yards of the road adjoining either end of it. As to the offence of pulling down, throwing down, or destroying a bridge, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 29 and 33.

Bridge-masters, persons chosen by the citizens, who have certain fees and profits belonging to their office, as in the case of London Bridge.—Lex. Lond. 283.

Brief [fr. brevis, Lat.; brief, Dutch; a letter], an abbreviated statement of the pleadings, proofs, and affidavits at law, or of the bill, answer, and other proceedings in equity, with a concise narrative of the facts and merits of the plaintiff's case, or the defendant's defence, for the instruction of counsel at the trial or hearing. Arrangement and compression without any material omission should be carefully attended to in the preparation of briefs.

Brief al'evesque, a writ to the bishop which, in quare impedit, shall go to remove an incumbent, unless he recover or be presented pendente lite.—1 Keb. 386.

Brief out of the Chancery, a writ or command to a judge that he examine by an inquest, whether a man be nearest heir.—Scotch Law.

Brief of distress, an obsolete writ, which issued out of Chancery after decree obtained against any landlord to distress his readiest goods, according to the old custom.—Ibid.

Brief of mortancestry, that which is used for entering of all heirs of defuncts.—Ibid.

Brief, papal, the Pope's letter upon matters of discipline.

Briefs for collecting charities, licenses to make collection for repairing churches, restoring loss by fire, &c.—4 Anne, c. 14.

Briga [fr. brigue, Fr.], debate, contention.

Brigandine [lorica, Lat.], a coat of mail or ancient armour, consisting of numerous jointed scale-like plates, very pliant and easy for the body, mentioned in 4 & 5 P. & M. c. 2; Jer. xlvi. 4, and li. 3.

Brigantes, the ancient name for the inhabitants of Yorkshire, Lancashire, Durham, Westmoreland, and Cumberland.

Brigbote, or Brug-bote [fr. brig, Sax.; pontus, Lat.; and bote, compensatio], the contribution to the repair of bridges, walls, and castles, which by the old laws of the Anglo-Saxons might not be remitted.—Fleta, l. 1, c. xlvii.

Broad-arrow, used as a Government mark, is thought to have had a Celtic origin; and the so-called arrow may be the → or á, the broad a of the Druids. This letter was typical of superiority either in rank and authority, intellect or holiness; and is believed to have stood also for king or prince. See 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 89; 55 Geo. III. c. 127.

Brinjarrie, Binjary, Benjary, or Banjary, a grain merchant in India.

Bristol bargain, where A lends B 1,000*l.* on good security, and it is agreed that 500*l.*, together with interest, shall be paid at a time stated; and as to the other 500*l.*, that B in consideration thereof, should pay unto A 100*l. per annum* for seven years.

British Columbia, the territory on the North-west coast of North America, commonly known by the designation of New Caledonia. Its government is provided for by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 99.

Britton. The small French tract under the name of Britton is thought to have been composed under the direction of Edward I. The singular form of it seems to countenance such a supposition; for the contents of the whole book are put into the king's mouth, and the law so delivered has the appearance of being promulgated by the immediate voice of the sovereign. This work is shorter than Fleta, and is little more than a compendium. It is attributed by some to John Breton, who was Bishop of Hereford and a judge; but as he died in the third year of this king's reign, and this treatise takes notice of statutes made in the 13th, the truth of this account is justly doubted. By others it is considered as nothing more than an abridgment of Bracton, with the subsequent alterations that had been made in the law; and that it is called Britton, as one of the names of Bracton himself.

This French tract, as it is written in the language which the law spoke for many years after, engages the curiosity of a modern reader in a particular manner. In the writings of Bracton and Fleta everything is seen as it were through a cloud, disguised in the terms and phraseology of the Latin tongue; whereas Britton addresses you in the technical, proper style of the law: you here perceive a determinate meaning, conveyed in precise terms, and are enabled to form an opinion from it with more confidence and certainty.—2 Reeves, c. xi. p. 280.

Brocage, the wages or hire of a broker; also termed Brokerage, 12 R. II. c. 2.

Brocella [fr. brusca, obs. Lat.; broce, Fr.], a wood, a thicket or covert of brushes and brushwood, hence brouce of wood, and brousing of cattle.

Brocha [fr. broche, Fr.], an awl or large packing needle; also a spit, hence to broach, or pierce a barrel.

Brochia, a great can or pitcher.—Bract. 1. 2, t. 1, c. vi.

Brode-halfpenny, or broad-halfpenny. See BORD-HALFPENNY.

Broken stowage, that space in a ship which is not filled by her cargo.

Broker [fr. broceur, Fr.; tritor, Lat.; a person who breaks into small pieces], an agent employed to make bargains and contracts between other persons in matters of trade, commerce, and navigation, for a compensation commonly called a brokerage. Domat has given (B. 1, tit. 17, s. 1, art. 1) a very full and exact description, according to the sense of our law: 'The engagement (says he) of a broker is like to that of a proxy, a factor, and other agent; but with this difference, that the broker being employed by persons who have opposite interests to manage, he is, as it were, agent both for the one and the other, to negotiate the commerce, or affair in which he concerns himself. Thus his engagement is twofold, and consists in being faithful to all the parties, in the execution of what each one of them entrusts him with. And his power is not a trust, but to explain the intentions of both parties, and to negotiate in such a manner as to put those who employ him in a condition to treat together personally.'

Where he is employed to buy or sell goods, he is not entrusted with the custody or possession of them, and is not authorised to buy or sell them in his own name. He is strictly, therefore, a middle-man, or intermediate negotiator between the parties, and for some purposes (as that of signing a contract within the Statute of Frauds) he is treated as the agent of both parties, but primarily he is deemed merely the agent of the party by whom he is originally employed. A broker being personally confided in, cannot ordinarily delegate his authority to a sub-agent or clerk under him, or to any other person, unless the principal give an assent, either expressed or implied, thereto. A broker differs from an auctioneer in two respects; a broker may buy as well as sell, but an auctioneer can only sell; a broker cannot sell personally at public auction, for that is the appropriate function of an auctioneer, but he may sell at private sales, which an auctioneer (as such) does not.

There are various sorts of brokers now employed in commercial affairs, whose transactions form, or may form, a distinct and independent business. Thus, for example, there are exchange and money-brokers, stock-brokers, ship-brokers, and insurance-brokers, who are respectively employed in buying and selling bills of exchange, or promissory notes, railway-scrip, goods, stocks, ships, or cargoes; or in procuring freights or charter parties. The character of a broker is also sometimes combined in the same person with that of a factor. In such cases, we should carefully distinguish between his acts in the one character and in the other, as the same rules do not always apply to each. See FACTOR. The Romans called brokers Proxenetæ.—Dig. Lib. 50, tit. 14, l. 2; Story's Comm. on Agency, p. 24.

Brokers in London must be admitted by the Lord Mayor and aldermen, paying 5*l.* on admission, and a like sum annually under a penalty of 100*l.* They are also required to take an oath, and enter into a bond for the observance of certain regulations. A broker, who is not duly qualified, cannot recover any compensation.— 6 Anne, c. 16; 57 Geo. III. c. 60.

Brokerage, the commission or per centage paid to brokers on the sale or purchase of bills, funds, goods, &c.

Brok, an old sword or dagger.

Brooke's (Sir Robert) Abridgment, a work printed in 1568, and an improvement on the plan of Statham and Fitzherbert. The cases are here arranged with more strict regard to the title; but the order in which they are strung together is very little better, being generally guided only by the chronology. He observes one method which contributes in some degree to draw the cases to a point; he generally begins a title with some modern determination in the reign of Henry VIII., as a kind of rule to guide the reader in his progress through the heap of ancient cases which follow. He abridges, with great care, in the language of his own time, sometimes adding a short observation, or quære, furnished by the experience of later times. So that, upon the whole, the substance of the year-books, to which it is an excellent repertory, is conveyed in this one volume, in a style and manner more generally acceptable than the original. This has the praise of being the most correct of these works.— Foster. However, such works, with all their use, can rarely be ultimately relied on; the opinion of a court can hardly be so abridged as to convey all the circumstances which had their weight in a determination; something will escape in the transfusion. As far as the nature of their design can go, they are of excellent use; and the full extent of their design was not tried till the very methodical work of Mr. Justice Rolle appeared, and the modern ones of Bacon and Comyns. An application to such a work as this to comprehend the great outline and extent of any branch, and a patient reading of the particular cases reported at length, more minutely to discern the grounds and principles upon which they were adjudged, is an union of labours which is necessary to form clear conceptions of the law.— 5 Reeves, c. xxxv. p. 244.

Brossus, bruised or injured with blows, wounds, or other casualty.—Cowel.

Brothel houses [fr. bordel, Fr.], lewd places, the habitation of prostitutes. They were formerly allowed in certain places, and especially on the Bank Side, in Southwark, where they had signs before their doors in like manner as inns and ale houses. By 14 Ric. II. it was enacted that no stews or brothel houses should be kept in Southwark, but in the common places appointed therefor. Of these, before the reign of Hen. VII., there were eighteen allowed; but the king for a long time forbad them. Afterwards, twelve, and no more, were permitted. But finally, Hen. VIII. by proclamation, in the 37th year of his reign, suppressed them all. And so odious were they become, that in leases of houses an express condition was inserted, that the lessees should not suffer, harbour, or keep any lewd woman within the said house, &c. Any person going to these places is subject to be imprisoned till he give security for good behaviour.—4 Inst. 205. See BAWDY HOUSE. A brothelman, or borelman, was a loose, idle fellow; a femme bordelier, or brothelier, a common woman.

Brother-in-law, a wife's brother or a sister's husband. There is not any relationship, but only affinity, between brothers-in-law.

Brudhote. See BRIGBOTE.

Brudkop [fr. brautkauf, Low Sax., purchase], betrothment.

Bruere [erica, Lat., heath], heath-ground.

Brueria [fr. brær, Sax., briar], thorns, briars, heath.—Par. Ant. 620.

Bruilletus, a small coppice or wood.

Bruillus [fr. breil, breuil, Fr., a thicket], a clump of trees in a park or forest.

Bruneta. See BURNETA.

Bruscia, a wood.—Mon. Ang. t. 1, fol. 773.

Bubbles [fr. bobbel, Dutch], projects started by dishonest individuals to cheat and rob the public. The South-Sea project, and the Railway mania, for examples. The 6 Geo. I. c. 18, punished such fraudulent undertakings; but the act was partly repealed by 6 Geo. IV. c. 91; and the 6 Geo. IV. c. 91 and 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 94 are repealed by 1 Vict. c. 73.

Bucinus, a military weapon for a footman.

Bucklarium, a buckler.—26 Edw. I. m. 8.

Buckstall, a toil to take deer.—4 Inst. 306.

Buckwheat, a French wheat, called in Essex brank, and in Worcestershire, crap.—15 Car. II. c. 5.

Budget (The). The Chancellor of the Exchequer makes one general statement every year to the House of Commons, which is intended to present a comprehensive view of the financial condition of the country. Sometimes there are preliminary, or supplemental, or occasional speeches; but the great general statement of the year has, for a long time past, been quaintly called 'the Budget,' from the French bougette, by a common figure of speech, putting the name of that which contains, to signify the thing contained. The annual speech known by that appellation embraces a review of the income and expenditure of the last, as compared with those of preceding years; remarks upon the financial prospects of the country; an exposition of the intended repeal, modifications, or imposition of taxes during the season, and a detail of the public expenditure during the current period, with its grounds of justification. Dod's Parl. Comp.

Buggery [fr. bugarone, or buggerare, Ital.], a detestable and abominable sin, amongst Christians not to be named, committed by carnal knowledge against the ordinance of the Creator and order of nature, by mankind with mankind, or with brute beast, or by womankind with brute beasts.—3 Inst. 58; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 61.

Building, a house or other erection. In order as much as possible to prevent the damage consequent upon fires happening in crowded streets, the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 84, and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 5, usually called the Building Acts, were passed. They are confined in their operation to the metropolis and its neighbourhood. See also 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122.

As to setting fire to, and other injuries to buildings, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 1–11.

Building lease, a demise of land for a long term of years, the lessee covenanting to erect certain edifices thereon according to specification. As to such leases of settled estates, see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 77.

Bul, in the ancient Hebrew chronology, the eighth month of the ecclesiastical, and the second of the civil year. It has since been called Marshevan, and answers to our October.

Bull [fr. bulla, Lat., a stud or boss], a brief or mandate of the Pope or Bishop of Rome, so called from the seal of lead or gold affixed to it, upon which was engraved on one side an image of St. Paul on the right of a cross, and that of St. Peter on the left, and on the other the Pope's name, and the year of his pontificate. To procure, publish, or put in use any of these is made treason by 13 Eliz. c. 2, and 7 Anne, c. 21.

Bull and Boar. By the custom of some places the parson is obliged to keep these animals for the use of the parishioners, in consideration of his having tithes of calves and pigs, &c.—1 Roll. Abr. 559.

Bullary, a bucket of brine.

Bulletin [fr. bulla, Lat., a sealed dispatch], an official notice of a public transaction or matter of importance.

Bullio salis, as much salt as is made at one wealing, or boiling; a twelve gallon measure of salt.—Mon. Ang. t. 2.

Bullion [some derive it from βόλος, Gk., a lump of earth, q. d. money having no stamp upon it; others from βούλα, a signature, because it is to receive the prince's effigies; and Minsevus of billon, Fr. or Span., copper to make money of], uncoined gold and silver in the mass. Those metals are called so, either when smelted from the native ore, and not perfectly refined; or when they are perfectly refined, but melted down into bars or ingots, or into any unwrought body, of any degree of fineness.

Bulter, or Boulter, the bran or refuse of meal after it is dressed; also the bag in which it is dressed, 51 Hen. III. Hence, bulted, or boulted bread, being the coarsest bread.

Bum-bailiff [fr. the notion of a humming, droning, or dunning noise; the term bum is applied to dunning a person for a debt.—Hall], a person employed to dun one for a debt; the bailiff employed to arrest for debt.—Wedgw.

Bungalow, a country-house in the East Indies.

Burden of proof [onus probandi, Lat.]. The most prominent canon of evidence is, that the point in issue is to be proved by the party who asserts the affirmative, according to the civil law maxims, Ei incumbit probatio qui dicit, non qui negat, and Affirmanti non neganti incumbit probatio. The burden of proof lies on the person who has to support his case by proof of a fact which is peculiarly within his own knowledge, or of which he is supposed to be cognisant. 'It is a well known principle of the law,' remarks Archbishop Whately (Rhetoric, pt. 1, chap. iii. s. 2), 'that every man (including a prisoner brought up for trial) is to be presumed innocent, till his guilt is established. This does not, of course, mean that we are to take for granted he is innocent; for if that were the case, he would be entitled to immediate liberation; nor does it mean that it is antecedently more likely than not that he is innocent; or that the majority of those brought to trial are so. According to the most correct use of the term, a "presumption" in favour of any supposition, means, not (as has been sometimes erroneously imagined) a preponderance of probability in its favour, but such a pre-occupation of the ground as implies that it must stand good, till some sufficient reason is adduced against it. It evidently means only that the "burden of proof" lies with the accusers;—that he is not to be called on to prove his innocence, or to be dealt with as a criminal till they have done so; but that they are to bring their charges against him, which if he can repel, he stands acquitted.'

'Thus again, there is a "presumption" in favour of the right of any individuals or bodies corporate to the property of which they are in actual possession: this does not mean that they are, or are not, likely to be the rightful owners, but merely that no man is to be disturbed in his possessions till some claim against him shall be established. He is not to be called on to prove his right; but the claimant to disprove it; on whom, consequently, the "burden of proof" lies.'

Bureau [fr. bujo, It., dark], a large writing-table; also a place where public business is transacted.

Bureaucracy, government by departments, each under a chief; also official abuse.

Burgage-holding, a tenure by which royal boroughs are held of the Sovereign. The service is watching and warding, and is done by the burgesses within the territory of the borough, whether expressed in the charter or not.—Scotch Dict.

Burgage-tenure, one of the three species of free socage holdings, is a tenure whereby houses, and lands which were formerly the site of houses, in an ancient borough, are held of some lord by a certain rent. There are a great many customs affecting these tenures, the most remarkable of which is the custom of Borough English (which see).—Litt. s. 162. This tenure is obviously a fragment of Saxon freedom. As to the right of voting for members of Parliament in respect of these interests, see 2 Wm. IV. c. 45.

Burg, or Burgh, a small walled town or place of privilege.

Burgbote, a contribution towards the building or repairing of castles or walls of a borough or city.—Cowel.

Burgesses [fr. burgeise, O. E.; burgeois, O. Fr.; burgensis, Lat.], generally the inhabitants of a borough or walled town; men of trade; sometimes restricted to the magistrates, &c., of corporate towns, and sometimes to the representatives of such borough in the Commons' House of Parliament.

Burgessour, a burglar.—Brit.

Burgh-breche [fidejussionis violatio, Lat., a breach of pledge], a fine imposed on the community of a town, for a breach of the peace, &c.—Leg. Canuti, c. lv.

Burgh English. See BOROUGH-ENGLISH.

Burgheristhe, or Burgheriche, a breach of the peace in a city, &c.—Domesday.

Burgh-mails, yearly payments to the Crown of Scotland, introduced by Malcolm III. and resembling the English fee-farm rents.—Encyc. Lond.

Burghware, a citizen or burgess.

Burglary [fr. burg, Sax., a house, and larron, a thief, fr. latro, Lat.], called by our ancient law hamesecken. A breaking and entering by night into a dwelling-house, with intent to commit a felony. There are four things to be considered in this definition. (1) The time; it must be by night, and not by day; and night in the perpetration of this offence, is to be considered as commencing at nine in the evening, and concluding at six in the morning (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. s. 1). (2) the place; it must be a mansion-house, or dwelling-house, or some building connected therewith. The 53rd s. of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, enacts 'that no building, although within the same curtilage with the dwelling-house, and occupied therewith, shall be deemed to be part of such dwelling-house, for the purposes of this Act (which include burglary), unless there shall be a communication between such building and dwelling-house, either immediate or by means of a covered and enclosed passage leading from one to the other.' A house that has not been slept in by the owner, or any part of his family, is not his dwelling-house, so as to make the breaking into it burglary, although it has been used for meals and for business in general. (3) The manner; there must be both a breaking and an entry to complete it. But they need not be both done at once; for if a hole be broken one night, and the same breakers enter the next night through the same, they are burglars. Breaking or taking out the glass of, or otherwise opening a window, picking a lock, opening it with a key, lifting the latch of a door, or unloosing any fastening, coming down a chimney, are breakings within the authorities; as for the entry, any the least degree of it, with any part of the body, or with an instrument held in the hand, is sufficient; as to step over the threshold; to put a hand or a hook in at a window to draw out goods, or a pistol to demand one's money; introducing the hand between the glass of an outer window and an inner shutter, are all of them burglarious entries. (4) The intent must be felonious, either at Common Law or by Statute, as robbery, murder, rape, or any other felony, whether actually perpetrated or not. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. s. 52, burglary is punishable with penal servitude for life or for any term not less than three years, or by imprisonment.—4 Bl. Com. 222; Russell on Crimes; Arch. Crim. Plead. 235, et seq.

Burgmote, a court of a borough.—Leg. Canuti, c. xliv.

Burgomaster, a German mayor or Burgomeister.

Buri, husbandmen.—Mon. Ang. t. 3, p. 183.

Burial, the act of interring the dead. The 4 Geo. IV. c. 52, abolished the barbarous mode of burying persons found felo de se, and directs that their burial shall take place, without any marks of ignominy, privately in the parish church-yard, between the hours of nine and twelve at night, under the direction of the coroner. The burial of dead bodies cast on shore is enforced by 48 Geo. III. c. 75. The recent Burial Acts are 20 & 21 Vict. cc. 35, 81; 22 Vict. c. 1; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 64; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 100.

Burial in some part of the parish church-yard without payment for breaking the soil, is a common law right, and that right will be enforced by mandamus, but not burial in an iron coffin or vault, or even in any particular part of a church-yard, as the family vault for example, that being within the discretion of the incumbent. In order to acquire a perfect right to be buried in a particular vault or place, a faculty must be obtained from the ordinary, as in the case of a pew; or a man may prescribe that he is occupier of an ancient messuage in a parish, and ought to have separate burial in such a vault within the church, and such prescription implies that a faculty was originally obtained (8 B & C. 293). The faculty, however, fails when the family cease to be parishioners.

A clergyman may be prosecuted in the Ecclesiastical Court for improperly refusing to bury a dissenter or other person, for by the 60th Canon 'no minister shall refuse or delay to bury any corpse that is brought to the church or church-yard (convenient warning being given him before), in such manner and form as is prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer' (3 Phil. Ec. Cas. 264–306). A conspiracy to prevent a burial is indictable at common law, and so is the wilfully obstructing a clergyman in reading the burial service over the dead in the parish church, and by threats and menaces hindering the burial (7 Dowl. & Ryl. 461). A clergyman has, neither by the ecclesiastical law, nor by the common law, any right to black cloth or other ornaments placed round a pulpit upon the occasion of a burial, but the same belong to the executors, or persons at whose expense they were placed there, and who may recover the value in an action of trover, if taken by the parson, or other person.

It is a popular error that a creditor can arrest or detain the body of a deceased debtor, and the doing such an act is indictable as a misdemeanour. See Lord Ellenborough's remarks in Jones v. Ashburnham, 4 East, 445. It is also an error that permitting a funeral procession to pass over private land creates a public right of way.

Funerals are exempt from tolls by 3 Geo. IV. c. 126, s. 32. The 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 74, regulating schools of anatomy, was intended to prevent the stealing of dead bodies, which is contrary to common decency, and abhorrent to the general sentiments and feelings of society. The 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 86, regulates the registry of deaths.

Burkism (from the name of its first perpetrator), the practice of killing persons for the purpose of selling their bodies for dissection.

Burneta, or Bruneta, cloth made of dyed wool.—Lyndewood.

Burning in the hand. See BRANDING.

Burning of houses, outhouses, &c. See ARSON. As to setting fire to churches, mills, ships, &c., see 1 Vict. c. 89.

Burrochium, a burroch, dam, or small wear over a river, where traps are laid for the taking of fish.—Cowel.

Bursa, a purse.

Bursar [fr. bursarius, Lat.; whence purse, and purser, a ship's officer], a treasurer of a college.

Bursaria, the exchequer of collegiate or conventual bodies; or the place of receiving, paying, and accounting by the bursars. Also stipendiary scholars, who live upon the burse, fund, or joint stock of the college.

Burse [cambium, bąsilica], an exchange, or place of meeting of merchants.

Burseholders. See HEADBOROUGH.

Bushel [fr. busse, Du., a box; busken, a little box], a dry measure containing eight gallons or four pecks.

Busones comitatus, the barons of a county. Blount; 2 Reeves, c. viii. p. 2.

Bussa, a ship.—Blount.

Bussellus [fr. bouts, old Fr., leathern vessels for holding wine], a bushel.

Busta, Bustus, Busca, and Buscus, &c. See BRUCIA and BRUSULA.

Bustard [fr. outarde, Fr.], a large bird of game, usually found on downs and plains.—25 Hen. VIII. c. 11.

Buthscarle, mariners or seamen.—Seld. Mare Claus. 184.

Butler [fr. bouteiller, Fr., as if fr. bouteille, a bottle; or fr. buttery, butt, a barrel]. See BOTILER.

Butlerage, an ancient hereditary duty belonging to the Crown, much older than the customs. It was a right of taking two tons of wine from every ship importing into England twenty tons or more, and by King Edward I. was exchanged into a duty of 2*s.* for every ton imported by merchant-strangers. It was called butlerage, because paid to the king's butler; and also prisage, because it was a taking or purveyance for wine to the king's use.—4 Inst. 30; 1 Bl. Com. 314.

Butler's ordinance. A law for the heir to punish waste in the life of the ancestor; though it be of record in the parliament book of Edward I., yet it never was a statute, nor ever so received; but only some constitution of the king's counsel, or lords in parliament, which never obtained the strength or force of an act of parliament.—Hale's Hist. p. 18.

Butticella, or Butticellin, a less measure.

Butt, 108 gallons.

Butts, the ends of short pieces of land in arable ridges or furrows. Also the place where archers meet with their bows and arrows to shoot at a mark.

Buyer [fr. bycgan, bohte, A. S.; bygge, O. E.; to purchase for money], a purchaser; 'the buyer wants a hundred eyes, the seller but one.' Chi compra ha bisogno di cent' occhii, chi vende n' ha assai di uno, It. Or according to the Latins, Caveat emptor. Let the buyer look to himself. The seller knows the good or bad qualities of his commodities, and has more need of his tongue than his eyes; whereas the buyer cannot be too watchful in this deceiving age, in which tricking in trade is but too much looked upon as warrantable cunning, over-reaching passing for wit.—Encyc. Lond.

Buying of Pleas. See MAINTENANCE.

Buza, Butta, or Buttis, a standing measure.

Buzonis, the shaft of an arrow before it is fledged and feathered.

Bye, and Bee [fr. by, Sax.], habitation, as bying, i. e. a dwelling-house.

Bye-bil-wuffa, a deed of mortgage or conditional sale. See KUL-KUBALA.—Ind.

By-laws [fr. bilagines, from by, Sax., pagus, civitas, and lagen, lex, Spelm.; or bylag, Sw., fr. by, a borough-town; byar-iög, Icel.; bylove, Dan.; leges urbanæ, Lat.; byarrette, Icel.; jus municipii; or perhaps laws made obiter by the by], the laws, regulations, and constitutions of corporations, for the government of their members, being private laws made by the by, in particular cases, to which the public laws do not extend. They may be made at courts-leet or courts-baron, by commoners or inhabitants, in vills, &c., guilds or fraternities of trade duly incorporated. They are binding, unless contrary to law, or unreasonable, and against the common benefit, and then they are void. There are nice distinctions drawn between by-laws made in restraint of a trade, and those to regulate it. If a by-law do not mention how the penalty for disobedience of it is to be recovered, debt or assumpsit will lie, but if warranted by special custom, distress and sale of the party's goods may be made.

No trading company is allowed to make by-laws which may affect the Crown, or the common profit of the people, under penalty of 40*l.*, unless they be approved by the Chancellor, Treasurer, and Chief Justices, or the Judges of assize in their circuits.—19 Hen. VII. c. 7.

By the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76), the council have express power to make such by-laws as to them shall seem meet, for prevention and suppression of any nuisances not already made punishable in a summary manner, and to inflict a fine not exceeding 5*l.* These by-laws cannot be made unless two-thirds of the whole council are present, and cannot come into operation till twenty-eight days after the same have been sent to the Secretary of State for approval of her Majesty in council, who may disapprove of the same, and till after public notification thereof has been made in the borough, by affixing the same in some public place.

In Scotland those laws are called laws of bir- law, or burlaw, which are made by neighbours elected by common consent in the birlaw courts, wherein cognizance is taken of complaints between neighbour and neighbour. The men so chosen are judges and arbitrators, and are styled birlaw-men. And birlaws, according to Skene (p. 33), are leges rusticorum, laws made by husbandmen, &c., concerning neighbourhood.

Bysax, the first month of the Bengal year, beginning on the 11th of April, and ending on the 11th of May.

C.

C, inscribed upon a ballot in the Roman Courts of Judicature, stood for condemno.—Tay. C. L. 192.

Cabal [fr. cabala, Heb., tradition; or cabale, Fr., intrigue], a hidden or imaginary art practised by the Jews (1 Hall. Litt. Hist. p. 205). (The Jews believed that Moses received in Sinai not only the law, but also certain unwritten principles of interpretation, called Cabala or Tradition, which were handed down from father to son, and in which mysterious and magical powers were supposed to reside.) Also a junto or private meeting of small parties. This name was given to that iniquitous ministry in the reign of Charles II. formed by Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale, who concerted a scheme for the restoration of popery. The initials of these five names form the word 'cabal;' hence the appellation.—Hume ix. 66. For a succinct account of the Cabal Ministry, see 2 Hall. Cons. Hist. p. 374. A cabal differs from a party, as few to many.

Cabalist, a factor or broker in French commerce.

Caballaria [fr. caballus, Lat., a mill horse], pertaining to a horse. It was a feudal tenure of lands, the tenant furnishing a horseman suitably equipped in time of war, or when the lord had occasion for his service.

Cabinet Council, a private and confidential assembly of the most considerable ministers of state, to concert measures for the administration of public affairs; first established by Charles I.

Cable [fr. cabl, Welsh; cabel, Dut.], the great rope of a ship, to which the anchor is fastened. See 25 Geo. III. c. 56.

Cablish [fr. cado, Lat., to fall; cablis, O. Fr.], brushwood, or more properly windfall-wood, according to Spelman.

Cachepolus, or Cacherellus, an inferior bailiff, or catchpole.—Jacob.

Cachet, Lettres de, letters issued and signed by the kings of France, and countersigned by a Secretary of State, authorising the imprisonment of a person. It is said that they were devised by Père Joseph, under the administration of Richelieu. They were at first made use of occasionally as a means of delaying the course of justice; but during the reign of Louis XIV. they were obtained by any person of sufficient influence with the king or his ministers. Under them persons were imprisoned for life, or for a long period, on the most frivolous pretexts, for the gratification of private pique or revenge, and without any reason being assigned for such punishment. They were also granted by the king for the purpose of shielding his favourites or their friends from the consequences of their crimes; and thus were as pernicious in their operation as the protection afforded by the church to criminals in a former age. Abolished during the revolution of 1789.

Cadastre, an official statement of the quantity and value of realty made for purposes of taxation.—Fr. Law.

Cade, a cask containing, of herrings 500, but of sprats 1,000.—Book of Rates, fol. 45.

Cadet [fr. cadet, Fr.; capdel, Gascon.; the younger son of a family; said to be fr. capitetum, little chief.—Wedgw.], one who is trained for the army by a course of military discipline, at Woolwich, Addiscombe, &c., previously to obtaining a commission in the East India service. Also a younger brother.—Encyc. Lond.

Cadi, a Turkish magistrate.

Caduca, the lapse of a testamentary disposition.—Sand. Just. 324.

Caep-Gildum, restoring cattle or goods.

Caerleon, in Wales, an archbishopric which became subject to the Archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Henry I.

Cæsarian operation [fr. Cæsar, or rather Cæso, the first of that name, who was cut out of his mother's womb], a surgical operation whereby the fœtus, which can neither make its way into the world by the ordinary and natural passage, nor be extracted by the attempts of art, whether the mother and fœtus be yet alive, or whether either of them be dead, is, by a cautious and well timed-section, taken from the mother, with a view to save the lives of both, or either of them. 'By most men,' observes Burn (Principles of Midwifery, p. 473, 1824), 'the life of the mother has been considered of the greatest importance, and therefore, as the Cæsarian operation is full of danger to her, no British practitioner will perform it, when delivery can, by the destruction of the child, be procured per vias naturales. There are, I think, histories of twenty-three cases, where this operation has been performed in Britain; out of these only one woman has been saved, but eleven children have been preserved. On the continent, however, where the operation is performed more frequently, and often in more favourable circumstances, the number of fatal cases is much less. If we confine our view to the success of the operation in this island, we must consider it as universally fatal to the mother. The operation itself, though dangerous in its consequences and formidable in its appearance, is by no means difficult to perform. Some advise the incision to be made perpendicularly in the linea alba, others transversely, in the direction of the fibres of the transversalis muscle. Perhaps the precise situation and direction of the wound must be regulated by the circumstances of the case, and the shape of the abdomen; but in general, I apprehend that the transverse wound will be most eligible.'

If this operation be performed after the mother's death, the husband cannot be tenant by the courtesy; since his right begins from the birth of the issue, and is consummated by the death of the wife; but if mother and child are saved, then the husband would be entitled after her death.

Cæterorum, a kind of administration granted after a limited administration for the rest of the estate.

Cagia, a cage or coop for birds.—Rot. Claus.; 38 Hen. III.

Calangium, and Calangia, a challenge, claim, or dispute.—Mon. Angl. tom. 2, fol. 252.

Calcetum, and Calcea [fr. calx, Lat.; chaux, Fr., chalk], a causey, or common hard-way, maintained and repaired with stones and rubbish.—Kennet's Gloss.

Calcutta, Bishop of, the metropolitan bishop in India.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 85, s. 94.

Caledonia, that part of Scotland north of the Firths of Dunbritton and Edinburgh.

Calefagium, a right to take fuel yearly.—Blount.

Calendar [fr. calendarium, Lat.; fr. calendæ, the first day in the month in Roman reckoning], the order and series of months, together with the festivals and fasts, which make up the year. There are two modes of computing time, by the annual course of the sun, and by the periodical revolutions of the moon. The solar year consists of 365 days, five hours, 48′, 45″, 30‴; the lunar year of 354 days, three hours, 48′, 38″, 12‴. The Mahometans adopt the lunar year. The solar year, calculated by the ancient Egyptians, has undergone various corrections and denominations. The chief of these now in use are the three following: (1) The Julian year, so called because Julius Cæsar introduced into the Roman empire the solar or Egyptian year, instead of the lunar year. The Russians and Greeks are the only nations that now use the Julian year. The common Julian year consists of 365 days, and the bissextile, which returns every four years, of 366 days. This computation is faulty, inasmuch as it allows 365 days, and six entire hours, for the annual revolution of the sun, being an excess every year of 11′, 14″, 30‴, beyond the true time. This, in a course of ages, had amounted to several days, and began at length to derange the order of the seasons. Leo X. paid some attention to this, but Gregory XIII. caused a new calendar to be drawn up, which is called the (2) Gregorian year; and because the civil year had gained ten days, he ordered, by a bull published in 1581, that these days should be expunged, so that instead of the 5th of October, 1582, it should be reckoned the 15th. The Catholic states adopted this new calendar, but the Protestants and the rest of Europe adhered to the Julian, and hence the distinction between the old and new style, to which it is necessary to attend in all public acts and writings since 1582. The difference until 1699 was ten days, and eleven from 1700, twelve days must be reckoned during 1800, so that the 1st January of the old style answers to the 13th of the new. (3) The Reformed Calendar differs from the Gregorian, as to the method of calculating the time of Easter, and the other moveable feasts. The Protestants of Germany, Holland, Denmark, and Switzerland, adopted this in 1700, Great Britain in 1752, Sweden in 1753, but since 1776, the Protestants of Germany, Switzerland, and Holland, have adopted the Gregorian. In England the year used to commence on the 25th of March until 1753, when by the 24 Geo. II. c. 23, the beginning of the year was transferred to the 1st of January, and the 3rd of September, 1752, was reckoned the 14th of the same month, in order to accommodate the English chronology to the new style.—25 Geo. II. c. 30; 6 Rymer's Fœdera, 119; Koch's Europe, Introd.; 2 Hall. Lit. Hist., 56, 329.

Calendar Month, a period of time consisting of thirty days in April, June, September, and November; of thirty-one days in the remainder of the months, except February, which consists of twenty-eight days, unless in leap year, when the intercalary day is added, making twenty-nine days.

Calendar of Prisoners, a list of all the prisoners' names in the custody of the sheriff of each county, prepared before the arrival of the judges on their respective circuits. At the end of the assize, the clerk of assize makes out four written lists of all the prisoners, with separate columns, containing their crimes, verdicts, and sentences, leaving a blank column, which the judge fills up opposite to the names of the prisoners, by writing to be reprieved, or respited, or imprisoned, &c. These four calendars are signed by the judge and clerk of assize; then one is given to the sheriff, another to the gaoler, and the judge and the clerk of assize each keep another. If the sheriff afterwards receive no special order from the judge, he executes the judgment of the law in the usual manner, agreeably to the directions in his calendar.—Christian's note to 4 Bl. Com. c. xxxii. p. 104.

Calends [fr. καλέω, Gk., to call], the first days of each month among the Romans. Romulus begun his months always upon the first day of the moon, to avoid the altering of the immovable feasts. Therefore every new moon, one of the inferior priests used to assemble the people in the Capitol, and call over as many days as there are between that and the nones. But we must remember that this custom of calling the days continued no longer than the year of the city 450, when C. Flavius, the curule ædile ordered the fasti, or calendar, to be set up in public places, that everybody might know the difference of times and the return of festivals.—Liv. l. 5, c. xlvi. &c. In the dates of deeds, the day of the month, by nones, ides, or calends, is sufficient.—2 Inst. 675.

Calkers, magistrates who repair the breaches of order and safety in the State.—Ezek. xxvii. 9,.27.

Call [fr. καλέω, Gk.] of the House, an imperative summons sent to every member of the House of Commons, on some particular occasion, when the sense of the whole house is deemed necessary. Members not attending when their names are called, are reported as defaulters, and ordered to attend on another day, when, if they still be absent, and no excuse offered, they may be committed to the custody of the Serjeant-at-arms.—Lex. Parl.

Calling the jury, successively drawing out of a box into which they have been previously put, the names of the jurors on the panels annexed to the nisi prius record, and calling them over in the order in which they are so drawn. The twelve persons whose names are first called, and who appear, are sworn as the jury, unless some just cause of challenge or excuse, with respect to any of them, shall be brought forward.

Calling the plaintiff, when a plaintiff or his counsel, seeing that sufficient evidence has not been given to maintain the issue, withdraws, the crier is ordered to call or demand the plaintiff, and if neither he nor any person for him, appear, he is nonsuited, the jurors are discharged without giving a verdict, the action is at an end, and the defendant recovers his costs. Such judgment does not prevent a plaintiff from bringing another action for the same cause, but a verdict would have barred him for ever.—3 Bl. Com. 376; Step. Pl. 120, 330.

Callis, the king's highway, according to old writers.—Hunt, l. 1.

Canon [fr. κανών, Gk., a rule], a law or ordinance of the church; also a residentiary member of a cathedral chapter.—3 & 4 Vict. c. 113.

Canon law. The origin of this law dates from a period much earlier than the papal supremacy, if indeed it be denied that St. Peter was the proto-bishop of Rome, or indeed pope, as he is termed by his pseudo-apostolic successors. When Christian communities formed themselves into congregations (ἐκκλησίαι), certain resolutions were agreed upon for their government; these, with characteristic simplicity, were termed rules (κάνωνες, forma, disciplina); the phrases canonica sanctio, lex canonica, and canonum jura, were not introduced until the ninth century, nor the phrase jus canonicum until the canon law began in the twelfth century to be treated as a science. The canon law, properly so called, denotes the ecclesiastical law, sanctioned by the church of Rome. It borrows from the Roman law many of its principles and rules of proceeding, though not servilely, nor without such variations as the independence of its tribunals and the different nature of its authorities might be expected to produce (2 Hall. Lit. Hist. pt. 2, c. iv. s. 3, p. 173). A comprehensive history of the canon law is yet to be given to the world (Droit Ecclésiastique). The component parts of the canon law are: (1) The Decree, containing three parts:—(a) distinctions; (b) causes; (c) a treatise concerning consecration. (2) The decretals, also in three parts:—(a) Gregory's decretals, in five books; (b) the sixth decretal; (c) the Clementine constitutions. (3) The extravagants of John XXII. and other later popes were subsequently added as novel constitutions. The term 'extravagant' is used in the canon law to denote documents which transcend the limits of a particular collection. From the careful revisions and scientific treatment of the canon law, it was received very generally in the Christian states. The rules for its application were as follows:—1st. In cases not contained in the civil law, or the rule for which was obscure, open to doubtful interpretation, or not expressly determined, if precisely and clearly resolved by the canon law, this latter formed the basis of decision; and on the contrary, if the case were not provided for, or ambiguously resolved by the canon law, when it was directly met, or its solution more clearly inferable from the civil law, this latter was to be preferred. 2nd. In cases of conflict, the civil law formed the rule in courts of civil, and the canon in those of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Thus, when a matter of canon law cognizance arose in civil law courts, the decision was given according to the rules of the canon law; and vice versâ when a question of civil law cognizance occurred before an ecclesiastical tribunal. 3rd. Within the imperial states, the civil law formed the basis, and the canon law in the papal states. 4th. In matters of a feodal nature the civil was preferred to the canon law. 5th. In forensic causes, the canon is not presumed to differ from the civil law. The canon law of England comprehends, besides the collections of the Roman pontiffs, legatine and provincial constitutions. Also, the canon law, so far as it was received here before the 25 Henry VIII.

c. 19, and is not repugnant to the common law, the statute law, and the law concerning the royal prerogative, is acknowledged to be in force by the authority of Parliament. The canons made in England in 1603, and never confirmed in Parliament, so far as they are agreeable to the ancient canon law, bind the laity; so far as they contain new regulations, are binding on the clergy only. The canon law is founded principally upon the civil law, and so interwoven with it in its many branches, that there is no understanding the canon law rightly, without being very well versed in the civil law; wherefore its knowledge is absolutely necessary for the despatch of all causes of ecclesiastical cognizance. And the civil law not only serves to explain the canon law, but by the practice of ecclesiastical courts it is allowed to come in aid of and to support the canon law in cases which are there omitted.

'The canon law prevails in this country' (observed Lord Thurlow, in Scott v. Tyler, 2 Dick. 716), 'only so far as it hath been actually received, with such amplifications and limitations as time and occasion have introduced; and subject at all times to the municipal law. It is founded on the civil law; consequently the tenets of that law also may serve to illustrate the received rules of the canon law.'

Canon Religiosorum, a book wherein the religious of convents had a fair transcript of the rules of their order, which were frequently held among them as their local statutes; and this book was therefore called Regula and Canon. These public books were the four following: (1) Missale, containing all the offices of devotion. (2) Martyrologium, a register of their saints and martyrs, with the place and time of passion. (3) Canon, or Regula, the institution and rules of their order. (4) Necrologium, or Obituarium, in which they entered the deaths of their founders and benefactors, to observe the days of commemoration of them.—Ken. Glos.

Canonical, agreeable to the canons of the church.

Canonical obedience, that duty which a clergyman owes to the bishop who ordained him, to the bishop in whose diocese he is beneficed, and also to the metropolitan of such bishop.

Canonist, a professor of ecclesiastical law.

Canons of the Protestant Church, ordinances enacted by the clergy under James I. in 1603, but never confirmed in Parliament. It has been solemnly adjudged upon the principles of law and the constitution, that, where they are not merely declaratory of the ancient canon law, but are introductory of new regulations, they do not bind the laity, whatever regard the clergy may think proper to pay them.—1 Bl. Com. 83.

Canons of inheritance, the rules directing the descent of real property throughout the lineal and collateral consanguinity of the owner, dying intestate, who is technically called the purchaser. The 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, materially altered the old canons of real property descent, but because the act does not extend to any descent which took place on the death of any persons who died before the 1st January, 1834, it is deemed expedient to give both the old and the new canons:—

The old canons, which obtain in cases of ancestors dying before 1st January, 1834, are the following:—

(1) That inheritances shall lineally descend to the issue of the person who last died actually seised, in infinitum, but shall never lineally ascend.

(2) That the male issue shall be admitted before the female.

(3) That where there are two or more males in equal degree, the eldest only shall inherit; but the females all together.

(4) That the lineal descendants, in infinitum, of any person deceased, shall represent their ancestor; that is, shall stand in the same place as the person himself would have done had he been living.

(5) That on failure of lineal descendants, or issue of the person last seised, the inheritance shall descend to his collateral relations, being of the blood of the first purchaser, subject to the three preceding rules.

(6) That the collateral heir of the person last seised must be his next collateral kinsman of the whole blood.

(7) That in collateral inheritances the male stocks shall be preferred to the female (that is, kindred derived from the blood of the male ancestors, however remote, shall be admitted before those from the blood of the females, however near, unless where the lands have in fact descended from a female.

The canons according to the new law grafted upon the old, are the following:—

(1) That inheritances shall lineally descend to the issue of the person who last died entitled, in infinitum.

(2) That the male issue shall be admitted before the female.

(3) That where there are two or more males in equal degree, the eldest only shall inherit, but the females all together.

(4) That the lineal descendants, in infinitum, of any person deceased, shall represent their ancestor; that is, shall stand in the same place as the person himself would have done had he been living.

(5) That on failure of lineal descendants, or issue of the person last entitled, the inheritance shall ascend and descend to the lineal ancestors, and to the collateral relations of the purchaser.

(6) That the nearest lineal ancestor shall be the heir of the purchaser, in preference to any of the descendants of such lineal ancestor, and to more remote lineal ancestors and their descendants (other than himself); and the descendants of every such lineal ancestor shall succeed next after or in default of him, so that the father shall be preferred to a brother or sister, and a more remote lineal ancestor to any of his issue, other than a nearer lineal ancestor or his issue; and subject to this rule and to the next, the descent to collaterals shall be subject to the second, third, and fourth canons.

(7) That as between collaterals of a purchaser, a relation of the half blood shall succeed next after any relation in the same degree of the whole blood and his issue, where the common ancestor shall be a male, and next after the common ancestor, where such common ancestor shall be a female. So that the brother of the half-blood, on the part of the father, shall inherit next after the sisters of the whole blood on the part of the father and their issue; and the brother of the half-blood on the part of the mother, shall inherit next after the mother. The collaterals of the half-blood of a person last entitled, who was not a purchaser, will take in a course of descent from the purchaser of whose whole blood they are, by force of the direction, that in every case the descent shall be traced from the purchaser.

(8) That in lineal ascending, and in collateral inheritances, the male stock shall be preferred to the female (that is, the male ancestors and kindred derived from their blood, however remote, shall be admitted before female ancestors and kindred derived from their blood, however near), unless where the lands have in fact descended from a female. Therefore, under the new law, none of the maternal ancestors of the person from whom the descent is to be traced (viz. the purchaser), nor any of their descendants, are capable of inheriting until all his paternal ancestors and their descendants shall have failed; and also no female paternal ancestor of such person, nor any of her descendants, is, or are capable of inheriting until all his male paternal ancestors and their descendants shall have failed; and no female maternal ancestor of such person, nor any of her descendants, is or are capable of inheriting until all his male maternal ancestors and their descendants have failed.—2 Sug. V. & P. 238, 10th ed.

(9) Where there shall be a total failure of heirs of the purchaser, or where any lands shall be descendible, as if an ancestor had been the purchaser thereof, and there shall be a total failure of the heirs of such ancestor, then, and in every such case, the land shall descend, and the descent shall thenceforth be traced from the person last entitled to the land as if he had been the purchaser thereof.—22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 19. This enactment is to be read as part of the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, s. 20.

Cantel, or Cantle [fr. chantel, Fr.], a lump, or that which is added above measure; also a piece of anything, as a 'cantel of bread,' or the like.—Blount.

Canterbury, Archbishop of, his customary privilege is to crown the Kings and Queens of England, while the Archbishop of York has the privilege to crown the Queen-Consort, and be her perpetual chaplain. The Archbishop of Canterbury has also, by 25 Hen. VIII. c. 21, the power of granting dispensations in any case not contrary to the Holy Scriptures and the law of God, where the Pope used formerly to grant them, which is the foundation of his granting special licenses to marry at any place or time; to hold two livings (which must be confirmed under the Great Seal), and the like; and on this also is founded the right he exercises of conferring degrees in prejudice of the two universities; but although he can confer all the degrees which are taken in the universities, yet the graduates of the two universities, by various acts of parliament, and other regulations, are entitled to many privileges, which are not extended to what is called a Lambeth degree.—1 Bl. Com. 381; 1 Burn's Ec. L. 178. The power of conferring medical degrees appears to be superseded by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, sch. A 10, called 'The Medical Act.' See ARCHBISHOP.

Cantred, or Kantress [fr. cant, or cantre, Brit., a hundred, and tre, a town or village], a hundred Welsh villages.—Mon. Ang. p. 1, f. 319.

Cap of Maintenance, one of the regalia or ornaments of State, belonging to the sovereigns of England, before whom it is carried at the coronation and other great solemnities. Caps of maintenance are also carried before the mayors of several cities in England.—Encyc. Lond.

Capacity, an ability or fitness to do or to receive, to sue or to be sued. All persons are capable of purchasing; and all that are in possession, or potential possession of any estates, are capable of conveying them, unless under peculiar legal disabilities, as being attainted, non compotes, infants (except by custom), under duress, feme coverts (except sub modo), and aliens. All persons are capable of committing crimes, unless there be in them a defect of will: for, to constitute a legal crime, there must be both a vicious will and a vicious act. The will does not concur with the act: (1) Where there is a defect of understanding. (2) Where no will is exerted. (3) Where the act is constrained by force and violence. A vicious will may, therefore, be wanting in the cases of—(α) infancy; (β) idiotcy, or lunacy; (γ) drunkenness, which does not, however, excuse; (δ) misfortune; (ε) ignorance, or mistake of fact; (ζ) compulsion, or necessity—which is 1st, that of civil subjection; 2ndly, that of duress per minas; 3rdly, that of choosing the less pernicious of two evils, where one is unavoidable; 4thly, that of want or hunger, which is no legitimate excuse, although this is a vexed point amongst jurists. The Queen, from her excellence and dignity, is also incapable of doing wrong.—Bl. Anal.

All laws which have for their principal object the regulation of the capacity, state, and condition of persons, have been treated by foreign jurists generally as personal laws. They are by them divided into two sorts: those which are universal, and those which are special. The former (universal laws) regulate universally the capacity, state, and condition of persons, such as their minority, majority, emancipation, and power of administration of their own affairs. The latter (special laws) create an ability or disability to do certain acts, leaving the party in all other respects with his general capacity or incapacity. Consult Story's Conflict of Laws, c. iv. tit. 'Capacity of Persons.'

Capax doli, capable of committing crime.

Cape, a judicial writ touching a plea of lands or tenements, divided into cape magnum, or the grand cape, which lay before appearance to summon the tenant to answer the default, and also over to the demandant; the cape ad valentiam was a species of grand cape; and cape parvum, or petit cape, after appearance or view granted, summoning the tenant to answer the default only.—Termes de la Ley; 3 Step. Com. 672.

Capella, an oratory, or depending place of divine worship; also a chest, cabinet, or other depository of precious things, especially of religious relics.—Ken. Paroch. Antiq. 580.

Capellus, a cap, bonnet, helmet, or other covering for the head.

Capias (that you take). The writ of capias, as a means of commencing an action at Common Law, is altogether abolished, and a new writ, called a 'capias on mesne process,' or 'bailable process,' was introduced by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 3. It is addressed to the sheriff, and is in force one calendar month; an order for issuing it, and arresting and holding the defendant to bail under it, may be obtained at any time after the commencement of the action and before final judgment, in all cases in which the defendant was previously liable to arrest (whether with or without a Judge's order), on satisfying a judge at chambers, by affidavit, that the cause of action amounts to 20*l.* or upwards, and that the debtor is about to quit England, unless forthwith apprehended.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 720. This writ is sometimes called capias ad respondendum.

A capias is the process on an indictment when the person charged is not in custody, and in cases not otherwise provided for by statute. 4 Step. Com. 447.

Capias ad audiendum judicium (that you take to hear judgment). This writ is awarded and issued, in case the defendant be found guilty of a misdemeanor (the trial of which may, and does usually, happen in his absence, after he has once appeared), to bring him up to the Court to receive sentence, and, if he abscond, he may be prosecuted even to outlawry.—4 Bl. Com. 375.

Capias ad respondendum (that you take to answer). A process issued in cases of injury accompanied with force, or otherwise, against the defendant's person, when he neglected to appear upon the former process of attachment, or had no substance whereby to be attached, subjecting his person to imprisonment.—3 Bl. Com. 281. See 48 Geo. III. c. 58.

Capias ad satisfaciendum (that you take to satisfy); called in practice a ca. sa. A writ of execution of the highest nature, inasmuch as it deprives a person of liberty, till the satisfaction awarded be made; and therefore, when a man is once taken in execution upon this writ, no other process can be sued out against his lands and goods, unless he escape or is rescued; and by 21 Jac. I. c. 24, if the defendant die while charged in execution upon this writ, the plaintiff may after his death sue out a new execution against his lands, goods, or chattels. This writ is addressed to the sheriff, commanding him to take the body of the defendant, and have him at Westminster on a day therein named, or immediately after the execution of the writ, to make the plaintiff satisfaction for his demand, or remain in custody till he does. The general rule is that any person may be arrested under this writ who is not privileged from being held to bail under a capias ad respondendum. By 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 57, no person shall be taken or charged in execution upon any judgment obtained in any of her Majesty's superior courts or in any County Court, Court of Requests, or other inferior courts, in any action for the recovery of any debt wherein the sum recovered shall not exceed 20*l.*, exclusive of the costs recovered by such judgment. The exception is in a case of fraud, when the Judge may order an arrest under s. 59.

Bail may be taken in execution upon a ca. sa., although they could not be holden to bail. So an infant and a feme covert may be taken on this writ, and if it be sued out against husband and wife, the wife may be taken on it, and she will not be discharged, unless she have no separate property, the general rule being that the wife shall be discharged, if in custody before execution, but not after it.—2 Bl. Com. 315; 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 651.

Capias in withernam (that you take by way of reprisals). If the goods before an action of replevin have been eloigned, so that the sheriff cannot replevy them, then, upon plaint being levied in the County Court by the plaintiff, the sheriff may issue this writ, in vetito (or, more properly, repetito), namio, signifying a second or reciprocal distress in lieu of the first which was eloigned; in other words, the officer is commanded to take goods or cattle of the defendant, to the value of those taken by him, and deliver them to the plaintiff, who gives a bond with sureties, conditioned to prosecute his suit and to return the goods, &c., so to be delivered to him, if a return of them should be afterwards adjudged. Goods taken in withernam cannot be replevied till the original distress is forthcoming.

Also, after verdict and judgment for defendant in replevin, and the usual writ of execution de retorno habendo has been sued out, to which the sheriff has returned that the goods, &c., are eloigned, i. e., conveyed to places unknown to him, so that he cannot execute the writ, the defendant may then sue out a capias in withernam, requiring the sheriff to take other goods, &c., of the plaintiff to the value of the goods, &c., eloigned, and deliver them to the defendant, to be kept by him until the plaintiff deliver to him the goods, &c., originally replevied.—3 Bl. Com. 148.

Capias pro fine, or Misericordia (that you take for the fine or in mercy). Formerly if the verdict was for the defendant, the plaintiff was adjudged to be amerced for his false claim; but if the verdict was for the plaintiff, then in all actions vi et armis, or where the defendant in his pleading had falsely denied his own deed, the judgment contained an award of a capiatur pro fine; in all other cases, the defendant was adjudged to be amerced. In actions of trespass and ejectment a capias pro fine used to issue in pursuance of the capiatur, and the defendant was obliged to compound the fine, by paying some small sum to the master, until by 5 W. & M. c. 12, it was enacted that no capias pro fine should thereafter issue in actions of 'trespass, ejectment, assault, or false imprisonment' brought in any of the Courts of Westminster; but that the plaintiff should pay 6*s.* 8*d.* to the master in satisfaction of the said fine, at the time of signing the judgment, and should be allowed the same in his costs; and it is now unnecessary in any case.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 500.

Capias utlagatum (that you take the outlaw). This writ is either general, against the person only; or special, against the person, lands, and goods. If a defendant be outlawed, and appear publicly afterwards, he may be arrested by virtue of this writ, and committed till the outlawry be reversed; and any person may arrest an outlaw on a criminal prosecution, either of his own head, or by this writ, or a warrant, in order to bring him to execution.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1251.

Capiatur, judgment quod. See CAPIAS PRO FINE, or MISERICORDIÂ.

Capita [M. Lat.], abuttals or boundaries.

Capita (rights). Distribution of personalty per capita (professedly borrowed from the civilians, and enacted in the Statutes of Distributions) happens when all the claimants claim in their own right, in equal degree of kindred, and not jure representationis, in the right of another person, as if the next of kin be the intestate's three children, A. B. and C.; and here the intestate's personalty is divided into three equal portions, and distributed per capita, one to each. So succession per capita is where the claimants are next in degree to the ancestor, in their own right, and not by right of representation.—2 Steph. Com. 225, 226.

Capital [fr. capitalis; caput, Lat.], in political economy, that portion of the produce of industry existing in a country, which may be made directly available, either for the support of human existence, or the facilitating of production; but, in commerce, and as applied to individuals, it is understood to mean the sum of money which a merchant, banker, or trader adventures in any undertaking, or which he contributes to the common stock of a partnership. Also the fund of a trading company or corporation, in which sense the word stock is generally added to it.—McCull. Com. Dict. As to circulating and fixed capital see 1 Mill's Pol. Econ. b. 1. c. vi.

Capital felonies, those crimes upon conviction of which the offender is condemned to be hanged. The crimes now punishable with death are high treason and murder. Since 24 & 25 Vict. cc. 96, 97, 98, and 100, numerous offences, formerly capital, have ceased to be so.

Capitale, a thing which is stolen, or the value of it.—Blount.

Capitale vivens, live cattle.—Ibid.

Capitation, a tax or imposition raised on each person in consideration of his labour, industry, office, rank, &c. It is a very ancient kind of tribute, and answers to what the Latins called tributum, by which taxes on persons are distinguished from taxes on merchandise, called vectigalia.

Capite, tenure in, lands held by tenants immediately from the king. It was the most honourable tenure, and was of two kinds, either ut de honore, where the land was held of the king, as proprietor of some honor, castle, or manor, or ut de coronâ, where it was held in right of the Crown itself. When these tenants in capite granted portions of their lands to inferior persons, they were called mesne (middle) lords or barons, with regard to such inferior tenants, who were styled tenants paravail, the lowest tenants, because they were supposed to make avail or profit of the lands. This tenure is abolished, so that tenures now created by the Crown are in common socage.—12 Car. II. c. 24.

Capitilitium, poll-money.

Capititium, a covering for the head.—1 Hen. IV.

Capitula itineris, articles of enquiry.—2 Reeves, c. viii. p. 4.

Capitulary, a code of laws.

Capitulation [fr. capitulo, Lat., to treat upon terms; fr. capitulum, a little head or division], the treaty which determines the conditions under which a place besieged is abandoned to the commanding officer of the besieging army; also an agreement by which the prince and the people, or those who have the right of the people, regulate the manner in which the government is to be administered.

Capitula ruralia, assemblies or chapters, held by rural deans and parochial clergy, within the precinct of every deanery; which at first were every three weeks, afterwards once a month, and subsequently once a quarter.—Cowel.

Capitulum est clericorum congregatio sub uno decano in ecclesiâ cathedrali.—Co. Litt. 98.—(A chapter is a congregation of clergy under one dean in a cathedral church.)

Capituli agri, head-lands; lands lying at the head or upper end of furrows, &c.—Ken. Par. Ant. 137.

Captain [fr. capitano, It., a head-man; fr. caput, Lat.], a leader or commander of a company of soldiers; who is either a general, governing a whole army, or special, as leader of a band or regiment. Also the commander of a ship or vessel.

Captator, a person who obtains a gift or legacy through artifice.

Caption, that part of a legal instrument, as a commission, indictment, &c., which shows where, when, and by what authority it is taken, found, or executed. Thus, where a commission is executed, the commissioners subscribe their names to a certificate, declaring when and where the commission was executed. The caption is no part of an indictment, it is merely the style of the Court where the indictment was preferred, which is prefixed as a kind of preamble to it on the record, when made up, or when it is returned to a certiorari.—Arch. Crim. Plead. tit. 'Caption.' This word is improperly used for an arrest.

Captives, prisoners. As in the goods of an enemy, so also in his person, a sort of qualified property may be acquired, by taking him a prisoner of war, at least till his ransom be paid.—2 Bl. Com. 402.

Capture, the arrest or seizure of a person or thing, particularly applied to the seizure of ships by an enemy in time of war.

Caputagium, head or poll-money.

Caput anni, the first day of the year.

Caput baroniæ, the castle or chief seat of a baron.

Caput jejunii, the beginning of the Lent Fast, i. e. Ash Wednesday.

Caput loci, the head or upper part of a place.

Caput lupinum, a wolf's head. An outlawed felon was said to have caput lupinum, and might be knocked on the head, like a wolf, by any one that should meet him, because, having renounced all law, he was to be dealt with as in a state of nature, when everyone that should find him might slay him; yet now, to avoid such inhumanity, it is holden that no man is entitled to kill another wantonly or wilfully, but in doing so is guilty of murder, unless it happen in the endeavour to apprehend him.—4 Steph. Com. 468.

Car, and Char [fr. caer, Brit., city], names of places beginning with these words signify a city, as Carlisle, Cardiff, &c.

Carat, a weight equal to three and one-sixth grains.

Carcan, a pillory.

Carcannum, a prison.—Leg. Canut. Reg.

Carcatus, loaded, a ship freighted.

Carcel-age, prison-fees.

Carcer ad homines custodiendos, non ad puniendos, dari debet.—Co. Litt. 260.—(A prison ought to be given for the custody, not the punishment, of persons.)

Cards. To keep a common house for card-playing is unlawful.—4 Steph. Com. 352.

Carecta, and Carectata, a cart and cart-load.

Caretarius, or Carectarius, a carter.—Blount.

Cargo [fr. cargo, Sp., the load of a ship; charge, Fr.], the lading of a ship, the merchandise or wares contained and conveyed in a ship.

Caristia, dearth, scarcity, dearness.—Cowel.

Caritas, or Karite, a grace-cup, an extraordinary allowance of wine or liquor.

Cark, a quantity of wool, whereof thirty make a sarplar.—27 Hen. VI. c. 2.

Carle See KARLE.

Carno, an immunity or privilege.—Cowel.

Caroome, a license by the Lord Mayor of London to keep a cart.—1 Wm. Ex. 730.

Carpemeals, a coarse cloth.—7 Jac. I. c. 16.

Carrels, closets, or apartments for privacy or retirement.

Carreta, a carriage, cart, or wain-load.

Carricle, or Carracle, a ship of great burden.

Carrier, in its general sense a person who undertakes to transport the goods of other persons from one place to another for hire. It is not, however, every person who undertakes to carry goods for hire that is deemed a common carrier.

A private person may contract with another for the carriage of his goods, and incur no responsibility beyond that of any ordinary bailee for hire, that is to say, the responsibility of ordinary diligence. To bring a person within the description of a common carrier, he must exercise it as a public employment; he must undertake to carry goods for persons generally; and he must hold himself out as ready to transport goods for hire, as a business, not as a casual occupation, pro hâc vice. A common carrier has, therefore, been defined to be one who undertakes for hire or reward to transport the goods of such as choose to employ him, from place to place. Although the expression used is a common carrier of goods, yet this language is not to be understood in a strict sense; for a common carrier may be of money as well as of goods, if such is his own practice, or the common usage of the business in which he is engaged.

Common carriers are generally of two descriptions: (1) carriers by land; (2) carriers by water. Of the former description are the proprietors of stage-wagons and stage-coaches, and railroads, which ply and run between different places, and carry goods for hire. So are truckmen, wagoners, teamsters, cartmen, and porters, who undertake to carry goods for hire, as a common employment, from one town to another, or from one part of a town or city to another. Of the latter description are the owners and masters of ships, whether they are regular packet ships or carrying smacks, or coasting ships, or other ships carrying on general freight. So are the owners and masters of steam-boats engaged in the transportation of goods for persons generally for hire. So are the lightermen, hoymen, barge-owners, ferrymen, and boatmen, and others employed in the same manner. The owners of a steam-boat, who undertake to tow freight boats for hire, or undertake to tow vessels in or out of port for hire, are not ordinary carriers, but are responsible only for common skill, care, and diligence in their undertaking.—Story on the Law of Bailments, 500.

The law regulating and limiting the common law liability of carriers, is fixed by the 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 68, which protects carriers from liability in case of the loss of certain specified articles, exceeding the value of ten pounds (excepting loss by the felony of the carrier's servants or his own personal default), unless the party delivering the goods declare the value, and offer to pay, if required, an extra charge for carriage, but requires that the notice of the increased charges that may be required shall be affixed in the office, and of which, when so affixed, every person is bound to take notice; but it provides that the act shall not affect special contracts. It then declares that all other notices, then already or thereafter to be given, shall not protect a carrier from liability, excepting when so given under terms of the act, viz. when certain specified articles exceed the value of 10*l.* and when such notice has been duly affixed; but as to any other goods, or even the specified articles, when under the value of 10*l.* carriers cannot by any notice protect themselves from the ancient common law liability. The act, however, allows effect to any express special contract made with a carrier, and according to the terms of that contract. The statute then authorizes an action for loss against any one proprietor, and excludes a plea in abatement of non-joinder, and provides that if loss ensue, then not only the declared value, but also the money paid for extra insurance, shall be recoverable; but entitles the carrier to require proof of the value of the package lost, and authorizes him to pay money into court.

The articles specified in the act are the following, viz.:—bills of exchange, china, clocks, coin (gold or silver) of this or any other state, engravings, fur, glass, gold coin or gold manufactured or otherwise, jewellery, lace, maps, notes of any bank, or for payment of money, orders for payment of money, paintings, pictures, plate (gold or silver), plated articles, precious stones, promissory notes, securities for payment of money, silks manufactured or unmanufactured or wrought up or not with other articles, silver, stamps, English or foreign, timepieces of every description, title-deeds, trinkets, watches, writings.

Since this act, carriers requiring an increased charge, usually affix in their offices and circulate, placards giving notice. It is settled by prior decisions that no action can be supported against the postmaster-general for the loss of bills or bank-notes, stolen out of letters put into the post-office, and, therefore, it is a proper precaution to remit such documents in registered letters, or in halves by different conveyances.—Jeremy on the Law of Carriers; 3 Chitty's Commercial Law, 369–386; Burn's Justice, tit. 'Carriers;' Chitty's Law of Contracts; and 1 Smi. L. C. 173.

Carrying away infant-females under sixteen. Statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 55, enacts that 'Whosoever shall unlawfully take, or cause to be taken, any unmarried girl, being under the age of sixteen years, out of the possession, and against the will of her father or mother, or of any other person having the lawful care or charge of her, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.' The abduction of a natural-daughter from her putative father is within this law. In order to constitute this offence it is not necessary that any corrupt motive should be the inducement to commit the offence, and the consent of the child herself would be no excuse, the gist of the offence being the taking away of infant-daughters from the possession of their parents or guardians. If the parents or guardians once consent, it seems doubtful whether they can afterwards revoke it. The offender's ignorance of the tender age of the female is no extenuation of his crime.

Cart-Bote. See BOTE.

Carte blanche, a white card, or free permission, signed at the bottom with a person's name, and sometimes sealed, giving another person power to superscribe what conditions he pleases. Applied generally in the sense of unlimited terms being granted.

Cartel [fr. cartella, It., pasteboard], a piece of pasteboard with some inscription on it, hung up in some place, and to be removed.—Flor. Hence a written challenge openly hung up, afterwards any written challenge. See CHARTEL.

Cartel-ship, a vessel commissioned in time of war to exchange the prisoners of any two hostile powers; also to carry any particular proposal from one to another; for this reason, the officer who commands her is particularly ordered to carry no cargo, ammunition, or implements of war, except a single gun for the purpose of signals.—Encyc. Lond.

Cartulary [fr. carta, Lat., paper], a place where papers or records are kept.

Caruca [fr. carr, old Gallic], a plough.

Carucage, a tax imposed on every plough for the public service.

Carucatarius, he that held lands in carvage, or plough-tenure.—Paroch. Antiq. 354.

Carucate [fr. carucata terræ], Carvage, or Carve of land, a plough-land of 100 acres, or, according to Skene, as much land as may be tilled in a year and a day by one plough.—Ken. Glos. This quantity varies in different counties from 60 to 120 acres.

Case, action on, resorted to where a party sues for damages, for any wrong or cause of complaint to which covenant or trespass will not apply. This action originated in the power given by the Statute of Westminster 2, to the clerks of the Chancery, to frame new writs in consimili casu, upon the analogy of writs already known. Under this power they constructed many writs for different injuries, which were considered as in consimili casu with, that is, to bear a certain analogy to a trespass. The new writs invented for the cases supposed to bear such analogy, received, accordingly, the appellation of writs of trespass on the case (brevia 'de transgressione super casum'), as being founded on the particular circumstances of the case, thus requiring a remedy; and to distinguish them from the old writ of trespass, and the injuries themselves, which are the subjects of such writs, were not called trespasses, but had the general name of torts, wrongs, or grievances. The writs of trespass on the case, though invented thus, pro re natâ, in various forms, according to the nature of the different wrongs which respectively called them forth, began, nevertheless, to be deemed as constituting, collectively, a new individual form of action; this new genus took its place by the name of trespass on the case, among the more ancient actions of debt, covenant, trespass, &c. Such being the nature of this action, it comprises, of course, many different species. There are two, however, of more frequent use than any other species of trespass on the case, viz. assumpsit and trover. The difference between an action of trespass and an action on the case is, that in the former the plaintiff complains of an immediate wrong, and in the latter, of a wrong that is the consequence of another act. The action on the case is equally applicable to consequential injuries to the real and personal property, as to the personal character of the party by whom it is brought.—Step. Plead. 17.

Case for the opinion of Courts of Law. It is no longer lawful for the Court of Chancery to direct cases for a Court of Common Law; but the Court of Chancery itself may decide legal questions arising incidentally.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 61.

Case stated, an agreement between litigants, setting forth the facts and points in dispute, with a view to a prompt decision. As to cases by Justices of the Peace, see 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

Cash [fr. caisse, Fr., a chest], money, properly ready money, bills, drafts, bonds, and all immediately negotiable paper in a person's possession.

Cashier, a person entrusted with the monetary interests of a public company, usually under the order of directors; also a deprivation of office.

Cashlite, a mulct.

Cassation [fr. casso, Lat., to quash], a making null or void of any unjust or illegal act or decision; also a decision in the last resort.—Fr. Law.

Cassatum and Cassata, a house, with land sufficient to maintain one family.

Cassetur breve (that the writ be quashed). When the defendant pleads sufficient matter in abatement and the plaintiff cannot deny it, he may either obtain leave to amend his declaration, if that will answer his purpose and which will be granted upon payment of costs, or he may at once enter on the roll a cassetur breve, or judgment upon his prayer that his writ may be quashed, to the intent that he may sue out a better. In practice, judgment is not often signed, nor any entry made on record, but the prayer and award are copied on paper, and delivered, in the same manner as a pleading, to the opposite party. Neither party is entitled to costs.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1417.

Cassidile, a little sack, purse, or pocket.

Cassock, or Cassula [fr. casag, Gael., a long coat], a garment belonging to a priest

Castel, or Castle [fr. castellum dim. of castrum, Lat.], a fortress in a town; a principal mansion of a nobleman.—2 Inst. 31.

Castellain, the lord, owner, or captain of a castle; the constable of a fortified house; a person having the custody of one of the Crown mansions; an officer of the forest.—Bract. Manw.

Castellarium, the precinct or jurisdiction of a castle.

Castellarum operatio, castle-work or service and labor done by inferior tenants for the building and upholding of castles of defence; towards which some gave their personal assistance, and others paid their contributions. See TRINODA NECESSITAS. Castleward was the service of guarding or watching at such castle.

Caster and Chester [fr. castrum, Lat.], the places ending with either of these words were the sites of the castles built by the Romans.

Castigatory, a certain engine of correction, otherwise called the tre-bucket, tumbrel tymborella, cucking-stool, scolding-stool, ducking-stool, goginstole, and cokestole, corrupted from choaking-stool. It was a punishment provided for scolding women, wherein they were plunged or soused over head in the water.

It was also called Cathedra Stercoralis, and by the Saxons scealfing stole, and anciently inflicted on brewers and bakers transgressing the laws, who were ducked in stercore (in stinking water).—Domesday Book.

Casting vote, the vote given by the chairman or president of a deliberative assembly, when the suffrages of the meeting are equal. Thus, in the House of Commons the Speaker declares the numbers after a division, but is not required to record his own vote unless the numbers are even, and then he must vote one way or the other, in order that the House may come to some decision upon the question which has been put from the chair. It is a difficult and delicate office to give an opinion under such circumstances, especially when it is the duty of the Speaker to withdraw himself as much as possible from the contentions of parties, and, therefore, when the question relates to the stage of a bill – as for the second reading, for instance— it is usual for him to vote for the 'ayes' in order to give the house an opportunity of re-considering the bill in a future stage. In committees, some misconception appears to have existed as to the precise nature of the chairman's right of voting. In 1836 the House of Commons was informed that the chairman of a select committee had first claimed the privilege to vote as a member of the committee, and afterwards when the voices were equal, of giving a casting vote as chairman, and that such practice had of late years prevailed in some select committees; when it was declared by the House that, according to the established rules of Parliament, the chairman of a select committee can only vote when there is an equality of voices (91 Commons' Jour. 214). This error was very probably occasioned by the practice of election committees, which was, however, confined to them, and only existed under the provisions of Acts of Parliament.

Casts. See SCULPTURES.

Casual ejector, the fictitious Richard Roe, in the mixed action of ejectment before the fiction was abolished by the C. L. P. A., 1852. The declaration stated that a lease of the premises in question, for a term of years, had been made by the party claiming the title (who was the real plaintiff) to a fictitious John Doe (who was the lessee of the plaintiff), who entered upon the land by virtue of such demise, and that afterwards Richard Roe (the casual ejector) entered and ousted John Doe, during the continuance of his term. Appended to this declaration was a notice supposed to be signed by Richard Roe addressed to the tenant in possession (who was the actual defendant). The notice informed the tenant of the action having been brought by the lessee, and of Richard Roe having no title to the premises, and advised him to appear at a certain time and defend his title, otherwise he, Richard Roe, would suffer judgment by default, and then the actual defendant would be turned out of possession by the sheriff, under a writ of habere facias possessionem.

Casual poor, those who are not settled in a parish. See 33 Geo. III. c. 35, s. 3, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 26.

Casualty of wards, the mails and duties due to the superior in ward-holdings.—Scotch Dict.

Casu consimili, a writ of entry, granted where tenant by the courtesy, or tenant for life, alienated in fee, or in tail, or for another's life, and was brought by him in reversion against the party to whom such tenant so alienated to his prejudice, and in the tenant's lifetime.—Termes de la Ley. Abolished.

Casu proviso, a writ of entry, given by the Stat. of Gloucester, c. 7, where a tenant in dower alienated in fee, or for life, &c., and it lay for him in reversion against the alienee.—F. N. B. 207. Abolished.

Casus fœderis, a case stipulated by treaty, or which comes within the terms of a compact.

Casus omissus, a point unprovided for by statute.

Casus fortuitus non est sperandus; et nemo tenetur divinare.—4 Co. 66.—(A fortuitous event is not to be foreseen; and no person is bound to divine.

Casus omissus et oblivioni datus dispositioni communis juris relinquitur.—5 Co. 37.—(A case omitted and given to oblivion is left to the disposal of the common law).

Casus omissus habetur pro amisso.—(An omitted case is deemed as lost.)

Cat. Amongst the ancient Britons cats were looked upon as creatures of intrinsic value; and the killing or stealing one was a grievous crime, and subjected the offender to a fine, especially if it belonged to the king's household, and was the custos horrei regii, for which there was a very peculiar forfeiture.—2 Steph. Com. 7 n.

Catalla justè possessa amitti non possunt.—Jenk. Cent. 28.—(Chattels justly possessed cannot be lost.)

Catalla reputantur inter minima in lege.—Ibid. 52.—(Chattels are considered in law among the least things.)

Catallactics, the science of political economy.—Whately's Lect. on Pol. Econ.

Catallis captis nomine districtionis, an obsolete writ that lay where a house was within a borough, for rent issuing out of the same, and which warranted the taking of doors, windows, &c. by way of distress.—Old Nat. Bre. 66.

Catallis reddendis, an obsolete writ that lay where goods delivered to a man to keep till a certain day were not upon demand re-delivered at the day.—Reg. Orig. 39.

Catals, goods and chattels.

Catapulta, a warlike engine to shoot darts; a crossbow.

Catascopus, an archdeacon.—Du Cange.

Catching bargain, a purchase from an expectant heir, for an inadequate consideration.

Catchland. Land in Norfolk, so called because it is not known to what parish it belongs, and the minister who first seizes the tithes of it, by right of pre-occupation, enjoys them for that year.—Cowel.

Catchpole, a sheriff's officer or bailiff, so called probably because he catches by the poll or head the party arrested.

Category [fr. κατηγορία, Gk.], a series or order of all the predicates or attributes contained under a genus.

Cathedral [fr. καθέδρα, Gk., a seat], the church of the bishop and head of the diocese, in which is his seat of dignity. The Cathedral Acts are 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, 4 & 5 Vict. c. 39, and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 77.

Our cathedrals and collegiate churches have been divided into four classes:—1st, consisting of thirteen, being the cathedrals of the old foundation, or Ecclesiæ Cathedrales Canonicorum Secularium; 2nd, consisting of eight conventual cathedrals, constituted with deans and chapters by Hen. VIII.; 3rd, containing the five cathedrals founded, together with new bishoprics, by Hen. VIII.; 4th, the new cathedrals of Ripon and Manchester.—Cath. Com. Rep.

Cathedral preferments, all deaneries, archdeaconries, and canonries, and generally all dignities and offices in any cathedral or collegiate church, below the rank of a bishop.

Cathedratic, a sum of 2*s.* paid to the bishop by the inferior clergy; but from its being usually paid at the bishop's synod, or visitation, it is commonly named synodals.—Burn's Dict.

Catholic [fr. καθολικὸς, Gk.], universal, general. The rise of heretics induced the primitive Italian church to assume to itself the appellation of Catholic, being a characteristic to distinguish itself from all private or particular sects. The Romish church, assuming this claim, distinguishes itself by the name of Catholic, in opposition to all those who have separated from her communion in the eucharist, and whom she considers as heretics and schismatics, and herself only as the true and Christian church. In the strict sense of the word, there is no Catholic church in being, that is, no universal Christian community; to the want of which, some philosophers have attributed the wide and boundless stride of Mahometanism.—Encyc. Lond.

Catholic Emancipation Act, 10 Geo. IV. c. 7.

Cattle [derived by Skinner, Menage, and Spelman fr. capitalia, quæ ad caput pertinent, personal goods; in which sense chattels is yet used. Mandeville uses catele for price], beasts of pasture, neither wild nor domestic.

Cattle-gate, common for one beast.

Catzurus, a hunting-horse.

Caucus, a public meeting of a political character.—North American.

Cauda terræ, a land's end, or the bottom of a ridge in arable land.

Caulceis, ways pitched with flint or other stones. See CALCETUM.

Causa matrimonii prælocuti, a writ which lay where a woman gave lands to a man in fee simple, &c., to the intent he should marry her, and he refused to do so in any reasonable time, being thereunto required. — Reg. Orig. 66. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Causæ dotis, vitæ, libertatis, fisci, sunt inter favorabilia in lege.—Jenk. Cent. 284.—(Causes of dower, life, liberty, revenue, are among the things favoured in law.)

Causa ecclesiæ publicis causis æquiparatur; et summa est ratio quæ pro religione facit.—Co. Litt. 341.—(The cause of the church is equal to public causes; and paramount is the reason which makes for religion.)

Causa et origo est materia negotii.—1 Co. 99.—(Cause and origin is the material business.)

Causa proxima, non remota spectatur.—Bac. Max. R. 1.—(The immediate, not the remote cause, is to be regarded.)

Causa spiritualis committi potest principio laico.—Da. 4.—(A spiritual cause may be committed to a lay prince.)

Causa vaga et incerta non est causa rationabilis.—5 Co. 57.—(A vague and uncertain cause is not a reasonable cause.)

Causa mortis (in prospect of death). See DONATIO MORTIS CAUSÂ.

Causam nobis significes quare, a writ addressed to a mayor of a town, &c., who was by the king's writ commanded to give seisin of lands to the king's grantee; on his delaying to do it, requiring him to show cause why he so delayed the performance of his duty.

Cause, a suit or action; motive or reason; that which produces an effect.

Cause of action, a right to sue; as to joining causes of action, see C. L. P. A. 1852, ss. 40 & 41, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 67. s. 6.

Cause-list, a printed roll of actions to be tried in the order of their entry, with the names of the attorneys for each litigant.

Causea [fr. chaussée, Fr., a paved road], a causeway.

Cautio pro expensis, security for costs.

Caution, a species of bail; security.

Caution juratory, the best security that a suspender can offer in order to obtain a suspension.—Scotch Law.

Cautione admittenda, a writ that lies against a bishop who holds an excommunicated person in prison for contempt, notwithstanding he offers sufficient caution or security to obey the orders and commandment of the Church for the future.—Reg. Orig. 66.

Cautioner, a surety.

Cauzi, Cazi, Kazy, a Mahometan judge or justice, who also officiates as a public notary in attesting deeds by affixing his seal. The same as the officer we call Cadi in Turkey.

Cauzi-ul-Cazant, judge of judges; the chief judge or justice.—Indian.

Cavendum est à fragmentis.—Bac. Aph. 26. (Beware of small pieces.)

Caveat (that he take heed), a warning or caution. If a person desire to stop the enrolment of a decree in Chancery, in order to present a petition of appeal to the Lord Chancellor, he enters a caveat with his lordship's secretary, which prevents the enrolment for twenty-eight days; it is sometimes entered to prevent the issuing of a lunacy commission. It is also entered to stay the probate of a will, letters of administration, a license of marriage, or an institution of a clerk to a benefice.

Caveat actor, caveat emptor (let the doer—let the purchaser beware).

Caveat emptor, qui ignorare non debuit quod jus alienum emit.—Hob. 99.—(Let a purchaser beware; who ought not to be ignorant that he is purchasing the rights of another.)

Lord Thurlow, in Lowndes v. Lane, 2 Cox, 363, said that, as to the extent of this maxim, he was willing to carry it to a great extent, but not to the extent of saying it should apply where there was a positive representation essentially material to the subject sold, and which at the same time is false in fact. He said he must consider any fundamental mistake in the particulars of an estate as furnishing a case in which the purchaser would be entitled to have the mistake set right, if recently applied for. 'If a man,' said Tindal, C. J. (Brown v. Edgington, 2 Scott, N. R. 504), 'purchase goods of a tradesman, without, in any way, relying upon the skill and judgment of the vendor, the latter is not responsible for their turning out contrary to his expectation; but, if the tradesman be informed at the time the order is given of the purpose for which the article is wanted, the buyer relying upon the seller's judgment, the latter impliedly warrants that the thing furnished shall be reasonably fit and proper for the purpose for which it is required.'

Cavers, persons stealing ore from mines in Derbyshire, punishable in the berghmote or miner's court; also officers belonging to the same mines.

Cavil, a captious argument.

Ceap, a bargain; anything for sale; chattel; also cattle, as being the usual medium of barter. Sometimes used instead of—Ceapgilde [fr. ceap, Sax., cattle, and gild, payment], payment in cattle, market price.

Ceapian, to make a bargain.

Cede, to assign or transfer.

Cedent, an assignor.

Celation [fr. celo, Lat.], concealment of pregnancy or delivery.—Dung.

Celer lecti, the top, head, or tester of a bed.

Celibacy [fr. cælibatus, Lat.], an unmarried or single state of life.

Cellerarius, a butler in a monastery; sometimes called manciple or caterer.

Cemetery [fr. κοιμητήριον, Gk. fr. κοιμάω, to set to sleep], a place of burial, differing from a churchyard by its locality and incidents; by its locality, as it is separate and apart from any sacred building used for the performance of divine service; by its incidents, that inasmuch as no vault or burying-place in an ordinary churchyard can be purchased for a perpetuity, in a cemetery a permanent burial place can be obtained. See The Cemeteries Clauses Act, 1847, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 65.

Cendulæ, small pieces of wood laid in the form of tiles, to cover the roof of a house.

Cenegild [fr. cinne, Sax., relation, and gild, payment], an expiatory mulct paid by one who killed another, to the kindred of the deceased.

Cenellæ, acorns from the oak.

Cenninga, notice given by a buyer to a seller that the thing sold was claimed by another, in order to appear and justify the sale.—Athel. ap. Brompt. c. iv.

Censaria [fr. cense, Fr.], a farm or house and land let at standing rent.

Censuales, a species or class of the oblati or voluntary slaves of churches or monasteries, i. e. those who, to procure the protection of the church, bound themselves to pay an annual tax or quit-rent only of their estates to a church or monastery. Besides this, they sometimes engaged to perform certain services.—Potg. de Stat. Serv. l. 1. c. i. ss. 6, 7.

Censumethidus, a dead rent, like that which is called mortmain.—Blount.

Censure [fr. census, Lat.], a custom observed in certain manors in Devon and Cornwall, where all persons above the age of sixteen years are cited to swear fealty to the lord, and to pay 11*d.* per poll, and 1*d.* per annum ever after; these thus sworn are called censers. Also a judgment which condems some book, person, or action, or more particularly a reprimand from a superior.—Surv. Dict. Corn.

Census, a numbering of the people. It takes place once in every ten years. By the last census, taken on the 8th of April, 1861, under the Acts 23 & 24 Vict. c. 61 for England, c. 62 for Ireland, c. 98 for Scotland, the number of persons then within Great Britain (including the islands in the British Seas), was 29,058,888, exclusive of the army, navy, and merchant-seamen then abroad, estimated at 275,900.

Census regalis, the annual revenue (or income) of the Crown.

Cent [fr. centum, a hundred], a hundred pounds. A profit of 10*l.* per cent. is the gain of 10*l.* by the use of 100*l.*

Centenarii, petty judges, under-sheriffs of counties, that had rule of a hundred, and judged smaller matters among them.—1 Vent. 211.

Centeni, the principal inhabitants of a district composed of different villages, originally in number a hundred, but afterwards only called by that name.

Central Criminal Court, the most important criminal tribunal in this country, as well from the authority of the judges who preside there as from the number and magnitude of the crimes which are tried before it. This court was erected in 1834, by 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 36, which, reciting that it was expedient, for the more effective and uniform administration of justice in criminal cases, that offences committed in the metropolis, and certain parts adjoining thereto, should be tried by justices and judges of oyer and terminer, and gaol delivery in the city of London, proceeded to constitute a new tribunal, which it entitled 'The Central Criminal Court,' to consist of the lord mayor, the lord chancellor, the judges of the three superior courts at Westminster, the judges in bankruptcy, the judges of the admiralty, the dean of the arches, the aldermen, recorder, and common serjeant of London, the judges of the sheriffs' court, and any person who had, or shall have been lord chancellor, a judge of any of the superior courts at Westminster, or who might be thereafter appointed by general commission of the queen. To this court her majesty may issue commissions of oyer and terminer, and gaol delivery, for the trial of all cases of treasons, murders, felonies, and misdemeanors committed within the city of London and county of Middlesex, and in certain specified parts of the counties of Essex, Kent, and Surrey, all of which constitute a district which is to be, for the purposes of that act, deemed and taken to be one county. The court sits at the sessions house, in the Old Bailey; and there are at least twelve sessions held in every year, at times fixed by any eight of the judges at Westminster. Two provisions in this statute, and also several subsequent statutes, greatly augmented the jurisdiction of this tribunal, by first curtailing that of the courts of quarter sessions within the district assigned to the Central Criminal Court, and restraining them from trying nearly all the serious kinds of felony (4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 36, s. 17); and by transferring to it the entire criminal jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty (s. 22), followed up, in 1837, by 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. cc. 84–89, by the operation of which all the serious offences punishable under them, if committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, may be, and have ever since been, tried at the Central Criminal Court. During every session two of the judges of the superior courts at Westminster preside in this court for the purpose of trying the more important offences. The remainder are tried by either the recorder or common serjeant, or a judge from the sheriffs' court, commissioned for that purpose; on every occasion the lord mayor or some of the aldermen being also present on the bench. There are two courts adjoining each other, which sit simultaneously. See 9 & 10 Vict. c. 24; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 16.

Ceola, a large ship.—Blount.

Cepi corpus et paratum habeo (I have taken the body and have it ready), a return made by the sheriff upon an attachment, capias, &c., when he has the person against whom the process was issued in custody.—F. N. B. 26.

Cepit in alio loco, a plea in replevin when the defendant took the goods in another place than that mentioned in the declaration.—Woodf. L. & T. 680.

Ceppagium, the stumps or roots of trees which remain in the ground after the trees are felled.—Fleta, l. 2. c. xli.

Ceragium, a payment to find candles in the church.—Blount.

Certa debet esse intentio, et narratio, et certum fundamentum, et certa res quæ deducitur in judicium.—Co. Litt. 303.—(The intention ought to be certain, and the count, and foundation, and the thing which is brought to judgment.)

Certainty, truth, fact. There are three kinds of certainties:—(1) to a certain intent in general, which is required in a charge or declaration; (2) to a common intent, which is sufficient for a defence; and (3) to a certain intent in every particular, which is rejected in almost all cases, as partaking of too much subtlety.—Rex v. Horne, Cowp. 682.

Certificando de recognitione stapulæ, a writ commanding the mayor of a staple to certify to the Lord Chancellor a statute-staple taken before him where the party himself detains it, and refuses to bring in the same. There is the like writ to certify a statute-merchant, and in divers other cases.—Reg. Orig. 152.

Certificate, a testimony given in writing to declare or verify the truth of anything. There are several sorts, the principal of which are the following:—

(1.) Certificates of acknowledgment of married women. Every deed executed by a married woman for any of the purposes of the Act of 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74 (not executed by her as protector) shall, upon her executing the same, or afterwards, be produced and acknowledged as her act and deed before a judge of one of the superior courts at Westminster, or before two of the perpetual commissioners, or two special commissioners, appointed as presently noticed (s. 79). And such judge, or commissioners, before receiving the acknowledgment, shall examine her, apart from her husband, touching the knowledge of such deed, and shall ascertain whether she freely and voluntarily consents to such deed, otherwise the deed cannot be acknowledged, and, so far as relates to her, is void (s. 80). The Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas shall appoint proper persons for every county, riding, division, soke, or place for which there may be a clerk of the peace, to be perpetual commissioners for taking such acknowledgments, who are removable at his pleasure; and lists of their names, with their residences and the places to which they are appointed, shall be kept by the officer of the Common Pleas, with whom the certificates of the acknowledgments are lodged; and such officer transmits to the clerks of the peace the lists relating to their locality, a copy of which may be obtained by any person (s. 81). These perpetual commissioners are competent to take the acknowledgment of any married woman wheresoever she may reside, and wheresoever the lands, &c., may be (s. 82).

If from being beyond seas, or from ill health, or any other sufficient cause, a married woman be prevented from making the acknowledgment before a judge, or special commissioners, the Court of Common Pleas, or any judge thereof, may issue a commission appointing special commissioners to take such acknowledgment (s. 83).

When a married woman acknowledges a deed, the person taking the acknowledgment signs a memorandum, endorsed on or written at the foot or in the margin of such deed (s. 84).

And the same person also signs a certificate of the taking of such acknowledgment, written or engrossed on a separate piece of parchment.

Every such certificate, together with an affidavit verifying the same, and the signature, shall be lodged with some officer of the Common Pleas, who, after examining it to see that everything is correct, files the same of record (s. 85). This certificate being filed, the deed takes effect by relation from the time of the acknowledgment (s. 86). An index of certificates is to be kept, and a copy of certificate filed, duly signed by the proper officer, is evidence (ss. 87, 88).

The Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas appoints the officer with whom the certificate shall be lodged, and the Court of Common Pleas is empowered to make orders touching the examination, memoranda, certificates, and affidavits, the time when the proceedings shall take place, and the amount of fees (s. 89).

In pursuance of this power, the Court of Common Pleas promulgated a set of rules in Michaelmas Term 1833; but they were revoked (yet so as not to invalidate any proceedings under them, which might have taken place before the 1st of March, 1834) by the rules of Hilary Term 1834, which were varied in a very few points by the rules of Trinity Term 1834.

The substance of the rules now in force is as follows:—

One, at least, of the commissioners must not be in any manner interested in the transaction, or concerned therein as attorney, solicitor, or agent, or as his clerk.

The commissioners, before receiving the acknowledgment, or if one of them be interested, then the other who is not interested, must inquire of any married woman separately and apart from her husband, and from the solicitor or attorney concerned in the transaction, whether she intends to give her interest in the estate to be passed by such deed, without having any provision made for her in lieu of or return for or in consequence of her so giving up such interest, and if she declare there is no provision, and the commissioners believe it, then they shall receive the acknowledgment; but if it appear that provision is to be made, then they shall not take her acknowledgment until they are satisfied that such provision has been actually made by some deed or writing produced to them, or if not actually made, then the commissioners shall require the terms of such intended provision to be shortly reduced into writing, and shall verify the same by their signatures in the margin, at the foot, or at the back thereof.

The affidavit verifying the certificate shall (except the acknowledgment be taken elsewhere than in England, Wales, or Berwick-upon-Tweed) be made by some practising attorney or solicitor of one of the Courts of Westminster, or one of the counties palatine of Lancaster or Durham, and that in all cases it shall be deposed, in addition to the verification of the certificate, that the deponent (or if more than one person join in the affidavit), that one or more of the deponents knew the person making such acknowledgment, and that she is of full age and competent understanding, and that one at least of the commissioners, to the best of deponent's knowledge and belief, is not in any manner interested or concerned in the transaction, and that the names and residences of the commissioners, and also the place where the acknowledgment is taken, shall be set forth in such affidavit. And that previously to the acknowledgment, the deponent had inquired of her whether she intended to give up her interest in the estate to be passed, and also her answer thereto, and if she declare that she intends to give up her interest without any provision, the deponent shall state that he has no reason to doubt its truth, and he verily believes the same to be true. And where there is to be a provision, the deponent shall state that the same has been made by deed or writing, or if not actually made, that the terms of the intended provision have been reduced into writing, which he verily believes has been produced to the said commissioners.

The affidavit must further state the parish or several parishes, or place or several places, and the county or counties in which the several premises wherein any such married woman shall appear to be interested, shall by deed be described to be situate. The form of the affidavit is given, which is subject to such variations as the circumstances of the case render necessary, and it may be made (where it is found convenient) by one of the commissioners.

The certificates and affidavits verifying the same must, within one lunar month from making the acknowledgment, be delivered to the proper officer (whose office is at No. 7, Lancaster Place, Waterloo Bridge), who cannot receive the same after such time, without the direction of the Court or Judge.

The fees to be paid for the copies to be delivered by the clerks of the peace or their deputies, or by the officers of the Common Pleas, are then set forth.

The County Court Judges may take these acknowledgments under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, ss. 26 & 73. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 70, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 75.

(2.) Annual certificate of an attorney. It expires on the 15th November in every year, without any reference to the day on which it was issued. If taken out before the 16th December it will have relation back to the 15th November, and protect from penalties incurred before that time for having practised without a certificate; but if taken out on or after the 16th December it will have relation only to the day on which it was issued; and if it be not issued before the end of the year, the attorney's name will not appear in the Law List. The duty payable is thus regulated: if the attorney practise within 10 miles of the General Post-Office in London, then, for the first three years, the yearly duty is 4*l.* 10*s.*, and for every subsequent year 9*l.*; if he practise elsewhere, then, for the first three years 8*l.*, and for every subsequent year 6*l.*—16 and 17 Vict. c. 63. The Incorporated Law Society is appointed registrar of attornies and solicitors. Consult 7 & 8 Vict. c. 73, ss. 21–26.

(3.) Certificate of appointment of the creditors' assignees to a bankrupt's estate and effects. Statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 123, enacts that 'When the election of an assignee shall have been accepted by the person elected, and confirmed by the court, the court shall by certificate under the hand of the commissioner and the seal of the court (to be called the certificate of appointment), declare such creditor's assignee to have been duly elected, and appoint him to the said office accordingly.'

(4.) Certificate of conformity of a bankrupt; an instrument whereby the court, before the passing of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, certified the adjudication, the bankrupt's surrender and conformity, and his having passed his last examination and made a true discovery of his estate and effects. By that act a certificate of conformity has been abolished, and instead of it a bankrupt receives an order of discharge. See s. 157, et seq.

(5.) Certificates of counsel; these are given as to a pauper having a good cause of suit or action, when he intends to sue in formâ pauperis; also in the case of petitions of appeal in Chancery suits, apprehending that the cause is proper to be reheard; also a certificate of respectability is required to be signed by two counsel before a student can be admitted to keep his terms at any of the Inns of Court.

(6.) Certificates of the Judges of the Superior Common Law Courts at Westminster. They are numerous; the chief, however, are:—(α) As to a special jury. The party upon whose application it is struck shall bear all the expenses occasioned at the trial of the cause by such special jury, and shall not be allowed upon taxation of costs, any more or other costs than he would have been entitled to if the cause had been tried by a common jury, unless the Judge shall, immediately after the verdict, certify, upon the back of the record, that it was a proper cause to be tried by a special jury. (β) For speedy execution. By 1 Wm. IV. c. 7, s. 2, it is enacted, 'that in all actions brought in either of the Superior Courts, by whatever form of process the same may be commenced, it shall be lawful for the Judge before whom any issue joined in such action shall be to be tried, in case the plaintiff or demandant therein shall become nonsuit, or a verdict shall be given for the plaintiff or demandant, defendant or tenant, to certify under his hand on the back of the record, at any time before the end of the sittings or assizes, that in his opinion execution ought to issue in such action forthwith, or at some day to be named in such certificate, and subject or not to any condition or qualification; and in case of a verdict for the plaintiff, then either for the whole or for any part of the sum found by such verdict; in all which cases a rule for judgment may be given, costs taxed, and judgment signed forthwith, and execution may be issued forthwith or afterwards, according to the terms of such certificate, on any day in vacation or term; and the postea, with such certificate as a part thereof, shall and may be entered of record as of the day on which the judgment shall be signed, provided always that it shall be lawful for the party entitled to such judgment to postpone the signing thereof.' As to the time for issuing execution when a cause is tried out of term, see C. L. P. Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76.) s. 120 & Reg. Gen. Hil. T. 1853, r. 57, and Chitty's Archb. by Prent, 412. (γ) By 43 Eliz. c. 6, s. 2, if in a personal action 'not being for any title or interests of lands, nor concerning the freehold or inheritance of any lands, nor for any battery, it shall be certified by the Judge (not the Sheriff or Judge of an inferior court, trying under the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 17, nor on a writ of inquiry, before whom it shall be tried), that the debt or damages to be recovered therein do not amount to 40*s.* the plaintiff shall have no more costs than damages, but less at the discretion of the Court.' (δ) By 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 9, 'in all actions of trespass, assault and battery, and all other personal actions, wherein the Judge at the trial shall not find and certify under his hand, upon the back of the record, that an assault and battery was sufficiently proved, or that the freehold and title of the land was chiefly in question, in case the jury find the damages to be under the value of 40*s.* the plaintiff shall not recover or obtain any more costs than the damages so found shall amount to.' (ε) For the preventing of wilful and malicious trespass, it is enacted by 8 & 9 Wm. III. c. 11, s. 4, 'that in all actions of trespass to be commenced or prosecuted in any of his Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster, wherein at the trial of the cause it shall appear and be certified by the Judge under his hand, upon the back of the record, that the trespass upon which any defendant shall be found guilty, was wilful and malicious, the plaintiff shall recover not only his damages, but also his full costs of suit, any former law to the contrary notwithstanding.' The Judge has power to certify in actions for the infringement of patents under 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 83, s. 3, and where there are several issues, under 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, ss. 4, 5. (ζ) The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24, enacts that in actions of trespass, or trespass on the case, if the plaintiff recover less than 40*s.* he shall not have his costs, unless the Judge certify that the action was not frivolously brought. (η) Except where money is paid into court and taken out in full satisfaction of the plaintiff's demand in all actions of contract (except for breach of promise of marriage) where the plaintiff recovers a sum not exceeding 20*l.* and in all actions of tort (not being an action for malicious prosecution, or for libel or slander or seduction), except in the case of a judgment by default, where the plaintiff recovers a sum not exceeding 5*l.* the plaintiff gets no costs unless he obtain a certificate under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 12, or obtains an order of the Court or a Judge for his costs under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 4, or the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 30. See 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 448, et seq.

(7.) Trial by certificate. This is now of very rare occurrence, but is still in force upon certain issues, which are enumerated in 3 Steph. Com. 610; one of the most important of which is the issue of ne unques accouple en loial matrimonie. This arises in the action of dower, in which the tenant may plead in bar that the demandant 'was never accoupled to her alleged husband in lawful matrimony.' Issue being joined upon this, the Court awards that it be tried by the diocesan of the place where the parish church in which the marriage is said to have been had is situate, and that the result be certified to it by the ordinary at a given day. It is said that this is a form of issue which can arise only in dower. The trial by certificate is, when competent, the only legitimate mode, and the issue cannot be tried by jury.—Step. Plead. 113.

(9.) As to a magistrate's certificate of the dismissal of a charge, see 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 14; and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 126, s. 7.

(10.) As to a certificate of qualification as an apothecary, see 55 Geo. III. c. 194, & 6 Geo. IV. c. 133.

(11.) As to a certificate of medical men in lunacy, see 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 96.

(12.) As to a certificate of dissenting places of worship, see 1 Wm. & M. Sess. 1, c. 18; 52 Geo. III. c. 155; 31 Geo. III. c. 32; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 115; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 59; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 36; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 81; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 119, ss. 17 & 24.

Certificates in the Customs. No goods can be exported by certificate, except foreign goods formerly imported, on which the whole or a part of the customs paid on importation is to be drawn back. The manner of proceeding is regulated by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 52, s. 68.

Certification, assurance; also when the Judge ascertains the party called, and not compearing what he will do in that case.—Scotch Term.

Certification of Assize, a writ anciently granted for the re-examining or re-trial of a matter passed by assize before justices, now entirely superseded by the remedy afforded by means of a new trial.

Certiorari (to be more fully informed of), an original writ issuing out of the common law jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in civil cases, and the Crown side of the Court of Queen's Bench in criminal cases, addressed, in the Queen's name, to the Judges or the officers of inferior courts, commanding them to certify or to return the records of a cause depending before them, to the end the party may have the more sure and speedy justice, before such justices as shall be assigned to determine the cause.—F. N. B. 145, 242, 554. The certiorari in civil matters lies in all cases before judgment, whether the action were commenced by process against the person or not; and it may be sued out to remove an ejectment, as well as other actions pending in inferior courts of record.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1262. In criminal cases, it lies to remove into the Queen's Bench, which is the sovereign ordinary court of justice in criminal causes, all indictments, coroners' inquisitions, summary convictions by magistrates, orders of removal of paupers, and of poor's rates, also orders made by the poor law commissioners, commissioners of sewers, tithe commissioners, town councils, and railway companies, for the purpose of being examined and determined upon. The certiorari is taken away by the express words of some acts of Parliament. A certiorari is frequently granted, either (1) to consider and determine the validity of indictments, and the proceedings thereon, and to quash or confirm them as there is cause; (2) where it is surmised that a partial or insufficient trial will probably be had in the Court below, the indictment is removed in order to have the person against whom it is found tried at the bar of the Queen's Bench or before the justices of nisi prius; (3) it is so removed in order to plead the royal pardon there; (4) to issue a process of outlawry against the offender, in those counties or places where the process of the inferior courts will not reach him.—4 Step. Com. 469. The writ may be granted either at the instance of the prosecutor or the defendant. A prosecutor was formerly entitled to a writ of certiorari as a matter of right, but a defendant could only obtain it by express leave of the Court, and upon his entering into recognizances; but to prevent abuses, by the wanton and improvident application for it, the 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 33, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, s. 5, provide that a prosecutor must obtain the previous leave of the Court to issue it, and enter into recognizances. And see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 16.

Certiorari, bill of, an original bill praying relief. It is filed for the purpose of removing a suit pending in some inferior court of equity into the Court of Chancery, on account of some alleged incompetency of the inferior court, or some hardship in its proceedings.

The Bill states the proceedings so far as they have gone; the cause of the incompetency of the inferior court, by suggesting that the cause is out of its jurisdiction; or that the witnesses live beyond it, or that the defendant lives beyond it, and is not able, from age, infirmity, or distance, to follow the suit there; or that for some other cause, substantial justice is not likely to be done to him, and then prays the writ to certify and remove the record and cause into the superior court.

When the Bill is filed, the writ of certiorari is obtained on motion, and a certificate from the Clerk of Records and Writs that the Bill is filed. It is usually addressed to the judge of the inferior court, requiring him to certify, or send to the court, the tenor of the Bill or Plaint there, with the process and proceedings thereupon.

When the order is passed and entered, and the writ is about to be issued, then, as some protection against the delay of justice, a bond is entered into before the registrar by the plaintiff, together with a surety, in a penalty of 100*l.* conditioned that the plaintiff shall prove the suggestion of his Bill in fourteen days after the return of the writ, which is returnable within fourteen days after its being served on the defendant. Upon the writ of certiorari being served and returned, a motion is made to file it, which will thereupon be ordered to be filed, together with the proceedings removed. If it appear by the plaintiff's own showing in the Bill filed by him in the inferior court, that he lives out of the jurisdiction of such court, then the plaintiff in the certiorari Bill, without proving any allegation in his Bill, may obtain an order on motion or petition to retain the Bill removed. When the cause is removed from the inferior court, the bill exhibited in such court is considered as an original Bill in the Court of Chancery, and is proceeded upon as such.

If the suggestions of the certiorari Bill are not proved, a writ of procedendo may be obtained by the defendant, and addressed to the judge of the inferior court, requiring him to proceed in a cause which was sought to be removed into the court of equity by certiorari, the plaintiff in the certiorari Bill not having sufficiently proved his suggestions in such Bill.—Stor. Eq. Pl. 356, and 1 Madd. Ch. 249.

Cert Money, quasi certain money. Head-money paid yearly by the resiants of several manors to the lords thereof, for the certain keeping of the leet, and sometimes to the hundred. It is called certum letæ in ancient records.

Certum est quod certum reddi potest.—9 Co. 47.—(That is certain which can be rendered certain.)

Lord Ellenborough observed, that a reasonable time is as capable of being ascertained by evidence, and, when ascertained, is as fixed and certain, as if defined by a particular Act of Parliament.—2 M. & S. 50.

Cervisarii [fr. cerevisia, ale], a duty called by the Saxons drinclean, i.e. retributio potûs, paid by tenants.

Cerura, a mound, fence, or inclosure.

Cessa regnare, si non vis judicare.—Hob. 155. (Cease to reign, if you wish not to adjudicate.)

Cessante causâ, cessat effectus.—Wing. 29.—(The cause ceasing, the effect ceases.)

Cessante primitivo, cessat derivativus.—(The primitive ceasing the derivative ceases.)

Cessante ratione legis, cessat ipsa lex.—Co. Litt. 70.—(The reason of the law ceasing, the law itself ceases.)

This maxim may be thus illustrated:—Where a contract, not under seal, is made with an agent in his own name, for an undisclosed principal, and on which, therefore, either the agent or principal may sue, the defendant as against the latter, is entitled to be placed in the same situation at the time of the disclosure of the real principal, as if the agent dealing in his own name had been in reality the principal, and this rule is to prevent the hardship under which a purchaser would labor, if, after having been induced by peculiar considerations—such, for instance, as the consciousness of possessing a set-off—to deal with one man, he could be turned over and made liable to another, to which those considerations would not apply, and with whom he would not willingly have contracted.

Cessante statu primitivo, cessat derivativus.—8 Rep. 34.—(The original state ceasing, the derivative ceases.)

Cessavit, a writ which lay (by the Statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. I. c. 4, and Westminster 2, 13 Edw. I. c. 21) when a man who held lands by rent or other services, neglected or ceased to perform his services for two years together, or where a religious house had lands given to it, on condition of performing some certain spiritual services, as reading prayers, giving alms, &c., and neglected it; in either of which cases, if the cesser or neglect had continued for two years, the lord, or donor, and his heirs, had a writ of cessavit to recover the land itself.—F. N. B. 208. This writ was abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Cesse [fr. sess, Fr. assess, spelled with a c, cençer, Fr. to rate], an assignment or tax. In Ireland, it was anciently applied to an exaction of victuals, at a certain rate, for soldiers in garrison.—Antiq. Hibern.

Cesser, proviso for. Where terms for years are raised by settlement, it is usual to introduce a proviso that they shall cease when the trusts are at an end. This proviso generally expresses three events:—(1) the trusts never arising; (2) their becoming unnecessary or incapable of taking effect; (3) the performance of them.—3 Sug. V. & P. 3, 10th edit.

Cesset executio (let execution stay). Where defendants plead severally, if they be found guilty of the same act of trespass, the damages cannot be severed, but the jury who try the first issue shall assess damages against all;

and there shall be a cesset executio until the other issues are tried, when the other defendants, if found guilty, shall be contributory to those damages.—11 Co. 6 & 7 a.

Cesset process, a stay of proceedings entered on the record.

C'est le crime qui fait la honte, et non pas l'échafaud.—(It is the offence which produces shame, and not the scaffold.)

Cessio bonorum (a surrender of goods). By the Roman law a cessio bonorum of the debtor was not a discharge of the debt, unless the property ceded was sufficient for that purpose. It otherwise operated only as a discharge pro tanto, and exonerated the debtor from imprisonment. Huberus informs us, that in Holland a cessio bonorum does not even exempt from imprisonment, unless the creditors assent; and Heineccius proclaims the same as the law of some parts of Germany. The Scottish law conforms to the Roman code in its leading outlines, and the modern code of France adopts the same system.—Story's Conflict of Laws, 492. A discharge under the Insolvency acts, now repealed, merely protected the person discharged from arrest, his future property remaining liable, subject to the claims of subsequent creditors.

An order of discharge from a Court of Bankruptcy under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, protects both the person of the bankrupt and his after-acquired property, except where protection is refused, in which case the bankrupt is liable to be arrested.

Cessio in jure, a fictitious suit in which the person who was to acquire the thing claimed (vindicabat) the thing as his own, the person who was to transfer it acknowledged the justice of the claim, and the magistrate pronounced it to be the property (addicebat) of the claimant.—Sand. Just. 176.

Cession, a ceasing, yielding up, or giving over. By 21 Hen. VIII. c. 13, if anyone having a benefice of 8*l. per annum*, or upwards, (according to the present valuation in the king's books), except deaneries, archdeaconries, chancellorships, treasurerships, chanterships, prebends, and sinecure rectories, accept any other, the first shall be adjudged void, unless he obtain a dispensation, which no one is entitled to have but the chaplains of the livings and others therein mentioned, the brethren and sons of lords and knights, and all doctors and bachelors of divinity, doctors of laws, and bachelors of the law canon, admitted by the universities of this realm. A vacancy thus made, for want of a dispensation, is called cession.—1 Bl. Com. 392. See PLURALITY.

Cessionary Bankrupt, one who has given up his estate to be divided amongst his creditors.

Cessment, an assessment, or tax.

Cessor, he who ceases or neglects so long to perform a duty, that he thereby incurs the danger of the law.—Old Nat. Br. 136.

Cessure, or Cessor, ceasing, giving over, departing from.

Cestui que trust, the person who possesses the equitable right to deal with property and receive the rents, issues, and profits thereof, the legal estate in which is vested in a trustee. There is such a confidence between the cestui que trust and his trustee, that no action at law will lie between them, except where the trustee admits that he has in his possession money belonging to the cestui que trust, in which case an action lies against the trustee; but they must settle their differences, and arrange their disputes in a Court of Equity.

The phrase, cestui que trust, is a barbarous Norman law French phrase; and is so ungainly and ill adapted to the English idiom, that it is surprising that the good sense of the English legal profession has not long since banished it, and substituted some phrase in the English idiom, furnishing an analogous meaning. In the Roman law the trustee was commonly called Hæres Fiduciarius; and the cestui que trust, Hæres Fidei Commissarius, which Dr. Hallifax has not scrupled to translate Fide-Committee (Hallifax Anal. of Civil Law, ch. vi. s. 16, p. 34; Id. ch. viii. ss. 2, 3, pp. 45, 46). Mr. Justice Story prefers Fide-commissary, as at least equally within the analogy of the English language. But Beneficiary, though a little remote from the original meaning of the word, would be a very appropriate expression, as it has not as yet acquired any general use in a different sense. Hæres fidei commissarius was sometimes used in the Civil Law, to denote the trustee. Vicat, Vocab. voce Fidei commissarius. The French Law calls the cestui que trust, fidei commissaire. Ferrière, Dict. voce Fidei commissaire. Merlin, Répertoire, voce Substitution et Substitution fidei commissaire. Dr. Brown uses the word Fidei commissary, 1 Brown's Civil Law, 190, n.

Cestui que use, in old law tracts cestui à que use. Previously to the Statute 27 Hen. VIII. c. 10 (usually called the Statute of Uses), the use was an equitable or beneficial interest enjoyed by the cestui que use, distinct from the legal property in the land, which was held by the feoffee to uses. The Statute of Uses destroyed the intervening estate of the feoffee to uses, and transferred the possession to the cestui que use, converting his equitable or beneficial interest into a legal estate; thus the use and possession being incorporated, the separate existence of the use is virtually extinguished, and he, who was called the cestui que use before the statute, is now to all intents and purposes the legal owner, the use being executed in him. Thus a conveyance transmuting the possession to A to the use of B, A's estate (feoffee to uses) is destroyed by the statute, the possession is given to B (cestui que use), in whom the legal estate is vested.

Cestui que vie, the person for whose life any lands, tenements, or hereditaments may be held.

Chacea est ad communem legem.—Reg. Br. 806.—(A chace is by common law.)

Chacea, a station of game, more extended than a park, and less than a forest; also the liberty of chasing or hunting within a certain district; also the way through which cattle are driven to pasture, otherwise called a drove-way.—Blount; Bract. 1. 4, c. xliv.

Chaceare ad lepores vel vulpes. To hunt hares or foxes.—Cart. Abb. Glast. MS. 87.

Chacurus [fr. chasseur, Fr.], a horse for the chase, or a hound, dog, or courser.

Chaffery, traffic; the practice of buying and selling.

Chaffwax, an officer in Chancery, who fitted the wax to seal writs, commissions, and other instruments. The office was abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 23.

Chairman of Committees of the whole House. In the Commons, this officer, always a member, is elected by the House on the assembling of every new Parliament. When the House is in committee on bills introduced by the Government, or in committee of ways and means, or supply, or in committee to consider preliminary resolutions, it is his duty to preside; he sits, not in the Speaker's chair, but at the table in the seat of the clerk of the House. On divisions, when the numbers happen to be equal, he gives the casting-voice, but in Committees he never otherwise votes. In August 1853, it was, by a resolution of the House, decided that during the unavoidable absence of the Speaker, this officer should preside in his stead, being only so appointed however from day to day. See 18 & 19 Vict. c. 84. In the Lords, the Chairman of Committees of the whole House is elected by the House every session; he usually holds in addition the office of Deputy Speaker of the House of Lords.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

Chaldron, Chaldern, or Chalder, twelve sacks of coals, each holding three bushels, weighing about a ton and a half. In Wales they reckon twelve barrels or pitchers a ton or chaldron, and 29 cwt. of 120 lbs. to the ton.

Chalking, or Caulking, stopping the seams in a ship or a vessel.—Rot. Parl. 50 Ed. III.

Challenge [fr. challenger, O. Fr., to accuse of], an exception taken either against things or jurors.

In civil actions, when a full jury appear, either party may challenge them for cause, as well the talesmen as the jurors originally returned. Challenges are of two kinds: (1) to the array; (2) to the polls, and each of these is again subdivided into principal challenges, and challenges to the favour.

(1) A challenge to the array is an objection to all the jurors returned by the sheriff collectively, not for any defect in them, but for some partiality or default in the sheriff or his under-officer who arrayed the panel; this is either (α) a principal challenge, as that the sheriff or other returning officer is of kindred or affinity to the plaintiff or defendant, if the affinity continue; that one or more of the jury are returned at the nomination of the plaintiff or defendant; that an action of battery is pending at the suit of the plaintiff or defendant against the sheriff, or at the suit of the sheriff against the plaintiff or defendant; that an action of debt is pending at the suit of the plaintiff or defendant against the sheriff, but not if by the sheriff against the plaintiff or defendant; that the sheriff or returning officer holds land depending upon the same title with that in litigation between the parties; that the sheriff, &c., is under the distress of the plaintiff or defendant; that the sheriff, &c., is counsel, attorney, officer, servant, or gossip of either party, or is an arbitrator in the same matter, and has treated thereof. (β) A challenge for favor, being such as implies at least a probability of bias or partiality in the sheriff, but does not amount to a principal challenge, as that the plaintiff or defendant is tenant to the sheriff, or that the parties are connected by marriage, &c. It seems very doubtful if the array in special jury cases can be challenged. Challenges to the array are, however, seldom resorted to, since, for the causes above named, the jury-processes may be directed to the coroner, or they would be grounds for a new trial.

(2) A challenge to the polls, which is an exception to one or more of the jurors who have appeared individually, either (α) a principal challenge, which may be subdivided into (a) challenge propter honoris respectum, as if a lord of parliament be called, he may challenge himself or he may have his writ of privilege, but it is doubtful if either party can challenge him. 6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 2; (b) challenge propter defectum, that the juror is not qualified, or if a woman be impanelled she may be challenged propter defectum sexus, unless it be on a writ de ventre inspiciendo; (c) challenge propter affectum, by reason of some supposed bias or partiality; (d) challenge propter delictum, when, for some act of the juror, he has ceased to be, in consideration of law, probus et legalis homo. (β) A challenge to the polls for favor is of the same nature with the principal challenge propter affectum, but of an inferior degree.

No challenge can be made before a full jury have appeared; a challenge to the polls is made ore tenus, that to the array in writing.

The trial of challenges to the array is entirely in the discretion of the court, sometimes they are tried by two of the coroners, sometimes by two of the jury, sometimes by the court itself. Challenges to the polls, if to the favor, are tried by two jurors, who have been sworn; if two have not been sworn, the court appoints two indifferent persons to try them, thence called triers, who are superseded as soon as two jurors are sworn; a principal challenge to the polls is tried by the court itself.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 412.

In criminal cases, challenges may be made, either on the part of the Crown, or on that of the prisoner, and either to the whole array, or to the separate polls, for the very same reasons that they may be made in civil causes. In capital cases, the prisoner, in favorem vitæ, is allowed an arbitrary and capricious species of challenge, without showing any cause at all, limited, in cases of treason to thirty-five, and in felonies to twenty.—22 Hen. VIII. c. 14; 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 3.

Challenges to fight, either by word or letter, or to be the bearer of such challenges, are misdemeanours, punishable by fine and imprisonment.—4 Step. Com. 338.

Chamber, the place where certain assemblies are held; also the assemblies themselves.

Chamber of commerce, an assembly of merchants and traders, where affairs relating to trade are treated of. There are establishments of this sort in most of the chief cities in France; and in this country, chambers of this kind have been established for various purposes.

Chamber-counsel, a barrister who confines his practice to chambers, and does not appear in court.

Chamber-practice, private and not court practice.

Chamberdekins, or Chamber-deacons, certain poor Irish scholars, clothed in mean habit, and living under no rule; also beggars banished from England, by 1 Hen. V. cc. 7 & 8.

Chamberlain [fr. chambellan, Fr.; custos cubiculi, or cubicularius, Lat.], a person who has the management or direction of a chamber or chambers. It is variously used in our laws, statutes, and chronicles. Among the most important, are:—(1) The Lord Chamberlain of Great Britain, the sixth high officer of the Crown, to whom belongs the government of the palace at Westminster, and upon all solemn occasions the keys of Westminster Hall and the Court of Requests are delivered to him; he disposes of the Sword of State, to be carried before the Queen when she comes to Parliament, and goes on the right-hand side, next to the Queen's person; he has the care of providing all things in the House of Lords during its sessions; to him belong livery and lodgings in the Queen's courts, &c., and the gentleman usher of the black rod, yeoman usher, &c., are under his authority. As to his power of licensing theatres, see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68. The office is hereditary. (2) The Lord Chamberlain of the Household; he has the oversight and direction of all officers belonging to the Queen's chambers, except the precinct of the bed chamber. (3) The Chamberlain of London, who keeps the city money, presides over the affairs of the citizens and their apprentices, and presents the freedom of the city to those who have faithfully served their apprenticeships.

Chambers [fr. chambre, Fr.; camera, Lat.; καμάρα, Gk., a vault or arched roof, place with an arched roof. Probably from cam, crooked, camera, gewölbe; camerare, krümmen; cameratus, gekrümmt, gebogen, gewölbt, Dief. Sup.—Wedgw.], rooms or apartments belonging to the Inns of Court, or to the Judges for the dispatch of summary business.

Chambers of the king [Regiæ cameræ]. The exclusive territorial jurisdiction of the British crown over the inclosed parts of the sea along the coasts of the island of Great Britain, has immemorially extended to those bays called the King's chambers; that is, portions of the sea cut off by lines drawn from one promontory to another.—Wheat. Internat. Law, 235.

Chambre depeinte, anciently St. Edward's Chamber, called the Painted Chamber, destroyed by fire with the houses of Parliament.

Champart, field-rent; champerty.

Champarty, or Champerty [fr. champ parti, Fr.; campi partitio, Lat., a division of the land, &c.], properly a bargain between a plaintiff or defendant in a suit and a third person, campum partire, to divide between them the land or other matter sued for, in the event of the litigant being successful in the suit; whereupon the champertor is to carry on the party's suit or action at his own expense; or it is the purchasing the right of action, or suit of another person. It was chiefly upon the ground of champerty that the courts of common law refused to recognise the assignment of debts and other rights of action and securities; though the same doctrine obtains not in equity. Every champerty implies a maintenance, but every maintenance is not champerty (2 Inst. 108): And courts of equity being ever solicitous to enforce the principles of law respecting champerty and maintenance, they will not in any case uphold an assignment involving such offensive ingredients. Thus, for instance, courts of equity, as well as courts of law, will repudiate any agreement made between a creditor and a third person, to maintain a suit of the former, and share the profits resulting from the success of the suit; for it would be a clear case of champerty.—2 Story's Comm. p. 289; Story on Contracts, s. 208.

Champertors, persons who move pleas or suits, or cause them to be moved, either by their own procurement or by others, and sue them at their proper costs, in order to have part of the land in variance, or part of the gain.—33 Edw. I. c. 2.

Champion [fr. campus, Lat.], a person who fights a combat in his own cause, or in place of another.—Bract. l. 3, tr. 2 c. 21.

Champion of the king or queen [fr. campio regis, Lat.], an ancient officer, who rode, armed cap-à-piè, into Westminster Hall at the coronation, while the king was at dinner, and by the proclamation of a herald, made a challenge, 'that if any man shall deny the king's title to the crown, he is there ready to defend it in single combat.' The king drank to him, and sent him a gilt cup covered, full of wine, which the champion drank, retaining the cup for his fee. This ceremony has been discontinued.

Chance, misfortune, accident, deficiency of will. Where a man commits an unlawful act by misfortune or chance, and not by design, his will not co-operating with the deed, such act wants one main ingredient of a crime. If an accidental mischief should follow from the performance of a lawful act, the party stands excused from all guilt; but if the act be unlawful, and a consequence ensues not foreseen or intended, as the death of a man, or the like, his want of foresight shall be no excuse, for, being guilty of one offence, in doing antecedently what is in itself unlawful, he is criminally guilty of whatever consequence may follow.—4 Bl. Com. 26.

But a very important distinction is made in such cases, viz. whether the unlawful act is also in its original nature wrong and mischievous; for a person is not answerable for the incidental consequences of an unlawful act, which is merely malum prohibitum; as, where any unfortunate accident happens from an unqualified person being in pursuit of game he is amenable only to the same extent as a man duly qualified.—Fost. 259; 1 Hale's P. C. 475.

Chancel, this part of a church belongs to the rector or the impropriator.—3 Step. Com. 69.

Chancellor, the Lord High [fr. cancello, Lat., to cancel], the highest judicial functionary in the kingdom, and superior, in point of precedency, to every temporal lord. He is appointed by the delivery of the Queen's great seal into his custody. He is a cabinet minister, a privy counsellor and prolocutor of the House of Lords by prescription, and vacates his office with the ministry by which he was appointed. When royal commissions are issued for opening the Session, for giving the royal assent to bills, or for proroguing Parliament, the Lord Chancellor is always one of the commissioners, and reads the royal speech upon the occasion. When the Sovereign opens or closes the Session in person, the Lord Chancellor stands on the right of the throne, and hands to him the royal speech opening or terminating the annual labours of the legislature. To him belongs the appointment of all justices of the peace throughout the kingdom. Being, in the earlier periods of our history, usually an ecclesiastic (for none else were then capable of an office so conversant in writings), and presiding over the royal chapel, he became keeper of the Sovereign's conscience, visitor, in right of the Crown, of all hospitals and colleges of royal foundation, and patron of all the Crown livings under the value of twenty marks per annum in the King's books. He is the general guardian of all infants, idiots, and lunatics, and has the general superintendence of all charitable uses. And all this, over and above the vast and extensive jurisdiction which he exercises in his judicial capacity in the High Court of Chancery.—3 Bl. Com. 47. His retiring pension is 5,000*l. per annum*.—2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 111. There is also a Lord High Chancellor of Ireland; but the Chancellorship of Scotland was abolished at the Union.

Chancellor of a Cathedral, one of the quatuor personæ, or four chief dignitaries of the Cathedrals of the Old Foundation. The duties assigned to the office by the statutes of the different chapters vary; but they are chiefly of an educational character, with a special reference to the cultivation of theology.

Chancellor of a Diocese or of a Bishop, a law officer, appointed to hold the Bishop's Court in his diocese, and to adjudicate upon matters of ecclesiastical law. He is the Vicar-general of the Bishop, and must be a doctor of Civil Law, as created in some university.—37 Hen. VIII. c. 17; 3 Steph. Com. 14.

Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, an officer before whom, or his deputy, the Court of the Duchy Chamber of Lancaster is held. This is a special jurisdiction concerning all matters of equity relating to lands held of the Crown in right of the Duchy of Lancaster; which is a thing very distinct from the county palatine (which has also its separate chancery for sealing of writs or the like), and comprises much territory lying at a vast distance from it, as particularly a very large district surrounded by the city of Westminster. The proceedings in this court are the same as in the High Court of Chancery; so that it seems not to be a court of record, and indeed it has been holden that the Court of Chancery has a concurrent jurisdiction with the Duchy Court, and may take cognizance of the same causes.—3 Bl. Com. 78. See COUNTY PALATINE.

Chancellor of the Exchequer, a minister of state, who presides in the Court of Exchequer, and takes care of the interests of the Crown, in addition to his other parliamentary duties. He has power with the Lord Treasurer to lease the Crown lands, and to compound for forfeiture of lands on penal statutes, bonds, and recognizances, entered into to the Queen; he has also great authority in managing the royal revenues, and in all matters relating to the finance of the State.—25 Hen. VIII. c. 16; 33 Hen. VIII. c. 39.

Chancellor of the Order of the Garter, and other military orders, an officer who seals the commissions and the mandates of the chapter and assembly of the knights; keeps the register of their proceedings, and delivers their acts under the seal of their order.—Stow's Annals, 706.

Chancellor of the two Universities, the president of those bodies, the office being honorary.

The Chancellor's Courts in the two Universities enjoy the sole jurisdiction, in exclusion of the Queen's Courts, over all civil actions and suits whatsoever, excepting where a right of freehold is concerned, and of all injuries and trespasses against the peace; mayhem and felony excepted (Brown v. Renouard, 12 East, 13; Thornton v. Ford, 13 East, 635), when a scholar or privileged person is one of the parties; and these, by the University charter, they are at liberty to try and determine, either according to the common law of the land, or according to their own local customs, at their discretion.

The Judge of the Chancellor's Court at Oxford is the Vice-Chancellor, who is deputy or assessor. From his sentence an appeal lies to delegates appointed by the congregation; thence to other delegates of the house of convocation; and if they all three concur in the same sentence, it is final, at least by the statutes of the University, according to the rule of the civil law.—Cod. 7, 70, 1. But if there be any discordance or variation in any of the three sentences, an appeal lies in the last resort to Judges delegates appointed by the Crown under the Great Seal in Chancery.—3 Bl. Com. 84. By 17 & 18 Vict. c. 81, s. 45, the Court of the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford is now governed by the common and statute law of the realm, and no longer by the rules of the civil law. And see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 36; 19 & 20 Vict. cc. 31 and 95, and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 25. As to Cambridge, the right of the University, or any member thereof, to claim conusance of any action or criminal proceeding wherein any person who is not a member of the University is a party, has ceased and determined.—19 & 20 Vict. c. 17. s. 18, and see c. 88.

Chance-Medley [fr. chaude meslée, Fr.; fr. chaud, hot, and meslée, fray, mesler, mêler, to mingle, mescolare, It. When the element chaud lost its meaning to ordinary English ears, it was replaced by chance, in accordance with the meaning of the compound.—Wedgw.], a casual affray. Such killing of a person as happens either in self-defence on a sudden quarrel, or in the commission of an unlawful act, without any deliberate intention of doing any mischief. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. xxx. s. 1. It is sometimes termed chaud-medley, which more properly signifies an affray in the heat of blood or passion.

It is frequently difficult to distinguish this species of homicide, upon chance-medley in self-defence, from that of manslaughter in the proper legal sense of the word. But the true criterion between them seems to be this, when both parties are actually combating at the time when the mortal stroke is given, the slayer is then guilty of manslaughter; but if the slayer has not begun to fight, or, having begun, endeavours to decline any further struggle, and afterwards, being closely pressed by his antagonist, kills him to avoid his own destruction, this is homicide, excusable by self-defence. For which reason the law requires that the person who kills another in his own defence should have retreated as far as he conveniently or safely can to avoid the violence of the assault before he turns upon his assailant, and that not fictitiously, or in order to watch his opportunity, but from a real tenderness of shedding another's blood. The civil law, in this respect, goes further than ours—'qui cum aliter tueri se non possunt, damni culpam dederint, innoxii sunt.' (Those who, when they cannot otherwise defend themselves, destroy their assailants, are innocent.)—4 Bl. Com. 184.

Chancery [fr. cancelli, cancellarii, Lat.; chancellerie, Fr.], the highest Court of judicature in this kingdom next to Parliament.

The jurisdiction of Chancery is fourfold:—

1st. The common law or ordinary jurisdiction, by which the Lord Chancellor is a privy councillor and prolocutor of the House of Lords. The writs for a new parliament issue out of this department; but in case of a vacancy during the session, the Speaker, on the motion of a member, directs the clerk of the crown, by warrant, to issue a new writ. The Petty Bag Office is in this jurisdiction; it is a Court of Common Law and of Record; pleas of scire facias to repeal letters-patent are here exhibited, together with many other matters, and all original writs issue hereout. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 94; 12 & 13. Vict. c. 109, and Gen. Ords. 29th Dec. 1848.

2nd. The Statutory Jurisdiction. Under the head of jurisdiction the Lord Chancellor exercises the power conferred by the celebrated Habeas Corpus Act, inquires into charitable uses, and formerly heard appeals in bankruptcy, now exercised by the Lords Justices of Appeal. Under it also the Judges in Chancery are entrusted with numerous authorities which are conferred upon them wholly and solely by acts of parliament. The statutes which regulate or enlarge the Equity jurisdiction are not to be classed under this division.

3rd. The Specially Delegated Jurisdiction. Under this head the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Justices of Appeal have exclusive authority over the persons and property of idiots and lunatics.

4th. The Equity or Extraordinary Jurisdiction, which is distributable into three subdivisions, namely :—

I. The assistant being auxiliary to the common law, under which range matters of—

(c) Removal of improper impediments, and prevention of unconscientious defences, at Common Law.

II. The Concurrent with the Common Law, comprehending—

(c) Accident.
(g) Interpleader.
(h) The delivery up of documents and specific chattels.
(i) The specific performance of agreements. And

III. The Exclusive, relating to—

(c) The equitable rights of wives.
(g) The appointment of receivers.
(h) Charities or public trusts.

The Courts of Chancery are either superior or inferior. The superior is called the High Court of Chancery, consisting of six separate tribunals, which rank in the following order : —

(1) The Court of the Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, whose name has given to these courts their appellation.

(2) The Court of the Master of the Rolls, so called from his being the Keeper of the Records in Chancery.

(3) The Court of the two Lords Justices of Appeal appointed by letters-patent, pursuant to 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83, and having precedence next after the Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer.

The Lord Chancellor, together with these Judges, forms the Court of Appeal in Chancery, which Court exercises and performs the ministerial, judicial, and statutory powers, authorities, and duties hitherto possessed by the Lord Chancellor as a judge in his own Court of Chancery. It also exercises the appellate jurisdiction of the Vice-Chancellor sitting in Bankruptcy, pursuant to the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, the appeal to the Lord Chancellor having been taken away.

This Court is constituted by one of the Lords Justices and the Lord Chancellor sitting together ; or by the two Lords Justices sitting apart from the Lord Chancellor, who, while sitting alone or apart from the Lords Justices, exercises the same powers as though this Court of Appeal had not been established. The Lord Chancellor regulates the sittings and business of this Court.

(4, 5, and 6) The separate Courts of the three Vice-Chancellors. The inferior Courts of Chancery are the Equity Courts of the Palatine counties of Durham and Lancaster; the Courts of the two Universities (Oxford and Cambridge), the Lord Mayor's Court in the City of London, and the Court of Chancery in the Isle of Man. The jurisdiction of the Cinque Ports is abolished by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 48.

Chancery Common Law Seal, for the sealing of writs, &c. out of the Petty-Bag-Office.—12 & 13 Vict. c. 109, ss. 11, 14.

Chancery Regulation Act, 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 42, for England, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 47, for Ireland.

Chandala, the most degraded Hindu caste.

Changer, or Chaunger, an officer belonging to the mint, who exchanges coin for bullion brought in by merchants or others.—6 Hen. II. c. 12.

Chantry, or Chauntry [fr. cantaria, Lat.], a little church, chapel, or particular altar, in some cathedral church, &c., endowed with lands, or other revenues, for the maintenance of one or more priests, daily to sing mass, and perform divine service for the souls of the donors and such others as they appointed. See 1 Edw. VI. c. 14, abolishing them.

Chapel [fr. capella, Lat. chapelle, Fr.], a building either adjoining to a church, for performing divine service, or separate from the mother-church, where the parish is large, and then called a chapel of ease, for the accommodation of those parishioners who dwell at a distance from the parish church. These may be parochial, and have a right to sacraments and burials, and to a distinct minister, by custom, though subject, in some respects, to the mother church. The chapels in the Universities, belonging to the different halls and colleges, though they are consecrated, and sacraments are administered there, yet are not liable to the visitation of the bishop, but of the founder.—2 Inst. 363.

Chapelry, the precincts and limits of a chapel.

Chaperon, a hood or bonnet anciently worn by the knights of the garter, as part of the habit of that noble order ; also a little escutcheon fixed in the forehead of horses drawing a hearse at a funeral.

Chapitres [fr. capitula, Lat., chapters of a book], a summary of such matters as are to be inquired of or presented before justices in eyre, justices of assize, or the peace, in their sessions. Also articles delivered by the justice in his charge to the inquest.—Britton, c. iii.

Chaplain [fr. capellanus, Lat.], an ecclesiastic who performs divine service in a chapel; but it more commonly means one who attends upon a king, prince, or other person of quality, for the performance of clerical duties in a private chapel.—4 Rep. 90.

Chaplain of the Queen's Prison. He is appointed by the Secretary of State for the Home department during pleasure. Sec 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22, s. 22.

Chapman [fr. ceapman, Sax.], a cheapner. one that offers as a purchaser.

Chapter [fr. capitulum, Lat.], a congregation of ecclesiastical persons in a cathedral church, consisting of canons, or prebendaries, whereof the dean is the head, all subordinate to the bishop, to whom they act as assistants in matters relating to the church, for the better ordering and disposing the things thereof, and the confirmation of such leases of the temporality and offices relating to the bishopric, as the bishop shall make from time to time. And they are termed capitulum, as a kind of head, instituted not only to assist the bishop in manner aforesaid, but also anciently to rule and govern the diocese in the time of vacation.—Burn's Dict.

Charge, the instructions given by a judge to a grand jury; the judge's summing up of the evidence at a trial by jury; the taking proceedings against a prisoner; an obligation imposed on property; a commission.

Chargé d'affaires, or Chargé des affaires, a diplomatic representative at a foreign court, to whose care are confided the affairs of his nation.

Charge and Discharge, the old mode of taking accounts in Chancery. For an explanation of it see Dan. Ch. Pr. 1173, 2nd edition. As to the present mode see Smi. Ch. Pr. 569.

Charger, a person in whose favour a decree suspended is pronounced.—Scotch Law.

Charges, expenses, costs.

Charging order, an order obtained from a Court or judge under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, binding the stocks or funds of a judgment debtor with the judgment debt. See Smi. Ch. Pr. 757; 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 537.

Charitable Uses and Trusts. The 9 Geo. II. c. 36, s. 1, after reciting that gifts or alienations of land in mortmain were prohibited by Magna Charta and other wholesome laws, as prejudicial to the common utility, and that such public mischief had greatly increased by many large and improvident dispositions, made by languishing or dying persons to charitable uses, to take place after their deaths, to the disherison of their lawful heirs, enacts that after the 24th June, 1736, no lands or other hereditaments whatsoever, nor any sums of money, or any other personal estate whatsoever, to be laid out or disposed of in the purchase of any lands or hereditaments should be given, or any ways conveyed to any person or persons, bodies politic, or corporate, or otherwise, for any estate or interest whatsoever, or any ways charged or incumbered by any person or persons whatsoever in trust, or for the benefit of any charitable uses whatsoever; unless such gift or conveyance of any such lands or hereditaments, sums of money, or personal estate (other than stocks in the public funds), be made by deed executed in the presence of two or more credible witnesses twelve calendar months before the death of such donor or grantor (including the days of the execution and death), and be enrolled in the Court of Chancery within six calendar months next after the execution thereof: and unless such stocks be transferred six calendar months before the death of such donor or grantor (including the days of the transfer and death), and unless the same be made to take effect in possession for the charitable use intended, immediately from the making thereof, and be without any power of revocation, reservation, trust, condition, limitation, or agreement whatsoever, for the benefit of the donor or grantor, or of any person or persons claiming under him.

Nothing in the act relating to the sealing and delivering of any deed twelve calendar months before the death of the grantor, or to the transfer of any stock six calendar months before the death of the grantor or person making such transfer shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any purchase of any estate or interest in lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any transfer of any stock to be made really and bonâ fide, for a full and valuable consideration, actually paid at or before the making such conveyance or transfer, without fraud or collusion (s. 2).—This section is explained by a later act to have been intended only to prevent such purchases from being avoided by reason of the death of the grantor, within twelve calendar months after the sealing and delivery of the deed relating thereto, and not wholly to exempt such purchases from the operation of the act.—9 Geo. IV. c. 85.

All gifts, grants, conveyances, appointments, transfers, and settlements, whatsoever, of any lands or other hereditaments, or of any estate or interest therein, or of any charge or incumbrance affecting any lands or hereditaments, or of any stock, money, or other personal estate or securities for money to be laid out or disposed of in the purchase of any lands or hereditaments or of any estate or interest therein, or of any charge or incumbrance affecting the same, to or in trust for any charitable uses whatsoever, which shall at any time after the 24th June 1736, be made in any other manner or form than by the act directed and appointed, are absolutely and to all intents and purposes null and void (s. 3).

Land, therefore, given by will to charitable uses will generally descend to the heir-at-law. When a bequest of personal property for charitable purposes, which if standing alone would be valid, is connected with and dependant upon a devise of real estate which is void; the devise being the principal, and failing, the accessory must fail with it; and the next of kin or residuary legatees will take it.

The act is not to make void the dispositions of any lands, tenements, hereditaments, or of any personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, which should be made in any other manner or form than by such act is directed, to or in trust for either of the two universities in England (Oxford and Cambridge), or any of the colleges or houses of learning within either of the said universities, or to or in trust for the colleges of Eton, Winchester, or Westminster, or any or either of them, for the better support and maintenance of the scholars only upon the foundations of the said colleges of Eton, Winchester and Westminster (s. 4). And see 45 Geo. III. c. 101.

The following dispositions are also exempted from the mortmain laws: where a power given to invest money, destined for charitable purposes, either in lands or in the funds, is merely discretionary and not imperative, for which a testator has pointed out two modes, the one consistent but the other inconsistent with the statute, Equity will adopt the legal mode and carry it into effect (The Mayor, &c. of Faversham v. Ryder, 2 Eq. Rep. 749, 1854). 'Semper in dubiis benigniora præferenda sunt' (Dig. lib. i. t. xvii. 56), is a good maxim of the Civil Law, which says 'Quoties ambigua oratio est commodissimum est id accipi quo res de quâ agitur in tuto sit' (Dig. lib. xlv. tit. r. 80). Where money is not to be laid out in acquiring realty, but in meliorating any land, or for beautifying, sustaining, or repairing buildings already vested in trustees for charitable uses; bequests of annuities, stock in the public funds, or pure personalty; devises of lands or monies charged thereon to the trustees of the British Museum for the benefit of that institution (5 Geo. IV. c. 39, s. 3); or to the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty (2 & 3 Anne, c. 11, s. 4; 43 Geo. III. c. 136, s. 1; and 45 Geo. III. c. 84, s. 3); the commissioners of Greenwich Hospital, and of the Royal Naval Asylum, the members of the Seamen's Hospital Society, the governors of St. George's Hospital, and of Magdalen Hospital for the reception of penitent frail ones, and devises by freemen according to the custom of London, together with a few other public charities, are enabled by several acts of Parliament to take land by devise. A bequest of pure personalty to be granted to trustees of contemplated almshouses, in case any person should, within twelve months after the testator's decease, purchase or give land as a site, is not struck at by 9 Geo. II. c. 36. Philpott v. St George's Hospital, 5 W. R. (House of Lords) 845 (1857), overruling the decision of M. R. The Mortmain Act does not extend to gifts of realty and personalty in Scotland and Grenada or the West Indies. See also, as to cases in which the law of Mortmain has been relaxed, 4 & 5 Vict. c. 38; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 37; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 137, s. 27; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 112; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 124, s. 41; 22 Vict. c. 22; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, s. 9, and c. 89, s. 18. See also 24 & 25 Vict. c. 9, amending the law as to the conveyance of land for charitable uses, amended by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 17.

Charities, or public trusts. It is highly probable that the rudiments of the law of charities were derived from the Roman Civil Law. One of the earliest fruits of the Emperor Constantine's zeal, or pretended zeal, for Christianity was a permission to his subjects to bequeath their property to the church. This permission was soon abused to so great a degree as to induce the Emperor Valentinian to enact a mortmain act by which it was restrained. But this restraint was gradually relaxed; and in the time of Justinian, it became a fixed maxim of Roman jurisprudence, that legacies to pious uses (which included all legacies destined to works of charity, whether they related to spiritual or temporal concerns), were entitled to peculiar favor, and to be deemed privileged testaments.

The high authority of the Roman law, coinciding with the religious notions of the times, could hardly fail to introduce these principles of pious legacies into our Common Law; and the zeal and learning of the ecclesiastical tribunals must have been constantly exercised to enlarge their operation. Lord Thurlow was clearly of opinion that the doctrine of charities grew up from the civil law; and Lord Eldon, in assenting to that opinion, has judiciously remarked, that, at an early period, the ordinary had the power to apply a portion of every man's personal estate to charity; and when afterwards the statute compelled a distribution, it is not impossible that the same favor should have been extended to charity in wills, which by their own force, purported to authorise such a distribution.

The history of the law of charities prior to the 43rd Eliz. c. 4, which is emphatically called the Statute of Charitable Uses, is extremely obscure. This statute provided a new mode of enforcing charitable uses by a commission from the Court of Chancery.

Charity (as Sir William Grant has justly observed) in its widest sense, denotes all the good affections men ought to bear towards each other; in its more restricted and common sense, relief to the poor. In neither of these senses is it employed in the Court of Chancery. In that court it means a general public use, and comprehends 'relief of aged, impotent and poor people; maintenance of sick and maimed soldiers and mariners, schools of learning, free-schools, and scholars of universities; repairs of bridges, ports, havens, causeways, churches, sea-banks, and highways; education and preferment of orphans; the relief, stock, or maintenance of houses of correction; marriages of poor maids; supportation, aid, and help of young tradesmen, handicraftsmen, and persons decayed; relief or redemption of prisoners or captives; and aid or ease of any poor inhabitants, concerning payments of fifteenths, setting out of soldiers, and other taxes.'—Preamble of 43 Eliz. c. 4.

It is clear that no superstitious uses are within the purview of the statute; such as are gifts of money for the finding or maintenance of a stipendiary priest; or for the maintenance of an anniversary or obit, or of any light or lamp in any church or chapel; or for prayers for the dead; or for such purposes as the superior of a convent, or her successor, may judge expedient. But there are certain uses which, though not within the letter, are yet deemed charitable within the equity of the statute. Such is money given to maintain a preaching minister; to maintain a schoolmaster in a parish; for the setting up a hospital for the relief of poor people; for the building of a sessions-house for a city or county; for the making of a new, or for the repairing of an old pulpit in a church; or for the buying of a pulpit-cushion, or pulpit-cloth; or for the setting of new bells where there were none, or for mending of them when they are out of repair.

Upon the whole, it seems to be the better opinion, that the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery over charities, where no trust is interposed, or where there is no person in esse capable of taking, or where the charity is of an indefinite nature, is not to be referred to the general jurisdiction of that court, but sprung up after the statute of Elizabeth, and rests mainly on its provisions.

The jurisdiction exercised by the Lord Chancellor, under the 43 Eliz. c. 4, over charities, is held to be personal in him, and not exercised in virtue of his ordinary or extraordinary jurisdiction in Chancery; and in this respect it resembles the jurisdiction exercised by him in cases of idiots and lunatics, which he exercises purely as the personal delegate of the Crown, which has a right to guard and enforce all charities of a public nature, by virtue of its general superintending power over the public interests, where no other person is entrusted with that right.

But as the Court of Chancery may also proceed in many, although not in all, cases of charity by original bill, as well as by commission under the statute of Elizabeth, the jurisdiction has become mixed in practice, that is to say, the jurisdiction of bringing informations in the name of the Attorney-General has been mixed with the jurisdiction given to the Chancellor by the statute. So that it is not always easy to ascertain in what case he acts as a judge, administering the common duties of a Court of Equity, and in what cases he acts as a mere delegate of the Crown, administering its peculiar duties and prerogatives. And again, there is a distinction between cases of charity, where the Chancellor is to act in the Court of Chancery, and cases where the charity is to be administered by the Queen, under her sign manual. Lord Eldon, after a full review of all the cases, came to the conclusion (which is now the settled rule), that where there is a general indefinite purpose of charity, not fixing itself upon any particular object, the disposition and administration of it are in the Queen by her sign manual.* But where the gift is to trustees with general objects, or with some particular objects pointed out, there the Court of Chancery will take upon itself the administration of the charity, and execute it under a scheme to be reported by a chief clerk.—Moggridge v. Thackwell, 7 Ves. 36–86; Story's Equity Jurisp. c. xxxi.; Shelford's Law of Charities. See the Charitable Trusts Acts, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 137; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 124; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 76; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 76; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 51; and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 50. Charre of lead, thirty pigs of lead.

Charta Chyrographata, or Communis, an indenture.

Charta de non ente non valet.—Co. Litt. 36. (A charter concerning a thing not in existence avails not.)

Charta de una parte, a deed-poll.

Charta est legatus mentis.—Ibid.—(A charter is the representation of the mind.)

Charta non est nisi vestimentum donationis.—Ibid.—(A charter is nothing else than the vestment of a gift.)

Chartæ libertatum are Magna Charta and Charta de Foresta. See 4 Bl. 423.

Charta de Foresta is taken from the roll of 25 Edward I. and has a confirmation of that date prefixed to it, similar to that prefixed to Magna Charta. This charter, though of infinite importance at the time it was made, contains in it nothing interesting to a modern lawyer, any further than as it gives some specimen of the nature of the institution of Forest Laws, and the burthens thereby brought on the subject. In this light, the Charter of the Forest is a curious remnant of ancient legislation. It contains sixteen chapters.—1 Reeves, c. v. p. 254; 4 Bl. Com. 423; 1 Steph. Com. 678.

Chartarum super fidem, mortuis testibus, ad patriam de necessitudine recurrendum est.—Co. Litt. 36.—(The witnesses being dead, the truth of charters must of necessity be referred to the country, i. e. a jury.)

Charte, a cart, chart, or plan, which mariners use at sea.—14 Car. II. c. 33.

Chartel [fr. cartel, Fr.], a letter of defiance, or challenge to a single combat; also an instrument or writing between two states for settling the exchange of prisoners of war.

Charter [fr. charta, Lat.; chartre, Fr.], an evidence of things done between man and man; also a statute or act of Parliament. Charters of the Queen are written instruments granting certain privileges or exemptions to towns, corporations, bodies politic. Charter of pardon, forgiving a felony or other offence committed against the crown and its dignity. Charter of the forest comprises the laws of the forest.—Fleta, l. 3, c. xiv.; Co. Litt. 6.

Charter-House [fr. chartreux, Fr.], formerly a convent of Carthusian monks in London, now a college founded and endowed by Thomas Sutton. The Governors of the Charter-House are a corporation aggregate without a head, president, or superior, all the members being of equal authority.—3 Steph. Com. 138.

Charter-land, otherwise called book-land, properly held by deed under certain rents and free-services. It in effect differs nothing from the free socage lands, and hence have arisen most of the freehold tenants, who hold of particular manors, and owe suit and service to the same.—2 Bl. Com. 90.

Chartered ship, a ship hired or freighted.

Charterer, a person who charters or hires a ship for a voyage or for a certain period; also a Cheshire freeholder.—Sir P. Ley's Antiq. f. 356.

Charter-party [fr. charta partita, Lat., a divided charter; charte partie, Fr. According to Boyer, the derivation of the word is 'quia per medium charta incidebatur et sic fiebat charta partita,' because when notaries were less common there was only one instrument made for both parties; this they cut in two, and gave each his portion, joining them together at their return, to know if each had done his part.—4 Encycl. Brit. 1797, 360]. An agreement in writing, sometimes under seal, by which a shipowner agrees to let an entire ship, or the principal part thereof, to a merchant, for the carriage of goods on a specified voyage, or during a specified period, for a sum of money which the merchant agrees to pay as freight for their carriage. By such an agreement the ship is said to be chartered to the merchant, who is called the charterer. There are certain terms usually to be found in all charter-parties, e. g. a statement of the burthen of the ship, an undertaking by the shipowner that the ship, being seaworthy and furnished with necessaries, shall be ready by a certain day to receive the cargo, shall sail when loaded, and deliver her cargo at her port of destination (the act of God or the king's enemies excepted), the charterer undertaking to load and unload the ship, within a certain number of days, called the lay or running days, and if he detains her longer, to pay demurrage, i. e. a certain sum of money for each extra day, and also to pay freight agreed. See 2 Instit. 673; Abbot on Shipping; Maude & Pollock on Shipping; and Smith's Mercantile Law.

Charters sont appelé 'muniments,' à 'muniendo,' quia muniunt et defendunt hæreditatem.—4 Co. 153.—(Charters are called muniments, from muniendo, because they fortify and defend the inheritance.)

Chartis Reddendis, an ancient writ which lay against one who had charters of feoffment entrusted to his keeping, and refused to deliver them.—Reg. Orig. 159.

Chase [fr. chasse, Fr.], a privileged place for the preservation of deer and beasts of the forest, of a middle nature between a forest and a park. It is commonly less than a forest, and not endowed with so many liberties, as officers, laws, courts; and yet is of larger compass than a park, having more officers and game than a park. Every forest is a chase, but every chase is not a forest. It differs from a park in that it is not enclosed, yet it must have certain metes and bounds, but it may be in other men's grounds as well as in one's own.—Mainw. 49.

Chastisement of a wife. It is a great error to suppose that a husband can beat his wife, for she can have the security of the peace against him, should he attempt anything of the kind.

Chattel-interests, the most inferior order of estates, and in the old time, when feudality flourished in all its stern and frowning grandeur, the little interests of the humble cottager and the laboring farmer in the soil of England were treated with contempt and trampled upon. But in these latter days, when the increase of knowledge has expanded commercial enterprise, and awakened the sleeping energies of the mass of the people, these minor properties are properly respected, and their value and importance much increased.—Pres. Est. 604, 1st edit.

The difference between freeholds and non-freeholds, or chattel-interests, consists, for the most part, in the fixity or non-fixity of their duration. It is the latter property, viz. uncertainty, that characterises a freehold; it is the former, viz. certainty, that characterises a non-freehold. Hence every tenancy of a definite duration is a term, i. e. a period accurately ascertained during which the interest or estate is to endure. The non-freeholds are deemed merely chattel-interests, and differ from freeholds not only in quantity but in order and kind; for freeholds are considered of greater interest than non-freeholds, and therefore if a term of 1,000 years and an estate for life vest in the same person, in the same right, the term will merge in the life estate, unless an intervening estate prevent such an union of interests. Chattel-interests devolve upon the personal representatives of the owner. Five species of estates rank as chattel-interests:—(a) for years; (b) from year to year; (c) at will; (d) by elegit; and (e) on sufferance.

Chattels, or Catals [fr. catalla, Lat.; chatel, Fr.; chaptel, old Fr.], goods moveable and immoveable, except such as are in the nature of freehold or parcel of it. They are either (1) personal, which belong immediately to the person of the owner, and for which, if they are injuriously withheld from him, he has no other remedy than by a personal action; (2) real, which either appertain not immediately to the person, but to some other thing by way of dependency, as a box with writings of land; or issue out of some immoveable thing, as a lease, or rent for a term of years; and they concern the realty, lands and tenements; such as an interest in advowsons, in statutes-merchant, and the like.—1 Inst. 118.

Chaud-medley. See CHANCE-MEDLEY.

Chaumpert, an ancient tenure.—Blount.

Chauntry rents, money paid to the Crown by the servants or purchasers of chauntry-lands. 22. Car. II. c. 6.

Cheap, subst. purchase, bargain; adj. low in price, [fr. ceap, A. S., price, sale, goods, cattle; kaupon, Goth., to deal; kaup, Icel., to buy, to negotiate; koopen, Du., kaufen, Germ., to buy; kaufmann, chapman, a dealer; kupiti, Slav., kaupiti, Bohem., to buy; κάπηλος, Gr., campo, Lat., a tavern-keeper, a tradesman.—Dief.] The word cheap forming part of the name of a place, denotes that in that place there was a market e. g. Cheapside, Eastcheap, Westcheap. The adjective, when used in its modern sense, low in price, is an ellipsis for good cheap, equivalent to bon marché, Fr.

Cheap railway trains. See 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 75; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 41.

Cheaters, or Escheaters, were officers appointed to look after the king's escheats, a duty which gave them great opportunities of fraud and oppression, and in consequence many complaints were made of their misconduct. Hence it seems that a cheater came to signify a fraudulent person, and thence the verb to cheat was derived.—Wedgw.

Cheats, deceitful practices, in defrauding or endeavouring to defraud another of his known right, by means of some artful device, contrary to the plain rules of common honesty; as by playing with false dice, by causing an illiterate person to execute a deed to his prejudice, or reading it over to him in words different from those in which it is written; selling one commodity for another, or using false weights and measures, and the like.—1 Hawk. 188.

Checks, Cheques, or Drafts, orders addressed to some person, generally a banker, directing him to pay the sum specified in the check to the person named in it, or bearer, or order, on demand. See BANKERS' CHECKS.

Check-roll, a list or book, containing the names of such as are attendants on, or in the pay of, the Queen or other great personages, as their household servants.—19 Car. II. c. 1.

Chelsea Hospital. See 47 Geo. III. st. 2, c. 25; 55 Geo. III. cc. 125, 136; 7 Geo. IV. c. 16; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 106, ss. 3, 4; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 70; 6 & 7 Vict. cc. 31, 95; 9 & 10 Vict. cc. 9. 10; 10 & 11 Vict. cc. 4, 54; 11 & 12 Vict. cc. 84, 103.

Chelsea Hospital Out-pensioners. See 19 & 20 Vict. c. 15.

Chemists and Druggists. See 55 Geo. III. c. 194, s. 28.

Chester, a county of England. It was declared to be no longer a county palatine by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, s. 13.—3 Reeves, 156.

Chevage, Chevagium, or Cherage [fr. chef, Fr.], a tribute sum of money formerly paid by such as held land in villenage to their lords in acknowledgment, and was a kind of head or poll-money.—Bract. l. 1, c. x.

Chevantia [fr. chevance, Fr.], a loan or advance of money upon credit; also goods, stock, &c.—Mon. Ang. t. 1. p. 629.

Chevisance [fr. chevir, i. e. venir à chef de quelque chose, Fr., to come to the end of a business], an agreement or composition; an end or order set down between a creditor or debtor; an indirect gain in point of usury, &c.; also an unlawful bargain or contract.

Chezé, a homestead or homesfall which is accessory to a house—Div. of Purl. 162, note.

Chicane [fr. chicaner, Fr., to wrangle], the use of tricks and artifice.

Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the presiding Judge in the Court of Exchequer of Pleas at Westminster, with whom four puisné judges are associated for the administration of justice.

Chief Clerks of Judges in Equity, appointed under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, s. 16, to act in the place of the abolished Masters in Ordinary. For their duties see Smi. Eq. Pr. 506.

Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the presiding Judge in the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster. He has four puisné judges associated with him.

Chief Justice of England, the presiding Judge in the Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster, with whom four puisné judges are associated. These judges are by their office the sovereign conservators of the peace, and supreme coroners of the land.

Chief-rents [fr. reditus capitales, Lat.], the annual payments of freeholders of manors; also denominated quit rents (quieti reditus), because thereby the tenant goes free of all other services.—2 Bl. Com. 42.

Chief, tenants in, persons who held their lands immediately under the king (in capite) in right of his Crown and dignity.

Chiefrie, a small rent paid to the lord paramount.

Chievance, usury.

Childbearing. It is generally conceded that in our own climate, no female under the age of thirteen, nor above that of fifty, can conceive, provided that she have been previously barren. This, however, is only to be taken as a general rule, subject to exceptions. See Capuron, pp. 93, 98. The question at what age pregnancy is possible, and when it ceases to be possible, has been much canvassed. As to premature pregnancy in European countries, the most astonishing instance, probably, is given by Meyer, of a Swiss girl becoming a mother at nine years of age. The English law admits of no presumption as to the time when a woman ceases to bear children, though this enters into most other codes.—Beck's Med. Juris. 148, 402.

Childwite, a fine or penalty of a bondwoman unlawfully begotten with child.—Cowel.

Chiltern-Hundreds, a member of the House of Commons, not in any respect disqualified, can only vacate his seat by the acceptance of the Stewardship of the Chiltern-Hundreds, or some other nominal office in the gift of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The practice began about the year 1750; but the duties of the stewardship have long since ceased, and the office is but retained to serve this particular purpose. The Chiltern Hills are a range of chalk eminences separating the counties of Bedford and Hertford, passing through the middle of Bucks from Tring in Hertfordshire to Henley in Oxfordshire. Formerly these hills were covered with thick beechwood, and sheltered numerous robbers; to put these marauders down, and protect the inhabitants of the neighbourhood from their depredations, an officer was appointed under the Crown, called the Steward of the Chiltern-Hundreds, which were Burnham, Desborough, and Stoke. The clump of noble 'Burnham beeches' remains to remind us of the old stewardship duties.

The Crown, for the convenience of the House at large, is always ready to confer on any member 'the Stewardship of Her Majesty's Chiltern-Hundreds, the Stewardship of the Manor of Poynings, of East Hendred and Northstead, or the Escheatorship of Munster,' sinecures which he continues to hold till some other member solicits a similar accommodation.—Dod's Parl. Comp.; 2 Steph. Com. 396.

Chimin [fr. chemin, Fr.], a way, which is either the Queen's highway (chiminus reginæ), or a private way: the first is that over which the subjects of this realm, and all others under the protection of the Crown, have free liberty to pass, though the property in the soil itself belong to some private individual; the last is that in which one person or more have liberty to pass over the land of another, by prescription or charter. This is divided into chimin in gross, where a person holds a way principally and solely in itself, and chimin appendant, where a person has it as appurtenant to some other thing; as if he rent a close or pasture, with covenant for ingress and egress through and over other land, over which otherwise he might might not pass.—Kitch. 117; Co. Litt. 56.

Chiminage, or Pedagium, toll due by custom for having a way through a forest.—Co. Litt. 56.

Chimney-money, or Hearth-money, a crown duty for every fire-place in a house.—14 Car. II. c. 2. Repealed.

China trade. See 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 93, amended by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 56; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 80, and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 9.

Chip, Cheap, Chipping, signify the place to be a market town, as Chippingham, Chipping-Norton, Chipping-Wicomb.—Blount.

Chippingavel, or Cheapingavel, toll for buying and selling.

Chirchgemot, Chirgemot, Kirkmote [fr. forum ecclesiasticum, Lat.], a synod, a meeting in a church or vestry.—Blount.

Chirograph [fr. χείρ, a hand, and γράφω, Gk., to write], a deed or other public instrument in writing, which anciently was attested by the subscription and crosses of witnesses; afterwards, to prevent frauds and concealment, people made their deeds of mutual covenant in a script and rescript, or in a part and counterpart, and in the middle between the two copies they drew the capital letters of the alphabet, and then tallied or cut asunder, in an indented manner, the sheet or skin of parchment; which, being delivered to the two parties concerned, were proved authentic by matching with and answering one another. Deeds thus made were denominated syngrapha by the canonists, and with us chirographa, or handwritings. Chirograph was also used for a fine, the manner of engrossing which and cutting the parchment into two pieces was observed in the chirographer's office of the Court of Common Pleas until those assurances by matter of record were abolished by the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.—2 Bl. Com. 296; 2 Inst. 468; Kenn. Antiq. 177; Mon. Ang. t. 2, p. 94.

Chirographa, writings emanating from a single party, the debtor.—Civil Law.

Chirographer, an officer of the Court of Common Pleas, who kept the fines. His office is abolished.

Chirographum apud debitorem repertum præsumitur solutum.—(A deed found with the debtor is presumed to be paid.)

Chirurgeon [fr. χειρουργός, Gk.], the ancient denomination of a surgeon.

Chivalry [fr. chevalier, Fr., a knight], a military dignity, supposed by some to have taken its rise soon after the death of Charlemagne, and by others during the crusades, because in these expeditions many chivalrous exploits were performed, and a proud feeling of heroism engendered. In describing the origin, object, and character of this military institution, Gibbon, the historian, thus alludes to a successful candidate for the honour of knighthood, and eulogises the institution:—'He was created a Knight in the name of God, of St. George, and of St. Michael the Archangel. He swore to accomplish the duties of his profession and education; example, and the public opinion were the inviolable guardians of his oath. As the champion of God and the ladies, he devoted himself to speak the truth; to maintain the right; to protect the distressed; to practice courtesy (a virtue less familiar to the infidels); to despise the allurements of ease and safety; and to vindicate in every perilous adventure the honor of his character. The abuse of the same spirit provoked the illiterate knight to disdain the arts of luxury and peace; to esteem himself the sole judge and avenger of his own injuries; and proudly to neglect the laws of civil society and military discipline. Yet the benefits of this institution to refine the temper of barbarians, and to infuse some principles of faith, justice, and humanity, were strongly felt and have been often observed. The asperity of national prejudice was softened; and the community of religion and arms spread a similar color and generous emulation over the face of Christendom. Abroad in enterprise and pilgrimage, at home in martial exercises, the warriors of every country were perpetually associated; and impartial taste must prefer a Gothic tournament to the Olympic games of classic antiquity. Instead of the naked spectacles which corrupted the manners of the Greeks and banished from the stadium the virgins and matrons, the pompous decoration of the lists was crowned with the presence of chaste and high-born beauty, from whose hands the conqueror received the prize of his dexterity and courage.' See TENURE.

Chivalry, Court of, anciently held as a court of honor merely, before the Earl-Marshal, and as a criminal court before the Lord High Constable, jointly with the Earl-Marshal. It had jurisdiction as to contracts and other matters touching deeds of arms or war, as well as pleas of life or member. It also corrected encroachments in matters of coat-armour, precedency, and other distinctions of families. It is now grown entirely out of use, on account of the feebleness of its jurisdiction and want of power to enforce its judgments, as it could neither fine nor imprison, not being a court of record.—3 Bl. Com. 68, and 3 Steph. Com. 459, note.

Chivalry, Guardian in. See TENURE.

Chloroform, administering. It is a felony for any person to administer or attempt to administer chloroform, or other stupefying drug, with intent to enable himself or another to commit, or to assist another in the commission of any indictable offence.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 22.

Choky, Chokee, a chair, seat, guard, watch. The station of a guard or watchman. A place where an officer is stationed to receive tolls and customs.—Indian.

Cholera Act, 2 Wm. IV. c. 10, continued by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 75. It has expired and not been revived.

Chop-church [ecclesiarum permutatio, Lat.], changing benefices.—9 Hen. VI. c. 95.

Chorepiscopi, bishops of the country in the early times of the church.

Chose [Fr., a thing], it is used in divers senses, of which the four following are the most important:—

(1) Chose local, a thing annexed to a place, as a mill, &c.

(2) Chose transitory, that which is moveable, and may be taken away, or carried from place to place.

(3) Chose in action, otherwise called chose in suspense, a thing of which a man has not the possession or actual enjoyment, but has a right to demand it by action or other proceeding. It is rather in potentia than in esse, as a debt, bond, &c. A well-known rule of the common law is, that no possibility, right, title, or thing in action, can be granted to third parties; for it was thought that a different rule would be the occasion of multiplying litigation; as it would in effect be transferring a lawsuit to a mere stranger. At law, therefore, with the exception of negotiable instruments, an interesse termini, and some few other securities, this still continues to be the general rule, unless the debtor assents to the transfer; if he assent, then the right of the assignee is complete at law, so that he may maintain an action against the debtor, upon the implied promise to pay him the debt, which results from such assent. When, therefore, in common acceptation, a debt or bond is said to be assigned over, it must still be sued (i. e. at law) in the original creditor's name; the person to whom it is transferred being rather an attorney than an assignee, unless, as we have seen, the debtor assents to such transfer.

Courts of Equity, however, have long since totally disregarded this nicety. They accordingly give effect to assignments of trusts, and possibilities of trusts, and contingent interests, whether they are in real or personal estates, as well as to assignments of choses in action, such equitable transfer being in the nature of an agreement, of which the Court of Chancery directs the performance.—Co. Litt. 214 a; 2 Bl. Com. 442; 2 Sanders on Uses, 40; 2 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 278; Watkins's Conv. 36.

(4) Choses in possession, where a person has not only the right to enjoy, but also the actual enjoyment of the thing.

Chout, a fourth, a fourth part of sums litigated; Mahratta chout, a fourth of the revenues extracted as tribute by the Mahrattas.—Indian.

Chrematistics [fr. χρῆμα, Gk.], the science of wealth.

Chrismatis denarii [fr. χρῖσμα, Gk.], chrisom pence, paid to the diocesan or his suffragan, by the parochial clergy about Easter. It is otherwise called quadragesimals, or paschals, or Easter-pence. Obsolete.

Christian-name, the name given at the font, distinct from the gentilitious name, or surname.

Christianity, the religion of Christians, who derive their name from the founder Christ [fr. χριστός, Gk., the anointed), and were first so designated at Antioch, in Syria. It is part of the law of England, and all offences against it are punished by fine and imprisonment.

Christmas-day, a festival of the Christian church, observed on the 25th of December, in memory of the birth of Jesus Christ. As to its antiquity, the first traces we find of it are in the second century, about the time of the Emperor Commodus. The decretal epistles, indeed, carry it up a little higher, and say that Telesphorus, who lived in the reign of Antoninus Pius, ordered divine service to be celebrated, and an angelical hymn to be sung the night before the nativity. It is one of the usual quarter days for the payment of rent and salaries; it is also a dies non juridicus.

Chrysology [fr. χρυσός and λόγος, Gk.], that branch of political economy relating to the production of wealth.

Church [fr. kerch, Dut.; kerche, high Ger.; kyrichia, Su.; chirich, Teut.; cyric circe, Sax. of κυριακή, Gk. scil. οἰκία, i. e. the Lord's house], used in several senses:—(1) The collective body of persons professing one and the same religion; or the religion itself; thus we say, the church of Christ. (2) Any particular congregation of Christians associating, as the church of Antioch. (3) A particular sect of Christians, as the Greek church, or the church of England. (4) The body of ecclesiastics, in contradistinction to the laity. (5) The building in which a congregation of Christians assembles.

Church-building Commissioners. Their commission expired on 1st Jan. 1857, and their powers were transferred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England.—19 & 20 Vict. c. 55.

Church-building Commissioners' Acts. For the purpose of extending the accommodation afforded by the national church, so as to make it more commensurate with the wants of the people, the following statutes have been passed: 58 Geo. III. c. 45; 59 Geo. III. c. 134; 3 Geo. IV. c. 72; 5 Geo. IV. c. 103; 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 72; 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 38; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 61; 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 75; 1 & 2 Vict. cc. 106, 107; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 49; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 60; 4 & 5 Vict. c. 38; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 56; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70; 9 & 10 Vict. cc. 68, 88; 11 & 12 Vict. cc. 37, 71; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 97; 17 & 18 Vict. cc. 14, 32; and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 127; these are known by the denomination of the Acts for Church Building.—1 Chit. Stat. 430.

Church Discipline Act, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86; which repealed 1 Hen. VII. c. 4. See Reg. v. Bp. Chichester, 7 W. R. 619.

Church Estate Commissioners, a committee of the ecclesiastical commissioners. See 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94, ss. 1. 3.

Church-rates, tributes, by which the expenses of the church are to be defrayed: which rates are to be made by the parishioners at large, that is, by the majority of those that are present at a vestry to be summoned for that purpose by the church-wardens; and when made are recoverable in the ecclesiastical court, or, if the arrears do not exceed 10*l.* and no question be raised as to the legal liability, before two justices of the peace.—4 & 5 Vict. c. 36; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14, s. 9. See Prid. Churchwardens' Guide.

Church-scot, customary obligations paid to the parish priest; from which duties the religious sometimes purchased an exemption for themselves and their tenants.

Church-wardens, anciently styled Church-Reeves, or Ecclesiæ Guardiani, the guardians or keepers of the church, and representatives of the body of the parish; but though in some sort ecclesiastical officers, they are always lay persons. They are a quasi corporation (Smith v. Adkins, 8 M. & W. 362). They are sometimes appointed by the minister, sometimes by the parish in vestry assembled, sometimes by both together as custom directs. But where there is no custom, it is said the election must be according to the canons, that they shall be chosen by the joint consent of the minister and parishioners, if it may be; but if they cannot agree, then the minister is to choose one and the parishioners another. They are to be chosen yearly in Easter-week, and are generally two in number; are obliged when chosen to serve, and are sworn to execute the office faithfully. Several persons are, however, exempted from the office, viz. peers of the realm, members of Parliament, Roman Catholic clergy, dissenting ministers, barristers, attornies, physicians, surgeons, apothecaries, aldermen, dissenting teachers, and persons living out of the parish, unless they occupy a house of trade there (Steer's P. L. 84). One of their chief duties is the care and management of the goods belonging to the church, such as the organ, bells, bible, and parish books. But as to the church and church-yard, they have no sort of interest therein; and if any damage be done thereto, the parson only or vicar shall have the action. It is also part of their office, unless other persons are appointed by the ordinary for that purpose, to have the care of the benefice during its vacancy, or while it is under sequestration for the debts of the incumbent. They are moreover required to see to the reparation of the church and the making of the church-rates, also to make such order relative to seats in the church and chancel, not appropriated to particular purposes, as the ordinary (who has in general the sole power in this matter) shall direct, and in practice, the arrangements are usually made by the church-wardens, even without any special direction from the ordinary. It is incident also to their office to enforce proper and orderly behaviour during divine service. Formerly too they were joined with the overseers in the care and maintenance of the poor; but this duty is now in general taken from them by the effect of the act for the amendment of the poor law (4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 76), and of the regulations introduced under its authority by the poor law commissioners. If church-wardens waste the goods of the church, or be guilty of other misbehaviour, they are liable to removal; at the end of the year they are bound to render an account of all their receipts and disbursements.—Prid. Churchwardens' Guide; 3 Step. Com. 40.

Churchesset [fr. churchset, ciricseat, Sax.], corn paid to the church. Fleta says, it signifies a certain measure of wheat, which, in times past, every man, on St. Martin's day, gave to holy church, as well in the times of the Britons as of the English; yet many great persons, after the coming of the Romans, gave their contributions according to the ancient law of Moses, in the name of first fruits; as in the writ of King Canutus, sent to the Pope is particularly contained, in which they call it churchsed.—Seld. Hist. Tithes, 216.

Churchyard, the freehold of the rector or vicar.—3 Step. Com. 69.

Churle [fr. ceorl, Sax.; carl, Germ.], a tenant at will, of free condition, who held lands of the Thanes, on payment of rents and services: of two sorts; one who hired the lord's tenementary estate, like our farmers; the other that tilled and manured the demesnes (yielding work and not rent), and were called his sockmen or ploughmen.—Spelm.

Ciltre, corruptly Siltre, Chiltern.

Cinque Ports [quinque portus, Lat.], the five most important havens in the kingdom, lying on the coast towards France, viz. Dover, Sandwich, Romney, Hastings, and Hythe; to which Winchelsea and Rye have since been added. The 18 & 19 Vict. c. 48 (amended by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 1), abolishes all jurisdiction and authority of the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports and Constable of Dover Castle, in or in relation to the administration of justice in actions, suits, or other civil proceedings at law or in equity.

Circada, a tribute anciently paid to the bishop or archbishop for visiting churches.—Du Fresne.

Circar, head of affairs; the state or government; a grand division of a province; a headman. A name used by Europeans in Bengal to denote the Hindu writer and accountant employed by themselves, or in the public offices. See SIRCAR.

Circuits, eight certain divisions of England and Wales, appointed for the Common Law Judges to go twice a year, in the respective vacations after Hilary and Trinity terms, to administer justice in the several counties. Two judges go on each of the eight circuits, with the exception of those of North and South Wales, to each of which one judge is found sufficient. Where there are two judges, they preside simultaneously in the civil and criminal courts; but the judge who takes the civil side in one county, takes the criminal side in the next county, and so alternately throughout the circuit. In presiding in the criminal court, the judge sits robed in scarlet and ermine, and wears a full-bottomed wig; but in the civil court he wears a black silk gown and a short wig. The following are the circuits:—

(1) Northern Circuit: York, Durham, Newcastle, Carlisle, Appleby, Lancaster, and Liverpool.

(2) Home Circuit: Hertford, Chelmsford, Maidstone, Lewes, Kingston, in spring; Guildford or Croydon, in summer.

(3) Western Circuit: Winchester, Salisbury, or Devizes, Dorchester, Exeter, Bodmin, Taunton, in spring; Wells and Bridgewater alternately in summer, and Bristol in summer only.

(4) Oxford Circuit: Reading in spring, Abingdon in summer, Oxford, Worcester, Stafford, Shrewsbury, Hereford, Monmouth, Gloucester.

(5) Midland Circuit: Northampton, Oakham, Lincoln, Nottingham, Derby, Leicester, Coventry, Warwick.

(6) Norfolk Circuit: Aylesbury or Buckingham, Bedford, Huntingdon, Cambridge, Bury, St. Edmund's, in spring; Ipswich in summer, Norwich.

(7) North Wales Circuit: Newtown, Dolgelly, in summer; Welchpool, Bala, in spring; Carnarvon, Beaumaris, Ruthin, Mold, Chester.

(8) South Wales Circuit: Swansea in spring, Cardiff in summer, Carmarthen, Haverfordwest, Cardigan, Brecon, Presteign, Chester.

The judges, upon their circuits, sit by virtue of four several authorities:—(1) The commission of the peace; (2) a commission of oyer and terminer; (3) a commission of general gaol-delivery; (4) a commission of Nisi Prius. See ASSIZE. The Judges may try causes pending in another Court, 13 Edw. I. c. 30 (West 2); and 2 & 3 Vict. c. 22; and also make orders on circuit, 1 Geo. IV. c. 55, and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 45; and see 2 & 3 Vict. c. 72; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 25, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 45.

In Ireland there are six circuits, called the Home, North-west, North-east, Leinster, Munster, and Connaught.

Circuity of Action, a longer course of proceeding to recover a thing sued for than requisite.—Termes de la Ley.

Circuitus est evitandus; et boni judicis est lites dirimere, ne lis ex lite oritur.—5 Co. 31.—(Circuity is to be avoided; and it is the duty of a good judge to determine litigations, lest one lawsuit arise out of another). On this maxim depends the law of set-off.—2 Geo. II. c. 22, s. 13; 8 Geo. II. c. 24, s. 5.

Circulating medium, more comprehensive than the term money as it is the medium of exchanges, or purchases and sales, whether it be gold or silver coin or any other article.

Circumduction, the time allowed for bringing proof of allegiance.—Scotch Law.

Circumspecte agatis (that you act cautiously), the statute 13 Edw. I. st. 4, A.D. 1285, relating to prohibitions.—2 Inst. 187; 2 Reeves, 215.

Circumstantial Evidence, presumptive proof, when the fact itself is not proved by direct testimony, but is to be inferred from circumstances, which either necessarily or usually attend such facts. It is obvious that a presumption is more or less likely to be true, according as it is more or less probable that the circumstances would not have existed unless the fact which is inferred from them had also existed: and that a presumption can only be relied on until the contrary is actually proved. Circumstantial evidence has, in some instances, undoubtedly been found to produce a much stronger assurance of a prisoner's guilt than could have been produced by more direct and positive testimony. As a general principle, however, it is true that positive evidence of a fact from credible eye-witnesses is the most satisfactory that can be produced; and the universal feeling of mankind leans to this species of evidence in preference to that which is merely circumstantial. If positive evidence of a fact can be produced, circumstantial evidence ought not to be trusted. Chief Baron Gilbert, therefore, considers it a higher species of proof. He says, 'when the fact itself cannot be proved, that which comes nearest to the proof of the fact is the proof of the circumstances which necessarily or usually attend such facts, and which are called presumptions and not proofs, for they stand instead of the proofs of the fact till the contrary be proved.'—1 Phill. Evid. c. 7, s. 2.

Still we must not overlook the danger of trusting too implicitly to circumstantial evidence. If the connection between cause and effect in the material world has so long baffled every philosophical inquirer, surely we ought to approach with diffidence a similar investigation in the moral world. Who can pretend to ascribe to each act of man its real motive, and to hit with an unerring aim the hidden indefinable source of human impulse.—Nicolas on Adulterine Bastardy, 448.

Circumstantibus, tales de (so many of the bystanders). In civil and criminal trials, where by reason of the default of the jury, or of challenge, there is not a sufficient number of the jurors impanelled, the judge may direct the sheriff to add to the panel the names of a sufficient number of persons qualified to act as jurymen who may be present or can be found, who are called tales de circumstantibus.—6 Geo. IV. c. 50. s. 37; 3 Step. Com. 628.

Circumvention, any act of fraud, whereby a person is reduced to a deed by deceit.—Scotch Dict.

Ciric-Bryce, any violation of the privileges of a church.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Ciric-Sceat [punicitiæ seminum], church-scot, or shot, an ecclesiastical due, payable on the day of St. Martin, consisting chiefly of corn.—Anc. Hist. Eng.

Cisleu, or Chisleu, the ninth month of the ecclesiastical and the third of the civil Hebrew year, answering nearly to our November.—Jahn's Bib. Antiq.

Citation, a summons to appear, applied particularly to process in the spiritual, probate and matrimonial courts; also a reference to authorities in support of an argument.

Citationes non concedantur priusquam exprimitur supra quâ re fieri debet citatio.—12 Co. 44.—(Summonses should not be granted, before that it is explained for what cause a summons ought to issue.)

Citatio est de jure naturali.—Ca. B. R. W. 3, 453.—(A summons is by natural right.)

Citatio ad reassumendam causam, a citation which issued when a party died pending a suit against his heir to revive the cause.

Citizen. Aristotle, in the beginning of the third book of the politics, defines a citizen to be one who is a partner in the legislative and judicial power (μέτοικος κρίσεως καὶ ἀρχῆς).

City [fr. cité, Fr.], a town corporate, which has usually a bishop and cathedral church. It is called civitas, because it is governed by justice and order of magistracy; oppidum, for that it contains a great number of inhabitants, and urbs, because it is in due form begirt about with walls.—Cowel.

Civil, stands for the opposite of criminal, of ecclesiastical, of military, of political.—1 Mill's Log. 44.

Civil Commotion, an insurrection of the people for general purposes, though it may not amount to rebellion, where there is an usurped power.

Civil Division of England. For civil purposes England is divided into counties, which are subdivided into hundreds, and these are again subdivided into tithings or towns. See 1 Steph. Comm. 126.

Civil Law, that rule of action which every particular nation, commonwealth, or city has established peculiarly for itself, more properly distinguished by the name of municipal law.

The term 'civil law,' is now chiefly applied to that which the old Romans compiled from the laws of nature and nations.

The 'Roman Law,' and the 'Civil Law,' are convertible phrases, meaning the same system of jurisprudence; it is now frequently denominated 'the Roman Civil Law.'

The collections of Roman Civil Law, before its reformation in the 6th century of the Christian æra by the eastern emperor Justinian, were the following:—

(1) Leges Regiæ. These laws were for the most part promulgated by Romulus, Numa Pompilius, and Servius Tullius. To Romulus are ascribed the formation of a constitutional government, and the imposition of a fine, instead of death, for crimes; Numa Pompilius composed the laws relating to religion and divine worship, and abated the rigour of subsisting laws, and Servius Tullius, the sixth king, enacted many wise and good laws to maintain the cause of the poor, and to stop the oppression of the rich. He also revived many of the obsolete laws of Romulus and Numa Pompilius.

Sextus Publius, Papyrius, Pontifex Maximus, in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus, collected the royal laws, which collection is known by the name of Jus Civile Papyrianum. Legislation under the regal dynasty must have been extremely simple; very few reliques of it, however, have been preserved, and among them it is almost impossible to distinguish the genuine from the spurious. The Leges Regiæ have been edited by Lipsius, and other men of learning; and of the supposed laws of Romulus, a separate collection was published by Balduinus.

(2) Leges Decemvirales, or the Laws of the Twelve Tables. The uncertain state of the law, in the republican æra, and the uneasiness occasioned by the continued quarrels of the patricians and plebeians, rendered systematic legislation indispensable, so after great opposition on the part of the patricians, a law was proposed by Caius Terentelius Horsa (B.C. 560, A.U.C. 293), to appoint a commission to draw up a body of laws; and (in B.C. 452, A.U.C. 301), three commissioners are said to have been chosen by the patricians to visit Greece, in order to collect materials for a code; upon their return, after an absence of three years, ten commissioners, including the three, were appointed, with the title De Legibus Scribendis, whose duty it was to revise, digest, and enforce the new laws. All other magisterial offices were then suspended, and these ten commissioners, or Decemviri, became invested with the sole management of state affairs. The Ten Tables they drew up, having been approved by the senate and comitia, were engraved on metal, and suspended in the Comitium, and all parties were so well satisfied with the result of the first year's administration of the Decemviri, that it was resolved to continue the same sort of government for another year, new members were elected to sit upon this commission, the only one re-elected being Appius Claudius. In the former year the whole ten had been taken from the patrician class, but this year three of them were plebeians. The new laws drawn up by this new commission having been duly approved, and reduced to writing on two supplementary tables, made up the total number of Twelve Tables, by which name they were subsequently known, and under which they became famous. To judge from the fragments of these laws which have survived, they were very epigrammatic and positive in their nature, they formed the catechism of education for the Roman youth; indeed, all well-educated persons were expected to know them by heart. Cicero, in his book De Oratore, describes the law of the Twelve Tables as a summary of all that is excellent in the libraries of the philosophers.

The laws of the Twelve Tables were illustrated by the commentaries of several ancient lawyers, especially Antistius, Labeo, and Caius; the fragments of these laws have been collected and explained by many of the moderns, by Balduinus, Rœvardus, Marcilius, Augustinus, Gravina, Funccius, Bouchaud, Gothofredus, and others.

(3) Jus Civile Flavianum, and its subsequent edition Jus Civile Ælianum. This collection consists of the forms of pleadings, called Actiones Juris, adapted in all proceedings and acts of court. It was compiled about 446 A.U.C. or B.C. 312, by Appius Claudius Cæcus, who, being blind, was obliged to employ an amanuensis, Gaius Flavius, hence the title of the collection.

The Flavian collection being the first, was naturally imperfect; in consequence of which Sextus Ælius Pœtus, surnamed Catus, published about 553 A.U.C. or 200 B.C. a supplement to it, again promulgating the new formulæ subsequently introduced, together with an interpretation of the laws of the Twelve Tables, whence it is called Tripartita, because the first part contained the laws of the Twelve Tables; the second, their interpretation; and the third, the forms of pleadings.

(4) Edictum Perpetuum Juliani. Ofilius, in Julius Cæsar's time, made a compilation of the Prætor's Edicts, which was made perpetual by Salvius Julianus, at the command of the Emperor Adrian, many years later.

(5) The Codes of Gregorius, Hermogenius, and Theodosius the Younger.

Gregorius, or Gregorianus, appears to have collected the imperial constitutions belonging to the intermediate reigns from Adrian to Constantine the Great.

Hermogenianus, or Hermogenes, is supposed to have formed a supplementary collection, and the remaining fragments consist entirely of the constitutions of Diocletian and Maximian.

The compilations are to be esteemed as the works of two private lawyers; the fragments which Cujacius (the most celebrated of all the interpreters of the Roman law) has placed at the end of the Theodosian code are all the remains of these two productions.

The Theodosian Code collects the constitutions enacted from the time of Constantine the Great (A.D. 312) up to A.D. 438. This work is of considerable magnitude, and is still extant, it is supposed, in an imperfect state, from three hundred and twenty constitutions being found in Justinian's Code, which are sought in vain in that which remains to us of the Theodosian. It is probable that this book, having been compiled by imperial command, had the stamp of authority. There are added to it the newer constitutions of Theodosius, Valentinianus III., Marcianus, Majoranus, Severus, and Anthemius. Theodosius the Younger also made another code, divided into seventeen books, called the Theodosian code, which, however, was never completed.

This code was followed, until suppressed, by Justinian's order, and is not unworthy of the attention of the learned. The editor and expounder of the Theodosian Code is Jacobus Gothofredus, or Godefroy, who is the first and most illustrious of modern civilians. He bestowed his assiduous labor upon this code for thirty years, and left his great commentary to be completed by Antoine Marville, who published it at Lyons in 1665. It is an immense storehouse of judicial and historical knowledge. Ritter published another edition of it some seventy years afterwards.

Such were the several collections of laws before Justinian's reign; I will now speak of those made by that emperor's order, which compose the body of the Civil Law in its present state.

The Imperial, or Civil Law, as consolidated by Justinian, consists of four parts:—

(1) The Institutions, in which the elements of jurisprudence are disposed in a didactic form, its chief and leading objects are explained in a regular series, and the whole arranged in such a way as neither to oppress the student with a multitude and a variety of matter, nor yet to leave him destitute of any necessary helps to facilitate his progress in legal knowledge.

These Institutes were composed chiefly from Gaius, and especially from his Aureorum (of important matters), in order to teach the rudiments of law, and the great principles of equity, and were divided so as to form an elementary introduction to legal study. This division is in four books, each book into several titles, and every title into several parts; the first (not numbered) is called Principium, which is the beginning of the title, and those which follow paragraphs. The Institutes are quoted with the letter I. or Inst. thus, § si adversus, 12 I. De Nuptiis, is nothing more than twelve paragraphs of the title De Nuptiis, which on reference to the index, will be found to be the tenth of the first book; this is usually now cited I. i. 10, 12.

(2) The Digest or Pandects, which are rules founded on the pure spirit of jurisprudence. The words 'Digest' and 'Pandect' are not synonymous; the former means an abstract of the opinions of lawyers upon certain points of law; the latter, from πᾶν, all, and δέχομαι, to receive, signifies a compendium of the law.

Tribonian received the imperial command, De Conceptione Digestorum, A.D. 530, with directions to choose his colleagues; and seventeen were ultimately appointed with absolute power to make such use of preceding works as should appear most conducive to the object in view. Tribonian's library afforded forty of the works of the most renowned civilians, which, with above two thousand other treatises, containing three millions of lines, were abridged into a hundred and fifty thousand; the work was completed in the incredibly short space of three years, and published on the 16th December, A.D. 533, a month after the appearance of the Institutes; its publication having been delayed a month, in order that the elementary work might precede it.—1 Colqu. R. C. L. 66.

The Digest is compiled from the decisions, conjectures, questions, and disputes of the most famous lawyers who had existed up to that time; and thus the substance of many thousand treatises are compressed into one work, which superseded all the then existing Digests, and render unnecessary references which had become not only laborious, but almost impossible. The Pandects were divided into fifty books, each book containing several titles, divided into laws, and the laws generally into several parts or paragraphs.

Besides this distribution of the Digest into fifty books, it was divided into seven parts, but the reason that induced the emperor to make this division is not known; some supposed it was done in order to separate the different matters, and include all that related to one subject in one part, consisting of several books. Others attribute it to the superstitious respect of the ancients for the number seven, as the most perfect. This book is variously quoted by the letters D. P. or π, or Π, and ff, which latter is supposed to be a corruption of the D with a stroke through the middle, or perhaps a corruption of the Greek π. The most ancient method of quotation is by mentioning the initial words of the law and paragraph with those of the book or title, which necessitates a reference to the general index, with which all modern editions are not furnished; thus, § sin. ver. l. quæsitum est D. de Peculio. The second by citing the initial words and numbers of the law or paragraph with the initial words of the book or title; thus, § sin. ver. 3 l. quæsitum est 30 D. de Peculio. The third by mentioning the number of the law or §, with the initial words of the book or title; thus, § 3 l. 30 D. de Peculio, which is the method adopted by Heineccius. The modern mode, which avoids all reference to the index, is thus, D. 15, 1, 30, 3. The first paragraph is not numbered, and is usually quoted by the abbreviation in pr. (in principio), in like manner the last paragraph is sometimes quoted by the words in fin. (fine), or § ult. (paragraphus ultimus).

(3) The Code. Within six years after the publication of the code, it was suppressed as imperfect, and replaced by a new edition entitled the Codex Repetitæ Prælectionis, containing 200 of Justinian's own laws, and the 50 decisions on the most obscure and debateable points of jurisprudence. The code was divided into twelve books, each book into titles, and each title into laws, each law containing several parts. The first is called Principium, being the beginning of the law, and those which follow, paragraphs. The letter C is the invariable mark of the codex, which may be variously quoted by the initial words of the paragraph, law, book, or title. The nine first books were emphatically called the codex; the latter three (tres libri) contained the Jus Publicum, which had been separated from the whole at an early period, as of less practical utility, and often bound up with other works.

(4) The Novels, or New Constitutions, which are explanatory of the code. After Justinian's decease, some parts of his novels, to the number of 168, were collected and reduced into one volume, together with thirteen of the Greek edicts; which, together, make up the fourth and last division of the Corpus Juris Romano-Civilis. The greatest part of these novels was composed in Greek, owing to the seat of the empire being then at Constantinople, where few or none spoke Latin in perfection; notwithstanding which, some of them were published in Latin, and have been noticed by Antonius Augustinus. There are four Latin translations of the novels. The novels are quoted by their respective numbers. They are directed either to magistrates, bishops, or citizens of Constantinople, and were of equal force and authority for those private persons to whom they were addressed, and who were enjoined to have them proclaimed and to see them executed according to their form and tenor. See Whart. Art. Clerks Man. p. 2. c. ii.

By the civil law was governed the greater part of Britain, for the space of about 360 years (from Claudius to Honorius), during which period some of the greatest masters of that law, whose opinions appear collected in the body of it—as Pampinian, Paulus, and Ulpian—sate in the seat of judgment in this island. After the declension of the Roman empire, the Saxon, Danish, and Norman laws, superseded a great portion of the Roman law; but not very long afterwards, it begun again to manifest its influence, and entered largely into the composition of the common law. Under the influence of the foreign ecclesiastics who, pouring into this country after the Conquest, long monopolized the administration of the law, great encouragement was given to the adoption of the civil law; till the nobility and laity became so jealous of its prosperity, and alarmed at its progress, that a long and fierce feud ensued between the laity, stoutly struggling for the common law, and the clergy, for the civil and canon law; to which, in the end, they entirely betook themselves; and, withdrawing from the temporal courts, left them to the superintendence of the common lawyers: still, however, keeping an ecclesiastic at the head of affairs, in the high station of chancellor, who, as his office gradually increased in influence and power, was enabled, in time, to introduce much of the spirit of the civil law into the administration of municipal law, especially in the courts of equity.

'The whole body of the civil law' (remarks Chancellor Kent, 1 Comm. 548), 'will excite never-failing curiosity, and receive the homage of scholars, as a singular monument of wisdom. It fills such a large space in the eye of human reason; it regulates so many interests of man, as a social and civilised being; it embodies so much thought, reflection, experience, and labour; it leads us so far into the recesses of antiquity, and it has stood so long against the waves and weathers of time, that it is impossible, while engaged in the contemplation of the system, not to be struck with some portion of the awe and veneration which are felt in the midst of the solitudes of a majestic ruin.'

Civitas et urbs in hoc differunt, quod incolæ dicuntur civitas, urbs verò complectitur ædificia.—Co. Litt. 109.—(A city and a town differ in this, that the inhabitants are called the city, but town includes the buildings.)

Civil List, an annual sum granted by Parliament at the commencement of each reign, for the expenses of the royal household and establishment, as distinguished from the general exigencies of the state, and is the provision made for the Crown out of the taxes, in lieu of its proper patrimony, and in consideration of the assignment of that patrimony to the public use. This arrangement has prevailed from the time of the Revolution downwards, though the amount fixed for the civil list has been subject in different reigns to considerable variation. At the commencement of the present reign a civil list was settled upon her Majesty for life, to the amount of 385,000*l.* per annum, payable quarterly, out of the consolidated fund, of which the sum of 60,000*l.* is assigned for her Majesty's privy purse; in return for which grant it was provided, that the hereditary revenues of the Crown (with the exception of the hereditary duties of excise on beer, ale, and cyder, which were to be discontinued during the present reign) should, during the present Queen's life, be carried to and form part of the consolidated fund. The civil list is properly the whole of the sovereign's revenue, in her own distinct capacity; the rest being rather the revenue of the public or its creditors, though collected and distributed again in the name and by the officers of the Crown. The civil list, therefore, now stands in the same place as the hereditary income did formerly, but with this great difference, that it is not chargeable, as the hereditary income was, with the general and public expenses of government.

By the Civil List Act, passed at the Queen's accession, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 2, her Majesty is also empowered to grant pensions to the amount of 1,200*l.* per annum, chargeable on her civil list revenues, which are intended for the remuneration of those who have just claims on the royal beneficence, or by their services or discoveries have merited the gratitude of their country.

Civil obligation, one binding in law.

Civil remedy, one open to a private person, as opposed to a criminal prosecution.

Civilian, one that professes the knowledge of the old Roman law, and of general equity.

Civiliter mortuus (civilly defunct, i. e. dead in law).

Civilization, a law; an act of justice, or judgment which renders a criminal process civil; performed by turning an information into an inquest, or the contrary.—Harris.

Clades [fr. clida, cleta, cleia, fr. the Brit. clie and clia, Irish], a wattle or hurdle.—Paroch. Antiq. 575.

Claim [fr. clamer, Fr.; clamo, Lat., to call], a challenge of interest of anything which is in another's possession, or at least out of a man's own possession, as claim by charter, descent, &c.—Plow. 359, a.

Claim in Equity. In simple cases, where there was not any great conflict as to facts, and a discovery from a defendant was not sought, but a reference to chambers was nevertheless necessary before final decree, which would be as of course, all parties being before the Court, the summary proceeding by claim was sometimes adopted, thus obviating the recourse to plenary and protracted pleadings.

This summary practice was created by orders 22nd April, 1850, which came into operation on the 22nd May following.—See Sm. Ch. Pr. 644. By Consolid. Ord. 1860, viii. r. 4, claims were abolished.

Claim of Liberty, a suit or petition to the Queen in the Court of Exchequer, to have liberties and franchises confirmed there by the Attorney-General.

Clam delinquentes magis puniuntur quam palam.—8. Co. 127.—(Those sinning secretly are punished more severely than those sinning openly.)

Clamea admittenda in itinere per attornatum. An ancient writ by which the king commanded the justices in eyre to admit the claim by attorney of a person who was in the royal service, and could not appear in person.—Reg. Orig. 19.

Clandestine Mortgages. Statute of 4 & 5 Wm. & Mary, c. 16, A.D. 1692, enacted that if any person, having once mortgaged his lands for a valuable consideration, shall again mortgage the same lands or any part thereof, to any person, the former mortgage being in force, and shall not discover in writing to the second mortgagee the first mortgage, such mortgagor so again mortgaging his lands shall have no relief or equity of redemption against the second mortgagee. But this act is not to bar any widow of dower who does not legally join her husband in such second mortgage.

Clarendon (Constitutions of). At a great council held at Clarendon, a village in Wiltshire, A.D. 1164, in the tenth year of the reign of Henry II., a code of laws was brought forward by the king, under the title of the ancient customs of the realm, and known as the famous 'Constitutions of Clarendon;' and as Becket had solemnly promised he would observe what were really such, the king procured the principal propositions in dispute to be enacted, and declared by the council under that denomination. Nothing will enable us to judge so well of the pretensions of the clergy as a perusal of these constitutions. They are contained in sixteen articles, ten of which were considered by the see of Rome as so hostile to the rights of the clergy, that Pope Alexander, in full consistory, passed a solemn condemnation on them; the other six he tolerated, not as good, but less evil. These six articles were the 2nd, 6th, 11th, 13th, 14th, and 16th.

The 2nd. Churches belonging to the see of our lord the king cannot be given away in perpetuity, without the consent and grant of the king.

6th. Laymen ought not to be accused, unless by certain legal accusers and witnesses, in presence of the bishop, so that the archdeacon may not lose his right, nor anything which should thereby accrue to him; and if the offending persons be such as none will or dare accuse them, the sheriff, being thereto required by the bishop, shall swear twelve lawful men of the vicinage or town before the bishop, to declare the truth, according to their conscience.

11th. Archbishops, bishops, and all dignified clergymen (universæ personæ), who hold of the king in chief, have their possessions from the king as a barony, and answer thereupon to the king's justices and officers, and follow and perform all royal customs and rights, and, like other barons, ought to be present at the trials of the king's court, with the barons, till the judgment proceeds to loss of members or death.

13th. If any nobleman of the realm shall forcibly resist the archbishop, bishop, or archdeacon, in doing justice upon him or his, the king ought to bring him to justice, that he may make satisfaction to our lord the king.

14th. The chattels of those who are under forfeiture to the king ought not to be detained in any church or church-yard against the king's justice, because they belong to the king, whether they are found within churches or without.

16th. The sons of villains ought not to be ordained without the consent of their lords, in whose lands they are known to have been born.

Thus was the pope pleased to tolerate such of these articles as either did not at all affect the clerical state, or rather contributed to aid and support it; and were thrown in, probably, to qualify and temper those which were evidently hostile to the ecclesiastical sovereignty. The ten which were condemned by the pope were as follow:—

The 1st. If any dispute shall arise concerning the advowson and presentation of churches between laymen, or between ecclesiastics and laymen, or between ecclesiastics, let it be tried and determined in the court of our lord the king.

3rd. Ecclesiastics charged and accused of any matter, and being summoned by the king's justice, shall come into his court to answer there concerning that which it shall appear to the king's court is cognizable there; and shall answer in the ecclesiastical court concerning that which it shall appear is cognizable there; so that the king's justice shall send to the court of holy church, to see in what manner the cause shall be tried there; and if an ecclesiastic shall be convicted, or confess his crime, the church ought not any longer to give him protection.

4th. It is unlawful for archbishops, bishops, or any dignified clergymen of the realm, to go out of the realm without the king's license; and, if they go, they shall, if it so please the king, give security that they will not, either in going, staying, or returning, procure any evil or damage to the king or kingdom.

5th. Persons excommunicated ought not to give any security by way of deposit, nor take any oath, but only find gage and pledge to stand to the judgment of the church, in order to absolution.

7th. No tenant in capite of the king, nor any of the officers of his household, or of his demesne, shall be excommunicated; nor shall the lands of any of them be put under an interdict, unless application shall first have been made to our lord the king, if he be in the kingdom, and if not, to his justice, that he may do right concerning such person; and in such manner as that which shall belong to the king's court shall be there determined; and what shall belong to the ecclesiastical court shall be sent thither to be there determined.

8th. Concerning appeals, if any shall arise, they ought to proceed from the archdeacon to the bishop, and from the bishop to the archbishop; and if the archbishop shall fail in doing justice, the cause shall at last be brought to our lord the king, that, by his precept, the dispute may be determined in the archbishop's court, so that it ought not to proceed any further without the king's consent.

9th. If there shall arise any dispute between an ecclesiastic and a layman, or between a layman and an ecclesiastic about any tenement which the ecclesiastic pretends to hold in eleemosynâ, and the layman pretends to be a lay fee, it shall be determined by the judgment of the king's chief justice, upon a recognition of twelve lawful men, utrùm tenementum sit pertinens ad eleemosynam, sive ad fœdum laicum. And if it be found to be in eleemosynâ, then it shall be pleaded in the ecclesiastical court; but if a lay-fee, then in the king's court, unless both parties claim to hold of the same bishop or baron; and if they do, the plea shall be in his court; provided that, by such recognition, the party who was first seised shall not lose his seisin till the plea has been finally determined.

10th. Whosoever is of any city, or castle, or borough, or demesne manor of our lord the king, if he shall be cited by the archdeacon or bishop for any offence, and shall refuse to answer to such citation, may be put under an interdict; but he ought not to be excommunicated till the king's chief officer of the town be applied to, that he may, by due course of law, compel him to answer accordingly; and if the king's officer shall fail therein, such officer shall be in misericordiâ regis; and then the bishop may compel the person accused by ecclesiastical justice.

12th. Pleas of debt, quæ fide interpositâ debentur, vel absque interpositione fidei, whether due by faith solemnly pledged, or without faith so pledged, belong to the king's judicature.

15th. When an archbishopric, or bishopric, or abbey, or priory of royal foundation, shall be vacant, it ought to be in the hands of the king, and he shall receive all the rents and issues thereof as of his demesne. And when such church is to be filled, the king ought to send for the principal clergy thereof, and the election ought to be made in the king's chapel, with the king's assent, and the advice of such of the prelates of the kingdom as he shall call for that purpose; and the person elect shall there do homage and fealty to the king as his liege lord, of life, limb, and worldly honour (saving his order) before he be consecrated.

These constitutions were calculated to give a rational limitation to the secular and ecclesiastical judicature; and furnished a basis on which these separate jurisdictions might have been founded, without any inconvenience to the nation, or diminution of the temporal authority; and they were with that view confirmed, A.D. 1176, at a council held at Northampton. But the king, overcome with shame for the murder of Becket, with which he was charged, and struck with a panic of superstition, gave way to the torrent, and endeavoured to reconcile himself to the holy see by an ample concurrence with all its demands; at least he desisted from executing those laws for which he had so many years been contending. It appears, moreover, from a letter which he sent to the pope by the hand of Hugo Petrileo, the legate, that notwithstanding the opposition of the greatest and wisest men in the kingdom, he had, at the intercession of the legate, and out of reverence and devotion to the see of Rome, made the following concessions:—That no clerk should for the future be brought personally before a secular judge for any crime or transgression whatsoever, except only for offences against the forest-laws, or in case of a lay-fee for which lay service was due to the king, or to some other secular person. He promised that any person convicted, or making confession before his justice, in the presence of the bishop, or his official, of having knowingly and premeditately killed a clerk, should besides the usual punishment for killing a layman, forfeit all his land of inheritance for ever. He also promised that clerks should not be compelled to submit to the trial by duel; and moreover he promised not to retain in his hands vacant bishoprics, or abbeys, beyond the term of one year, unless from urgent necessity, and evident cause of delay, not falsely pretended. It is said that Henry, by charter, granted to the clergy the cognizance of causes matrimonial; but neither this nor any of the foregoing concessions were enacted by authority of parliament, during any part of this king's reign; nor did he himself observe them, except in not compelling criminal clerks to appear before a lay judge as before stipulated, and in exempting them in all cases from the trial by duel. The statutes of Clarendon concerning ecclesiastical matters subsisted unrepealed and confirmed, but were suspended in part by a temporary connivance of the executive power.—1 Reeves's Hist. c. ii. 75–80; Hale's Hist. pp. 7 & 164, note (b).

Classiarius [fr. classis, Lat.], a seaman or soldier serving at sea.

Claud [Brit.], a ditch; claudere, to enclose, or turn open fields into enclosures.—Paroch. Antiq. 236.

Clausula generalis non refertur ad expressa. 8 Co. 154.—(A general clause does not refer to things expressed.)

Clausula quæ abrogationem excludit ab initio non valet.—Bac. Max. Reg. 19.—A clause w ich excludes abrogation avails not from the beginning.)—2 Dwar. Stats. 673.

Clausula vel dispositio inutilis per præsumptionem remotam vel causam ex post facto non fulcitur.—Bac. Max. Reg. 21.—(An invalid clause or disposition is not rendered valid by a remote presumption or a cause arising after the event.)

Lord Bacon explains clausula vel dispositio inutilis, when the acts or the words work or express no more than the law by intendment would have supplied; and such a clause or disposition is not supported by any subsequent matter which might give effect to the particular words or acts.

Clausulæ inconsuetæ semper inducunt suspicionem.—3 Co. 81.—(Unusual clauses always excite suspicion.)

Claves insulæ, the keys of the island of Man, or twelve persons to whom all ambiguous and weighty causes are referred.

Clavia, a club or mace.

Clavigeratus, a treasurer of a church.—Mon. Angl. t. 1. p. 184.

Clause irritant, any provision which makes a penalty incurred, and the obligation to be null for the future; or which upon any other account, makes the right to vacate or resolve.—Scotch Law.

Clause resolutive, a provision whereby the contract to which it is affixed is, for non-performance, declared to have been null from the beginning.—Ibid.

Clause rolls [rotuli clausi, Lat.], contain all such matters of record as were committed to close writs; these rolls are preserved in the Tower. See CLOSE ROLLS.

Clausum fregit (he broke the close). See CLOSE.

Clausum paschiæ, the morrow of the utas, or eight days of Easter; the end of Easter; the Sunday after Easter-day.—2 Inst. 157.

Clausura heyæ, an enclosure of a hedge.

Clawa, a close or small measure of land.—Mon. Ang. t. 2, p. 250.

Clear, in asserting an estate to be of any given 'clear' yearly rent, the parties should attend to the meaning of the word 'clear' in an agreement between buyer and seller, which is free of all outgoings, incumbrances, and extraordinary charges not according to the custom of the country, as tithes, poor-rates, church-rates, &c., as these are natural charges on the tenant, but subject nevertheless to the land-tax and all other outgoings which, according to such custom, ought to be borne by the landlord.—St. Leonards, V. & P. 22.

Clearance, a certificate that a ship has been examined and cleared at the custom-house.

Clear days. If a certain number of clear days be given for the doing of any act, the time is to be reckoned exclusively as well of the first day as the last.

Clearing, among London bankers, a method adopted by them for exchanging the drafts of each other's houses, and settling the difference. Daily at half-past three o'clock a clerk from each banker attends at the clearing-house, bringing all the drafts on the other bankers which have been paid into his house during that day, and deposits them in their proper drawers (a drawer being allotted to each banker); he then credits their accounts separately with the drafts which they have against him, as found in the drawer. Balances are then struck from all the accounts, and the claims transferred from one to another, until they are so wound up and cancelled that each clerk has only to settle with two or three others, and the balances are immediately paid.—Gilbart's Prac. Treat. on Banking, 16–20; Tate's Modern Cambist.

Clearing-house, the place where the operation termed clearing is carried on, situated in a corner of Post Office Court at the back of the Guardian Insurance Office, in Lombard Street.—2 Mill's Pol. Eco. 48.

Clementines, the collection of decretals or constitutions of Pope Clement V. made by order of John XXII. his successor, who published it in 1317.

Clergy [fr. clergé, Fr.; clerus, Lat.; κλῆρος, Gk.], the assembly or body of clerks or ecclesiastics set apart from the rest of the people or laity, in order to superintend the public worship of Almighty God, and the other ceremonies of religion, and to administer spiritual counsel and instruction.

The clergy, in general, were heretofore divided into (1) regular, which lived under certain rules, being of some religious order, and were called men of religion, or the religious; such as abbots, priors, monks, &c.; and (2) secular, that did not live under any certain rules of the religious orders, as bishops, deans, parsons, &c. Now, the term comprehends all persons in holy orders, and in ecclesiastical offices, viz. archbishops, bishops, deans and chapters, archdeacons, rural deans, parsons (either rectors or vicars), and curates, to which may be added parish clerks.—3 Step. Com. 2.

Clerical error, a mistake in copying.

Clerico infra sacros ordines constituto, non eligendo in officium, a writ directed to those who have thrust a bailiwick or other office upon one in holy orders, charging them to release him.—Reg. Orig. 143.

Clerico capto per statutum mercatorum, &c., a writ for the delivery of a clerk out of prison, who is taken and incarcerated upon the breach of a statute-merchant.—Ibid. 147.

Clerico convicto commisso gaolæ in defectu ordinarii deliberando, an ancient writ, that lay for the delivery to his ordinary, of a clerk convicted of felony, where the ordinary did not challenge him, according to the privilege of clerks.—Ibid. 69.

Clericum admittendum, a writ of execution directed not to the sheriff, but to the bishop or archbishop, and requiring him to admit and institute the clerk of the plaintiff.—3 Bl. Com. 413.

Clericus et agricola et mercator, tempore belli, ut oretque, colat, commutet, pace fruuntur.—2 Inst. 58.—(Clergymen, husbandmen, and merchants, in order that they may preach, cultivate, and trade, enjoy peace in time of war.)

Clericus non connumeretur in duabus ecclesiis.—1 Rol. R.—(A clergyman should not be appointed to two churches.)

Clerici non ponantur in officiis.—Co. Litt. 96. (Clergymen should not be placed in offices.)

Clerici, vel monachi, ne sæcularibus negotiis se immisceant.—Ferrier's Rom. Hist. 117.—(Clergymen or monks should not mix themselves in secular matters.)

Clerk [fr. cleric, Sax.; clericus, Lat.], originally a learned man or man of letters, whence the term is appropriated to churchmen, who were called clerks and now clergymen; the nobility and gentry being bred to the exercise of arms, and none left to cultivate the sciences but ecclesiastics. Where the canon law has full power, the word 'clerk' comprehends sacerdotes, diaconi, subdiaconi, lectores, acolyti, exorcistæ, and ostiarii. The word has been anciently used for a secular priest, in opposition to a religious or a regular.

In modern usage, the word means a writer, one who is employed in the use of the pen, in an office, public or private, either for keeping accounts or entering minutes. It is synonymous with secretary, but not always. A clerk is generally an officer subordinate to a higher officer, board, corporation, or private individual; but a secretary may either be a subordinate officer, or the head of a department.—Blount. There are numerous officers in the public departments called clerks, which it is impossible to specify.

Clerk of Affidavits in Chancery. The office was abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 27.

Clerk of the Custodies, of lunatics and idiots, the office of, abolished. See 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 111; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 84; and 5 & 6 Vict. c. 84, s. 10.

Clerk of Reports in Chancery, abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 27.

Clerk of the House of Commons, an officer of great trust and importance. He, with two assistants, sits at the upper end of the table. The Crown appoints him by letters patent, and when necessary he can appoint a deputy. The appointment of the other clerks in the service of the house is vested in him. It is his duty to make minutes, not of the arguments held in the house, but of the decisions at which it arrives; in other words to record its votes, resolutions, addresses, orders, reports, divisions, and all other proceedings in which it may be engaged; to see that they are correctly printed and distributed to the members, to read aloud all such documents as the house may order to be read, to perform the duty (without taking the chair) of president or moderator during the choice of a Speaker, putting a question and directing a division in the same manner as a chairman would.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

Clerk of Warrants in Common Pleas, for registering deeds in Middlesex. See 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 30, s. 28.

Clerks of Assize, officers who officiate as associates on the circuits.

Clerks of the Enrolments in Chancery. Their offices and those of their deputies are abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 103.

Clerks of Records and Writs. Three officers in Chancery appointed under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 103. See their duties, Smi. Ch. Pr. 28.

Client [fr. cliens, Lat., said to contain the same element as the verb clueo, to hear or obey, and is accordingly compared by Niebuhr with the German word hoeriger, a dependent], a person who seeks advice of a lawyer or commits his cause to the management of one, either in prosecuting a claim, or defending a suit in a court of justice. The relation between solicitor and client, and the power which his situation gives the former over the latter, makes it impossible to be perfectly assured whether in their transactions, the client is a free agent or under influence and imposition; a court of equity, therefore, will not let a solicitor take a security from his client, pending a suit by way of gratuity, however reasonable it might be; and equity will not allow a solicitor to make a purchase from his client whilst the relation subsists.

Among the Romans, nearly all citizens were comprehended in two classes, patron and client. Their relative rights and duties were as follows:—The patron was the legal adviser of the client; he was the client's guardian and protector, as he was the guardian and protector of his own children; he maintained the client's suit when he was wronged, and defended him when another complained of being wronged by him; in a word, the patron was the guardian of the client's interests both public and private. The client contributed to the marriage portion of the patron's daughter, if the patron were poor; and to his ransom, or that of his children, if taken prisoners; he paid the costs and damages of a suit which the patron lost, and of any penalty in which he was condemned; he bore a part of the patron's expenses incurred by his discharging public duties, or filling the honorable places in the state. Neither party could accuse the other or bear testimony against the other, or give his vote against the other. This relationship between patron and client subsisted for many generations, and resembled in all respects a relationship by blood. It was the glory of illustrious families to have many clients, and to add to the number transmitted to them by their ancestors. But the clients were not limited to the δημοτικοί; the colonies and states connected with Rome by alliance and friendship, and the conquered states, had their patrons at Rome, and the senate frequently referred the disputes between such states to their patrons and abided by their decision.

In the Greek writers on Roman history, patronus is represented by προστάτης, and cliens by πελάτης. The early Romans threw a sanctity around this obligation on the patron's part. It was expressly enforced by a law of the Twelve Tables, patronus, si clienti fraudem fecerit, sacer esto. Virgil, many ages after, places the unjust patron in Tartarus, among the violators of natural and moral decorum: hìc quibus invisi fratres, pulsatusve parens, et fraus innexa clienti, Æ. vi. 608. This state of mutual dependence, which commenced with the monarchy, was productive of the happiest effects; till, as riches and pride increased, new duties were imposed on the clients; they were harassed with constant attendance, and mortified by neglect; in a word, they were little better than slaves.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Cloere [fr. cloaca, Lat.], a prison or dungeon.

Close, a field or piece of land parted off from other fields or common land by banks, hedges, &c. Every entry upon another's lands (unless by the owner's leave, or in some very particular cases) is an injury or wrong, for satisfaction of which an action of trespass will lie to recover such damages as a jury may think proper to assess, and this injury is called trespass quare clausum fregit, or trespass for breaking a man's close.

Close rolls, and Close writs, royal letters, under the Great Seal, addressed to particular persons for particular purposes, which, because they are not intended for public inspection, are closed and sealed, and recorded in the close rolls; hence their name.—2 Bl. Com. 346.

Closing evidence in Chancery. The evidence of both sides must be completed and closed within eight weeks from issue joined.—Consol. Ord. 1860 xxxvii. r.15; Smi. Ch. Pr. 384. It superseded publication.

Clough, a valley.—Domesday. Also an allowance of two lbs. in every cwt. for the turn of the scale, on buying goods wholesale by weight.—Lex Mercat.

Club-law, regulation by force; the law of arms.

Clubs, or Club-houses, associations to which individuals subscribe for purposes of mutual entertainment and convenience; the affairs of which are generally conducted by a steward or secretary, who acts under the immediate superintendence of a committee. The members of a club, merely as such, are not liable for debts incurred by the committee, for work done or goods supplied to the club.

Clypeus, a shield; metaphorically one of a noble family. Clypei prostrati, a noble family extinct.—Mat. Paris, 463.

Co, a prefix, meaning one of several; also an abbreviation for Company or County.

Coadjutor, an assistant, helper, or ally; particularly a person appointed to assist a bishop, who from age or infirmity is unable to perform his duty.—52 Geo. III. c. 62; 1 Gibs. Cod. 155. As to the distinction between an executor and a coadjutor, see 1 Wm. Exs. 212.

Coal-note, a particular description of promissory note in the coal trade, for which there are some peculiar provisions, it having been enacted that all lightermen and other buyers or contractors of coal aboard ship, in the port of London, shall, at the time of delivery of such coals, either pay for the same in ready money, or give their promissory note for payment, expressing therein the words 'value received in coals,' and that such notes may be protested and noted as inland bills; and that in default of such protest or noting, and notice thereof given to the endorsers within twenty days after non-payment, they shall be discharged from liability; and it is enacted, that such buyer of coals, and the master of the vessel, shall, for refusing to insert the words 'value received in coals,' or receiving a note for coals without those words, forfeit 100*l.*—3 Geo. II. c. 26, ss. 7, 8. Upon this act it has been decided, that it extends only to contractors for coals, and to cases between an indorser and indorsee; and that though the act directs that the instrument shall be drawn in a particular form, under a severe penalty, yet, if drawn in a different form, it is not void, and that the effect of the act is only to subject a party to a penalty.

Coast-guard. See 19 & 20 Vict. c. 83.

Coasting trade. See 12 & 13 Vict. c. 29; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 5; and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 96.

Coat-armour, heraldic ensigns, introduced by Richard I. from the Holy Land, where they were first invented. Originally they were painted on the shields of the Christian knights, who went to the Holy Land during the Crusades, for the purpose of identifying them, some such contrivance being necessary in order to distinguish knights when clad in armour from one another. See CHIVALRY, COURT OF.

Cocherings, or Cosherings, Irish exactions, or tributes, now reduced to chief rents. See BONAUGHT.

Cock-fighting, a criminal offence.—12 & 13 Vict. c. 92; and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60.

Cocket, a seal belonging to the custom-house, or rather a scroll of parchment, sealed and delivered by the officers of the custom-house to merchants, as a warrant that their merchandizes are entered; likewise a sort of measure.—Fleta, l. 2, c. ix.

Cock-pit, a name familiarly given to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the council-room being built on the old cock-pit of Whitehall Palace.

Cocksetus, a boatman, cockswain; contracted into coxen.—Cowel.

Code, a collection or system of laws. The collection of laws and constitutions, made by order of the Emperor Justinian, is distinguished by the appellation of 'The Code,' by way of eminence. See CODEX JUSTINIANEUS. The Code Napoleon, or civil code of France, proceeding from the French revolution, and the administration of Napoleon, while First Consul, effected great changes in the laws of that country. In 1800 Bonaparte directed a commission of jurists of the first eminence in France, under the presidency of Cambacérès, to frame a code of laws for the kingdom. The commission consisted of Tronchet, president of the Court of Cassation, Bigot de Préameneu, Portalis, and Malleville. The first code which was framed, and of which a projet was printed early in 1801, was sent to the different courts of justice for their remarks and suggestions. The remarks and suggestions were also printed, and the whole was then laid before the section of legislation of the Council of State, consisting of Boulay, Berlier, Emmery, Portalis, Rœdérer Réal, and Thibaudeau. Bonaparte and Cambacérès, his colleague in the consulship, took an active part in the debate. The various heads of the code were successively discussed, and then laid before the tribunate, where some of the provisions met with considerable opposition. At length the code passed both the tribunal and the legislative body, and was promulgated in 1804, as the 'Code Civil des Français.' When Napoleon became emperor, the name was changed to that of Code Napoleon, by which it is still often designated, though it is now styled by its original name of Code Civil. A Code de Procédure Civile, a Code de Commerce, Code d'Instruction Criminelle, and Code Pénal, were afterwards compiled and promulgated under Bonaparte's administration. To these was subsequently added a Code Forestier, or regulations concerning the forests, which was promulgated under Charles X. in 1827. All these codes are sometimes called 'Les six Codes.' A Code de la Conscription, and a Code Militaire, were also promulgated under Napoleon. All these codes under his administration are sometimes confusedly designated by the name of the Code Napoleon.—Life of Napoleon, by Vieusseux; Savigny; Von Beruf unsrer Zeit zur Gesetzgebung und Rechtswissenchaft; Meyer's Esprit des Institutions Judiciaires.

Codex, a roll or volume.

Codex Gregorianus, and Hermogenianus. It does not appear quite certain whether this title denotes one or two collections. The general opinion, however, is, that there were two codices, compiled respectively by Gregorianus and Hermogenianus, who are sometimes, though, as it seems, incorrectly, called Gregorius and Hermogenes. The codex of Gregorianus consisted of thirteen books at least, which were divided into titles. The fragments of this codex begin with constitutions of Septimus Severus, and end with Diocletian and Maximian. The codex of Hermogenianus, so far as we know of it, is only quoted by titles, and it also contains constitutions of Diocletian and Maximian; it may perhaps have consisted of one book only, and it may have been a kind of supplement or continuation to, or an abridgment of, the other. The name Hermogenianus is always placed after that of Gregorianus when this code is quoted.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq. · See CIVIL LAW.

Codex Justinianeus. In February of the year A.D. 528, Justinian appointed a commission, consisting of ten persons, to make a new collection of imperial constitutions. Among these ten were Tribonianus, who was afterwards employed on the Digesta and the Institutiones, and Theophilus, a teacher of law at Constantinople. The commission was directed to compile one code from those of Gregorianus, Hermogenianus, and Theodosius, and also from the constitutions of Theodosius made subsequently to his code from those of his successors, and from the constitutions of Justinian himself. The instructions given to the commissioners empowered them to omit unnecessary preambles, repetitions, contradictions, and obsolete matter; to express the laws to be derived from the sources above mentioned in brief language, and to place them under appropriate titles; to add to, take from, or vary the words of the old constitutions, when it might be necessary; but to retain the order of time in the several constitutions, by preserving the dates and the consuls' names, and also by arranging them under their several titles in the order of time. The collection was to include rescripts and edicts, as well as constitutiones, properly so called. Fourteen months after the date of the commission, the code was completed, and declared to be law, under the title of the Justinianeus Codex; and it was declared that the sources from which this code was derived were no longer to have any binding force, and that the new code alone should be referred to as of legal authority.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

The Code was divided into twelve books, each book into titles, and each title into laws, each law containing several parts. The first is called Principium, being the beginning of the law, and those which follow, paragraphs, so that the part next to the beginning is the first paragraph: a Greek term, signifying a part of a section of a law that contains one article, the sense whereof is complete.

The first book of the Code treats of the Catholic faith, churches, bishops, ecclesiastical persons, heretics, Jews, pagans, church privilege; then of laws and their different kinds, and lastly, of magistrates.

The second book explains the forms to be observed in commencing a suit; then it treats of restitutions; and after that of compromises; sureties that are to be given, and the oath of calumny.

The third book speaks of those who may stand in judgment of contestatio litis in a cause; of holydays; of the jurisdiction wherein we are to pursue our rights; after which it treats of undutiful testaments, undutiful donations, and dowries; of the demand of inheritance; of the real actions of services; of the law aquila; of mixed actions; of actions for crimes done by slaves; of the action ad exhibendum; of gaming; of burying-places, and funeral expenses.

The fourth book begins with the explanation of personal actions, arising out of loans and other causes; after which it speaks of obligations and actions, which have their effect in relation to heirs and other persons bound by them; then it speaks of testimonial or written evidence; of things borrowed for the use of the contract by pledge; and the personal action thereon founded on the senatus consulta macedonianum, and velleinum; of compensation; usury; deposits; mandate; partnership; buying and selling; permutation; hiring and mortgages.

The fifth book treats of espousals; donations in contemplation of marriage; then of marriages; women's portions; of the action for the recovery of the dowry; of the donations made between married persons; of estates given in dowry; of alimony due from fathers to their children, and from children to their fathers; of concubines; of natural children, and the ways of making them legitimate; after which it treats of testamentary, legal, or dative tutorships; of those who have a power to appoint or be appointed tutors; of the administration of tutors; and the action arising thereon against them and their heirs and bondmen; then it shows after what manner the office of a tutor ceases; and lastly, it speaks of the alienation of minors' estates.

The sixth book first treats of slaves and theft by freemen, of the rights their patrons have over them and their goods; then it explains at large the prætorian possession called bonorum possessio; after which it explains the whole question of testaments, e. g. institutions and substitutions, preteritions and disinherisons, the right of deliberate refusal of an inheritance, the opening of wills, of codicils, of legacies, and fiduciary bequests; and lastly, of successions to intestate estates.

The seventh book begins with manumissions; after which it treats of matters relating to prescriptions; and then of sentences and appeals of the session; of estates or goods; of the seizure of the debtor's goods and sale thereof; and lastly, of the privileges of the exchequer, those of dowries; and the revocation of goods alienated to defraud creditors.

The eighth book begins with possessory judgment in law, called injunctions; then of pledges and pawns; of stipulations, novations, and delegations; of payments, acceptilations, and evictions; after which it treats of paternal power, emancipations of children, and their ingratitude; it explains the jus postliminii; what is meant by custom or unwritten law; donations, their different kinds and their revocation; and lastly, of abrogations, and the penalty on celibacy.

The ninth book treats of criminal judgments and the punishment of crimes. The first title explains what relates to accusations, public or private; prisons; how the accusation drops by the death of the accuser or accused. The following titles speak of criminal judgments, which are treasons, adulteries, and other unlawful copulations, public and private violence, rape, homicide; and under this last head of the correction of slaves. The rest of the crimes which are under criminal judgments and are explained in this book are parricide; malificium, which comprehends poisoning, sacrilege, jugglery, sorcery, and witchcraft, the robbing of sepulchres, and forging certificates and wills, extortion, cheating the public, sacrilege, and raising sedition and tumult. Afterwards this book treats of judgments commenced for private offences, such as stealing, or abstracting anything out of another man's inheritance before administration be taken, rapine, cozenage, called crimen-stellionatus, injury, and some others; then it speaks of abolition of accusations proceeding either from the accuser or the accused; and lastly explains punishment, under which is comprised the confiscation of goods.

The tenth book treats of the rights and prerogative of the exchequer; of unclaimed property, and how the same may be incorporated into the prince's domain; of those by whose means such unclaimed property is discovered; after which it speaks of treasurer's tributes levied upon the people; tolls; super-impositions; magistrates called decuriones, and matters relating to them; of the freedom of citizens, of the inhabitants of cities, of the domicile or place of abode of public officers, and the causes which exempt persons from bearing them; of ambassadors; of the different kinds of public offices, and functions of officers, and of those who were entrusted with civil government and the reformation of manners.

The last two books treat of the rights common to municipal towns with the city of Rome, which were four in number.

The rights of bodies corporate and communities;

The rights of the public; or censor's registers;

The rights of dignities and the military;

The rights of magistrates to execute judgment;

Of these the first two are set forth in the eleventh, and two last in the twelfth book.

Irnerius (the founder of the celebrated law-school of Bologna in the 12th century), it would appear, first possessed the first nine books of the Codex only, the latter three, which contained the jus publicum, had been separated from the whole at an early period, as of less practical utility, and often bound up with other works. These three latter books are termed the Tres Libri, while the nine first were emphatically called the Codex.

Within six years after the publication of the Code, it was suppressed as imperfect, and replaced by a new edition entitled the Codex Repetitæ Prælectionis, containing 200 of Justinian's own laws, and the 50 decisions on the most obscure and debateable points of Jurisprudence.

They had the force of law given them by the emperor's constitution placed at the head of the work by way of preface.

The letter C is invariably the mark of the Codex, which may be variously quoted by the initial words of the paragraph, law, book, or title, thus: § ad fil. l. Meminimus, C. De Jur. Fisc. or Quando et quibus.

By the initial words and numbers of the paragraphs and law, and the initial words of the book and title, thus: § ad fil. 1, l. Meminimus 2, C. De Jur. Fisc. or Quando et quibus.

By the number of the law and paragraph, with the initial words of the book or title, thus: § 1, l. 2, De Jur. Fisc. or Quando et quibus.

The modern method adopts simply numbers, thus: C. 10, 32. 2 l. Pr. stands for the Principium, or first paragraph not numbered, and in fin. or fine for the latter part of the lex.—1 Colqu. R. C. L. 58–60. See Civil Law.

Codex Theodosianus. In the year 429, Theodosius II. commonly called Theodosius the Younger, appointed a commission consisting of eight persons, to form into a code all the edicta and leges generales from the time of Constantine, and according to the model of those of Gregorianus and Hermogenianus. In 435, the instructions were renewed or repeated; but the commissioners were now sixteen in number, Antiochus was at the head of both commissions. It seems, however, to have been originally the design of the emperor, not only to make a code which should be supplementary to, and a continuation of, the Codex Gregorianus and Hermogenianus, but also to complete a work on Roman law from the classical jurists, and the constitutions prior to those of Constantine. However this may be, the first commission did not accomplish this, and what we have now is the code which was compiled by the second commission. This code was completed and promulgated as law in the Eastern empire in 438, and declared to be the substitute for all the constitutions made since the time of Constantine. In the same year the code was forwarded to Valentinian III., the son-in-law of Theodosius, by whom it was laid before the Roman senate, and confirmed as law in the Western empire.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Codicil [fr. codicillus, Lat., a little book, tablet, or writing], a supplement to a will, containing anything which the testator wishes to add, or any explanation or revocation of what the will contains.—See Irving's Civil Law, 4.

Co-emptio, the solemn sale of a wife to a husband.—Civil Law.

Co-emption, the act of purchasing the whole quantity of any commodity.

Cofferer of the queen's household, a principal officer of the royal establishment, next under the controller, who, in the counting-house and elsewhere, has a special charge and oversight of the other officers, whose wages he pays. He passes his accounts in the Exchequer.—39 Eliz. c. 7.

Cogitationis pœnam nemo meretur.—2 Inst. Jur. Civ. 658.—(No man deserves punishment for a thought.)

Cognati, relations by the mother's side, i. e. derived per fœminei sexus personas. A cognate is related by conception; thus, my mother, grandmother, daughter's children, and maternal uncle and aunt, are cognate to me.

Cognatione. See Cosenage.

Cognisor, and Cognisee, the former is he who passed or acknowledged a fine of lands or tenements to another; the latter is the person to whom the fine of the said lands, &c., was acknowledged.—32 Hen. VIII. c. 5.

Cognition, the process whereby molestation is determined.—Scotch Term.

Cognitiones, ensigns and arms of a military coat painted with arms.—Mat. Par. 1250.

Cognitionibus mittendis, an abolished writ to one of the Justices of the Common Pleas, or other, who has power to take a fine, who having taken the fine defers to certify it, commanding him to certify it.—Reg. Orig. 68.

Cognomen majorum est ex sanguine tractum, hoc intrinsecum est; agnomem extrinsecum ab eventu.—6 Co. 65.—(The cognomen is derived from the blood of ancestors, and is intrinsic; an agnomen arises from an event, and is extrinsic.)

Cognitor, a person appointed by one of the parties to a suit to conduct it for him.—Civil Law.

Cognizance, or Conusance, the hearing of a thing judicially; also an acknowledgment of a fine; and in replevin it is the pleading of a defendant who has acted as bailiff, &c., to another, in making a distress, by which he alleges the right or title to be in that person by whose command he acted.—Step. Plead. 225. Cognizance of pleas is a privilege granted by the Crown to a city or town, to hold pleas of all contracts, &c., within the liberty of the franchise; and when a person is impleaded for such matters in the courts of Westminster, the mayor, &c., of such franchise may ask cognisance of the plea, and demand that it shall be determined before them; but if the courts at Westminster are possessed of the plea before cognisance be demanded, it is then too late.—Termes de la Ley.

Cognovit actionem (he has confessed the action). A defendant's written confession of an action brought against him, to which he has no available defence. It is usually upon condition that he shall be allowed a certain time for the payment of the debt or damages, and costs. It is supposed to be given in court, and it impliedly authorizes the plaintiff's attorney to do everything necessary in order to obtain judgment. The cognovit should be given after declaration, as required by 1 Wm. IV. c. 7, s. 7, in order not to be affected by the Bankrupt Laws; if it be given after plea pleaded, it contains an agreement to withdraw the plea, in which case it is termed a cognovit actionem relictâ verificatione (he has confessed the action, having abandoned the plea). A mere cognovit does not require any stamp, but if it contain any terms of agreement, the subject matter of which is of the value of 5*l.* or upwards, as if it be conditional for the payment of a debt amounting to 5*l.* by instalments and implies an agreement to wait accordingly, it must be stamped as an agreement, and it may be stamped, like other agreements not under seal, within fourteen days after it is executed, without payment of any penalty. By 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 9, no cognovit given by any person shall be of any force, unless there shall be present some attorney of one of the superior courts on behalf of such person, expressly named as attorney at his request, to inform him of the nature and effect thereof before it is executed, which attorney shall subscribe his name as a witness to the due execution thereof, and thereby declare himself to be attorney for the person executing the same, and state that he subscribes as such attorney. Sec. 10 enacts that if not executed in this manner, it shall not be rendered valid by proof that the person executing the same did, in fact, understand the nature and effect thereof, and was fully informed of the same. The 3 Geo. IV. c. 39, s. 3, enacts that every cognovit given in the Court of Queen's Bench, or a true copy thereof, if given in any other court, shall, together with an affidavit of the time of the execution thereof, be filed as therein directed, within twenty-one days after execution, otherwise the same shall be void against the assignees, if the defendant become bankrupt. The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 66, provides that in addition to the book directed to be kept by the 3 Geo. IV. c. 39, and which might be inspected for 6*d.*, another book or index shall be kept, containing the names, additions, and descriptions of the respective defendants or persons giving any cognovit, but containing no further particulars thereof, which book might be inspected by any person on payment of 1*s.* in addition to the aforesaid 6*d.* This statute was passed to prevent frauds on creditors by a secret cognovit.—See 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 136; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 898.

Cohæredes unâ personâ censentur, propter unitatem juris quod habent.—Co. Litt. 163.—(Coheirs are deemed as one person, on account of the unity of right which they possess.)

Coheir, one of several to whom an inheritance descends.

Coheiress, a woman who has an equal share of an inheritance with other women.

Cohuagium, a tribute made by those who meet promiscuously in a market or fair.—Du Cange.

Coif [fr. coiffe, Fr.; caffia, It..; σκουφια, Gk.; apparently from kufiyah, Arab., a head kerchief], the badge of serjeants-at-law, who are called serjeants of the coif, from the lawn patch or coif they wear on their heads under their caps when they are created serjeants.

Coigne, horse-meat, man's meat and money at pleasure.—Irish Term.

Coin [fr. coign, Fr.; cuneus, Lat., a wedge], a piece of metal stamped with certain marks, and made current at a certain value. Strictly speaking, coin differs from money, as the species differs from the genus. Money is any matter, whether metal, paper, beads, shells, &c., which have currency as a medium in commerce. Coin is a particular species, always made of metal, and struck according to a certain process called coining. The coining of money is in all States the prerogative of the sovereign power; and, as money is the medium of commerce, it is the Crown's prerogative and monopoly as arbiter of domestic commerce, to give it authority or make it current.

The most ancient coin of which we have any knowledge, is the Persian gold coin, called the daric, δαρεικός, stamped on one side with the figure of an archer, crowned, and kneeling upon one knee, and on the other with a sort of quadrata incusa, or deep cleft. Genesius (Heb. Lexicon) supposes the name to be derived from an ancient Persian word, signifying king or royal palace, or the bow of the king, in allusion to the figure stamped upon it. The value of the daricus in our money, computed from the drachma, is 16*s.* 3*d.*; but if reckoned in comparison with our gold money, it is worth much more.—Jahn's Bib. Antiq. c. vii. s. 117. As to offences relating to the coin, see the Coinage Offences Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99.

Cold-water-ordeal, the trial which was ordinarily used for the common sort of people, who, having a cord tied about them, under their arms, were cast into a river; if they sank to the bottom until they were drawn up, which was in a very short time, then were they held guiltless; but such as did remain upon the water were held culpable, being, as they said, of the water rejected and kept up.—Verstegan's Rest of Decayed Intelligence.

Coliberts, tenants in socage, particularly such villains as were manumitted or made freemen; but they had not an absolute freedom, for though their condition was better than that of servants, yet they had superior lords, to whom they paid certain duties, and in that respect they might be called servants, though they were of middle condition, between freemen and servants.—Du Cange.

Collateral, indirect, sideways, that which hangs by the side; applied in several ways, thus:—collateral assurance, that which is made over and above the deed itself; collateral consanguinity or kindred, which descend from the same stock or ancestor as the lineal relations, but do not descend from each other, as the issue of two sons; collateral issue, where a criminal convict pleads any matter allowed by law, in bar of execution, as pregnancy, pardon, an act of grace, or diversity of person, viz. that he or she is not the same that was attainted, &c., the issue upon which when taken is tried by a jury instanter; collateral security, where a deed is made of other property, besides that already mortgaged, for the better safety of the mortgagee; collateral warranty was where the heir's title to the land neither was, nor could have been, derived from the warranting ancestor, as where a younger brother released to his father's disseisor, with warranty, this was collateral to the elder brother. The whole doctrine of collateral warranty seems repugnant to plain and unsophisticated reason and justice; and even its technical grounds are so obscure that the ablest legal writers are not agreed upon the subject.—Wright's Tenures, 168; Gilbert's Tenures, 143. But now warranty is abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 14.

Collatio bonorum (a contribution of goods). Where a portion of money, advanced by the father to a son or daughter, is brought into hotchpot, in order to have an equal distributory share of his personal estate at his death, according to the intent of the 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 10.

Collation, the comparison of a copy with its original to ascertain its correctness; or the report of the officer who made the comparison.

Collation to a benefice, where the bishop and patron are one and the same person; in which case the bishop cannot present to himself, but he does, by the one act of collation or conferring the benefice, the whole that is done in common cases both by presentation and institution.—2 Bl. Com. 22.

Collatione factâ uni post mortem alterius, a writ directed to justices of the Common Pleas, commanding them to issue their writ to the bishop, for the admission of a clerk in the place of another presented by the Crown, where there had been a demise of the Crown during a suit; for judgment once passed for the king's clerk, and he dying before admittance, the king may bestow his presentation on another.—Reg. Orig. 31.

Collatione heremitagii, a writ whereby the king conferred the keeping of an hermitage upon a clerk.—Reg. Orig. 303, 308.

Collation of seals, when upon the same label one seal was set on the back or reverse of the other.

Collative advowson. See Advowson.

Collegatary, a person who has a legacy left to him in common with other persons.

College [fr. colligo, Lat., to bring to], a civil corporation, company, or society of men, having certain privileges and endowed with certain revenues, founded by royal license. An assemblage of several of these colleges is called an university.

College of Doctors of Laws, exercent in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts, called Doctors' Commons. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, ss. 116, 117.

Collegia, the guild of a trade.—Civil Law.

Collegiate Church, a religious house built and endowed for a society or body corporate, a dean or other president, and secular priests as canons or prebendaries, independently of any cathedral.

Collegium est societas plurium corporum simul habitantium.—Jenk. Cent. 229. (A college is a society of several persons dwelling together.)

Colligendum bona defuncti (Letters ad), in defect of representatives and creditors to administer to an intestate, &c., the Probate Court may commit administration to such discreet person as it approves of, or grant him these letters to collect the goods of the deceased, which neither makes him executor nor administrator; his only business being to keep the goods in his safe custody, and to do other acts for the benefit of such as are entitled to the property of the deceased.—1 Wm. Ex. 242, 389.

Collision of ships, the striking or running foul of one ship against another. The remedy is either an action at law, or a suit in the Court of Admiralty. The possibilities under which a collision may occur, and the rules acted on by the Court of Admiralty, have been thus stated by Lord Stowell in The Woodrop Sims, 2 Dods. 85:—'In the first place, it may happen without blame being imputable to either party; as where the loss is occasioned by a storm or any other vis major, in that case the misfortune must be borne by the party on whom it happens to light, the other not being responsible to him in any degree. Secondly, a misfortune of this kind may arise where both parties are to blame, where there has been a want of due diligence or of skill on both sides; in such a case the rule of law is, that the loss must be apportioned be'tween them, as having been occasioned by the fault of both of them. Thirdly, it may happen by the misconduct of the suffering party only, and then the rule is that the sufferer must bear his own burthen. Lastly, it may have been the fault of the ship which ran the other down, and in that case the injured party would be entitled to an entire compensation from the other.'

In a court of common law the same rule prevails in the 1st, 3rd, & 4th cases; but in the 2nd, viz. where both parties are to blame, the rule is that if the negligence of both substantially contributed to the accident, neither can maintain an action against the other; but that if one of them by the exercise of ordinary care might have avoided the consequences of the other's negligence, the former is liable for any injury that the latter may have sustained. See Maude and Pollock on Shipping, and Abbott on Shipping, and Tuff v. Warman, 2 C. B. N. S. 740.

In pursuance of The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), and of an order of Council, dated Jan. 9th, 1863, Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea have been issued, which contain rules concerning lights, rules concerning fog signals, and steering and sailing rules.

Collistrigium, a pillory.

Collitigant, one who litigates with another.

Collocation, the order in which creditors are placed and paid.—Fr. Law.

Colloquium, a talking together; a conversation. A term in pleading applied to the statement in declarations for libel or slander, that the libellous or slanderous imputation had reference to the plaintiff.—1 Chitty on Pleading, 414.

Collusion [collusio, Lat., fr. colludo, to play together, to unite in the same play or game, and thus to unite for the purposes of fraud or deception], a deceitful agreement or compact between two or more persons to do some act in order to prejudice a third person, or for some improper purpose. Collusion in judicial proceedings is a secret agreement between two persons that the one should institute a suit against the other, in order to obtain the decision of a judicial tribunal for some sinister purpose, and appears to be of two kinds. (1) When the facts put forward as the foundation of the sentence of the court do not exist. (2) When they exist, but have been corruptly preconcerted for the express purpose of obtaining the sentence. In either case the judgment obtained by such collusion is a nullity. See The Duchess of Kingston's case, 20; State Trials, 355; 2 Smith's leading cases, 5th ed., 642. Collusion between the petitioner and either of the respondents in presenting or prosecuting a suit, for dissolution of marriage, is a bar to such suit.—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, ss. 30 & 31.

Colonial dioceses. Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Colombo, Mauritius, Victoria (Hong Kong), Labuan, Cape Town, Sierra Leone, Natal, Graham's Town, Quebec, Montreal, Toronto, Nova Scotia, Fredericton, Newfoundland, Rupert's Land, Jamaica, Barbadoes, Antigua, Guiana, Sydney, Newcastle, Melbourne, Adelaide, Tasmania, New Zealand, Gibraltar, and Jerusalem.

Colonial lands and casual revenues of the Crown.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 39.

Colonial laws repugnant to the home laws or statutes are void.—7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 22, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 190.

Colonial lighthouses.—18 & 19 Vict. c. 91.

Colonus, an husbandman or villager, who was bound to pay yearly a certain tribute; or, at certain times in the year, to plough some part of the lord's land; hence the word clown.

Colony [fr. colo, Lat., to cultivate], a settlement in a foreign country possessed and cultivated, either wholly or partially, by immigrants and their descendants, who have a political connection with, and subordination to, the mother-country whence they emigrated. In other words, it is a place peopled from some more ancient city or country.

The formation of colonies is among the oldest events recorded in history or handed down by tradition. Various motives have, in different countries and ages, led to the formation of colonies. Commercial and agricultural enterprise, however, seems to have led to colonization as much as any one single cause.

England was not the first among European nations that planted settlements in parts beyond Europe. But by her own colonization, and by the conquest of the settlements of other nations, she has now acquired a more extensive dominion of colonies and dependencies than any other nation. The colonies of Great Britain exceed in number, extent, and value, those of every other country.

Colonies are acquired either (1) by conquest, (2) by cession under treaty, (3) by occupancy, as Newfoundland, New South Wales, and Van Dieman's Land, and (4) by hereditary descent. By far the greater part of the colonies was acquired by conquest or cession. In the two first cases, the territory retains its former laws until they are altered by the Home Government, i. e. the Queen in Council, yet subordinate to the authority of parliament. The alterations may be general or partial, leaving the old laws still in force touching matters unprovided for. In the third case (which is strictly a plantation), the English laws, so far as they are applicable to the condition of an infant colony, are ipso facto in force in such colony, for there can be no existing laws to contest the superiority; and besides, the occupants could not have any power to establish laws independently of the mother-country, to whom their allegiance is still due; and they also carry with them the laws of their country, which are their inalienable birthright. Such a colony is, then, not subject to legislation by the Crown, nor is a country which comes to the Crown by title or descent. Such colonies retain their own laws till changed by the Act of the Imperial Parliament, to whose legislative authority every kind of colony is subject, as portions of the British dominions, and whose protection they have a right to demand, for the resistance of hostile aggression, and the peaceful possession of their territory. As a general rule, an Act of Parliament must name the colony in order to bind it, but there are exceptions.—Clark's Col. Law; Burge's Col. and For. Law, and Whart. Art. Cl. Man. part 2, c. iv.

Color, a term of the ancient rhetoricians, and early adopted into the language of pleading. It is an apparent or primâ facie right; and the meaning of the rule, that pleadings in confession and avoidance should give color, is that they should confess the matter adversely alleged, to such an extent, at least, as to admit some apparent right in the opposite party, which requires to be encountered and avoided by the allegation of new matter. Color is either express, i. e. formally inserted in the pleading, or implied, which is naturally inherent in the structure of the pleading.—Step. Plead. 233; 3 Bl. Com. 309; 3 Reeves, pp. 24 & 438. Express color is abolished by C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 64.

Color of office, an act unjustly done by the countenance of an office, being grounded upon corruption, to which the office is as a shadow and color.—Plowd. 64.

Colpices, young poles, which, being cut down, are made levers or lifters.—Blount.

Colpo, a small wax candle.

Combarones, the fellow barons or commonalty of the Cinque Ports.

Combat, trial by single. See BATTEL.

Combaterræ [fr. cumbe, Sax.; kum, Brit.; comb, Eng.], a valley or piece of low ground between two hills.—Ken. Gloss.

Combe [ccom, W.] a narrow valley.

Combination, an assembly of workmen met to perpetrate unlawful acts.—6 Geo. IV. c. 129, explained by 22 Vict. c. 34; and 9 Geo. IV. c. 31.

Combustibility, Preternatural. A question may arise in cases where persons are found burnt to death, whether there can be such a thing as preternatural combustibility of the human body? Several cases are recorded, from which it appears that the phenomenon has been produced by the long and immoderate use of spirituous liquors. Some deductions have been drawn from these cases, viz.: (1) The subjects were nearly all females, and they were far advanced in life. (2) Most of them had, for a long time, made an immoderate use of spirituous liquors, and they were either very fat or very lean. (3) The combustion occurred accidentally, and often from a slight cause, such as a candle, a coal, or even a spark. (4) The combustion proceeded with great rapidity, usually consuming the entire trunk, while the extremities, as the feet and hands, were occasionally left uninjured. (5) Water, instead of extinguishing the flames, sometimes gave them more activity. (6) The fire did very little damage to, and often did not affect the combustible objects in contact with the human body, at the moment when it was burning. (7) The combustion of these bodies left as a residuum, fat, fœtid ashes, with an unctuous, stinking, and very penetrating soot. (8) The combustions have occurred at all seasons, but most frequently in winter, and in northern as well as southern countries.

As to its cause various opinions have been promulgated. Some suppose that there is an alcoholic impregnation of the body, and that the actual contact of fire is necessary to produce it. But there is no proof of such a saturation of the organs; and if it were so, it would not, judging from experiments, render the body combustible. Another theory refers the combustion to the agency of the electric fluid. It is difficult, however, on this hypothesis, to explain the rapidity of the combustion, and the complete reduction of the body, or its parts, to ashes. It has also been referred to an internal decomposition, and the formation of new products, which are highly inflammable. Another opinion is, that phosphuretted hydrogen may be generated in the system, an explanation which will almost justify the term in common use—spontaneous combustion. See Dung. 226.

These cases differ from ordinary combustion, which requires large quantities of fuel to convert the body into ashes, and is also slow in its progress, and, the heat required being high, extends itself to surrounding substances. It is often incomplete, and particularly so as to the bones. There will also be blisters, scars, &c., on various parts of the unconsumed body. But the empyreumatic odour, and the moist and sooty matter resting on the furniture and walls are wanting, and, if Fontenelle be correct, the hair, the most combustible part of the human frame, is never burnt, while the liver and spleen are always so.

The application of these distinctions to medico-legal cases is manifest.—Beck's Med. Jurisp. 575.

It is well known that vegetable substances, when highly dried and closely heaped, will frequently burst into flame.—See Notes and Queries, No. 184.

Combustio pecuniæ, the ancient method of testing mixed and corrupt money, paid into the Exchequer, by melting it down.

Come ceo, as well for this.

Comes, the count or superior officer of a county.

Comitatus, a county.

Comitatu commisso, a writ or commission whereby a sheriff is authorized to enter upon the charges of a county.—Reg. Orig. 295.

Comitatu et castro commisso, a writ by which the charge of a county, together with the keeping of a castle, is committed to the sheriff.—Ibid.

Comites, earls, courtiers, or companions.

Comitiva, a companion or fellow-traveller; a troop or company of robbers.

Comity of nations, the most appropriate phrase to express the true foundation and extent of the obligation of the laws of one nation within the territories of another. It is derived altogether from the voluntary consent of the latter; and it is inadmissible, when it is contrary to its known policy, or prejudicial to its interests. In the silence of any positive rule, affirming, or denying, or restraining the operation of foreign laws, courts of justice presume the tacit adoption of them by their own government, unless repugnant to its policy. It is not the comity (courtesy) of the courts, but the comity of the nation, which is administered and ascertained in the same way, and guided by the same reasoning, by which all other privileges of the municipal law are ascertained and guided.—Story's Conflict of Laws, s. 38.

Commandery, a manor or chief messuage with lands and tenements thereto appertaining, which belonged to the priory of St. John of Jerusalem, in England; he who had the government of such a manor or house was styled the commander, who could not dispose of it, but to the use of the priory, only taking thence his own sustenance, according to his degree. The manors and lands belonging to the priory of St. John of Jerusalem were given to Henry the Eighth, by 32 Hen. VIII. c. 20, about the time of the dissolution of abbeys and monasteries; so that the name only of commanderies remains, the power being long since extinct.

Commandite, or in commendam, partnerships which are limited where the contract is between one or more persons, who are general partners, and jointly and severally responsible, and one or more other persons, who merely furnish a particular fund or capital stock, and thence are called commandataires, or commendataires, or partners in commandite; the business being carried on under the social name or firm of the general partners only, composed of the names of the general or complimentary partners, the partners in commandite being liable to losses only to the extent of the funds or capital furnished by them.—Code of Commerce of France, art. 23, 24; Watson on Partn. ch. i. p. 2; Pothier, de Société, n. 60, 102; Story on Partn. 109, 119, 120.

Commandment, order, direction; also the offence of inducing another to transgress the law, or do anything contrary to it. The civilians call it mandatum.

Commarchio, the confines of the land.

Commenda, or Ecclesia commendata, a living commended by the Crown to the care of a clerk, to hold till a proper pastor is provided for it. This may be temporary for one, two, or three years, or perpetual, being a kind of dispensation to avoid the vacancy of the living, and is called a commenda retinere, and has been usually granted to bishops in the poorer sees to aid the deficiency in their episcopal revenue. There is also a commenda recipere, which is to take a benefice de novo in the bishop's own gift, or the gift of some other patron consenting to the same; and this is the same to him as institution and induction are to another clerk.—Mire. on Adv. c. vii. s. 6. But now by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 77, s. 18, no ecclesiastical dignity, office, or benefice shall be hold in commendam by any bishop unless he shall have held the same when the act passed; and every commendam thereafter granted, whether to retain or to receive, and whether temporary or perpetual, shall be absolutely void.

Commenda est facultas recipiendi et retinendi beneficium contra jus positivum à supremâ potestate.—Moor, 905.—(A commendam is the power of receiving and retaining a benefice contrary to positive law, by supreme authority.)

Commendators, secular persons upon whom ecclesiastical benefices are bestowed, called so, because the benefices were commended and intrusted to their oversight; they are not proprietors, but only trustees or tutors.—Scotch Term.

Commendatory, he who holds a church living or preferment in commendam.

Commendatory letters, such as are written by one bishop to another in behalf of any of the clergy, or others of his diocese travelling thither, that they may be received among the faithful; or that the clerk may be promoted; or necessaries administered to others, &c.

Commendatum. See DEPOSIT.

Commendatus, one who lives under the protection of a great man.—Spelm.

Commerce [fr. commutatio mercium, Lat.], the intercourse of nations in each other's produce and manufactures, in which the superfluities of one are given for those of another, and then re-exchanged with other nations for mutual wants. There is a distinction between commerce and trade; the former relates to our dealings with foreign nations, colonies, &c.; the latter to mutual dealings at home.

The affairs of commerce are regulated by the Law Merchant, Lex Mercatoria, or Commercial Law. 'Lord Mansfield,' said Mr. Justice Buller (Lickbarrow v. Mason, 2 T. R. 631), 'may be truly said to be the founder of the commercial law of this country. We all know that, from his time, the great study has been to find out some certain general principles which shall be known to all mankind, to rule not only one particular case, but to serve as a guide to the future. Most of us have heard those principles stated, reasoned upon, enlarged, and explained, till we have been lost in admiration at the strength and stretch of the human understanding.' Commercial law is based upon very different principles from those which govern real property law, and is derived from a variety of sources and authorities—from international law, from the different maritime codes of ancient Europe, and from the imperial code of Rome.—McCull. Com. Dict.

Commercium jure gentium commune esse debet, et non in monopolium et privatum paucorum quæstum convertendum.—3 Inst.—(Commerce, by the law of nations, ought to be common, and not converted to monopoly and the private gain of a few.)

Commissariate, the whole body of officers in the commissaries' department.

Commissary, one who is sent or delegated to execute some office or duty as the representative of his superior. In ecclesiastical law, an officer of the bishop, who exercises spiritual jurisdiction in distant parts of the diocese. In military affairs, an officer who has the charge of furnishing provisions, clothing, &c., for an army.

Commission, the warrant or letters-patent which all persons exercising jurisdiction, either ordinary or extraordinary, have, to authorize them to hear or determine any cause or action, or do other lawful things, as the commission of the Judges, &c. There was formerly a High Commission Court founded on 1 Eliz. c. 1, but it was abolished in the reign of Charles II. though an impotent attempt was made to re-establish it during the succeeding reign.

In commerce, the order by which any one traffics or negotiates for another; also the percentage given to factors or agents for transacting the business of others. See PROCURATION FEE.

Commission of anticipation, an authority under the Great Seal to collect a tax or subsidy before the day.—15 Hen. VIII.

Commission of Array, issued to send into every county officers to muster or set in military order the inhabitants. The introduction of commissions of lieutenancy, which contained in substance the same powers as these commissions, superseded them.—2 Step. Com. 608.

Commission of Bankruptcy, the authority formerly given by the Lord Chancellor to certain commissioners, empowering them to proceed in the bankruptcy of a trader. Abolished by 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 56, s. 12.

Commission of Charitable Uses, issues out of Chancery to the bishop and others, where lands given to charitable uses are misemployed, or there is any fraud or dispute concerning them, to enquire of and redress the same, &c.—43 Eliz. c. 4.

Commission-day, the opening day of the assizes.

Commission del Credere, where an agent of a seller undertakes to guaranty to his principal the payment of the debt due by the buyer. The phrase del credere is borrowed from the Italian language, in which its signification is equivalent to our word guaranty or warranty.—Story's Agency, 28.

Commission of Delegates, issued under the Great Seal to certain persons, usually lords, bishops, and judges, to sit upon an appeal to the king in the Court of Chancery, where a sentence was given in any ecclesiastical cause by the archbishop.—25 Hen. VIII. c. 19, repealed by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 92.

Commission of Patents for Inventions. See LETTERS-PATENT.

Commission to enquire of Faults against the Law, anciently sent forth on extraordinary occasions and corruptions.

Commission to examine Witnesses, issued in Chancery suits, where the witnesses reside abroad. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 35. As to the examination of witnesses abroad in Common Law actions, see 13 Geo. III. c. 63; 1 Wm. IV. c. 22; and 22 Vict. c. 20.

Commission of Lunacy, issued out of Chancery, to enquire whether a person alleged to be a lunatic, be so or not. But see IDIOTS AND LUNATICS.

Commission-merchant. A factor is commonly said to be an agent employed to sell goods or merchandize, consigned or delivered to him by or for his principal for a compensation commonly called factorage or commission. Hence he is often called a commission-merchant or consignee; and the goods received by him for sale are called a consignment.—Story's Agency, 28.

Commission of the Peace, issues under the Great Seal for the appointment of justices of the peace.

Commission of Railways, appointed by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 105; but this act is repealed by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 64, and the jurisdiction restored to the Board of Trade.

Commission of Rebellion, an attaching process, formerly issuable out of Chancery, to enforce obedience to a process or decree, but abolished by the 6th Order of 26th August 1841.

Commission of Sewers, directed to certain persons to see drains and ditches well kept and maintained in the marshy and fenny parts of England for the better conveyance of the water into the sea, and the preservation of the grass upon the land.—13 Eliz. c. 9.

Commission to take answer in Chancery, issued when defendant lives abroad, to swear him to such answer. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 21.

Commission to take up Men for War, issued to press or force men into the Queen's service.—Fost. Rep. 154.

Commission of Treaty with Foreign Princes, leagues and arrangements made between states and kingdoms, by their ambassadors and ministers, for the mutual advantage of the kingdoms in alliance.

Commissioner, a person authorised by letters-patent, or other lawful warrant, to examine any matters, or execute any public office, &c. There are many appointed for different judicial purposes, as the commissioners of bankruptcy, insolvency, &c.; and for other purposes, an almost infinite number.

Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, pt. vi. s. 389, et seq.

Commissioners to Administer Oaths in Chancery, officers who exercise the powers and discharge the duties formerly appertaining to the office of Master Extraordinary.—16 & 17 Vict. c. 78. Solicitors of ten years' standing are eligible for the appointment.

Commissioners for taking Affidavits in the Common Law Courts. Attornies so appointed under 29 Car. II. c. 5. See 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 43, s. 4. The 22 Vict. c. 16, enables the judges to appoint Commissioners within ten miles of London, and in the Isle of Man and Channel Islands.

Commissioners of Turnpike Roads. See 3 Geo. IV. c. 126, ss. 61, 62, 65, and 4 Geo. IV. c. 95, s. 32.

Commissioners of Woods, Forests, Land Revenues, Works, and Buildings, Board of, established by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 1, and divided into a board of 'Commissioners of her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues,' 15 & 16 Vict. c. 62 (with power to the Crown to appoint in lieu of them a Surveyor-general of her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues), and a board of 'Commissioners of her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings,' which has the management of the royal parks in and near London.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 42, s. 21.

Commissoria lex, the term applied to a clause often inserted in conditions of sale, by which a vendor reserved to himself the privilege of rescinding the sale, if the purchaser did not pay his purchase-money at the time agreed on. Dig. 18, tit. 3.

Commitment, the sending a person to prison by warrant or order, either for a crime, contempt, or contumacy.—4 Step. Com. 419.

Committee, certain persons elected or appointed, to whom any matter or business is referred, either by a legislative body or by any corporation or society.

Committee of a Lunatic or Idiot, the person to whom the care and custody of a lunatic is committed by the Court of Chancery.

Committees in Parliament, first, those of the whole house, which may be to consider of certain resolutions, as to the nature of which considerable latitude prevails; or the house resolves itself into such committee to consider the details of a bill, the principle of which may be discussed at any or all of its other stages; or there may be committees for financial purposes, as those of 'supply' or 'ways and means.' Secondly, there are select committees, chosen by ballot or otherwise, for some specific purpose; the numbers composing such bodies seldom exceed twenty or thirty members; occasionally these are declared committees of secrecy. Thirdly, election committees, which are judicial tribunals, appointed to try the merits of controverted elections; these are always chosen by ballot. Fourthly, committees on private bills; when the whole house is in committee, the Speaker vacates the chair, the mace is placed under the table, and some other member is called on to preside, who sits in the seat of the senior clerk. For committees of supply, and ways and means, and bills introduced by ministers, there is a chairman, who receives a salary.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

Committitur piece, an instrument in writing on parchment, which charges a person already in prison, in execution at the suit of the person who arrested him.

Commodatum, one of those obligations which are contracted re. He who lends to another a thing for a definite time, to be enjoyed and used under certain conditions, without any pay or reward, is called commodans; the person who receives the thing is called commodatarius, and the contract is called commodatum. It differs from locatio and conductio in this, that the use of the thing is gratuitous.—Dig. 13, tit. 6; Instit. iii. 14, 2.

Commodum ex injuriâ suâ nemo habere debet. Jenk. Cent. 161.—(No person ought to have advantage from his own wrong.)

Common, a profit which a man has in the land of another; it derives its name from the community of interest which thence arises between the claimant and the owner of the soil, or between the claimant and other commoners entitled to the same right; all which parties are entitled to bring actions for injuries done to their respective interests, and that both as against strangers and against each other. It is called an incorporeal right, which lies in grant, as if originally commencing in some agreement between lords and tenants, for some valuable consideration which, by lapse of time, being formed into a prescription, continues, although there be no deed or instrument in writing which proves the original contract or agreement. It differs from a rent, principally in freedom of enjoyment on the one hand, and in freedom from obligation on the other; which the law expresses by the quaint antithesis that it lies not in render but in prender. It is also incidentally distinguished by its fruits being always taken in kind, and being in general not otherwise measured than by limiting the instruments of enjoyment. The 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 71, s. 1, enacts, that after thirty years' enjoyment a right of common cannot be defeated by merely showing it commenced within time of memory, and after sixty years' enjoyment the right shall be absolute and indefeasible, unless it appear that the same was taken and enjoyed under some deed or writing.

There are four sorts of common, viz.:—

(1) Common of pasture, limited or unlimited, which is the right of feeding one's beasts in another's land, and this is sub-divided into:—

(a) Appendant, which is a privilege belonging to the owners or occupiers of arable land holden of a manor, to put upon its wastes their commonable beasts, viz. horses, kine, or sheep, being such as either plough or manure the soil.

(b) Appurtenant, which arises from no connection of tenure, nor from any absolute necessity, but may be annexed to lands in other lordships, or extend to other beasts besides such as are generally commonable, as swine, goats, or geese. This can only be claimed by grant, or by title of prescription, which supposes a now forgotten grant.

(c) Because of vicinage or neighbourhood (pur cause de vicinage), which takes place where the tenants of two adjoining manors have suffered their cattle to range indiscriminately over both wastes, and it seems that either lord may put an end to it by erecting a fence. In close connection with this, and substantially of the same kind is common of shack, or the right of persons occupying lands lying together in the same common field, to turn out their cattle after harvest, to feed promiscuously in that field.

(d) In gross or at large, which is neither appendant nor appurtenant to land, but is annexed to a man's person, by granting it to him and his heirs by deed, or it may be claimed by prescriptive right, as by a parson of a church, or a corporation sole. As to the enclosure of commons, see 41 Geo. III. c. 109, and 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 115.

(2) Common of piscary, a liberty of fishing in another's water. It is either appendant, appurtenant, or in gross.

(3) Common of turbary, a license to dig turf upon the land of another, or in the lord's waste. It may be either appendant, appurtenant, i. e. appendant or appurtenant to a house, and not to lands, for turfs are to be burnt in the house, or it may be in gross.

(4) Common of estovers or estouviers, or necessaries, a liberty of taking necessary wood, for the use or furniture of a house, or farm, from off another's estate. The Saxon word bote, is used by us as synonymous with the French estovers. House-bote, then, is a sufficient allowance of wood to repair, or to burn in the house; which latter is sometimes called fire-bote; plough-bote and cart-bote are wood to be employed in making and repairing all instruments of husbandry; and hay-bote or hedge-bote is wood for repairing of hays, hedges, or fences.—2 Bl. Com. 32.

Commonable beasts, such as are necessary for the ploughing or manuring of land, as horses, oxen, cows, and sheep.

Common assurances, the legal evidences of the translation of property, whereby every person's estate is assured to him, and all controversies, doubts, and difficulties are either prevented or removed.

The common assurances are of four kinds:—(1) By matter in pais, or deed, which is an assurance transacted between two or more private persons in pais in the country; that is (according to the old common law) upon the very spot to be transferred. (2) By matter of record, or an assurance transacted only in the sovereign's public courts of record, or under the authority of a public board or commission empowered by Act of Parliament to record its proceedings. (3) By special custom obtaining in some particular places, and relating only to some particular species of property: which three are such as take effect during the life of the party conveying or assuring. (4) The fourth takes no effect till after his death, and that is by devise, contained in his last will and testament.—2 Bl. Com. 290.

Common bar, otherwise called a bar at large or blank bar. If a plaintiff declare in trespass quare clausum fregit, for breaking his close in a certain parish, without naming or otherwise describing the close, if the defendant happen to have any freehold land in the same parish, he may be supposed to mistake the close in question for his own, and may therefore plead what is called the common bar, viz. that the close in which the trespass was committed is his own freehold. And then it would be necessary for the plaintiff to new assign, alleging that he brought his action in respect of a different close from that claimed by the defendant as his freehold. But by rule of court, Reg. Gen. Trin. T. 1853, r. 18, the plaintiff is now bound to designate the close or place in the declaration, by name or abuttals or other description.—Step. Plead. 256.

Common Bench [fr. banc, Sax., bench], the ancient name of the Court of Common Pleas, because the pleas of controversies between common persons were there tried and determined. C. B. sometimes stands for this court.

Common Council, the assembly of a city or corporate town, empowered to make by-laws for the government of the citizens.

Common Counts. It is to be observed that several causes of action do not always form the subject of several counts in a declaration, but are sometimes thrown, for the sake of brevity and convenience, into one; and in the actions of debt and assumpsit the claims of most frequent occurrence, viz. those for goods sold, for work done, for money lent, for money paid, for money received to the use of the plaintiff, for money due on an account stated, are always condensed (when they occur in the same action) under the allegation of a single promise, pursuant to a form promulgated by rule of court.—Step. Pl. 304.

Common day of plea in land, an ordinary day in court, as Octabis Hilarii, Quindena Paschæ, &c.—51 Hen. III. st. 2 & 3.

Common fine, a small sum of money.—Fleta, l. 7, c. xlviii.

Common Hall, a court in the city of London at which all the citizens, or such as are free of the city, have a right to attend.

Common informer, a person who prosecutes others for breaches of penal laws, or furnishes evidence on criminal trials.

Common intendment, ordinary meaning or understanding, according to the plain matter; not strained to any extraordinary or foreign sense.

Common Law [lex communis, Lat.], the meaning of this term is very ambiguous, the expression being used in various senses according to the objects with which it is contrasted, it being so contradistinguished, sometimes from the statute law, sometimes from the civil and canon law; occasionally from the lex mercatoria, and frequently from equity. Many use it to designate simply a law 'common' to all the realm. It is also sometimes adopted in opposition to criminal law, which is certainly erroneous, since the common law includes all the criminal law, which is not of positive statutory origin. 'Our English lawyers,' observes Hallam (Midd. Ages, ii. 465), 'prone to magnify the antiquity, like the other merits, of their system, are apt to carry up the date of the common law, till, like the pedigree of an illustrious family, it closes in the obscurity of ancient time: Sir Matthew Hale not hesitating to say that its origin is as undiscoverable as that of the Nile.' It may upon the whole be received as generally true, that our common law traces its origin to the early usages and customs of the aboriginal Britons, and was necessarily augmented, in different ages, by the admixture of some of the laws and usages of the Romans, the Picts, the Saxons, the Danes, and the Normans, who spread themselves over the country: 'our laws becoming as mixed as our language.'

The common law includes those principles, usages, and rules of action, applicable to the government and security of person and property, which do not rest for their authority upon any express or positive declaration of the will of the legislature.

This at once marks the leading distinction between common law (lex non scripta) and statute law (lex scripta). The distinction between written and unwritten law is adopted from the Romans, who borrowed it from the Greeks (Inst. l. 1, t. 2, ss. 3, 9, 10). In thus distinguishing our own laws into the scriptæ or statute, and non scriptæ or common, we use the latter in a peculiar and restrained sense; signifying by it nothing more than that the original institution and authority of the law are not set down in writing, as is the case with Acts of Parliament; but that it receives its binding power, as a law, from long and immemorial usage, and universal reception throughout the realm. The authenticity of these customs, rules, and maxims, rests entirely upon reception and usage, as declared by our judges, who are the sworn depositaries and interpreters of our law. This common law is properly distinguished into three kinds. (1) General customs, or those applicable to and governing the whole kingdom, comprehending the law of nations and the law merchant. (2) Particular customs, i. e. affecting the inhabitants of particular districts. (3) The civil and canon laws, properly denominated the ecclesiastical, military, maritime, and academical laws.—1 Bl. Com. 35; 1 Step. Com. 10; Hale's Hist. of the Com. Law, c. iii.; Encyc. Americana, vol. iii. p. 394; Mackintosh's England, 274; 1 Kent's Com. 447, 468.

Common Law Procedure Acts, 1852, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76; 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125; and 1860, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126.

Common Pleas, the Court of, one of the three Superior Courts of common law at Westminster, presided over by a Lord Chief Justice and four puisné judges. It was detached from the King's Court (Aula Regis), as early as the reign of Richard I. and the 14th clause of Magna Charta enacted, that it should not follow the King's Court, but be held in some certain place, which is at Westminster. Its jurisdiction is altogether confined to civil matters, having no cognizance in criminal cases, and is concurrent with that of the Queen's Bench and Exchequer in personal actions and ejectment. It has a peculiar or exclusive jurisdiction in the following cases :—

Real actions.

Under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854. (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31.)

(III.) Auxiliary.

(1) Registration of judgments, annuities, &c. (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82; 18 Vict. c. 15.)

(2) Under 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, respecting the fees connected with conveyances executed by virtue of the act, and also with the examination of married women concerning their assurances. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 70; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 75; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 73.

(IV.) Appellate.

Appeals from the Revising Barristers' Courts, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18.

Common Prayer [preces publicæ, Lat.], the liturgy, or public form of prayer prescribed by the Church of England to be used in all churches and chapels, and which the clergy are enjoined to use under a certain penalty.—1 Eliz. c. 2; 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 4.

Common scold. See SCOLD.

Common seal, a seal used by a corporation as the symbol of their incorporation.

Common vouchee, the indemnificator general in the Common Pleas, whose services were dispensed with by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

Common weal [bonum publicum, Lat.], the common good.

Commonalty [populus, plebs, communitas, Lat.], the people of England.—2 Inst. 539.

Commonance, the commoners, or tenants and inhabitants, who have the right of common or commoning in open field.—Cowel.

Commons, part of the demesne land of a manor (or land the property of which was in the lord), which, being uncultivated, was termed the lord's waste, and served for public roads, and for common of pasture to the lord and his tenants.—2 Bl. Com. 90.

Commons' Inclosure Acts. See INCLOSURE ACTS, post.

Commons House of Parliament, the lower House, so called, because the Commons of the realm, that is, the knights, citizens, and burgesses returned to Parliament, representing the whole body of the Commons, sit there. See PARLIAMENT.

Commonwealth, the social state of a country, without regarding its form of government; also, a republic, or that form of government in which the administration of public affairs is open to all, with few, if any, exceptions.

Commorancy, or Commorant, an abiding, dwelling, continuing, or lying in a certain place.

Commorientes, persons who die by the same accident or upon the same occasion.

Commorth, or Comorth [fr. cymmorth, Brit.; subsidium, Lat.], a contribution which was gathered at marriages, and when young priests said or sung the first masses. Prohibited by 26 Hen. VIII. c. 6.—Cowel.

Commote, half a cantred or hundred in Wales, containing fifty villages.—Stat. Walliæ, 12 Edw. I. Also a great seignory or lordship, and may include one or divers manors.—Co. Litt. 5.

Commune Concilium Regni Angliæ, the common council of the King and people assembled in Parliament.

Communia placita non tenenda in scaccario, an ancient writ directed to the treasurer and barons of the Exchequer, forbidding them to hold pleas between common persons (i. e. not debtors to the king, who alone originally sued and were sued there) in that court, where neither of the parties belonged to the same.—Reg. Orig. 187, now superseded by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 39.

Communi custodia, an obsolete writ which anciently lay for the lord, whose tenant, holding by knight's service, died, and left his eldest son under age, against a stranger that entered the land, and obtained the ward of the body.—Reg. Orig. 161; 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Communis error facit jus.—4 Inst. 240.—(Common error makes a right.)

'It has been sometimes said,' observed Lord Ellenborough, in Isherwood v. Oldknow, 3 M. & S. 396, 'communis error facit jus; but I say, communis opinio is evidence of what the law is, not where it is an opinion merely speculative and theoretical, floating in the minds of persons, but where it has been made the groundwork and substratum of practice.'

Lord C. J. Denman, remarked (O'Connell v. Reg. House of Lords, edited by Leahy), 'when, in the pursuit of truth, we are obliged to investigate the grounds of the law, it is plain, and has often been proved by recent experience, that the mere statement and re-statement of a doctrine—the mere repetition of the cantilena of lawyers—cannot make it law, unless it can be traced to some competent authority, and if it be irreconcileable, to some clear legal principle.

Communism. An equality of distribution of the physical means of life and enjoyment as a transition to a still higher standard of justice, that all should work according to their capacity, and receive according to their wants.—1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 248.

Communis Rixatrix, a common (female) brawler, a scold.

Community, a society of people living in the same place, under the same laws and regulations, and who have common rights and privileges.

Commutation, conversion; the change of a penalty or punishment from a greater to a less; or giving one thing in satisfaction of another, as commuting tithes into a rent-charge, copyhold services into money-payments, &c.

Commutative Contract, one in which each of the contracting parties gives and receives an equivalent.

Companage, all kinds of food, except bread and drink.—Spel.

Companies' Act, 1862. 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89.

Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, 8 Vict. c. 16. See WINDING-UP ACTS.

Companion of the Garter, one of the knights of that most noble order.

Company [fr. con and pagus, Lat., one of the same town, or con and panis, one that eats of the same mess], a society of persons joined in a common interest, for the purpose of carrying on some commercial or industrious undertaking. McCull. Comm. Dict. Companies are governed by statute law.

Compass, the Mariner's, an instrument used by mariners to point out the course of a ship at sea. It consists of a magnetised steel bar, called the needle, attached to the under side of a card, upon which are drawn the points of the compass, and supported by a fine pin, upon which it turns freely in a horizontal plane. A magnetic needle so balanced, subject to a correction for its variation or declination, possesses the property of pointing out the true direction of north and south; and thus the ship's course may at any time be ascertained. The needle and card are enclosed in a cylindrical box covered with glass, which is kept in a horizontal position, notwithstanding the rolling or lurching of the ship, by an ingenious contrivance called gimbles. The declination or variation of the needle is the angle which it makes with the geographical meridian at any given place. It is different at different places, and at the same place varies from time to time. Thus in the year 1581 at London, the declination was 11° 15′ to the east, and in the year 1832 it was 24° 12′ to the west of the meridian.

Compassing [fr. compasser, Fr., to encircle; con, with, and passus, a step, Lat.], imagining or contriving.

Compaternity, spiritual affinity.

Compendia sunt dispendia.—Co. Litt. 305.—(Abbreviations are detriments.)

Compelativum, an adversary or accuser.—Leg. Athel.

Compensatio criminum (compensation of offences), a term used by the canonists. Where husband and wife had both been guilty of adultery, there was, according to the doctrine of the Canon Law, a compensatio criminum, i. e. the guilt of the one was neutralised by that of the other, and both were restored to the position of innocent persons. This doctrine has been held not to be part of the law of England.—Hope v. Hope, 1 Swab. & T. 94; S. C. 27; L. J. P. & M. 43. But see Seaver v. Seaver, 2 Swab. & T. 665.

Compensation, making things equivalent, satisfying or making amends, a reward for the apprehension of criminals; also a sort of right by set-off or stoppage, whereby a person who has been sued for a debt, demands that the debt may be compensated with what is owing to him by the creditor, which, in that case, is equivalent to payment.

Compertorium, a judicial inquest in the civil law, made by delegates or commissioners to find out and relate the truth of a cause.—Paroch. Antiq. 575.

Comperuit ad diem (he appeared at the day).

Complainant, one who urges a suit or commences a prosecution against another.

Complice, one who is united with others in an ill design; an associate; a confederate; an accomplice.

Compos mentis (sound of mind).

Composition, an amicable arrangement of a law-suit; also an agreement or contract between a parson, patron, or ordinary, and the owner of lands, that such lands shall for the future be discharged from payment of tithes, by reason of some land or other real recompense given to the parson in lieu and satisfaction thereof. No real composition, however, since the 13 Eliz. c. 10, is, in general, good for any longer term than three lives, or twenty-one years, though made by consent of the patron and ordinary. But by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 100, s. 2, every composition for tithes which had then been made or confirmed by the decree of any court of equity in England, in a suit to which the ordinary, patron, and incumbent were parties, and which had not been since set aside or departed from, shall be valid in law. Also an agreement made between an insolvent debtor and his creditors, by which the latter accept a part of their debts in satisfaction of the whole.

Compositio mensurarum, the title of an ancient ordinance for measures not printed.

Compost, several sorts of soil or earth and other matters mixed, in order to make a fine kind of mould for fertilizing lands.

Compound interest, interest upon interest, i. e. when the interest of a sum of money is added to the principal, and then bears interest, which thus becomes a sort of secondary principal.

Compounding, arranging, coming to terms; compounding felony is where the party robbed not only knows the felon, but also takes his goods again, or other amends, upon an agreement not to prosecute; this offence is denominated theftbote, and is punishable by fine and imprisonment. It is no offence to compound a misdemeanor, for the party injured may maintain an action to recover compensation in damages. And compounding offences only cognizable before magistrates on summary jurisdiction is not within 18 Eliz. c. 5. To take any reward for helping a person to stolen goods, without bringing the offender to justice, is felony; and to advertise a reward for the return of things stolen, or printing or publishing such advertisement, incurs a penalty of 50*l.* by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, ss. 58, 59. Penal actions by common informers may be compounded by leave of the court; this leave of the court, however, is not necessary in actions by the party grieved. The defendant must have pleaded.

Comprint, a surreptitious printing of another bookseller's copy of a work, to make gain thereby, which was contrary to common law, and is illegal.

Compromise, an adjustment of claims in dispute by mutual concession, without resorting to the law; also a mutual promise of two or more parties at difference to refer the ending of their controversy to arbitrators.

Compromissarii sunt judices.—Jenk. Cent. 128.—(Arbitrators are judges.)

Compromissum, a submission to arbitration. Can. Law.

Comptróller, one who observes and examines the accounts of collectors of public money; an officer of the royal household.

Comptrollers of the Hanaper, officers of the Court of Chancery; their offices were abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 103.

Comptroller of the Pipe, an officer of the Exchequer, who writes out summonses twice every year to the sheriffs, to levy the farms and debts of the pipe, and who also keeps a contrarollment of the pipe.—Scotch Law.

Compurgator, one who by oath justifies another's innocence.—Du Cange.

Computo, a writ to compel a bailiff, receiver, or accountant, to yield up his accounts, founded on the Statute of Westminster II. c. 12. It also lies against guardians.—Reg. Orig. 135. Also an order to compute is made, when the master is required to ascertain the debt and interest on a bill of exchange or promissory note, &c., at the same time that he taxes the costs on an interlocutory judgment for want of a plea, in order that final judgment may be signed and execution issued thereon. The rule to compute is abolished by C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 92.

Conacre, the payment of wages in land, the rent being worked out in labor at a money valuation.—Irish Practice.

Conatus, quid sit, non definitur in jure.—2 Buls. 277.—(An endeavour, what it is, is not defined in law.)

Concealers, such as were used to find out concealed lands, i. e. such lands as are privily kept from the king by common persons, having nothing to show for their title or estate therein. 39 Eliz. c. 23.

Concealing a birth, a misdemeanor. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57.

Concealing documents of title to lands or testamentary instruments. These offences are felonies, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 28 & 29.

Concealment, i. e. suppressio veri, to the injury or prejudice of another. This must amount, in order to be deemed a fraud, to the suppression or non-disclosure of facts, which one under the circumstances is bound, both legally and equitably, to disclose to another, the latter having an undoubted right to be put in possession of such facts.

There is a material distinction between circumstances which are intrinsic, forming the very ingredients of a contract, and circumstances which are extrinsic, forming no part of it, although perhaps offering inducements to enter into it, or affecting the value of the thing contracted for. As to the former, the caution caveat emptor should be heeded, for, unless there be some artifice to disguise the subject of the contract, or some warranty as to its quality, a vendee is bound by the sale, although there may exist extrinsic defects in it, known only to the vendor, which greatly affect its worth.

For the leading cases upon this voluminous subject, see Lord St. Leonards' concise and practical treatise on the law of Vendors and Purchasers of Estates, Introd. 1–7, 13th edit. 1857.

In treaties for an agreement, a wilful and industrious concealment of a material fact, by one of the parties, in order to keep the other in ignorance, so as to profit by that ignorance, is a fraud, which will nullify the agreement.

Concessi (I have granted), a word of frequent use in conveyances. By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s 4, the word 'grant' in a deed executed after 1st October 1845, shall not imply any covenant in law, in respect of any tenements or hereditaments, except so far as it may, by force of any act of Parliament, imply a covenant.

Concessimus (we have granted).

Concessio per regem fieri debet de certitudine. 9 Co. 46.—(A grant by the King ought to be made from certainty.)

Concessio versus concedentem latam interpretationem habere debeat.—Jenk. Cent. 279.—(A grant ought to have a liberal interpretation against the grantor.)

Concessit solvere (he granted and agreed to pay), an action of debt upon a simple contract. It lies by custom in the London and Bristol city courts.—1 Saund. 68.

Concessor, a grantor.

Concilium, a court; a time and place of meeting. No motion or rule for a concilium is now required.—R. 15, Trin. T. 1853.—(Common Law.)

Concionatores, common-council men, freemen.

Conclusion, a binding act; also the end of a pleading, conveyance.

Concord, an agreement between parties, who intend to levy a fine of lands one to the other, how and in what manner the lands shall pass; it was the foundation and substance of the fine taken and acknowledged by the party before one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, or before commissioners in the country; also an agreement made between two persons, one of whom has a right of action against the other. It is of two kinds, concord executory, and concord executed.—Plowd. 5, 6, 8.

Concordat, a treaty or public act of agreement between the Pope and any prince, relative to some collation of benefices.

Concordiâ parvæ res crescunt et opulentiâ lites.—4 Inst. 74.—(Small means increase by concord, and litigations by opulence.)

Concubaria, a fold, pen, or place where cattle lie.—Cowel.

Concubeant, lying together.

Concubinage, an exception against a woman suing for dower, on the ground that she was the concubine and not the wife of the man of whose land she seeks to be endowed.—Brit. c. 107. As to the right of concubinage allowed to the patriarchs, Jahn (Bib. Antiq. c. x., s. 155) thus observes:—'Concubines (some of whom had previously acted in the humble capacity of maid-servants, and others were females who possessed their freedom) were sometimes permanently associated by mutual consent with individuals of the other sex; but, although this connection was in fact a marriage, and a legitimate one, it was not, nevertheless, confirmed by the ceremonies performed in the case of a wife. The concubine thus associated had a right to claim the privileges of a wife; and it was no longer in the power of her husband to dispose of her by public sale, even if she had previously been his slave.'—Deut. xx. 10–14; Exodus xxi. 9–12.

Concurrent, acting in conjunction; agreeing in the same act; contributing to the same event; contemporaneous; having a similar jurisdiction. As to concurrent writs of summons, see C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 9.

Concussion, the unlawful forcing of another by threats of violence to yield up something of value.

Condiction, a repetition.

Condition, a restraint annexed to a thing, so that by the non-performance, the party to it shall receive prejudice and loss; and by the performance, commodity or advantage; or it is that which is referred to an uncertain chance, which may or may not happen.

There are many kinds of conditions, but the following are the most important.

A condition in a deed, or express, which is joined by express words to a feoffment, lease, or other grant, as if a person make a lease of lands to another, reserving a rent to be paid at a certain day, upon condition that if the lessee fail in payment at the day, then it shall be lawful for the lessor to enter.

A condition in law, or implied, as when a person grants another an office, as that of keeper of a park, steward, bailiff, &c., for term of life; here, though there be no condition expressed in the grant, yet the law implies one, viz. that if the grantee do not justly execute all things belonging to the office, it shall be lawful for the grantor to discharge him from his office.

A condition precedent is when an estate is granted to one for life, upon condition that if the grantee pay to the grantor a certain sum of money at such a day, then he shall have the fee-simple, in this case the condition precedes the estate in fee, and on performance thereof gains the fee-simple.

A condition subsequent is when a man grants to another his estate, &c., in fee, upon condition that the grantee shall pay to him at such a day a certain sum, or that his estate shall cease: here the condition is subsequent, and following the estate, and upon the performance thereof, continues and preserves the same; so that a condition precedent gets and gains the thing or estate made upon condition, by the performance of it, whereas a condition subsequent keeps and continues the estate by the performance of the condition.—Termes de la Ley.

Condition inherent is that which descends to the heir, with the land granted, &c.

Condition collateral is that which is annexed to any collateral act.

Conditions are likewise affirmative, which consist of doing an act; negative, which consist of not doing an act; restrictive, for not doing a thing; compulsory, as that the lessee shall pay rent, &c.; single, to do one thing only; copulative, to do divers things; and disjunctive, where one thing of several is required to be done.—Shep. Touch. 117; 2 Com. Dig. tit. 'Condition;' Bac. Ab. tit. 'Condition.'

Conditio beneficialis, quæ statum construit, benignè secundum verborum intentionem est interpretanda; odiosa autem, quæ statum destruit, strictè secundum verborum proprietatem accipienda.—8 Co. 90.—(A beneficial condition, which creates an estate, ought to be construed favourably, according to the intention of the words; but a condition which destroys an estate is odious, and ought to be construed strictly according to the letter of the words.)

Conditio dicitur, cum quid in casum incertum, qui potest tendere ad esse aut non esse, confertur. Co. Litt. 201.—(It is called a condition, when something is given on an uncertain event, which may or may not come into existence.)

Conditio illicita habetur pro non adjecta.—(An unlawful condition is deemed as not annexed.)

Conditio præcedens adimpleri debet priusquam sequatur effectus.—Co. Litt. 201.—(A condition precedent must be fulfilled before the effect can follow.)

Conditional fee, an estate restrained to some particular heirs, exclusive of others, as to the heirs of a man's body, by which only his lineal descendants were admitted, in exclusion of collateral; or to the heirs male of his body, in exclusion of heirs female whether lineal or collateral. It was called a conditional fee, by reason of the condition expressed or implied in the donation of it, that if the donee died without such particular heirs, the land should revert to the donor. But on the passing of the Statute of Westminster II. commonly called the Statute de donis, the Judges determined that the donee had no longer a conditional fee-simple, which became absolute the instant issue was born; but they divided the estate into two parts, leaving in the donee a new kind of particular estate, which they denominated a fee-tail, and vesting in the donor the ultimate fee-simple of the land expectant on the failure of issue, which expectant estate is what we now call a reversion. And hence it is that tenant in fee-tail is by virtue of the Statute de donis.—2 Bl. Com. 112.

Conditional legacy, a bequest whose existence depends upon the happening or not happening of some uncertain event, by which it is either to take place or to be defeated.—1 Rop. Leg. 645, 3rd edit.

Conditional limitation partakes of the nature both of a condition and a remainder. At the common law, whenever either the whole fee or a particular estate, as an estate for life or in tail was first limited, no condition or other quality could be annexed to this prior estate, which would have the double effect of defeating the estate, and passing the lands to a stranger, for as a remainder it was void, being an abridgment or defeasance of the estate first granted, and as a condition it was void, as no one but the donor or his heirs could take advantage of a condition broken; and the entry of the donor or his heirs unavoidably defeated the livery upon which the remainder depended. On these principles it was impossible by the old law to limit by deed, if not by will, an estate to a stranger upon any event which might abridge or determine an estate previously limited. But the expediency of such limitations, assisted by the revolution effected by the Statute of Uses, at length established them, in spite of the maxim of law that a stranger cannot take advantage of a condition. These limitations are now become frequent, and their mixed nature has given them the name of conditional limitations; they so far partake of the nature of conditions, as they abridge or defeat the estates previously limited, and they are so far limitations, as upon the contingency taking effect, the estate passes to a stranger. Such is the limitation to A. for life, in tail or in fee, provided that when C. returns from Rome, it shall henceforth remain to the use of B. in fee.—2 Bl. Com. 156.

Conditions of sale, the terms set forth in writing, upon which an estate or interest is to be sold by public auction. Conditions of sale will be construed, so as to collect the meaning of the parties, without encumbering them with the technical meaning of words; for as Lord Hardwicke declared, 'there is no magic in words.' But the conditions should be accurate, for they cannot be contradicted by parol at the sale; 'the babble of the auction room,' as Lord Eldon termed it, being inadmissible as evidence, and this, although the purchaser, by the written agreement, bind himself to agree by the conditions and declarations made at the sale. If the conditions require alteration, they should be so altered in writing before the sale.—St. Leon. V. & P. 11; Dart's Comp. c. iv.

Condonation, a pardoning or remission. In cases of adultery it is forgiveness, legally releasing the injury. Beeby v. Beeby, 1 Hagg. Supp. 793. It has been recently explained to be a blotting out of the offence imputed, so as to restore the offending party to the same position which he or she formerly held before the offence was committed. Keats v. Keats, 1 Swab. & T. 334; S. C. 28; L. J. P. & M. 57. See Campbell v. Campbell, Deane's Eccl. R. 288.

Conduct-money, money paid to a witness for his travelling expenses.

Conductio, a hiring.

Coney, a beast of warren.

Confederacy, a combination of two or more persons to do some damage or injury to another, or to commit some unlawful act.

Confederation, a league or compact for mutual support, particularly of princes, nations, or states.

Conference, a species of negotiation between the two Houses of Parliament, conducted by managers appointed on both sides, for the purpose of producing concurrence, in cases where mutual consent is necessary; or for the purpose of reconciling differences which may have arisen. If the conference be upon the subject of a bill depending between the two Houses, it must be demanded by that House which, at the time of asking the conference, is in possession of the bill. It is the sole privilege of the Lords to name the time and place for holding a conference, no matter by which House it may have been demanded. Reasons in writing for the course resolved to be taken, are usually furnished to the managers on both sides, in which case it is simply called 'a conference.' Should this proceeding fail, a 'free conference' must be held, which gives an opportunity for the managers individually, and unrestrained by any precise form of argument, to urge such reasons as in their judgment may best tend to influence the House to which they are addressed. A free conference is usually demanded after two conferences have been holden without effect. After one free conference, none other but free conferences can be held touching the same subject. In May 1851, it was agreed, both by Lords and Commons, that reasons respecting differences of opinion on any bill or other proceeding might be communicated to either House by message from the other, and that no conference need take place, unless specially requested. At all conferences the managers, on the part of the Upper House, are seated, and wear their hats; those for the Commons stand uncovered. The Speaker quits the chair of the House during the absence of managers attending a conference.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

Confession and avoidance, plea of, a plea in bar, admitting the facts alleged in the declaration to be true, but showing some new facts, tending to obviate their legal effect. These pleas are distinguished (in reference to their subject-matter) as pleas in justification or excuse, or as pleas in discharge. The former class of pleas show some justification of or excuse for the matter charged in the declaration: those of the latter some discharge or release. The effect of the former, therefore, is to show that the plaintiff never had any right of action, because the act charged was lawful, the plea of son assault demesne is an example; the effect of the latter is to show, that though he had once a right of action, it is discharged or released by some matter subsequent, as a release, &c. This division applies to pleas only, for replications, or other subsequent pleadings in confession and avoidance, are not subject to any such classification.—Step. Plead. 229; 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 234.

Confession by culprit, the acknowledgment by a criminal of the offence charged against him when called upon to plead to the indictment. The criminal may confess the offence openly in court, and submit himself to the judgment of the law, so that the confession be of his own accord, without any threats or extremity used; and sometimes he confesses the indictment to be true, and then becomes an approver or accuser of others, who are guilty of the same offence for which he is indicted, or of other offences with him. There was a third sort of confession, formerly made by an offender in felony, not in court before the Judge, but before the coroner in a church or other privileged place, upon which the offender, by the ancient law of the land, was to abjure the land.—3 Inst. 129.

Confession, judgment by. See COGNOVIT.

Confessio, facta in judicio, omni probatione major est.—Jenk. Cent. 102.—(A confession made in judgment is greater than all proof.)

Confesso, bill taken pro, an order which the Court of Chancery makes when the defendant does not file an answer that the plaintiff may take such a decree as the case made by his bill warrants. For the practice as to taking bills pro confesso, see Consol. Ord. 1860, Ord. xxii.; Smi. Ch. Pr. 266.

Confessus in judicio pro judicato habetur, et quodammodo suâ sententiâ damnatur.—11. Co. 30.—(A person confessing his guilt when arraigned is deemed to have been found guilty, and is, as it were, condemned by his own sentence.)

Confidential communication, a privileged communication, which see.

Confirmatio Chartarum, the 25 Edw. I A.D. 1297. This statute being in the form of a charter, was sealed with the King's Great Seal, at Ghent in Flanders, on Nov. 5th, as appears by a memorandum upon the roll. It gave that security to personal property which Magna Charta gave to personal liberty.—Barr on Statutes, 173.

Confirmation, a species of conveyance by which a voidable estate is made valid and unavoidable, or by which a particular estate is increased. The operative words are, 'ratified and confirmed;' though, for safety, it is usual and prudent to insert the words, 'given and granted.' Estates which are void cannot be confirmed, but only those which are voidable.—Watkins's Conv. 321. A confirmation does not strengthen a void estate; for a confirmation may make a voidable or defeasible estate good, but it cannot work upon an estate that is void at law.—Co. Litt. 295 b.

Confirmation and Probate Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 56, amended by 22 Vict. c. 30.

Confirmare est id firmum facere quod prius infirmum fuit.—Co. Litt. 295.—(To confirm is to make firm that which was before infirm.)

Confirmare nemo potest priusquam jus ei acciderit.—10 Co. 48.—(No person can confirm before that the right shall fall to him.)

Confirmat usum qui tollit abusum.—Moor, 764.—(He confirms a use who removes an abuse.)

Confirmatio est nulla ubi donum præcedens est invalidum.—Moor, 764.—(There is no confirmation where the preceding gift is invalid.)

Confirmatio omnes supplet defectus, licet id quod actum est ab initio non valuit.—Co. Litt. 295 b.—(Confirmation supplies all defects, though that which has been done was not valid at the beginning.)

Confiscation [fr. confiscor, from fiscus, Lat., which signifies, metonymically, the emperor's treasure], the condemnation and adjudication of goods or effects to the public treasury, as the bodies and effects of criminals, traitors, &c.

Conflict, opposition; also the difference between two judicial jurisdictions when they both claim the right to decide a cause, or where they both declare their incompetency. The first is called a positive, and the latter a negative conflict.

Conformity, bill of. When an executor or administrator finds the affairs of his testator or intestate so much involved that he cannot safely administer the estate, except under the direction of the Court of Chancery, he files this bill against the creditors generally, for the purpose of having all their claims adjusted, and a final decree settling the order and payment of the assets. This bill is so called, probably because the executor or administrator in such case undertakes to conform to the decree, or the creditors are compelled by the decree to conform thereto.—1 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 440.

Confrairie, a fraternity, brotherhood, or society.

Confreres, brethren in a religious house, fellows of one and the same society.

Confusion, a mode of extinguishing a debt, in the French law, by the concurrence in the same person of two qualities which mutually destroy one another. This may occur in several ways, as where the creditor becomes the heir of the debtor, or the debtor the heir of the creditor, or either accedes to the title of the other by any other mode of transfer.—Pothier on Oblig. by Evans, n. 606–609.

Also unnatural intimacy with beasts, or of a man with his daughter-in-law.—Lev. xviii. 25; xx. 12.

Confusion of boundaries, a jurisdiction of equity, concurrent with the common law. The civil law was far more provident than ours upon the subject of boundaries. It considered that there was a tacit agreement or duty between adjacent proprietors to keep up and preserve the boundaries between their respective estates: and it enabled all persons having an interest to bring a suit to have the boundaries between them settled; and this, whether they were tenants for years, usufructaries, mortgagees, or proprietors. The action was called actio finium regundorum; and if the possession were also in dispute, that might be ascertained and fixed in the same suit, and indeed was incident to it. Equity adopts this general rule, not to entertain jurisdiction in cases of confusion of boundaries, upon the ground that the boundaries are in controversy; but to require that there should be some equity superinduced by the act of the parties; such as some particular circumstances of fraud, or some confusion, where one person has ploughed too near another, or some gross negligence, omission, or misconduct on the part of persons whose special duty it is to preserve or perpetuate the boundaries. Where there is an ordinary legal remedy there is certainly no ground for the interference of equity, unless some peculiar equity supervenes which a court of law cannot take notice of or protect.—1 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 495.

Confusion, property by. Where goods of two persons are so intermixed, that the several portions can no longer be distinguished, if the intermixture be by consent, it is supposed that the proprietors have an interest in common, in proportion to their respective shares; but if one wilfully intermix his money, corn, or hay, with that of another man, without his approbation or knowledge, or cast gold in like manner into another's melting-pot or crucible, our law allows no remedy in such a case, but gives the entire property without any account to him whose original dominion or property is invaded, and endeavoured to be rendered uncertain without his consent.—2 Bl. Com. 405. See also Vin. Abr. Justification (B) and Instit. of Justin. l. ii. tit. 1, ss. 27-34.

The general rule, that, as against an agent, who has mixed the property of his employer with his own, so as to render it undistinguishable, the whole may, both at law and in equity, be taken to be the property of the employer, is well settled; but the same rule does not, in all cases, hold against the creditors of such agent; for instance, if an agent pay money belonging to his employer, into his own banking-house, and to his general account, this money may not be distinguishable; but should the agent become bankrupt, the whole sum which appears to be due to him from the bankers will go to his assignees, and his employer can only come in as a general creditor under the bankruptcy. So, if the bankers had an account with the agent by way of set-off, that set-off would equally affect the money of his employer paid into the agent's account, as it would the agent's own money, supposing the bankers to have no notice, displacing their equity.—Ex parte Townsend, 15 Ves. 470; Massey v. Banner, 1 Jac. & Walk. 248.

Congeable [fr. congé, Fr., leave], lawful, done with permission.

Congé d'Accorder, leave to accord or agree. 8 Edw. I.

Congé d'Eslire, or d'Elire (leave to choose). The Queen's license or permission sent to a dean and chapter to proceed to the election of a bishop, when a see becomes vacant.

Congress, an assembly of envoys, commissioners, deputies, &c. from different courts, who meet to concert measures for their common good, or to adjust their mutual concerns.

Congress of the United States of America, the assembly of senators and representatives of the several states of North America, forming the legislature of the United States. It consists of a Senate and a House of Representatives, each constituting a distinct and independent branch. The House of Representatives is chosen every second year by the people of the several states, and electors are required to have the same qualifications as are requisite for choosing the members of the most numerous branch of the state-legislature of the state in which they vote. Each state, however small its population, is entitled to at least one representative; but upon the whole population there cannot be more than one for every 30,000 persons. No person can be a representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and have been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that state for which he shall be chosen. No other qualifications are required. The senate is composed of two senators from each state, who are chosen by the legislature of the state for six years. They are divided into three classes, so that one-third thereof is or may be changed by a new election every second year. No person can be a senator who is not thirty years of age and has not been nine years a citizen of the United States, and is not, when elected, an inhabitant of the state for which he is chosen.

The time, place, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives are appointed by the state legislatures. Each house determines the rules of its own proceedings, and has power to punish its members for disorderly conduct. Neither house, during the session of Congress, can, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two houses shall be sitting. The senators and representatives are entitled to receive a compensation provided by law for their services, from the treasury. They are also privileged from arrest for civil causes during the session.

Conjoints, persons married to each other.

Conjugal rights, the right which husband and wife have to each other's society, comfort, and affection. The suit for restitution of conjugal rights is a matrimonial suit, cognizable in the Divorce Court, which is brought whenever either the husband or wife is guilty of the injury of subtraction, or lives separate from the other without any sufficient reason; in which case the court will compel them to come together again, if either party be weak enough to desire it, contrary to the inclination of the other. 3 Bl. 2 Com. 94. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 17.

Conjuratio [fr. conjuro, Lat.], an oath.

Conjuration, a plot or compact made by persons combining by oath to do any public harm; but was more especially used for the having (as was supposed) personal conference with the devil or some evil spirit to know any secret or effect any purpose. The difference between conjuration and witchcraft was said to be, that a person using the one endeavoured, by prayers and invocations, to compel the devil to say or do what he commanded him; the other dealt rather by friendly and voluntary conference or agreement with the devil or familiar, to have his desires served, in lieu of blood or other gift offered. Both differed from enchantment or sorcery, because the latter were supposed to be personal conferences with the devil, and the former were but medicines and ceremonial foam of words, usually called charms, without apparition.—Cowel.

Conquest [fr. conquerir, Fr., to acquire; conquiro, Lat., to seek for], the feodal term for purchase.

Consanguineo. See COSENAGE.

Consanguineus est quasi eodem sanguine natus. Co. Litt. 157.—(Consanguinity is, as it were, sprung from the same blood.)

Consanguineus frater, a brother by the father's side.

Consanguinity, or kindred, the connection or relation of persons descended from the same stock or common ancestor. It is either lineal or collateral. Lineal is that which subsists between persons, of whom one is descended in a direct line from the other as between son, father, grandfather, great grandfather, and so upwards in the direct ascending line; or between son, grandson, great grandson, and so downwards in the direct descending line. Collateral, agree with the lineal in this, that they descend from the same stock or ancestor, but differing in this, that they do not descend one from the other.—2 Bl. Com. 202.

Conscience, courts of, tribunals for the recovery of small debts, constituted by acts of Parliament in the city of London, and other towns. See 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 94. The ordinary constitution of these courts, which are generally for causes of debt to the amount of 40*s.* only, but often to the amount of 5*l.*, is to examine in a summary way, and without jury, by the oath of the parties, or other witnesses, and make such order therein as is consonant to equity and good conscience.—7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. The County Courts have generally superseded them.

Conscientia dicitur a con et scio, quasi scire cum Deo.—1 Co. 100.—(Conscience is called from con and scio, to know, as it were, with God.)

Consecratio est periodus electionis; electio est præambula consecrationis.—2 Rol. R. 102.—(Consecration is the termination of election; election is the preamble of consecration.)

Consensual contract, marriage.

Consensus est voluntas multorum, ad quos res pertinet, simul juncta.—Dav. 48.—(Consent is the conjoint will of many persons, to whom the thing belongs.)

Consensus facit matrimonium.—(Consent constitutes marriage.)

Consent is absolutely necessary to matrimony, and therefore persons non compotes mentis, cannot enter into this, or indeed any other contract.

Consensus, non concubitus, facit nuptias vel matrimonium, et consentire non possunt ante annos nubiles.—6 Co. 22.—(Consent, and not cohabitation, constitutes nuptials or marriage, and persons cannot consent before marriageable years.)

Consensus tollit errorem.—Co. Litt. 126.—(Consent removes mistake.)

Consent, an act of reason accompanied with deliberation, the mind weighing, as in a balance, the good or evil on either side. Consent supposes three things: a physical power, a mental power, and a free and serious use of them. Hence it is that if consent be obtained by meditated imposition, circumvention, surprise, or undue influence, it is to be treated as a delusion, and not as a deliberate and free act of the mind. For although the law will not generally examine into the wisdom or prudence of men in disposing of their property; or in binding themselves by contracts, or by other acts; yet it will not suffer them to be entrapped by the fraudulent contrivances, cunning, or deceitful management of those who purposely mislead them.—1 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 186.

Consentientes et agentes pari pœnâ plectentur. 5 Co. 80.)—Those consenting and those perpetrating are embraced in the same punishment.)

Consent-rule, a superseded instrument in writing, which a defendant in an action of ejectment entered into, before the fiction was abolished, at the time he entered an appearance, in which he specified for what purposes he intended to defend, and also undertook to confess upon the trial, not only the fictitious lease, entry, and ouster, but that he (if he defended as tenant; or if he defended as landlord, then that his tenant) was at the time of the service of the declaration in the possession of such premises, and that if upon the trial the defendant should not confess such possession, as well as lease, entry, and ouster, whereby the plaintiff should not be able further to prosecute his suit against the defendant, then no costs should be allowed for not further prosecuting the same, but the defendant should pay the taxed costs to the plaintiff. The consent-rule was signed by the defendant's attorney, and marked by the master at the time of entering appearance, a copy of it was then delivered with the plea, to the plaintiff's attorney, who signed it, and drew up the rule at the Master's office, a copy of which was annexed to the issue, and served upon defendant's attorney.

Consequentiæ non est consequentia.—Bac.—(The consequence of a consequence exists not.)

Consequential damages, those losses or injuries which follow an act, but are not direct and immediate upon it.

Conservancy courts, held by the Lord Mayor of London for the preservation of the fishery on the river Thames.

Conservative, the name of a political party, first assumed in 1830.—xliii. Quart. Rev. 276.

Conservator, a protector, preserver, or maintainer; or a standing arbitrator chosen and appointed as a guarantee, to compose and adjust differences that should arise between two parties, &c.

Conservators of the Peace, officers appointed by the common law for the maintenance of the public peace. Of these, some had and still have this power annexed to other offices which they hold, others had it merely by itself, and were thence called custodes, or conservatores pacis. Those that were so, virtute officii, still continue; but the latter sort are superseded by the modern justices.

The Queen's Majesty is, by her office and dignity royal, the principal conservator of the peace within all her dominions, and may give authority to any other to see the peace kept and to punish such as break it; hence it is called the Queen's peace. The Lord Chancellor, or keeper, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord High Steward of England, the Lord Mareschal, the Lord High Constable of England (when any such officers are in being), and all the justices of the Court of Queen's Bench (by virtue of their offices), and the Master of the Rolls (by prescription), are general conservators of the peace throughout the whole kingdom, and may commit all breakers of it, or bind them in recognizances to keep it; the other judges are only so in their own courts The coroner is also a conservator of the peace within his own county, as is also the sheriff; so are the constables, tything men, and the like.—2 Step. Com. 648.

Conservators of truce and safe conducts, officers appointed at ports to hear and determine questions relating to the breaking of truce and safe conducts, and the abetting and receiving truce breakers, which offence was, in affirmance and support of the law of nations, declared to be treason. It was enacted by 31 Hen. VI. c. 4, that if any of the King's subjects attempt or offend upon the sea, or in any port within the King's obeisance, against any stranger in amity, league, or truce, or under safe conduct, and especially by attacking his person, or spoiling him, or robbing him of his goods, the Lord Chancellor, with any of the justices of either the King's Bench or Common Pleas, should cause full restitution and amends to be made to the party injured. This statute is in force.

Consideratio curiæ, the judgment of the court.

Consideration, the price, motive, or matter of inducement of a contract, which must be lawful in itself.

The consideration is the very life of a simple contract or parol agreement, while a specialty does not require a consideration to make it obligatory at law, the law always presuming a sufficient consideration, which the parties, except in special cases, are estopped from denying. The law, then, not only requires a consideration in the case of a simple contract (under which term is included all contracts not under seal, whether oral or written), but that it should be valuable, i. e. a legal consideration emanating from some injury or inconvenience to the one party, or from some benefit to the other party. A good consideration, i. e. an equitable consideration, founded upon mere love, affection, or gratitude, will not support a contract.

Considerations divide themselves into (1) valuable; and (2) insufficient. Valuable may be thus classed:—

(α) Benefit and injury. The principal requisite, and that which is the essence of every consideration, is, that it should create some benefit to the party promising, or some trouble, prejudice, or inconvenience to the party to whom the promise is made. It is not necessary that the consideration and promise should be equivalent in actual value, for it would be impossible precisely to determine whether in a given case the consideration were adequate, without a psychological investigation into the motive of the parties. If the consideration, however, be so insufficient as to 'shock the conscience,' equity would quash the contract, upon the ground that such great inequality betokens fraud or undue advantage on the one side, or mental incompetency on the other.

(β) Forbearance, for a certain or reasonable time to institute a suit upon a well-founded claim, or even upon one which is doubtful, but not upon one utterly unfounded, is sufficient, since it is a benefit to the one party, and a prejudice to the other. If the time of forbearance be stated, it must be a reasonable time, and an agreement to forbear per breve aut paululum tempus, or pro aliquo tempore will not be sufficient, inasmuch as the party promising may, in such case, sue immediately after the promise is made.

(γ) Assignment of a chose in action, unless it be void on account of maintenance. Assignments of choses in action are void at common law, unless the original debtor expressly promise to pay the assignee, or unless the assignment be made with his assent, in which case the law implies a promise from him to the assignee, the consideration of which is the discharge of liability to the assignor, in respect of the claim. See Choses in Action.

(δ) Mutual promises are concurrent considerations, and will support each other if they be made simultaneously, unless one or the other be void.

(ε) Considerations moving from third persons. It is a general rule that in cases of simple contract, if one party make a promise to another for the benefit of a third, although no consideration move from such third person, it is binding, and either the party to whom it is made, or the party for whose benefit it is made, may maintain an action upon it.

Insufficient considerations may be divided into:—

(α) Gratuitous, which are void for want of consideration; for, however obligatory they may be in morals or in honor, inasmuch as they are not founded upon an injury or deprivation to the promisee, or a benefit to the promisor, they are not regarded by the law as legal and valuable considerations.

(β) Illegal and impossible consideration. A contract may be illegal, because it contravenes the principles of the common law, or the special requisitions of a statute. The former illegality exists whenever the consideration is founded upon a transaction which violates public policy or morality:—as a contract to commit, conceal, or compound a crime; a contract for illicit cohabitation; or a contract in fraud of the rights and interests of third parties. The illegality created by statute exists when the act is either expressly prohibited, or when the prohibition is implied from the nature and object of the statute. A contract founded upon an impossible contract is void; for the law will not compel a man to attempt to do that which is not within the limits of human capacity. Lex neminem cogit ad vana aut impossibilia.

(γ) Moral consideration is not alone a sufficient legal consideration to support either an express or implied promise; for the law, although it will not suffer any immorality, cannot undertake to enforce every promise which a man of strict honor and integrity would feel himself bound to fulfil. The performance, therefore, of many purely moral obligations must be left to the good faith of the individual; and it is neither within the province nor the policy of the law to apply a metaphysical standard of morality to the conduct of men in their common relations of life.

(δ) Executed consideration. A consideration, in regard to the time when it operates, is either —1st, executed, i. e. already performed before the making of the defendant's promise, which must be at the request of the promisor, otherwise it will not support a promise; 2nd, executory, or something to be done after the promise; 3rd, concurrent, as in the case of mutual promises; and 4th, continuing, i. e. executed in part only. The three last classes are sufficient to support a contract not void for other reasons. Story on Contracts, 71.

Since deliberation necessarily accompanies the making and completion of deeds, they are adjudged to bind the party, without examining upon what consideration they were made; for in the deed is a sufficient consideration, viz. the will of the party who made it. A deed therefore must be founded upon good and sufficient consideration, not upon fraud or collusion, either to deceive purchasers bonâ fide, or just and lawful creditors. The consideration may be either good or valuable; good, is such as that of blood, or natural love and affection; valuable, is such as marriage, money, and the like.—2 Bl. Com. 296. See also Smith on Contracts.

Consideratum est per curiam (it is considered by the court).—3 Step. Com. 665.

Consignation [fr. consigno, Lat., to write down], the deposit of a thing owed with a third person, under the authority of a court.—Civil Law.

Consignment, the delivery of goods to another for sale or purchase. He who consigns the goods is called the consignor, and the person to whom they are sent is called the consignee.

Consilia multorum quæruntur in magnis.—4 Inst. 1.—(The counsels of many are required in great things.)

Consistory Court, the prætorium or tribunal of every diocesan bishop, held in their several cathedrals for the trial of all ecclesiastical causes arising within their jurisdiction. The bishop's chancellor, or his commissary, is the judge, and from his sentence an appeal lies, by virtue of 24 Hen. VIII. c. 12, to the archbishop of each province respectively.

The ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Consistory Court of Edinburgh is restricted, and a large portion of its business is transferred to the courts of the sheriffs.—11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 69.

Consolato del mare, il, a code of sea-laws compiled by order of the ancient kings of Arragon.

Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, a repository of public money, which now comprises the produce of customs, excise, stamps, and several other taxes, and some small receipts from the royal hereditary revenue, surrendered to the public use; and constitutes almost the whole of the public income of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. This fund is pledged for the payment of the whole of the interest of the national debt of Great Britain and Ireland; and besides this is liable to several other specific charges imposed upon it at various periods by act of Parliament, such as the civil list, and the salaries of the judges and ambassadors, and other high official persons; after payment of which, the surplus is to be indiscriminately applied to the service of the United Kingdom, under the direction of Parliament.—2 Step. Com. 587. See 56 Geo. III. c. 98; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 3, s. 101; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 59.

Consolidating Actions. If two or more actions be brought by the same plaintiff, at the same time, against the same defendant, for causes of action which might have been joined in the same action, the court or a judge at chambers, if they deem the proceedings oppressive, will, in general, compel the plaintiff, by rule or order, to join (i.e. consolidate) them, and to pay the costs of the application, which may be made at any time after appearance, though before declaration. The rule will seldom be granted in penal actions. If the plaintiff is defeated in one of the actions he may try another, consolidated in the rule, without applying to the court. Where several actions are brought on the same policy of insurance, the court, or a Judge, upon the application of the defendants, will grant a rule or order, to stay the proceedings in all the actions but one, the defendants undertaking to be bound by the verdict in such action, and to pay the amount of their several subscriptions and costs, if the plaintiff should recover, together with such other terms as the court or a Judge may think proper to impose upon them.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1297; Arnould on Marine Insurance.

Consolidation, in the civil law, the uniting the possession, occupancy, or profits, &c., of land with the property, and vice versâ; in the ecclesiastical law, the uniting two benefices by assent of the ordinary, patron, and incumbent.

Consols, funds formed by the consolidation (of which word it is an abbreviation) of different annuities, which had been severally formed into a capital.

Consortio malorum me quoque malum facit.—Moor, 817.—(The company of wicked men makes me also wicked.)

Conspiracy, a combination or agreement between several persons to carry into effect a purpose hurtful to some individual, or to particular classes of the community, or to the public at large; though this is subject to exceptions in the case where the offence is a felonious one and actually accomplished, the offence of conspiracy, which is a misdemeanour only, being then merged in the felony. Conspiracy has been frequently defined to be, an agreement for an unlawful purpose, or to effect a lawful purpose by unlawful means; but this antithetical definition was questioned in Reg. v. Peck, 9 A. & E. 686.

The law has given a very adequate remedy in damages, for preferring malicious indictments or prosecutions against a person, either by an action of conspiracy, which cannot be brought but against two at the least, and is confined to the particular case where the plaintiff has been acquitted by verdict, upon an accusation of treason or felony, or, which is the only way now known in practice, by an action on the case for a false and malicious prosecution, which may be brought either against a single person or against several, with an allegation that they conspired together for the purpose.—2 Selw. N. P. 1071.

Conspiratione, the writ that lay against conspirators.—Reg. Orig. 134; F. N. B. 114.

Conspirators, those who bind themselves by oath, covenant, or other alliance, that each of them shall aid the other falsely and maliciously to indict persons; or falsely to move and maintain pleas, &c.—33 Edw. I. st. 2. Besides these, there are conspirators in treasonable purposes: as for plotting against the government.

Constable [fr. comes stabuli, Lat., in the eastern empire a superintendent of the imperial stables, or the emperor's master of the horse, who at length obtained the command of the army], an officer to whom our law commits the duty of maintaining the peace, and bringing to justice those by whom it is infringed.

Constables are of two sorts, high and petty. The former, called also chief constables, were first ordained by the Statute of Winchester, 13 Edw. I. st. 2, c. 6, are appointed at the courts-leet of the franchise or hundred over which they preside, or in default of that, then by the justices at their special sessions, as directed by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 33, s. 8. The petty constables are inferior officers in every town and parish; subordinate to the high constable of the hundred, and first instituted about the reign of Edward III. These petty constables have two offices united in them; the one ancient, the other modern. Their ancient office is that of head-borough, tithing-man and borsholder; their more modern office is that of constable merely. The proper duty of the high constable seems to be to keep the Queen's peace within the hundred, as the petty constable does within the parish or township. He is also, by various statutes, charged with other duties; such as that of serving precepts and warrants on certain occasions, and the returning of lists of jurors. An action cannot be brought against a constable for what he does as constable, after the expiration of six months from the commission of the act, and without making a written demand of a perusal and copy of his warrant, six days at least before the action is commenced.—24 Geo. II. c. 24, s. 6.

Petty constables, head-boroughs, tithing-men, and borsholders, were formerly all chosen by the jury at the court-leet; or if no court-leet were held, then by two justices of the peace. But it is now provided by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 109, intituled 'An Act for the Appointment and Payment of Parish Constables,' that for the future no petty constable, head-borough, borsholder, tithing-man, or peace officer of the like description, shall be appointed for any parish, township, or vill, within the limits of that act at any court-leet or tourn, except for the performance of duties unconnected with the preservation of the peace and with the execution of that act. This act does not apply to the city of London, or the metropolitan police district, or any borough within the Municipal Act, or any parish which levies rates for the payment of constables under 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 90, or under any local act, or to the county of Chester.—10 Geo. IV. c. 44, and 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47. Special constables are appointed on particular occasions, 41 Geo. III. c. 78; 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 41; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 43; and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 80. County and district constables were established by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 93; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88; and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 89.—Burns' Justice, tit. 'Constable.' See 7 & 8 Vict. c. 52; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 20; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 69.

Constablewick, the jurisdiction of a constable.

Constat, a certificate which the clerk of the pipe and auditors of the Exchequer make, at the request of any person who intends to plead or move in that court, for the discharge of anything. The effect of it is, the certifying what appears (constat) upon record, touching the matter in question. It is held to be superior to an ordinary certificate, because it does not contain anything but what appears on record. An exemplification of the enrolment of letters-patent under the Great Seal is called a constat.—Co. Litt. 225; Page's case, 5 Rep. 52.

Constituent, one who, by his vote, constitutes or elects a member of parliament.

Constituimus (we constitute or appoint).

Constitution, any regular form or system of government. It is either (1) Democratic, when the fundamental law guarantees to every citizen equal rights, protection, and participation, direct or indirect, in the government; such is the constitution of the United States of America, and of some Cantons of Switzerland. (2) Aristocratic, when the constitution establishes privileged classes, as the nobility, and entrusts the government entirely to them or allows them a very disproportionate share of it, such as was that of Venice. (3) Mixed, to which belong some monarchical constitutions which require the existence of a sovereign, whose power is modified by other branches of government, of a more or less popular cast. Of this kind is the British constitution, consisting of the Sovereign, the House of Lords, and the House of Commons. 1 Bl. Com.; De Lolme on the Constitution; Hall. Middle Ages and Constit. Hist. Also a particular law, ordinance, or regulation made by the authority of any superior; as the novel constitutions of Justinian and his successors; the constitutions of Clarendon; the ecclesiastical constitutions, &c. As to the character of the English constitution, see 3 Hall. M. A. p. 153.

Constitutor, a person who has promised to pay the debt of another.

Constraint, duress.

Constructio legis non facit injuriam.—Co. Litt. 183.—(The construction of law does not work an injury.)

Constructive notice. See NOTICE.

Constructive total loss, a term used in the law of marine insurance to denote a loss which entitles the assured to claim the whole amount of his insurance, on giving to the assurers notice of abandonment. Generally there is a constructive total loss when the subject matter insured has not actually perished or lost its form or species, but has, by one of the perils insured against, been reduced to such a state or placed in such a position as to make its total destruction, though not inevitable, yet highly imminent, or its ultimate arrival under the terms of the policy, though not utterly hopeless, yet exceedingly doubtful. In such a case the assured, by giving notice within a reasonable time to the assurers of abandonment, i. e. the relinquishment of all his right to whatever may be saved, is entitled to recover against them as for a total loss. See Arnould on Marine Insurance.

Constructive treason, an attempt to establish treason by circumstantiality, and not by the simple genuine letter of the law, and therefore highly dangerous to public freedom.—Erskine's Defence of Lord George Gordon; 3 Hall. Cons. Hist. c. xv. p. 151. See TREASON.

Constructive trust, which arises from equitable operation; thus, when an estate is subject to a trust or equitable interest or lien, and a person purchases it for value, with either actual or constructive notice of it, the estate will still be subject to the trust, or equitable interest in the hands of such a purchaser. To this general rule, however, there is an exception in the case of a disseisor, abator, or intruder, who cannot hold in trust, although he have notice of it, for he is not in in privity of the estate, to which it is annexed, but in the post, which is inconsistent with the trust. And notice of an unenrolled bargain and sale, or of an unregistered deed, will bind a purchaser; but notice of a fraud will not convert the person receiving it into a trustee. So a person acquiring an estate as a voluntary grantee, even without notice, or as a devisee, will take it subject to every equitable interest, for equity will presume notice where no consideration has been paid.

Of course, if a person purchase of a trustee, or from a purchaser affected with notice, for a valuable consideration without notice, he will hold the estate discharged of the trust.

It is not clear how far a purchaser may be affected by notice of a constructive trust; notice of an equitable title, it is to be observed, is very different from notice of a legal title; the result of the authorities appears to be, that where the construction to be put on the words of the instrument on which the equitable title arises may admit of serious doubt, the purchaser will not be bound, though the Court may consider that the words do give an equitable title; on a similar principle the Court will not, at least in a doubtful case, rectify a settlement as against a purchaser, though the case might be clear as against a volunteer.—2 Sp. Eq. Jurisd. 195.

The doctrine of constructive trusts also arises upon the renewal of a lease by a trustee, or executor, or executor de son tort, or person having a limited interest in his own name, even in the absence of a fraud, and upon the refusal of the lessor to grant a new lease to the cestui que trust, or expectant; for such renewed lease is held upon trust for the person beneficially entitled to the old lease or the expectant in order to prevent persons in fiduciary situations from acting so as to take a benefit for themselves. This doctrine is extended to the renewal of leases by one of several persons, or partners, jointly interested, by an agent, mortgagor, mortgagee, or person jointly interested with an infant, but, if the renewed lease turn out not to be beneficial, the person renewing must sustain the loss; if beneficial, the infant can claim his share of the benefit to be derived from it.

A renewing trustee, and a volunteer claiming under him, as well as a purchaser from him with notice will be directed to assign the lease free from incumbrances, except a bonâ fide lease made by him at the best rent, and to account for the mesne rents and profits; but he will be entitled to be indemnified against his covenants with the lessor, and will have a lien upon the estate, for the costs of renewal, and the expenses of lasting improvements with interest.—See the leading authority on this subject, Keech v. Sandford, otherwise called the Romford Market Case (1726), 1 White & Tudor, L. C. 32–39.

Constructive use. See USE.

Consuetudinarius, a ritual or book, containing the rights and forms of divine offices, or the customs of abbeys and monasteries.

Consul, an officer appointed by competent authority to reside in foreign countries, to facilitate and extend the commerce carried on between the subjects of the country which appoints him and those of the country or place in which he is to reside. The office appears to have originated in Italy, about the middle of the twelfth century, and was generally established all over Europe in the sixteenth century. British consuls were formerly appointed by the Crown, upon the recommendation of great trading companies, or of merchants engaged in trade with a particular country and place; but they are now directly appointed by government, without requiring any such recommendation, though it, of course, is always attended to when made. The right of sending consuls to reside in foreign countries depends either upon a tacit or express convention.

The duties of a consul, even in the confined sense in which they are commonly understood, are important and multifarious. It is his business to be always on the spot, to watch over the commercial interests of the subjects of the state whose servant he is; to be ready to assist them with advice on all doubtful occasions; to see that the conditions in commercial treaties are properly observed; that those he is appointed to protect are subjected to no unnecessary or unjustifiable demands in conducting their business; to represent their grievances to the authorities at the place where they reside, or to the ambassador of the sovereign appointing him, at the court on which the consulship depends, or to the government at home; in a word, to exert himself to render the condition of the subjects of the country employing him, within the limits of his consulship, as comfortable, and their transactions as advantageous and secure as possible.

The following more detailed exposition of the general duties of a British consul is taken from Mr. Chitty's work on Commercial Law:—

A British consul, in order to be properly qualified for his employment, should take care to make himself master of the language used by the court and the magistracy of the country where he resides, so as to converse with ease upon subjects relating to his duties. If the common people of the port use another, he must acquire that also, that he may be able to settle little differences without troubling the magistracy of the place for the interposition of their authority; such as accidents happening in the harbour, by the ships of his nation running foul of and doing damage to each other.

He is to make himself acquainted, if he be not already, with the law of nations and treaties, with the tariff or specification of duties on articles imported or exported, and with all the municipal ordinances and laws.

He must take especial notice of all prohibitions to prevent the export or import of any articles, as well on the part of the state wherein he resides, as of the government employing him; so that he may admonish all British subjects against carrying on an illicit commerce, to the detriment of the revenues, and in violation of the laws, of either. And it is his duty to attend diligently to this part of his office, in order to prevent smuggling; and consequent hazard of confiscation, or detention, of ships, and imprisonment of the masters and mariners.

It is also his duty to protect from insult or imposition British subjects of every description within his jurisdiction. If redress for injury suffered is not obtained, he is to carry his complaint by memorial to the British minister residing at the court on which the consulship depends. If there be none, he is to address himself to the court; and if, in an important case, his complaint be not answered, he is to transmit the memorial to her Majesty's Secretary of State.

When insult or outrage is offered by a British subject to a native of the place, and the magistrate thereof complains to the consul, he should summon, and in case of disobedience, may, by armed force, bring before him the offender, and order him to give immediate satisfaction; and if he refuse, he resigns him to the civil jurisdiction of the magistrate, or to the military law of the garrison; nevertheless always acting as counsellor or advocate at his trial, when there is question of life or property.

But if a British subject be accused of an offence alleged to have been committed at sea, within the dominion or jurisdiction of his sovereign, it is then the duty of the consul to claim cognizance of the cause for his sovereign, and to require the release of the party, if detained in prison by the magistracy of the place on any such accusation brought before them, and that all judicial proceedings against him do instantly cease; and he may demand the aid of the power of the country, civil and military, to enable him to secure and put the accused party on board such British ship as he shall think fit, that he may be conveyed to Great Britain, to be tried by the proper judges. If contrary to this requisition, the magistrates of the country persist in proceeding to try the offence, the consul should then draw up and transmit a memorial to the British minister at the court of that country; and if that court give an evasive answer, the consul should, if it be a sea offence, apply to the Board of Admiralty in London, stating the case; and upon their representation, the secretary for the proper department will lay the matter before the Sovereign, who will cause the ambassador of the foreign state, resident in England, to write to his court abroad, desiring that orders may immediately be given by that government that all judicial proceedings against the prisoner be stayed, and that he be released.

It is the duty of a British consul to relieve all distressed British mariners, to allow them 6*d*. daily for their support, to send them home in the first British vessels that sail for England, and to keep a regular account of his disbursements, which he is to transmit yearly, or oftener if required, to the Navy Office, attested by two British merchants of the place; this is provided for by positive enactment, 1 Geo. II. s 2, c. 14, s. 12. He is also to give free passes to all poor British subjects wishing to return home, directed to the captains of the Queen's packet boats, or ships of war, requiring them to take them on board.

The consul is not to permit a British merchant ship to leave the port where he resides without her passport, which he is not to grant until the master and crew thereof have satisfied all just demands upon them; and for this purpose, he ought to see the governor's pass of a garrisoned town, or the burgomaster's; unless the merchant or factor to whom the ship was consigned will make himself responsible.

It is also his duty to claim and recover all wrecks, cables, and anchors, belonging to British ships, found at sea by fishermen or other persons, to pay the usual salvage, and to communicate a report thereof to the Navy Board.

The consuls and vice-consuls are, by express enactment (46 Geo. III. c. 98, s. 9), empowered to administer oaths in all cases respecting quarantine, in like manner as if they were magistrates of the several towns or places where they respectively reside, and see 6 Geo. IV. c. 87, s. 20. It is also laid down that a consul is to attend, if requested, all arbitrations where property is concerned, between masters of British ships and the freighters, being inhabitants of the place where he resides.—Chitty's Comm. Law, vol. i. 58-61.

Any person, whether he be a subject of the state by which he is appointed, or of another, may be selected to fill the office of consul, provided he be approved and admitted by the government in whose territory he is to reside. In most instances, however, but not always, consuls are the subjects of the state appointing them.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Consulta ecclesia, a church full or provided for.—Cowel.

Consultary response, the opinion of a court of law on a special case.

Consultation, a writ in the nature of a procedendo, whereby a cause, having been removed by prohibition from the ecclesiastical court to the king's court, is returned thither again; for if the judges of the king's court, upon comparing the libel with the suggestion of the party, find the suggestion false or not proved, and therefore the cause to be wrongfully removed from the ecclesiastical court, then upon this consultation or deliberation they decree it to be returned, whereupon the writ in this case obtained is called a consultation.—24 Edw. I.; Reg. Orig. 44. Also a meeting for deliberating or advising with counsel.

Consummate, tenant by courtesy, is when a husband, upon his wife's death, becomes entitled to hold her lands in fee simple or fee tail, of which she was seized during the marriage, for his own life, provided he has had issue by her, capable of inheriting.

Consummation, the completion of a thing.

Contango. Contracts for shares on the Stock Exchange, London, are made for ready money, or for payment on 'settling' days; if for ready money, the money is paid immediately; if for time, it is paid on the settling day. The price at which stock or shares is sold, to be transferred on the next settling day, is called the 'price for account.' In the London share market, the 'account day' is generally twice a month. The 'settling day' is always the day before the account day. On the settling day takes place the business of giving the names of the persons for whom brokers have bought, and that of carrying over transactions to another day, which are called 'continuances,' the commission for which is called 'contango.' Foreign railway shares are subject to the same rules as English shares. And in foreign stocks, the account and settling days are one and the same. See Wilkinson's Law of Public Funds, 155, et seq.

Contemporanea expositio est optima et fortissima in lege.—2 Inst. 11.—(A contemporaneous exposition is the best and most powerful in law.)

'Great regard,' says Sir Edward Coke, 'ought, in construing a statute, to be paid to the construction which the sages of the law who lived about the time, or soon after it was made, put upon it, because they were best able to judge of the intention of the makers at the time when the law was made.'

These four points are to be considered in the interpretation of all statutes, be they penal or beneficial, restrictive of, or enlarging, the common law:—1st, what was the common law before the making of the act; 2ndly, what was the mischief and defect for which the common law did not provide; 3rdly, what remedy the Parliament has resolved and appointed to cure the disease of the commonwealth; and, 4thly, the true reason of the remedy; and then the office of the judges is always to make such construction as shall suppress the mischief and advance the remedy.—3 Rep. 7.

Contempt, a disobedience to the rules, orders, or process of a court, which has power to punish for such offence by attachment. Contempts are either direct, which only insult or resist the powers of the court, or the persons of the judges who preside there; or consequential, which, without such gross insolence or direct opposition, plainly tend to create a universal disregard of their authority. The principal instances of either sort are:—(1) Those committed by inferior judges and magistrates by acting unjustly, oppressively, and irregularly in administering those portions of justice which are entrusted to their distribution, or by disobeying any writs issued out from the superior courts, by proceeding in a cause after it is put a stop to or removed by writ of prohibition, certiorari, error, supersedeas, and the like. (2) Those committed by sheriffs, bailiffs, gaolers, and other officers of the court, by abusing the process of the law, or deceiving persons, or by any acts of oppression, extortion, collusive behaviour, or culpable neglect of duty. (3) Those committed by attornies or solicitors, who are officers of their respective courts, by gross instances of fraud or corruption, injustice to their clients, or other dishonest practices. (4) Those committed by jurymen in collateral matters, relating to the discharge of their office, such as making default when summoned, refusing to be sworn or to give any verdict, eating or drinking without the leave of the court, and especially at the cost of either litigant. (5) Those committed by witnesses, by making default when summoned, refusing to be sworn or examined, or prevaricating in their evidence. (6) Those committed by parties to any suit or proceeding in a court; as by disobedience to any rule or order made in the progress of a cause, by non-payment of costs, or by non-observance of awards made rules of court. (7) Those committed by any other persons under the degree of a peer, and even by peers themselves, when enormous and accompanied by violence. —4 Bl. Com. 233.

Contenement, a man's countenance or credit, which he has together with, and by reason of, his freehold; or, that which is necessary for the support and maintenance of men, agreeably to their several qualities or states of life.

Contentious business, a term used in the Court of Probate, meaning generally the business of obtaining probate or administration when there is a contest, as opposed to non-contentious business when there is no such contest.

Contentious jurisdiction, jurisdiction to hear and determine any matter between party and party in an action or other judicial proceeding.

Contestation, an issue or controversy.

Contestatio litis eget terminos contradictarios. Jenk. Cent. 117.—(The joinder of issue in a suit needs contradictory terms.)

Contingency with a double aspect, when one event only is expressed by the party, and two events are clearly in his contemplation. This is a construction in favour of the intention, that the intention may not be frustrated. The general rule is, that an interest to commence on a contingency shall not take place unless that contingency shall arise. It is in a few cases only that this favour is extended by construction. The exception seems to have been borrowed from the mode in which remainders are limited, and the construction which the limitations of remainders receive; and under which every estate will take place after the preceding estate, without regard to the particular time at which, by the words of the remainder, the estate is to take place. In these cases the court proceeds on the intention that the determination of every prior or intermediate estate shall accelerate the commencement of the more remote estate. It is on similar grounds of intention that the contingency with double aspect is allowed; for it is allowed on the idea that, by the intent of the testator, the estate limited on a contingency referible to one estate, shall also take place in case the contingency should not arise on which the prior gift is to vest an interest; and then, in point of law, the contingency has a double aspect: providing, by expression, for a contingency annexed to the interest previously limited, and also, by inference and construction of law, for the event that the contingency on which the prior interest is to vest, shall never arise.

Mr. Fearne (Cont. Rem. 373) has the following passage on this sort of contingency:—'However, we are to remember, that although a fee cannot, in conveyances at common law, be mounted on a fee; yet two or more several contingent fees may be limited merely as substitutes or alternatives one for the other, and not to interfere; but so that one only take effect, and every subsequent limitation be a disposition substituted in the room of the former, if the former should fail of effect. Thus in the case of Loddington v. Kime (1 Ld. Raym. 208), which was a devise to A. for life, without impeachment of waste, and if he have issue male, then to such issue male and his heirs for ever; and if he die without issue male, then to B. and his heirs for ever; it was held, that the first remainder was a contingent remainder in fee to the issue of A., and the remainder to B. was also a contingent fee, not contrary to, or in any degree derogatory from, the effect of the former, but by way of substitution for it. And this sort of alternative limitation was termed a contingency with a double aspect. For if A. had issue male, the remainder was to vest in that issue in fee; but if A. had no issue male, then it was to vest in B. in fee; and these were limitations of which the one was not expectant upon, and to take effect after the other, but were cotemporary; to commence from the same period, not indeed together, but the one to take effect in lieu of the other, if that failed.'

Contingent legacy, one that is bequeathed to a legatee, at twenty-one, or if, when, or provided he shall attain twenty-one; if the legatee die before that age, the legacy lapses. The 33rd section of 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 26, enacts:—'That where any person, being a child or other issue of the testator, to whom any real or personal estate shall be devised or bequeathed for any estate or interest not determinable at or before the death of such person, shall die in the lifetime of the testator, leaving issue, and any such issue of such person shall be living at the time of the death of the testator, such devise or bequest shall not lapse, but shall take effect as if the death of such person had happened immediately after the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.'

Contingent remainder, an executory remainder limited so as to depend on an event or condition, which may never happen or be performed, or which may not happen or be performed till after the determination of the preceding estate.

Four sorts of contingent remainders are distinguished under this definition, by Mr. Fearne (Cont. Rem.), viz.:—

1. When the remainder depends entirely on a contingent determination of the preceding estate itself; as, if A. convey by grant to the use of B. till C. do such a thing, and after such a thing done by the said C. then to the use of D. in fee. The contingency must be such as makes it uncertain, not only whether the event, on which the remainder depends for becoming vested, determines the preceding estate, but whether that event will ever happen. If, therefore, the particular estate is to determine by death, such a contingency is excluded from this class, because death is an event which must certainly happen at some time or other.

The distinction between contingent remainders and conditional or contingent limitations should be kept in view. Now it is essential to an estate in remainder, that it should wait the regular expiration of the particular estate, and should not take effect in possession till that expiration; but a conditional limitation takes effect on the happening of an event during the continuance of the particular estate.

Let us illustrate this:—A limitation to A. for his life if he shall so long continue single, and then to B. in fee; B.'s limitation is a remainder, for whether A.'s life estate expire by his death or marriage, the estate is considered in law to expire equally at the period fixed for its term by the original limitation, since the determining event—marriage—is considered to be incorporated into, and to make a part of, the original limitation, and to form, with it, the original measure.

But if the limitation were to A. for life, with a proviso that if he married his life estate should cease, the case would be different, the event upon which A.'s estate was to cease being extrinsic, separate, distinct, and collateral to the original limitation, and therefore making no part of it. The limitation over will then be a conditional limitation.

Butler observes (F. C. R. n., p. 19) :—Perhaps the difference is artificial, and such as common sense alone would not teach; but, in legal construction, and in several legal consequences of great importance to the interests of the parties claiming under such limitations, the distinction is established.

2. Where the contingency, on which the remainder is to take effect, is independent of, and unconnected with, the determination of the preceding estate; as, if a lease be made to A. for life, remainder to B. for life, and if B. die before A. remainder to C. for life; here the event of B.'s dying before A. does not in the least affect the determination of the particular estate, nevertheless it must precede and give effect to C.'s remainder; but such event is dubious; it may or may not happen, and the remainder depending on it is, therefore, contingent.

3. Where a remainder is limited to take effect upon an event, which, though it certainly must happen some time or other, yet may not happen till after the determination of the particular estate; as, if a lease be granted to A. B. for life, and after the death of C. D. the lands to remain to another in fee. It is certain that C. D must die some time or other, but his death may not happen till after the determination of the particular estate by the death of A. B., and, therefore, such remainder is contingent.

The following is an exception to the third class of remainders:—

A limitation to A. for eighty years, if B. so long live, with remainder over, after the death of B. to C. in fee. In such a case as this it has been held, that, notwithstanding the remainder over is limited to take effect on an event (B.'s death) which possibly may not happen till after the expiration of the preceding estate for eighty years, yet as the chance against such event happening before the expiration of the preceding term is exceedingly small, such remainder shall be considered as vested; and that the mere possibility that a life in being may endure for eighty years to come, does not amount to a degree of uncertainty sufficient to constitute a contingent remainder.

4. Where a remainder is limited to a person not ascertained, or not in being at the time when such limitation is made; as, if a lease be granted to A. for life, remainder to the right heirs of B. Now, there can be no such person as the right heir of B. until B.'s death (since nemo est hæres viventis), which may not happen till after the determination of the particular estate by the death of A. the tenant for life; therefore such remainder is contingent. So, if an estate be limited to two for life, remainder to the survivor of them in fee, the remainder is contingent, for it is uncertain which of them will be the survivor.

A remainder (Butler's note (g) to Fearne, p. 9) over may be so limited as to depend for its vesting on the happening of every kind of event, constituting the four sorts of remainders mentioned by Mr. Fearne:—

As a limitation to A., until B. return from Rome, and after the return of B. and C. from Rome and the death of D., to the son of A. in tail-male, who shall first or alone attain the age of twenty-one years. In this case, the remainder to the son of A., so far as it depends on B.'s return from Rome, partakes of the nature of the first sort of contingent remainders; so far as it depends on C.'s return from Rome, partakes of the nature of the second class of contingent remainders; so far as it depends on the decease of D. partakes of the third class of contingent remainders; and so far as it depends on A.'s having a son who first or alone shall attain the age of twenty-one years, partakes of the nature of the fourth class of contingent remainders.

To the fourth class of remainders the rule in Shelley's case presents an exception, for the remainder being executed in the ancestor, cannot be contingent; exceptions to it also occur where a limitation in a devise to the heir special of a person living has been adjudged a descriptio personæ, or sufficient designation of the person, for the remainder to vest, notwithstanding the general rule that nemo est hæres viventis. But the testator's intention, that the estate should vest, must be manifested in the will.

As where A. devised land to I. S. and his heirs, during the life only of B., upon trust to permit and suffer B. during his life to receive the profits, he committing no waste, and after the decease of B. then to the heirs male of the body of B. now living, and to such other heirs male or female as he thereafter should happen to have of his body. B. had issue C., a son, then living. It was decided that B. took a trust estate for life, and that the remainder in tail vested in C. immediately, and was not contingent, for that the words 'now living' made the limitation a sufficient designation of the person.—Burchett v. Durdant, 2 Ventr. 311; Fearne's Cont. Rem. 210.

Again, where there was a devise to trustees for the term of twenty-one years for the payment of debts and legacies, remainder to testator's first son in tail male, remainder to the heirs male of the testator's body, and for default of such issue to I. S. for ninety-nine years, if he should so long live, remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male, remainder to the heirs male of the body of the testator's aunt, E. L., lawfully begotten, and for default of such issue, the reversion and remainder to the testator's right heirs. The testator gave a legacy to his said aunt, E. L., thereby taking notice that she was then living; he also took notice of her having three sons, to whom he gave a legacy; he also gave his heir-at-law an annuity out of the lands, and legacies to her children. The testator died childless, and so did I. S.; the question then was, whether the eldest son of E. L. (the said E. L. being living at the testator's death) or the testator's heir-at-law, was entitled to the land? It was held that though in the strictest legal sense of the word heir, the eldest son of E. L. would not be the heir-male of her body during her life; yet the word heir had another more general sense, in which it was used for heir apparent, in which sense it was applicable to him at the time of the testator's decease, and that he took the land; for the word 'begotten' is tantamount to the phrase 'then living.'—Darbison d. Long v. Beaumont, 1 P. Wms. 229; Fearne's Cont. Rem. 210.

Another class of exceptional cases arises thus:—Suppose A. die leaving issue two sons, the elder of whom has issue, an only daughter, and dies in his brother's life-time; it is obvious that, under a limitation to A. and the heirs male of his body, A.'s younger son would be entitled per formam doni. But A.'s grand-daughter is A.'s general heir, and the point is whether, in the case proposed, A.'s younger son be sufficiently the heir-male of his body to take under the devise, or, whether, to entitle himself to take under it, he should unite in him the double character of heir-general and heir-male of A. It has been adjudged that he need not.—Goodtitle d. Weston v. Burtenshaw, Fearne's Cont. Rem. App. I.

It is to be particularly borne in mind, that it is not the uncertainty of ever taking effect in possession that makes a remainder contingent. Upon this point we cannot do better than quote Fearne, whose mastery of this difficult subject was pre-eminent.

He says (Cont. Rem. p. 215), 'wherever there is a particular estate, the determination of which does not depend on any uncertain event, and a remainder is thereon absolutely limited to a person in esse and ascertained; in that case, notwithstanding the nature and duration of the estate limited in the remainder may be such, as that it may not endure beyond the particular estate, and may therefore never take effect or vest in possession, yet is it not a contingent but a vested remainder. As if a lease be to A. for life, remainder to B. for life or in tail; here, notwithstanding B. may possibly die, or die without issue in the life-time of A., and consequently never come into possession, yet is his remainder vested in interest, and by no means comprised in the legal notion of a contingent estate.'

In short, upon a careful attention to this subject, we shall find, that wherever the preceding estate is limited, so as to determine on an event which certainly must happen; and the remainder is so limited to a person in esse, and ascertained, that the preceding estate may, by any means, determine before the expiration of the estate limited in remainder; such remainder is vested. On the contrary, wherever the preceding estate (except in the instances before noticed, as exceptions to the descriptions of a contingent remainder) is limited, so as to determine only on an event which is uncertain, and may never happen; or wherever the remainder is limited to a person not in esse or not ascertained; or wherever it is limited so as to require the concurrence of some dubious uncertain event, independent of the determination of the preceding estate and duration of the estate limited in remainder, to give it a capacity of taking effect; then the remainder is contingent.

The common limitation to trustees to preserve contingent remainders is a vested remainder. In cases of this description, the estate is conveyed to the use of A. for life; and after the determination of that estate by forfeiture or otherwise, in his lifetime, to the use of B. and his heirs during the life of A., in trust for A., and to preserve the contingent remainders; and, after the decease of A. to the use of the first and other sons of A. successively in tail male. Here the preceding estate may determine by one of two modes, A.'s forfeiture of his life estate, or A.'s decease; the estate of the trustees is to take effect in the first event, and is not to take effect in the second. The remainder to the trustees may therefore appear to be of that sort which is contingent, from its depending on the preceding estate's determining in a particular manner.

The judges held (Smith d. Dormer v. Parkhurst, 18 Vin. 413; 4 Bro. Cas. Par. 353) that, in every case, where an estate is given to A. for life, the grantor has an interest remaining in him to enter upon the estate, if it should determine by any act of the tenant amounting to a forfeiture; that this right is inherent in the grantor, from the nature of the estate itself, and may be conveyed to the trustees; and that, when it is conveyed to them, it becomes a legal estate in remainder, and vests in them as such. On this ground, the usual limitation to trustees for preserving contingent remainders is held to confer on them a vested estate.

The interposition of trustees to preserve contingent remainders has been rendered unnecessary in three cases by the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 8, which enacts 'that a contingent remainder existing at any time after the 31st day of December, 1844, shall be, and, if created before the passing of this act, shall be deemed to have been, capable of taking effect, notwithstanding the determination by forfeiture, surrender, or merger of any preceding estate of freehold in the same manner, in all respects, as if such determination had not happened.'—Prest. Conv. 403.

Contingent remainders are not preserved by this statute in all possible cases of the determination of the particular estate; they are only preserved against those destructive acts by or with the concurrence of the owner of the particular estate which prematurely determine it. A contingent remainder still fails of effect, if the particular estate regularly and naturally expire before the contingency happens, upon which the remainder vests; to obviate which trustees to preserve the contingent remainder should in such a case be interposed.

In those cases where contingent remainders are interposed between a particular estate and other limitations over, if the contingent remainder be not in fee, but for life or in tail, the subsequent remainder may be vested, provided it be made to a person in esse. So a subsequent contingent remainder may become vested in interest before a preceding one, which will be no obstruction to its so vesting. But where there is a contingent limitation in fee absolute, no estate limited afterwards can be vested (Fearne's Cont. Rem. c. i. s. 8). But a contingent determinable fee, devised in trust for some special purpose only, will not prevent a subsequent limitation to one in esse from being vested. Where estates are subjected to a general power of appointment in the first taker with remainders over in default of such appointment, the power does not suspend the remainders from vesting.

Contingent uses. These properly take effect as remainders, and in imitation of contingent remainders. Where an estate is limited previously to a future use, and the future use is limited by way of remainder, it is subject to the rules of the common law, which are, that a vested estate of freehold must precede in order to support the remainder, and that a remainder must vest either during the existence of such preceding estate, or eo instanti that it determines. And herein these contingent or springing uses (for they have been called by both epithets, and without any great inconsistency, although it creates difficulty in regard to their distinctive classification) differ from executory devises, which latter do not require any particular estate to support them; that by them a fee-simple or other less estate may be limited after a fee-simple, and that a remainder may be limited of a chattel interest, after a particular estate for life created in the same. The following is an example of a contingent use: A use to the first unborn son of A., after a previous limitation to A. for life or for years, determinable on his life: for this does not answer to the notion of either a shifting or a springing use. To create a good springing use, it must be limited at once, independently of any preceding estate, and not by way of remainder, for if so, it is then a contingent and not a springing use, and subject to the laws governing contingent remainders. Thus springing uses are confined within very narrow limits, and future or contingent uses are placed on exactly the same footing with contingent remainders. Although shifting or secondary uses cannot be classed with future or contingent uses, because of the different modes by which they take effect, yet, as a shifting use, when created, may in point of limitation, be like a contingent remainder, it will, in that case, as well as a strict contingent use (which does not take effect in derogation of any other estate), be subject to the same laws.

Continual claim, abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 11.

Continuance, notice of trial by, when notice of trial in London or Middlesex has been given, and the plaintiff is not ready to proceed, then, instead of countermanding his notice, he may continue it to any sitting (in or after term), by giving notice of trial by continuance four days before the time mentioned in the notice of trial or inquiry, unless short notice of trial or inquiry has been given, in which case two days' previous notice shall be sufficient, unless otherwise ordered by the Court, or a Judge, or by consent (R. 36, H. T. 1853). It can be given only once in a term. It cannot be given after the plaintiff has countermanded his notice of trial.—1 Chit. Arch. by Pren. 316.

Continuances. The entry of them is abolished by rule of all the courts.—T. T. 1853, r. 31.

Continuando, a word used in a special declaration of trespass when the plaintiff would recover damages for several trespasses in the same action; and, to avoid multiplicity of actions, a man may in one action of trespass recover damages for many trespasses, laying the first to be done with a continuando to the whole time in which the rest of the trespasses were done; which is in this form, continuando (by continuing the trespasses aforesaid, &c., from the day aforesaid, &c.) until such a day, including the last trespass.—Termes de la Ley.

Contraband [fr. contra, Lat., against, and bando, Ital., edict], such goods as are prohibited to be imported or exported, bought or sold, either by the laws of a particular state or by special treaties; also a term applied to designate that class of commodities which neutrals are not allowed to carry during war to a belligerent power.

It is a recognised general principle of the law of nations, that ships may sail to and trade with all kingdoms, countries, and states in peace with the princes or authorities whose flags they bear; and that they are not to be molested by the ships of any other power at war with the country with which they are trading, unless they engage in the conveyance of contraband goods. But great difficulty has arisen in deciding as to the goods comprised in this term.

In order to obviate all disputes as to what commodities should be deemed contraband, they have sometimes been specified in treaties or conventions. But this classification is not always respected during hostilities; and it is sufficiently evident that an article which might not be contraband at one time, or under certain circumstances, may become contraband at another time, or under different circumstances. It is admitted on all hands, even by Mr. Hubner, the great advocate for the freedom of neutral commerce, that everything that may be made directly available for hostile purposes is contraband, as arms, ammunition, horses, timber for ship-building, and all sorts of naval stores. The greatest difficulty has occurred in deciding as to provisions, which are sometimes held to be contraband, and sometimes not. Lord Stowell has shown that the character of the port to which the provisions are destined is the principal circumstance to be attended to in deciding whether they are to be looked upon as contraband. A cargo of provisions intended for an enemy's port, in which it was known that a warlike armament was in preparation, would be liable to arrest and confiscation; while, if the same cargo were intended for a port where none but merchantmen were fitted out, the most that could be done would be to detain it, paying the neutral the same price for it as he would have got from the enemy.

The right of visitation and search is a right inherent in all belligerents; for it would be absurd to allege that they had a right to prevent the conveyance of contraband goods to an enemy, and to deny them the use of the only means by which they can give effect to such right.—Vattel, b. 3. c. vii. s. 114. The object of the search is twofold: first, to ascertain whether the ship is neutral or an enemy, for the circumstance of his hoisting a neutral flag affords no security that it is really such; and, secondly, to ascertain whether it has contraband articles, or enemies' property on board.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Contracausator, a criminal; one prosecuted for a crime.

Contract, an agreement between competent parties, upon a legal consideration to do, or to abstain from doing, some act. In its widest sense it includes contracts of record and specialties, but the term is usually employed to designate only simple or parol obligations, which comprehend not only verbal and unwritten contracts, but all contracts not of record nor under seal.

Contracts are divided into three classes:—1st, contracts of record, such as judgments, recognisances, and statutes staple; 2nd, specialties, which are under seal, such as deeds and bonds; 3rd, simple contracts, or contracts by parol. There is no such fourth class as contracts in writing, distinct from verbal and sealed contracts; both verbal and written contracts are included in the class of simple contracts, and the only distinction between them is in regard to the mode of proof.

Every contract is founded upon the mutual agreement of the parties; when the agreement is formal, and stated either verbally or in writing, it is usually called an express contract; when the agreement is matter of inference and deduction it is called an implied contract.

Contracts are also distinguished into executed and executory; executed, where nothing remains to be done by either party, and where the transaction is completed at the moment that the agreement is made; as where an article is sold and delivered, and payment therefor is made on the spot; executory, where some future act is to be done; as where an agreement is made to build a house in six months; or to do an act on or before some future day; or to lend money upon a certain interest, payable at a future time.

There is also one other distinction, namely, that between entire and severable contracts. An entire contract is one, the consideration of which is entire on both sides. The entire fulfilment of the promise by either is a condition precedent to the fulfilment of any part of the promise by the other. Whenever, therefore, there is a contract to pay a gross sum for a certain and definite consideration, the contract is entire. A severable contract is one, the consideration of which is, by its terms, susceptible of apportionment on either side, so as to correspond to the unascertained consideration on the other side, as a contract to pay a person the worth of his services so long as he will do certain work; or to give a certain price for every bushel of so much corn as corresponds to a sample.—Chitty on Contracts; Smith on Contracts; Story on Contracts; 1–12; Pothier on Contracts.

Contract of benevolence, a contract made for the benefit of one of the contracting parties only, as a mandate or deposit.

Contractus est quasi actus contra actum.—2 Co. 15. (A contract is, as it were, act against act.)

Contractus ex turpi causâ vel contra bonos mores, nullus.—Hob. 167.—(A contract arising out of a base consideration, or against morality, is null.)

Contrafaction, a counterfeiting.—Blount.

Contra formam collationis, a writ that issued where lands given in perpetual alms to lay houses of religion, or to an abbot and convent, or to the warden or master of an hospital and his convent, to find certain poor men with necessaries, and do divine service, &c., were alienated, to the disherison of the house and church. By means of this writ the donor, or his heirs, could recover the lands.—Reg. Orig. 238; F. N. B. 210.

Contra formam feoffamenti, a writ that lay for the heir of a tenant, enfeoffed of certain lands or tenements, by charter of feoffment from a lord, to make certain services and suits to his court, who was afterwards distrained for more services than were mentioned in the charter.—Reg. Orig. 176; Old. Nat. Br. 162.

Contra formam statuti (contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided). The usual conclusion of every indictment, &c. brought for an offence created by statute.—7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 20; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 24; 4 Steph. Com. 457.

Contra negantem principia non est disputandum.—Co. Litt. 43.—(Against one denying principles there is no disputing.)

Contra non valentem agere nulla currit præscriptio.—(No prescription runs against a person unable to act.)

Contra pacem (against the peace). It is generally necessary, in all indictments whatsoever, to allege that the offence was committed against the peace of our Lady the Queen. The omission of these words does not render an indictment, information, inquisition, or presentment insufficient.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 24; 4 Steph. Cons. 457.

Contra veritatem lex nunquam aliquid permittit.—2 Inst. 252.—(The law never suffers anything contrary to truth.)

Contramandatio placiti, a respiting or giving a defendant further time to answer, or a countermand of what was formerly ordered.—Leg. H. I. c. 59.

Contramandatum, a lawful excuse, which a defendant in a suit by attorney alleges for himself, to show that the plaintiff has no cause of complaint.—Blount.

Contrapositio, a plea or answer.

Contrarients, those who are opposed to the government, but are neither rebels nor traitors.

Contrariorum contraria est ratio.—Hob. 344. (The reason of contrary things is contrary.)

Contratenere, to withhold.

Contravention, the action founded on the breach of law-burrows.—Scotch Dict.

Contrectatio rei alienæ, animo furandi, est furtum.—Jenk. Cent. 132.—(The touching or removing of another's property, with an intention of stealing, is theft.)

Contribution, the performance by each of two or more persons, jointly liable by contract or otherwise, of his share of the liability. It frequently arises between sureties, who are bound for the same principal, when upon his default, one of them is compelled to pay the money, or to perform any other obligation for which they all became bound; the surety, who has paid the whole, being entitled to receive contribution from all the others for what he has done, in relieving them from a common burthen. Contribution amongst sureties may in general be enforced as well in courts of law as in equity; but in some cases the remedy is more extensive in equity than at law. Thus, suppose there are three sureties in a bond for 3,000*l.*, and one of them has been obliged to pay the whole debt, he could at law only sue one of the sureties for his third, viz., 1,000*l.*, although the other surety had become bankrupt; but in equity he might compel the solvent surety to contribute 1,500*l.*, the moiety of the entire sum.—Peter v. Rich, 1 C. C. 321. And the remedy is more complete and effectual in equity when an account and discovery are wanted, or where the number of the parties interested would occasion a multiplicity of actions. If one of the sureties die, the remedy at law lies only against the surviving sureties, whereas in equity, it may be enforced against the representative of the deceased surety, who may be compelled to contribute.

The claim of contribution has its foundation in the clearest principles of natural justice; for as all are equally bound, and are equally relieved, it seems but just that, in such a case, all should contribute, in proportion, towards a benefit obtained by all, according to the maxim, Qui sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus. The doctrine is founded also upon morals, since no one ought to profit by another man's loss, where he himself has incurred a like responsibility. Any other rule would put it in the power of the creditor to select his own victim; and upon motives of mere caprice or favouritism, to make a common burthen a gross personal oppression.

Legatees are sometimes compelled to refund and contribute for the payment of debts. In like manner, contribution lies between partners for any excess, which has been paid by one partner beyond his share, if, upon the winding-up of the partnership affairs, such a balance appears in his favor; or if, upon a dissolution, he has been compelled to pay any sum for which he ought to be indemnified. It also lies between joint-tenants, tenants-in-common, and part owners of ships and other chattels, for all charges and expenditures incurred for the common benefit.—1 Story's Equity, 393–415.

Contributione facienda, a writ that lay where tenants-in-common were bound to do some act, and one of them was put to the whole burthen, to compel the rest to make their contribution.—Reg. Orig. 175; F. N. B. 162.

Contributory, a person liable to contribute to the assets of a Joint Stock Company in the event of the same being wound up. See 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, ss. 74–78.

Controller [fr. contrerolle, Fr., the copy of a roll of accounts], an overseer or officer appointed to examine and verify the accounts of other officers. See 5 & 6 Vict. c. 103.

Contubernium, the union of slaves with their master's consent; the children of such unions were the property of their parents' owners.—Sand. Just. 118, 418.

Contumace capiendo. Excommunication in all cases of contempt in the spiritual courts is discontinued by 53 Geo. III. c. 127, s. 2, and in lieu thereof, where a lawful citation or sentence has not been obeyed, the Judge shall have power, after a certain period, to pronounce such person contumacious and in contempt, and to signify the same to the Court of Chancery, whereupon a writ de contumace capiendo shall issue from that court, which shall have the same force and effect as formerly belonged, in case of contempt, to a writ de excommunicato capiendo.—2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 93; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 93.

Contumacy, a refusal to appear in court when legally summoned; or disobedience to the rules and orders of a court.

Convent, the fraternity of an abbey or priory, as societas is the number of fellows in a college.

Conventicle, a private assembly or meeting for the exercise of religion; the word was at first an appellation of reproach to the religious assemblies of Wickliffe in the reigns of Edward III. and Richard II., and is now usually applied to a meeting of dissenters from the established church. As this word in strict propriety denotes an unlawful assembly, it cannot be justly applied to the assembling of persons in places of worship licensed according to the requisitions of law.

Conventicle Act, 22 Car. II. c. 1, repealed by 52 Geo. III. c. 155; 3 Steph. Com. 56, 60.

Conventio, an agreement or covenant.

Convention, an extraordinary assembly of the Houses of Lords and Commons, without the assent or summons of the Sovereign. It can only be justified ex necessitate rei, as the Parliament which restored Charles II. and that which disposed of the crown and kingdom to William and Mary.

Conventio privatorum non potest publico juri derogare.—Wing. 746.—(An agreement of private persons cannot affect public right.)

Conventio vincit legem.—Dig 2.—(An agreement overcomes law.)

Conventional estates, those freeholds not of inheritance or estates for life, which are created by the express acts of the parties, in contradistinction to those which are legal and arise from the operation and construction of law.

Conventione, a writ for the breach of any covenant in writing, whether real or personal.—Reg. Orig. 115; F. N. B. 145.

Conventions with America, France and Denmark as to the apprehension and extradition of fugitive offenders. See 6 & 7 Vict. cc. 75, 76, amended by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 120; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 70.

Conventual church, that which consists of regular clerks, professing some order of religion; or of dean and chapter, or other societies of spiritual men.

Conventuals, religious men united in a convent or religious house.—Cowel.

Conversion, the wrongful appropriation of the goods of another. Where a person finding the goods of another, or having them in his possession, applies or converts them to his own use, without the owner's consent, the owner may maintain an action of trover and conversion against him. Refusal to restore the goods is primâ facie sufficient evidence of a conversion, though it does not amount to a conversion. 10 Rep. 56.

Conversion of property. From trusts, there is derived an equitable principle, relative to the constructive conversion of property, which is this:—That money directed to be employed in the purchase of realty, and realty directed to be sold and turned into money, are considered in equity as that species of property into which they are directed to be converted; and this, in whatever manner the direction is given; whether by will, by contract, marriage articles, settlement, or otherwise; and whether the money is actually deposited, or only covenanted to be paid, or whether the land is actually conveyed, or only agreed to be conveyed (Fletcher v. Ashburner, 1 Bro. C. C. 497). This principle is governed by the doctrine of equity, that that which ought to be done shall be deemed as actually done.

The property thus equitably transmuted by anticipation will possess all the qualities, incidents and peculiarities of that kind of property, into which it is destined to be changed. See 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 71.

But the beneficiary may elect to take the property in the shape it then is, before the actual conversion takes place. Slight evidence of an intention so to elect will be sufficient. When a person entitled to the fee-simple of an estate to be purchased with trust money, without requiring the purchase to be completed, causes the securities for the money to be changed in the name of a trustee, in trust for himself, his executors and administrators (Lingen v. Sowray, 1 P. W. 172); and where a person entitled absolutely to the money to arise by the sale of real estate, makes a lease of the estate itself, reserving rent payable to him, his heirs and assigns (Crabtree v. Bramble, 3 Atk. 380); these circumstances have been considered to amount to an election.

The nature of the fund cannot be altered by the election of a trustee or an infant.

Conveyance, an instrument which transfers property from one person to another inter vivos, or after the death of the person transferring; the former is accomplished by deed, record, or special custom; the latter by will. See DEED.

Conveyancers, persons who being neither barristers nor solicitors, nor proctors, employ themselves solely in the preparation of deeds or assurances of property. They must take out yearly a certificate upon which a stamp duty of 9*l.* is payable if they reside within ten miles from the General Post Office, or in the city of Dublin, or within three miles thereof, and 6*l.* if they reside elsewhere.—16 & 17 Vict. c. 63.

Conveyancing, in its more precise and technical sense may be considered as the science, and also as the art of alienation. If, by an investigation of the laws of property, we elicit and systematize the principles which govern the disposition, we are then compacting the science. The science of alienation, therefore, may be defined a systematic statement of the principles of alienation. To apply these principles to practice, by means of appropriate instruments or conveyances, constitutes the art of alienation.

Conveyancing counsel. The Lord Chancellor may nominate any number of conveyancing counsel in actual practice, not less than six, who have practised as such for ten years at least, to be the conveyancing counsel upon whose opinion the court or any judge thereof may act in any of the cases mentioned in the 40th sect. of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, and may supply vacancies in such list from time to time, and distribute the business among such counsel, in such order and manner as to the Lord Chancellor seems fit.—Smi. Ch. Pr. 506.

Convicia si irascaris tua divulgas, spreta exolescunt.—3 Inst. 198.—(If you be moved to anger by insults you publish them, if despised they are forgotten.)

Convicium, anything which publicly insults another.—Civil Law.

Convict, a person found guilty of a crime or offence alleged against him, either by a verdict of a jury or other legal decision.

Conviction, the act of a legal tribunal adjudging a person guilty of a criminal offence.

Convitium convitio tegere est lutum luto porrigere.—1 Buls. 86.—(To cover reproach with reproach, is to heap mud upon mud.)

Convivium, the same among the laity as procuratio with the clergy, viz. when a tenant, by reason of his tenure, is bound to provide meat and drink for his lord once or oftener in the year.—Blount.

Convocation, an assembly of the clergy of England, of which there is one in each province. Its purpose is stated to be the enactment of canon law, subject to the license and authority of the sovereign, and the examination and censure of all heretical and schismatical books and persons. From its judicial proceedings an appeal lies to the Queen in council, by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 92. It is held during the session of Parliament, and is convened by the sovereign. It consists of an upper and a lower house in the province of Canterbury; in the upper sit the bishops, and in the lower the inferior clergy, who are represented by their proctors, and all the deans and archdeacons. In York, the convocation consists of one house only. Convocation, by express license from the sovereign, may legislate by making canons—but, except in one instance in the year 1861, it has long ceased to exercise any legislative power. See 2 Steph. Com. 545.

Convoy, ships of war which accompany merchantmen in time of war, to protect them from the attacks of the enemy. There are five things essential to sailing with convoy:—viz. (1) It must be with a regular convoy under an officer appointed by government; (2) it must be from the place of rendezvous appointed by government; (3) it must be a convoy for the voyage; (4) the master of the ship must have sailing instructions from the commanding officer of the convoy; (5) the ship must depart and continue with the convoy till the end of the voyage, unless separated by necessity.—Abbott on Shipping, pt. 3, c. iii.; Marshall on Insurance, book 1, c. ix. s. 5; 43 Geo. III. c. 57. Also a body of troops, which accompanies provisions, ammunition, or other property, for protection.

Conusance of pleas, a privilege that a city or town has to hold pleas. See COGNIZANCE.

Conusant [fr. connaissant, Fr.], knowing, or understanding.

Coolies, Cooly, porter, laborer.—Indian.

Co-operation, the combined action of numbers. It is of two distinct kinds:—(1) Such co-operation as takes place when several persons help each other in the same employment; (2) such co-operation as takes place when several persons help each other in different employments. These may be termed simple co-operation and complex co-operation.—1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 142.

Coopertio, the head or branches of a tree cut down; though coopertio arborum is rather the bark of timber trees felled, and the chumps and broken wood.—Cowel.

Coopertura, a thicket or covert of wood.

Coparceners, or Parceners, a tenancy which arises when an inheritable estate descends from the ancestor to several persons possessing an equal title to it. It arises by act of law only, i. e. by descent, which, in relation to this subject, is of two kinds:—(1) Descent by the common law, which takes place where an ancestor dies intestate, leaving two or more females as his co-heiresses; these, according to the canon of real property inheritance, take altogether as coparceners or parceners, the law of primogeniture not obtaining among women in equal relationship to their ancestor; they are, however, deemed to be one heir; and (2) Descent by particular custom, as in the case of gavelkind lands, which descend to all the males in equal degree, as the sons, brothers, or uncles of the deceased intestate ancestor; in default of sons, they descend to all the daughters equally.

Coparcenary relates to the estate — joint tenancy to the person. Hence a man may be coparcener with himself. Suppose two moieties of an estate to descend upon the same individual, one from his father, and the other from his mother, he may fairly be said to possess the estate in coparcenary; for on his death without lineal descendants, one moiety will descend to his heir on the part of his father, and the other to his heir on the part of his mother.

Coparceners have a unity, though not an entirety, or necessarily an equality of interest; if there be two only, each is properly entitled to the whole of a distinct moiety; and being seised in moiety there is no jus accrescendi between them, for on the death of one of them intestate, her moiety descends to her heir-at-law, who holds, subject to courtesy (if any), with the surviving parcener in coparcenary, although such heir may be a male, and a collateral. Indeed their estates are held in coparcenary, so long as they claim by descent. As soon as any part is severed, by conveyance from the title of the remaining part, the part so severed will be held in common.

Between the alienee and the other coparceners there will be a tenancy in common. The remaining coparceners will, as between themselves, continue to hold in coparcenary.

They are seised both jointly and severally, and possess a unity of title, but the estate may vest in them at different periods.

Coparcenary is like joint-tenancy so far as the same unity of title and similarity of interest is common to both, but they differ in this, that while coparceners always must claim by descent (for if two sisters purchase an estate to hold to them and their heirs, they are not parceners, but joint-tenants), joint-tenants always claim by act of parties.

Coparcenary is intermediate in its nature between joint-tenancy and tenancy in common. There is a unity of title, but no benefit of survivorship; for the share of a coparcener dying seised descends to her heir, who holds it also as a coparcener. A joint-tenant cannot convey his share to his companion by feoffment, because each is supposed to be equally seised of the whole; but he may convey it by release. Tenants in common, on the contrary, may convey to one another by feoffment, but not by mere release. But coparceners may adopt either mode.

This estate may be dissolved in any of the following modes: —

(1) By a deed of partition, as

(α) Where coparceners agree to divide the estate into equal parts in severalty, each to have a determinate portion.

(β) Where they appoint some third person to divide the estate, and after a division by him, each coparcener, according to seniority of age, or as shall be agreed between them, selects her own portion. The privilege of seniority is in this case personal; for if the eldest sister be dead, her issue shall not choose first, but the next sister. But if an advowson descend in coparcenary, and the sisters cannot agree in the presentation, the eldest and her issue, nay, her husband, or her assigns, shall present alone, before the younger. And the reason given is, that the former privilege, of priority in choice upon a division, arises from an act of her own, the agreement to make partition, and, therefore, is merely personal; the latter, of presenting to the living, arises from the act of the law, and is annexed not only to her person, but to her estate also.

(γ) Where the eldest coparcener divides the estate, in which case she takes the portion remaining after her sisters have made their choice.

(δ) When they agree to cast lots for their shares.

(2) By the alienation of one of the parties, which destroys the unity of title.

(3) By all the estate at last descending to one person, which reduces it to a severalty, and

(4) By a compulsive partition under a decree in Chancery.—Co. Litt. 163, et seq.; 1 Steph. Com. 351.

Copartnership, the having an equal share in any matter or business.

Cope, a custom or tribute due to the crown, or lord of the soil, out of the lead-mines in Derbyshire; also a hill, or the roof and covering of a house.

Copeman, or copesman.

Copesmate [fr. koopman, Du., fr. koop, chaffer, exchange], a merchant, a partner in merchandise.

Copia libelli deliberanda, a writ that lay where a man could not get a copy of a libel at the hands of a spiritual judge, to have the same delivered to him.—Reg. Orig. 51.

Coppa, a crop or cock of grass, hay, or corn, divided into titheable portions, that it may be more fairly and justly tithed.

Copulatio verborum indicat acceptationem in eodem sensu.—Bac. vol. iv. p. 26.—(The coupling of words shows their acceptation in the same sense.)

Coppice, or Copse [fr. couper, Fr., to cut] a small wood, consisting of underwood, which may be cut at twelve or fifteen years' growth for fuel.

Copy [fr. κόπος, Gk., labor, according to Junius, because to copy another's writing is very painful and laborious], the transcript or double of an original writing, as the copy of a patent, charter, deed, &c.

Copyhold, a base tenure founded upon immemorial custom and usage; its origin is undiscoverable, but it is said to be the ancient villeinage modified and changed by the commutation of base services into specified rents, either in money or money's worth.

A copyhold estate is a parcel of the demesnes of a manor held at the lord's will, and according to the custom of such manor. The tenant may have the same quantities of interest in this tenure, as he may enjoy in freeholds, as an estate in fee-simple or (by particular custom) fee-tail, or for life, and he may have only a chattel-interest, as an estate for years in it. By the custom of some manors, the estate devolves upon the heir on the ancestor's death, and is called a copyhold of inheritance. As far as the quantity and modification of interest are concerned, the tenant's estate partakes of the nature of a freehold, but because it is held by a base instead of a free tenure, it is called a copyhold. Viewing his estate, then, through the medium of its holding or tenure, the tenant is merely a tenant-at-will; but it is to be remarked, that this tenancy-at-will must be according to custom, which always regulates the copyholder's interest, upon which interest the lord has no power whatever to encroach. Free copyholds or customary freeholds, however, are held according to the custom of the manor, and altogether independently of the will of the lord, while copyholds of base tenure are held merely at the lord's will. The law certainly considers the freehold to be in the lord (except in the case of strict customary freeholds, when the freehold is in the tenant), and the tenant to possess his customary estate according to the quantity of interest it is intended he should possess, but the law will protect the copyholder, and will not permit him to be at the will or wayward caprice of the lord.

There are four circumstances necessary to the existence of a copyhold estate:—(1) A manor; (2) a court; (3) the land must be parcel of the manor; and (4) it must have been demised or demisable by copy of court roll from time immemorial.

A manor is essentially necessary, for all copyholds must be parcels of manors; and so is a court, for a copyholder has no other evidence of his title than the rolls of the court, which he can inspect and take copies of to use as he may think proper; and the Court of Queen's Bench will order the lord to allow such inspection, and if the lord then refuse, he will be attached. There are two courts incident to every manor, a court baron or freeholders' court, and a customary court, which only relates to the copyholders, who form the homage and transact the necessary business, the lord or his steward presiding as judge. Although these courts are essentially distinct, yet they are usually held at the same time, and the same roll serves to record the proceedings of both. In the court baron the suitors are judges. In the customary court the suitors are assistants to the lord, or his steward, who is the judge. It is obvious that the lands granted must be parcel of a manor, seeing that a copyhold is part of the demesnes of a manor, but it is not absolutely necessary that the lands should continue parcel of the manor. And because this tenure derives its whole force from custom, the lands must have been demisable by copy of court roll from time immemorial, for the two pillars, upon which every custom rests, are common usage and existence time out of mind. No copyhold estate can, therefore, be created at the present day.

Copyhold customs are divided into two species:—(1) General, which extend to all manors in which there are copyholders, and are warranted by the common law, and of which the courts of law take judicial notice, without being specially pleaded; and (2) Particular, which prevail in some manors only, and which must be specially pleaded. They are construed strictly, and when they are contrary to reason, morality, or justice, or cannot be reduced to a certainty, the courts will not give effect to them.

The following services and incidents are by general custom annexed to copyholds:—

(1) Fealty, but the oath of fealty is now generally respited.

(2) Suit of court, for every copyholder is bound to attend the lord's court and be sworn of the homage.

(3) The copyholder is entitled to estovers, i. e. housebote, hedgebote, and ploughbote, unless restrained by particular custom.

(4) He cannot commit any kind of waste, unless there exists a particular custom to warrant it.

(5) Copyholds of inheritance are descendible according to the rules of the common law, unless the custom be otherwise, in which case the custom must prevail. The alterations effected by the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, are applicable to this species of tenure.

(6) Copyholds are alienated by surrender, according to general custom, and they are deviseable.

(7) A copyholder, by general custom, may make a lease for a year, and with the lord's license he may lease for any number of years.

(8) Copyholds are liable to all sorts of debts, by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 104, and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.

(9) The widow of a copyholder, according to particular custom, is entitled to a certain portion of her husband's lands, which varies in quantity, as a half, a third, a fifth, or the whole. It is called her free-bench. It is generally an estate for life, but is forfeited by a second marriage or incontinency. If the widow is detected in incontinency, she loses her free-bench, but, nevertheless, in certain manors, if she come into the Manor Court riding backwards upon a black ram, with his tail in her hand, and repeating certain words, the steward is bound, by particular custom, to re-admit her to her free-bench. The words to be repeated are the following:

Here I am,
Riding upon a black ram,
Like a whore, as I am;
And for my crincum crancum,
Have lost my bincum bancum,
And for my tail's game,
Have done this worldly shame:
Therefore, I pray, Mr. Steward, let me have my lands again.

The widow's free-bench is barred by a jointure, whether legal or equitable; or by the alienation of the copyhold lands by the husband, or even by an agreement to convey, or by forfeiture, or by a grant of the freehold by the lord to the husband, for then the copyhold is destroyed, or by a devise expressed to be in satisfaction of it.

(10) Copyholds, by special custom, are subject to courtesy, and, by the custom of some manors, the husband is entitled to courtesy, though he have no issue by his wife, but it is forfeitable on a second marriage.

(11) Upon every descent of a copyhold estate, a sum of money or fine is due to the lord from the heir upon his admission, as a consideration for the renewal of a grant. If the heir refuse to be admitted, the lord may seize the estate to his own use. The lord is also entitled to fines upon all voluntary grants, upon the admission of tenants by the courtesy, the free-bench, and indeed upon alienation generally, the only exception being in cases of bankruptcy or insolvency, which are provided for by the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, and the Insolvent Act of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. No fine is due upon the admission of a remainder-man, unless by special custom, because the admission of the tenant for life is generally deemed the admission of the remainder-man, nor are fines due upon a mere change of the tenant's interest, nor upon a covenant or agreement to surrender, because it is only due upon an actual admittance. Tenants in common pay this fine apportionably, each according to his share. Joint-tenants and coparceners pay a single fine for all. The practice as to the payment of the fine on the admittance of joint-tenants is this: two years' value is paid for the first life, half of that on the second, and a half of that half on the third, and so on, according to the number of the tenants. Joint-tenants succeed each other, by right of survivorship and without a new admittance, and fines are not due but upon admittance; the application, therefore, of the general rule to the case of joint-tenants would be unfair to the lord. By the custom of many manors, fines are due from copyholders on every change of the lord, which happens by the act of God. The quantum of all these fines is not to exceed two years' value of the lands, which is recoverable by action of debt.

(12) Besides a fine, a heriot is due to the lord on his tenant's death, though he be only a tenant for life, provided he be a legal and not an equitable tenant. It is usually the best beast or averium, it is sometimes the best chattel, as a jewel or a piece of plate, but it must be a personal chattel. But no heriot is due upon the death of a married woman, because she can have no chattels. Heriots are in some manors commuted to a customary composition in money, but it must be an indisputably ancient custom.

Copyholds are forfeited to the lord of the manor, and not to the Crown, unless by the express words of an act of parliament, by the tenant being attainted of treason or felony; also by his attempting to alienate his estate by any mode which is contrary to custom, or by committing any kind of waste, by disclaiming the tenure, by refusing to perform the services.

Copyholds may be destroyed, suspended, or enfranchised, i. e. converted into free tenure, in several ways.

(1) If the copyholder surrender his estate to the rightful lord, to the use of the lord.

(2) If a copyholder release all his right and interest to the lord.

(3) If the lord convey the freehold of the copyhold to a stranger, and the copyholder release to the stranger.

(4) If the lord convey to the copyholder the land for an estate of freehold, or even for a term of years.

(5) There are several cases in which copyholds are suspended only for a certain time, and not absolutely extinguished; thus, where a copyholder marries the lady of the manor, this suspends the copyhold during the marriage, but does not extinguish it. So where a copyholder becomes king, the copyhold is suspended, for the king could not perform the services, being inconsistent with his royalty; but after his death, the next person entitled to the copyhold, shall, if a subject, hold by copy.

(6) The efforts of the legislature have been, of late years, directed to these customary estates, which are, in fact, the remains of feudal slavery; they are embarrassing and unnecessary blots upon the juridical system of property. Their chief inconveniences, as set forth by the Real Property Commissioners, in their third report, are the multiplicity and uncertainty of the different manorial customs on which the tenure depends — the check to agricultural improvements occasioned by the state of the law with respect to timber and minerals — the liability to arbitrary fines — the numerous payments due to stewards on account of fees, and the vexatious and oppressive character of heriots. It is manifest, then, that where complexity which must always belong to the legal institutions of a civilised country is wantonly aggravated by the admission of several conflicting systems, serious mischiefs are likely to arise from the ignorance or forgetfulness of practitioners, and even of judges, however carefully selected.

In order to diminish these grievances, and to facilitate enfranchisement, the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 94, has been passed, which came into operation on the 1st October, 1858 (s. 1).

It repeals (s. 2) the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 57; the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 35, s. 11, after the words 'substituted in the place of such lord, tenant, or other person;' the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 51, ss. 2, 11, 27; and 'all the provisions of the copyhold acts which authorise commutations by schedule of apportionment, and commutations by a schedule to be prepared by the steward, and also enfranchisement by schedule of apportionment, and the charging of enfranchisement or compensation moneys or the expenses of commutations or enfranchisements upon land.' But this repeal is not to affect accomplished acts or vested rights (s. 3).

The copyhold acts are not to extend to ecclesiastical manors, where the tenant has not a right of renewal (s. 4).

There is a copyhold commission, composed of three commissioners, who act as a board, in order to carry the provisions of this act into execution.

By commutation, the most burdensome incidents affecting customary tenure, as rents, fines, and heriots, and the lord's right in timber, and also (if so expressed) in mines and minerals, may be commuted by agreement, for corn rents or fixed fines, or for pieces of land, part of the copyholds commuted.

The effect of enfranchisement is that the lands become freeholds, but with the saving of all commonable rights and beneficial limitations. Consult Bac. Abr. (Copyhold) and Watkins or Scriven on Copyholds, besides the acts quoted, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 59, s. 4.

Copyhold Commissioners, the tithe commissioners for England and Wales (the number of whom is never to exceed three) are appointed the commissioners for carrying the provisions of the copyhold acts into execution. They are styled 'The Copyhold Commissioners' when acting in these cases, and any two of them form a board to transact business. They have an official seal with which all documents must be stamped, when they are receivable in evidence without any further proof. Their office must be in London or Westminster. It is at No. 9, Somerset Place, Somerset House, at present. The commissioners make an annual report to the Home Secretary of State, which is then laid by him before parliament. They are empowered to appoint and remove assistant commissioners, or secretary, and other servants and officers, as shall be deemed necessary. They cannot sit in parliament, and their salaries and allowances are paid out of the consolidated fund. They make a solemn declaration to act honestly in the discharge of their duties, which however they may delegate to their assistant commissioners, who pledge their impartiality by a like solemnity.—4 & 5 Vict. c. 35, ss. 1–10, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 53, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 72.

Copyhold Inclosure Commissioners, a board constituted under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118. The powers of these commissioners, of the copyhold commissioners, and of the tithe commissioners, are now vested in one board. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 53; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 31; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 81; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 73.

Copyright, an incorporeal right, being the exclusive privilege of printing, reprinting, selling, and publishing, his own original work, which the law allows an author. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, provides, that the copyright of every book (which includes every volume, part, or division of a volume, pamphlet, sheet of letter-press, sheet of music, map, chart, or plan, separately published), which shall be published in the lifetime of its author, shall endure for his natural life, and for seven years longer; or if the seven years shall expire before the end of forty-two years from the first publication, it shall endure for such period of forty-two years; and that when the work is posthumous, the copyright shall endure for forty-two years from the first publication, and shall belong to the proprietor of the author's manuscript. The remedy given for a book unlawfully printed within the British dominions is an action on the case, to be commenced within twelve calendar months. Equity will also afford relief by special injunction, to restrain the progress of the injury, and to compel an account of the profits arising from the invasion. The title of the work must be entered at Stationers' Hall. As to those unlawfully re-printed in any place out of the British dominions, and imported into the United Kingdom, they may be seized, as forfeited, by any officer of the custom or excise, and the offenders are liable to penalties.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 93. A copyright is assignable by an instrument in writing, which does not require to be under seal.

The sole liberty of printing and publishing lectures is secured to lecturers by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 65; dramatic pieces and musical performances are protected by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 15, and 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, ss. 20, 21; engravings and prints by 8 Geo. II. c. 13; 7 Geo. III. c. 38; 17 Geo. III. c. 57; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 59; and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 95; sculptures, models, copies, and casts by 38 Geo. III. c. 71; and 54 Geo. III. c. 56; and designs for articles, whether of ornament or utility, by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 100; amended by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 70; 6 & 7 Vict c. 65; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 104; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 8; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 6; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68.

Coraage, an extraordinary imposition, upon some unusual occasion, and seems to be of certain measures of corn.—Blount.

Coram non judice (in presence of a person not a judge). When a suit is brought and determined in a court which has no jurisdiction in the matter, then it is said to be coram non judice, and the judgment is void.

Coram paribus (before his peers).

Cord of wood, a quantity of wood eight feet long, four feet broad, and four feet high.

Cordiner, or Cordwainer [fr. cordonnier, Fr.; fr. cordouan, Old Fr., originally leather from Cordova], a shoe-maker.

Coretes [fr. cored, Brit.], pools, ponds, &c.

Corium forisfacere, to forfeit one's skin, applied to a person condemned to be whipped; anciently the punishment of a servant. Corium perdere, the same. Corium redimere, to compound for a whipping.

Corn-rent [the word corn is found in all the Teutonic dialects]. It was created by 18 Eliz. c. 6, by which it was directed that one-third of the whole rent then paid on college leases should for the future be reserved in wheat or malt, reserving a quarter of wheat for each 6*s.* 8*d.*, or a quarter of malt for every 5*s.*; or that the lessees should pay the same according to the price that wheat or malt should be sold for in the market next adjoining to the respective colleges, on the market day before the rent becomes due.—2 Bl. Com. 609.

Cornage [fr. cornu, Lat., a horn], a kind of tenure in grand serjeanty, the service of which was to blow a horn when any invasion of the Scots was perceived; and by this tenure many persons held their lands northward about the place commonly called Picts' Wall. This old service of horn-blowing was afterwards paid in money, and the sheriffs accounted for it under the title of Cornagium.—Camd. Brit. 609.

Cornare, to blow in the horn.

Corn Tax Abolition Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 46.

Cornwall, Duke of, one of the titles of the eldest son of the reigning sovereign of the United Kingdom. He is Duke of Cornwall by inheritance, and is usually made Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester by special creation and investiture.—1 Bl. Com. 225.

Cornwall Submarine Mines Act, 1858, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 109, explained by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 53.

Corodio habendo, a writ to exact a corody of an abbey or religious house.—Reg. Orig. 264.

Corody, or Corrody [fr. conredium, corredium, conradium, corrodium, Monk. Lat.; corredare, Ital., to fit out], a sum of money or allowance of meat, drink, and clothing due to the Crown from an abbey or other religious house, whereof it was founder, towards the sustentation of such one of its servants as is thought fit to receive it. It differs from a pension, in that it was allowed towards the maintenance of any of the king's servants in an abbey; a pension being given to one of the king's chaplains, for his better maintenance, till he may be provided with a benefice.—F. N. B. 250.

Corona mala, the clergy who abused their character.

Coronare filium, to make one's son a priest. Homo coronatus was one who had received the first tonsure, as preparatory to superior orders, and the tonsure was in form of a corona, or crown of thorns.—Cowel.

Coronation oath. At the public and solemn ceremony of crowning or investing a sovereign with the insignia of royalty, in acknowledgment of his right to govern the kingdom, the prince swears to observe the laws, customs, and privileges of the kingdom, and to act and do all things conformably thereto. The oath is as follows:—'The archbishop or bishop shall say—Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the people of this kingdom of England, and the dominions thereto belonging, according to the statutes in parliament agreed on, and the laws and customs of the same?' The king or queen shall say—'I solemnly promise so to do.'

Archbishop or bishop—'Will you, to the utmost of your power, cause law and justice, in mercy, to be executed in all your judgments?' King or queen—'I will.' Archbishop or bishop—'Will you, to the utmost of your power, maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant reformed religion established by the law? And will you preserve unto the bishops and clergy of this realm, and to the churches committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges as by law do or shall appertain unto them, or any of them?' King or queen—'All this I promise to do.' After this the king or queen laying his or her hand upon the holy Gospels, shall say—'The things which I have here before promised I will perform and keep, so help me God;' and then shall kiss the book.

Coronatore eligendo, the writ issued to the sheriff, commanding him to proceed to the election of a coroner.

Coronatore exonerando, a writ for the removal of a coroner, for a cause which is to be therein assigned, as that he is engaged in other business, or incapacitated by years or sickness, or has not a sufficient estate in the county, or lives in an inconvenient part of it. The 25 Geo. II. c. 29, makes extortion, neglect, or misbehaviour, causes of removal.

Coroner, a very ancient officer at the common law, so called because he has principally to do with pleas of the Crown, or such wherein the sovereign is more immediately concerned. There are usually four or six appointed for every county of England. They are chosen for life by all the freeholders in the county court. By 7 & 8 Vict. c. 92, coroners may be appointed for districts within counties, instead of the county at large, and by that Act and by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 116 provision is made for the election and remuneration of coroners and their removal for inability or misbehaviour. The Crown and certain lords of franchises, having a charter from the Crown for that purpose, may appoint coroners for certain precincts or liberties by their own mere grant, and without election. In every borough having a separate quarter sessions, a coroner is to be appointed, with exclusive jurisdiction within the borough.—5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76, ss. 62, 63. County coroners may appoint deputies by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 83. As to their fees see 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 68.

The office and power of a coroner are either (1) Judicial, and consist principally in enquiring when any person is slain or dies suddenly or in prison, concerning the manner of his death. A jury is empanelled and inquisition must be found with the concurrence of at least twelve of them. Provisions have been recently made to prevent it from being quashed on account of certain technical defects (6 & 7 Vict. c. 12; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 83). The inquisition must be had super visum corporis, for if the body be not found, the coroner cannot sit, except by virtue of a special commission issued for that purpose. If any be found guilty ot murder or other homicide by such inquisition, the coroner is to commit them to prison for further trial, and is also to enquire concerning their lands, goods, and chattels, which are forfeited thereby; and must certify the whole inquisition under the seals of himself and jurors, together with the evidence thereon, to the Court of Queen's Bench or the next assizes. The 22 Vict. c. 33, enables coroners to admit to bail persons charged with manslaughter. Another branch of the coroner's office is to enquire concerning shipwrecks and treasure trove. (2) Ministerial. He is the sheriff's substitute in executing process, when the sheriff is interested in the suit, or of kindred to either plaintiff or defendant.—Jervis on Coroners; Com. Dig. Officer, 9. This officer is first mentioned in King Athelstan's charter to Beverly, in 925.

Coroner's court, a tribunal of record, where a coroner holds his enquiries.

Corporal, an epithet for anything that belongs to the body, as corporal punishment. A corporal oath is so called, because the party taking it is obliged to lay his hand on the Testament.

Corporate name. When a corporation is erected, a name is always given to it, or supposing none to be actually given, will attach to it by implication, and by that name alone it must sue and be sued, and do all legal acts, though a very minute variation therein is not material, and the name is capable of being changed (by competent authority) without affecting the identity or capacity of the corporation. But some name is the very being of its constitution; and though it is the will of the sovereign that erects the corporation, yet the name is the knot of its combination, without which it could not perform its corporate functions. The name of incorporation, says Coke (10 Rep. 28), is as a proper name, or name of baptism, and, therefore, when a private founder gives his college or hospital a name, he does it only as a godfather, and by the same name the king baptizes the incorporation.

Corporation, or Body Politic, artificial persons established for preserving in perpetual succession certain rights, which, being conferred on natural persons only, would fail in process of time. It is either aggregate, consisting of many members, or sole, consisting of one person only. It is also either spiritual, erected to perpetuate the rights of the church, or lay, subdivided into civil, erected for many temporal purposes, and eleemosynary, to perpetuate founders' charities. It is, by virtue of the sovereign's prerogative, exercised by a charter, or of an act of parliament, or of prescription, that the artificial personage called a corporation, whether sole or aggregate, civil or ecclesiastical, is created. The royal charter gives it a legal immortality and a name by which it acts and becomes known. It has power to make bye laws for its own government, and transacts its business under the authority of a common seal—its hand and mouthpiece; it has neither soul nor tangible form, so it can neither be outlawed nor arrested; it only enjoys a legal entity, sues, and is sued by its corporate name, and holds and enjoys property by such name. The several members of a corporation and their successors constitute but one person in law. The duty of a corporation is to answer the ends of its institution. To enforce which it may be visited: if spiritual, by the ordinary; if lay, by the founder or his representatives; viz. the civil by the queen (who is the fundator incipiens of all), represented in the Queen's Bench: the eleemosynary, by the endower (who is the fundator perficiens of such), or by his heirs or assigns. The distinction between corporations and trading partnerships is, that in the first the law sees only the body corporate and knows not the individuals, who are not liable for the contracts of the corporation in their private capacity, their share in the capital only being at stake: but in the latter the law looks not to the partnership but to the individual members of it, who are therefore answerable for the debts of the firm, even to their last shilling and acre.

It is a general rule that a corporation must contract under its common seal, but whenever the observance of this rule would occasion great inconvenience, or tend to defeat the very purpose of the business, it is not observed, e. g. the retainer of an inferior servant, the acceptance of bills of exchange, or making of promissory notes by companies incorporated for the purposes of trade, or the doing of acts frequently occurring; in these cases, the affixing of the common seal is not necessary. In all matters, however, of importance, and in respect of acts not coming within the sphere of its daily functions, the common seal must be affixed, which the law takes as conclusively evidencing the sense of the whole body corporate. It is the fixing of the seal, and that only, which evidences the assents of the individuals composing it, and makes one joint assent of the whole.

A corporation may be dissolved by statute, by death of all the members, by surrender of its franchise to the Crown, by forfeiture of its charter, and by bankruptcy or insolvency.—1 Bl. Com. c. xviii.; Grant on Corporations. See also JOINT STOCK COMPANIES, post.

Corporeal hereditament, that subject of property which is comprised under the denomination of things real.

Corps diplomatique [Fr.], the body of ambassadors and diplomatic persons.

Corpse. The superstitious opinion that the dead body of a person murdered bleeds when touched by the murderer, is founded neither in law nor reason. Carpzovius says, he has seen a body bleed in the presence of one not guilty, and not bleed when one guilty was present.—4 Harg. 283.

Corpus Christi day, a feast instituted in 1264, in honour of the sacrament.—32 Hen. VIII. c. 21.

Corpus cum causa, a writ issuing out of Chancery to remove both the body and record, touching the cause of any man lying in prison. F. N. B. 251.

Corpus humanum non recipit æstimationem. Hob. 59.—(A human body is not susceptible of appraisement.)

Corpus juris canonici. See CANON LAW.

Corpus juris civilis. The three great compilations of Justinian, the Institutes, the Pandects, and the Code, together with the Novellæ, form one body of law, and were considered as such by the glossatores, who divided it into five volumina. The Pandects were distributed into three volumina, under the respective names of Digestum Vetus, Infortiatum, and Digestum Novum. The fourth volume contained the first nine books of the Codex Repetitæ Prælectionis. The fifth volume contained the Institutes, the Liber Authenticorum or Novellæ, and the three last books of the Codex. The division into five volumina appears in the oldest editions; but the usual arrangement now is the Institutes, Pandects, the Codex, and Novellæ. The name Corpus Juris Civilis was not given to this collection by Justinian, nor by any of the glossatores. Savigny asserts that the name was used in the twelfth century: at any rate, it became common from the date of the edition of D. Gothofredus of 1604.—Smith's Dict of Antiq.

Correction, House of, a prison for the reformation of petty offenders.

Corrector of the staple, a clerk belonging to the staple, to write and record the bargains of merchants there made.—27 Edw. III. cc. 22, 23.

Corredium, Conredium. See CORODY.

Corregidor, a Spanish magistrate.

Corruptio optimi est pessima.—(Corruption of the best is worst).

Corruption of Blood, one of the immediate consequences of attainder for treason or felony. The blood of the attainted person was said to be corrupted or attainted both upwards and downwards, so that he could neither inherit lands or hereditaments, retain the possession of those in his possession, nor transmit them by descent to any heir, but the same escheated to the lord of the fee, subject to the king's superior right of forfeiture.—4 Bl. Com. 388.

By 54 Geo. III. c. 145, it is provided, that no attainder for felony, except for treason or murder, shall extend to the disinheriting of any person, nor to the prejudice of the right or title of any person or persons, other than the right or title of the offender, during his natural life only; and that it shall be lawful for every person, to whom the right or interest of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments after the death of such offender, should or might have appertained if no such attainder had been, to enter into the same. By 3 and 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, that when the person from whom the descent of any land is to be traced, shall have had any relation, who having been attainted shall have died before such descent shall have taken place, then such attainder shall not prevent any person from inheriting such land who would have been capable of inheriting the same, by tracing his descent through such relation, if he had not been attainted, unless such land shall have escheated, in consequence of such attainder, before January 1, 1834. By 13 and 14 Vict. c. 60, s. 46, that no land, chattels, or stock vested in any person upon any trust, or by way of mortgage, or any profits thereof, shall escheat or be forfeited by reason of the attainder or conviction for any offence of such trustee or mortgagee, but shall remain in such trustee or mortgagee, or survive to his co-trustee, or descend or vest in his representative, as if no such attainder or conviction had taken place.

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, continued and amended by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 84; 21 and 22 Vict. c. 87; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 48; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 99; and 25 and 26 Vict. c. 109.

Corselet [fr. corpusculum, Lat.], a little body; ancient armour which covered the body.

Corsepresent [fr. corps, Fr., body], a mortuary, thus termed, because when a mortuary became due on the death of a man, the best or second-best beast was, according to custom, offered or presented to the priest, and carried with the corpse. In Wales a corsepresent was due upon the death of a clergyman to the bishop of the diocese till abolished by 12 Ann st. 2, c. 6.—2 Bl. Com. 426.

Corsned Bread [fr. corsian, to curse, and snaed, a morsel, A. S.; panis conjuratus, or offa execrata, Lat., the morsel of execration, or ordeal bread]. It was a kind of superstitious trial or ordeal used among the Saxons, to purge themselves of any accusation, by taking a piece of barley bread and eating it with solemn oaths, curses, and execrations, that it might prove poison, or their last morsel, if what they asserted, or denied, were not true.—4 Bl. Com. 345, 414.

Probably this ceremony was in imitation of the Jewish custom that a husband who suspected his wife of infidelity might cause her to drink the water of jealousy, at the same time exacting from her in the temple or tabernacle what may be termed the ordeal oath.—Num. v. 11–31. To this oath were attached such dreadful penalties, that a person really guilty certainly could not take it without betraying her criminality by some indications, unless she possessed the extremity of hardihood. Moses appears to have substituted this oath, and the ceremonies attending it, instead of an ancient and pernicious custom, of which some traces still remain in Africa. Oldendorp's Geschichte der Mission, s. 266. The Talmudists state (Sota, c. ix.) that this law was abrogated as much as forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem. The reason they assign for it is, that the men themselves were at that period generally adulterers, and that God would not fulfil the horrid imprecations of the ordeal oath upon the wife alone, while the husband was guilty of the same crime.—Jahn's Bib. Antiq. c. x., s. 168.

Cortes, the assembly of the States of Spain or Portugal, answering in some measure to the Parliament of Great Britain.

Cortis, a court or yard before a house.—Blount.

Cortularium, or Cortarium, a yard adjoining to a country farm.—Old Records.

Corvee [Fr.], a feudal service, as to repair roads, &c.

Cosduna, custom or tribute.

Cosenage, or Cosinage, kindred, cousinship. Also a writ that lay for the heir where the tresail, i. e. the father of the besail, or great grandfather, was seized of lands and tenements in fee at his death, and a stranger entered upon the heir and abated.—F. N. B. 221.

Cosening, Cozenage [fr. cozen], cheating, defrauding.

Coshering, a feudal custom, whereby the lords may lie and feast themselves and their followers at their tenants' houses, &c.

Cosmus [fr. κόσμος, Gk.], clean.—Blount.

Costard, a head.—Shaksp. Also a kind of apple.

Costera, sea coast.

Cost Book Mining Companies. They are formed thus:—A number of adventurers who have obtained permission from the landowner to work a lode, assemble; they decide on the number of shares into which their capital is to be divided, and the number to be allotted to each; they appoint an agent, commonly called a purser, for the purpose of managing the affairs of the mine, and enter in a book, called the cost-book, the minutes of their proceedings, which are signed by all present. A license to try for ores, for twelve months, or some short period, is then obtained, followed, if the search be promising, by a sett, that is a lease of the minerals, or a license to dig, or both, granted by the landowner to the purser, or to one or two of the adventurers, without any declaration of trust on their part for the rest, or for any other person, for a term of years, commonly twenty-one, stipulating for the annual payment to the landowner of some portion of the ore raised.

The 'cost-book' contains the names of all the shareholders, and the number of shares held by each is set opposite to his name. In a 'cost-book' partnership, a shareholder may get rid of his shares, and with them his liabilities, so far as his partners are concerned, without their consent, either by transfer or simple relinquishment, provided the cost-book regulations do not prohibit such a course; in the former case the fact of transfer being entered by the purser in the cost-book, and in the latter notice being given to the purser of his having so relinquished his shares, and all his claims upon the mine.

There being a purser or manager of the mine, all acts are in general done by him, such as ordering the supply of the necessary materials for working the mine, hiring of labour, &c.; and a shareholder has no power to bind his co-shareholders by any contract for materials, &c., not necessary, nor for money lent, nor upon bills of exchange; nor has the purser power to make them liable for money lent, or upon bills of exchange.

The rules are simple, and all the transactions of the partnership are entered in the cost-book. All the shareholders meet and order their general affairs, without the assistance of any directing body, and consider and resolve upon the purser's reports, made to them at their meetings, which are seldom at greater intervals than two months. Sometimes there is a committee of management in a cost-book mine; but they are only appointed from general meeting to general meeting, have no power to make calls or declare dividends, and all their acts are subject to the review of a general meeting.

The mode of transferring shares is simple, and effected with great facility, and in any form, and the mere entry by the purser in the 'cost-book' of the fact of transfer is sufficient to bind all parties, and constitutes the introduction of a new partner into the concern.

Although there are several theories of the 'cost-book principle' of working mines, the meaning of which the courts are not bound to take judicial notice of (Re Gt. Cambrian, Hawkins's case, 2 Kay & J. 253), yet it appears clear, that whatever may be the rules and regulations between the adventurers themselves, each shareholder is liable to be sued by a creditor who has furnished the mines with necessaries for its due working, ordered according to the customary course in such concerns, and this whether the creditor knew at the time of crediting the mine that he was a shareholder or not.—See Collier on Mines, 93, and Wordsworth's Law of Mining, 193.

Coss, a term used by Europeans in India to denote a road-measure of about two miles, but differing in different parts.

Co-stipulator, a joint promissee.

Costs [expensæ litis, Lat.], expenses incurred in litigation or professional transactions, consisting of money paid for stamps, &c. to the officers of the court, or to the counsel, attorneys, and solicitors, for their fees, &c. Costs in actions or suits are either between attorney or solicitor and client, being what are payable in every case to the attorney or solicitor, by his client, whether he ultimately succeed or not; or between party and party, being those only which are allowed in some particular cases to the party succeeding against his adversary, and these are either interlocutory, given on various motions and proceedings in the course of the suit or action, or final, allowed when the matter is determined.

Neither party was entitled to costs at common law, but the Statute of Gloucester (6 Edw. I. c. 1) gives costs to a successful plaintiff. This enactment is somewhat restrained by subsequent statutes, in order to check trifling or vexatious litigation; and the 2 & 3 Hen. VIII. c. 6, and 4 Jac. I. c. 3, give costs to a victorious defendant. The civil law maxim, victus victori in expensis condemnatus est, is now recognised. 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. p. 470, et seq.

There were many cases of vexatious proceedings, in which the legislature formerly provided that the party in fault should be punished by the payment to his adversary of double or treble costs: but all such provisions are now repealed, and the adversary is entitled only to a full and reasonable indemnity, to be taxed by the proper officer, which taxation shall, as in ordinary cases, be subject to review. Bills of costs for conveyancing business are now subject to taxation by the Attorneys and Solicitors' Act.

Although, in equity, the person who fails in the suit must be deemed liable to the costs, yet the costs rest entirely in the discretion of the court, for the primâ facie claim to costs may be rebutted by the particular circumstances of the case, and it is for the court to decide whether those circumstances are or are not sufficient to rebut the claim. See Sm. Ch. Pr. 810, et seq.

As to costs in criminal cases, see 7 Geo. IV. c. 64; 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 44; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 12; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 76; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 101; and 14 & 15 Vict. cc. 11, 19, 55.

In matrimonial suits the wife, whether petitioner or respondent, is generally entitled to her costs from the husband, and they may be taxed de die in diem during the progress of the suit. She can compel the husband to deposit, or give security for, a sufficient sum to meet the costs of the hearing, and her proctor or attorney is entitled to her taxed costs to the amount of the sum so deposited, although she fails in the suit; if successful, she is entitled to all her costs, though the amount exceeds the sum deposited or secured. If she does not get a sum deposited or secured, and fails, the court will not compel the husband to pay the costs after the hearing has taken place.

Costs de incremento, costs of increase, i.e. those extra expenses incurred, which do not appear on the face of the proceedings, such as witnesses' expenses, fees to counsel, attendances, court-fees, &c.

Co-surety, a fellow-surety.

Cotarius, a cottager, who held in free socage, and paid a stated firm or rent in provisions or money with some occasional personal services.

Cote, or Cot [fr. koti, Fin.], cottage.

Cotellus, or Coteria, a small cottage, house, or homestall.

Coterellus, a servile tenant, who held in mere villenage; his person, issue, and goods were disposable at the lord's pleasure.

Coterie, a fashionable association; or a knot of persons forming a particular circle. The origin of the term was purely commercial, signifying an association, in which each member furnished his part, and bore his share in the profit and loss.

Coteswold [fr. cote and wold, Sax.], a place where there is no wood.

Cotland, and Cotsethland, land held by a cottager, whether in socage or villenage.

Cotsethla, Cotsetle, the little seat or mansion belonging to a small farm.

Cotsethus, a cottage-holder, who by servile tenure was bound to work for the lord.—Cowel.

Cottage, a small house without lands belonging to it.—15 Geo. III. c. 32. As to cottage allotments for the benefit of the poor, see 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 42; and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118.

Cottier tenure, one where a labourer makes his contract for land without the intervention of a capitalist farmer, and where the conditions of the contract, especially the amount of rent, are determined not by custom, but by competition. Also a class of subtenants, who rent a cottage and an acre or two of land from small farmers.—Irish. 1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 383.

Cotuca, coat armour.

Cotuchans, boors, husbandmen.

Couchant, lying down; squatting.

Coucher, or Courcher, a factor who continues abroad for traffic; also the general book wherein any corporation, &c. register their acts.

Council, an assembly of persons for the purposes of concerting measures of state or municipal policy—hence called councillors.

Council of Medical Education, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 91.

Counsel, or Counsellor, a person retained by a client to plead his cause in a court of judicature; a barrister; an advocate.

Count [fr. conte, Fr., narrative], a particular charge in a declaration or indictment, setting forth the cause of complaint. It is also used, in a real action, as the name for the whole declaration.

Countee, or Count [fr. comte, Fr.; comes, Lat.], the most eminent dignity of a subject before the Conquest. He was præfectus or præpositus comitatûs, and had the charge and custody of the county; but this authority is now vested in the sheriff.—9 Rep. 46.

Countenance [fr. contenance, Fr., contineo, Lat., to hold together], credit; estimation.

Counter, the name of two prisons in London, the Poultry Counter, and Wood Street Counter, now consolidated into one new-built prison, for the use of the city, to confine debtors, peace-breakers, &c.

Counter-Deed, a secret writing, either before a notary or under a private seal, which destroys, invalidates, or alters a public one.

Counterfeit, an imitation of something made without lawful authority, and with a view to defraud by passing the false for the true.

Counterfesance [Fr.], the act of forging.

Countermand, the revocation of an Act; where a thing done is afterwards, by some act or ceremony, made void by the person who did it, it is either actual, by deed; or implied, by law. A plaintiff who has given notice of trial may countermand it in writing four days before the time mentioned in the notice of trial, unless short notice of trial has been given, and then two days only, unless otherwise ordered.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 316.

Countermark, a sign put upon goods already marked; also the several marks put upon goods belonging to several persons, to show that they must not be opened, but in the presence of all the owners or their agents.

Counterpart, the corresponding part or duplicate; the key of a cipher. When the several parts of an indenture are interchangeably executed by the several parties, that part or copy which is executed by the grantor is usually called the original, and the rest are counterparts. Of late, it is more usual and better for all the parties to execute every part, whereby they are all made originals.

Counterplea, a kind of replication; an incidental pleading; diverging from the main series of the allegations. When the tenant in any real action, tenant by the curtesy or in dower, in his answer and plea vouches any one to warrant his title, or prays in aid of another who has a larger estate, as of him in reversion, &c.: or where one that is a stranger to the action comes and prays to be received to save his estate; then that which the demandant alleges against it, why he should not be admitted, is called a counterplea: it is a replication to aid prier, and is called counterplea to the voucher. But when the voucher is allowed, and the vouchee comes and demands what cause the tenant has to vouch him, and the tenant shows his cause, whereupon the vouchee pleads anything to avoid the warranty, that is termed a counterplea of the warranty.—Termes de la Ley.

Counter-rolls, the rolls which sheriffs have with the coroners, containing particulars of their proceedings, as well of appeals as of inquests, &c.—3 Edw. I. c. 10.

Counter-security, a security given to one who has entered into a bond or become surety for another; a countervailing bond of indemnity.

Counter-sign, the signature of a secretary or other subordinate officer to any writing signed by a principal or superior, to test the authenticity of it.

Counties Corporate, certain cities and towns to which, out of special grace and favor, the sovereigns of England have granted the privilege to be counties of themselves, and not to be comprised in any other county, but to be governed by their own sheriffs and other magistrates, so that no officers of the county at large have any power to intermeddle therein. The 3 Geo. I. c. 5, for the regulation of the office of sheriffs, enumerates twelve cities and five towns which are counties of themselves, and which have, consequently, their own sheriffs. The cities are London, Chester, Bristol, Coventry, Canterbury, Exeter, Gloucester, Litchfield, Lincoln, Norwich, Worcester, York. The towns are Kingston-upon-Hull, Nottingham, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Poole, Southampton. As they constitute no part of the counties at large in which they are locally situate, so they had formerly, in general, no share in voting for the members to serve for those counties in Parliament. Twelve of the number are now expressly included within their respective counties as far as regards the right of election for knights of the shire. They are Canterbury, Chester, Coventry, Gloucester, Kingston-upon-Hull, Lincoln, London, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Poole, Worcester, York and Ainsty, and Southampton; to these is added Carmarthen in South Wales.—Schedule G. 2 Wm. IV. c. 45, s. 17.

Counting-house, the room appropriated by merchants, traders, and manufacturers to the keeping of their account-book, ledgers, &c.

Counting-house of the Queen's Household, usually called the Board of Green Cloth, where sit the lord-steward and treasurer of the Queen's house, the comptroller, master of the household, cofferer, and two clerks of the Green Cloth, &c., for daily taking the accounts of all expenses of the household, making provisions and ordering payment.—39 Eliz. c. 7.

Countors [fr. contours, Fr.], serjeants-at-law, whom a man retains to defend his cause and speak for him in court, for their fees.—1 Inst. 17.

Count-out. Forty members form a House of Commons; and though there be ever so many at the beginning of a debate, yet, if during the course of it, the House should be deserted by the members, till reduced below the number of forty, any one member may have it adjourned upon its being counted; but a debate may be continued when only one member is left in the House, provided no one choose to move an adjournment.

County [fr. comté, Fr.; comitatus, Lat.], a shire or portion of country comprehending a great number of hundreds. England is divided into forty counties or shires, Wales into twelve, and Scotland into thirty. It seems probable that the realm was originally divided into counties with a view to the convenient administration of justice, the judicial business of the kingdom having, in former times, been chiefly despatched in local courts held in each different county, before the sheriff as its principal officer. His duties are now more ministerial than judicial. The larger counties are subdivided, for purposes of parliamentary representation, and each portion forms a separate county (so far as this purpose is concerned), and sends its own representative knights to the House of Commons.—2 Wm. IV. c. 45. As to the divisions of counties for holding petty and special sessions, see 9 Geo. IV. c. 43; 10 Geo. IV. c. 46; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 12; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 65.

County Court, a tribunal incident to the jurisdiction of a sheriff. It is not a court of record. Proceedings are removable into a superior court, by recordari facias loquelam, or writ of false judgment. Outlawries of absconding offenders are here proclaimed; and also election of knights of the shire, coroners, &c., takes place, but the judicial business has been for the most part transferred to the County Courts, sixty inferior tribunals which have been established throughout England. The ancient Teutonic County Courts or Shyremotes, the great seats of Saxon justice, were tribunals of the same kind. They are chiefly regulated by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 101; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 74; and the rules of practice pursuant thereto dated Dec. 8, 1856. The power of committal by the County Court Judges under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 98, is no longer to be exercised unless credit has been obtained by false pretences, fraud, or breach of trust, or the debt, &c., has been contracted without reasonable expectation of being able to pay it, or the debtor has made a transfer &c.

of his property with intent to defraud his creditors, or has had, since the judgment, means to pay the debt, &c. or costs, and has neglected to pay the same.—22 & 23 Vict. c. 57. See also 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, s. 105.

County Palatine [fr. palatium, Lat., a court]. There were three of these counties—Chester, Durham and Lancaster. The two former were such by immemorial custom, the latter was created by Edward III. The Bishop of Durham and the Duke of Lancaster had royal power within their respective counties. They could pardon treasons, murders, and felonies, they appointed judges and magistrates; all writs and indictments ran in their names, and offences were said to be done against their peace and not contra pacem domini regis. The 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, abolished the Court of Session of the county palatine of Chester, and subjected the county in all things to the jurisdiction of the superior courts at Westminster. The 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 62; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 43; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 229; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 82, and c. 125, ss. 100–102; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15, ss. 1–3, c. 45, and c. 67, s. 8; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, s. 10, regulated and made conformable the practice and proceedings in the Court of Common Pleas and of Chancery at Lancaster, in most particulars, to those of the superior courts; and the 2 Vict. c. 16; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, ss. 229–234; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, ss. 100–104; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15 and c. 67, s. 8, have made similar provisions with regard to the courts at Durham.

The counties palatine are now in the hands of the Crown; the jurisdiction of Durham is vested, as a separate franchise and royalty, in the Crown, by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 19. Lancaster was vested in the Crown by Henry IV., separated indeed from the other possessions of the Crown in order and government, but united in point of inheritance.

County Rate, an imposition levied on the occupiers of lands, and applied to many miscellaneous purposes; among which the most important are those of defraying the expenses connected with prisons, reimbursing to private parties the costs they have incurred in prosecuting public offenders, and defraying the expenses of the county police. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81.

County Sessions. They are the general quarter sessions of the peace for each county, and are held four times a year, viz. in the first week (on some day fixed by the magistrates) after the 11th of October, the 28th of December, the 31st of March, and the 24th of June, in every year, provision being made to prevent the April sessions clashing with the spring assizes (1 Wm. IV. c. 70; 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 47). The general quarter sessions for the county of Middlesex are remodelled by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71, which requires two sessions to be held monthly—the general quarter sessions being the first of these, held in the months of January, April, July, and October; and the general sessions being the second or adjourned sessions, held in the months of February, May, August, and November; and such other sessions as shall be fixed by the magistrates at the first sessions held in December. Sec. 11 abolishes the sessions for the city of Westminster. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55. County general quarter sessions have both a criminal and civil jurisdiction. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 38, has abridged their criminal jurisdiction, prohibiting them from trying any treason, murder, or capital felony; any offence punishable with penal servitude for life; and a long catalogue of offences, specified in the act, such as misprision of treason, political offences, offences against religion, perjury, and subornation of perjury; bribery, forgery, bigamy, abduction; setting fire to growing crops, woods, heaths, &c.; endeavouring to conceal the birth of a child; offences against the insolvent and bankrupt laws; administering unlawful oaths; blasphemous and seditious libels; conspiracies and combinations; stealing, injuring, or destroying legal records and documents, testamentary papers and wills. Their civil business is generally as a court of appeal, extending over penal convictions, orders of justices, matters connected with the administration of the poor laws, vagrant laws, the highways, &c.—3 Burns' Justice, 973.

Coupons [fr. couper, Fr., to cut], interest and dividend certificates; also those parts of a commercial instrument which are to be cut, and which are evidence of something connected with the contract mentioned in the instrument. They are generally attached to certificates of loan, where the interest is payable at particular periods, and, when the interest is paid, they are cut off and delivered to the payer. A coupon does not require a stamp; it is nothing more than an I.O.U.

Courier [fr. courir, Fr., to run], an express messenger of haste.

Courtacier, a horse courser—2 Inst. 719.

Courtesy, see CURTESY.

Court [fr. curia, Lat.; cour, Fr.; koert, Dut.], the Queen's palace or mansion; also a place where justice is administered. In every court there must be at least three constituent parts, the actor, or plaintiff, who complains of an injury done; the reus, or defendant, who is called upon to make satisfaction for it; and the judex, or judicial power, which is to examine the truth of the fact, to determine the law arising upon that fact, and if any injury appear to have been done, to ascertain, and by its officers to apply, the remedy. It is usual in the superior courts to have attorneys or solicitors, and advocates or counsel, as assistants. Courts are either of record, where their acts and judicial proceedings are enrolled for a perpetual memory and testimony, and they have power to fine and imprison, and error may be brought upon their judgments; or, not of record, as those generally of a private man, which the law will not entrust with any discretionary power over the fortune or liberty of the subject; their proceedings are neither enrolled nor recorded; they cannot hold pleas of matters cognisable at the common law, unless under the value of 40*s*., nor of any forcible injury whatsoever, nor have any process to arrest the person of the defendant; a writ of false judgment lies to reverse their decisions. It does not follow, however, that a court which is not of record must be an inferior court. The equity jurisdiction of the High Court of Chancery is said to be in strictness a court not of record; but the dignity of this court precludes a writ of false judgment, when sitting as a court of equity; and as it is not a court of record, no error can be brought to rectify its decrees, and the proceeding for this purpose is by appeal to the House of Lords. The instances in which this court sits as a court of common law are very rare, but whenever this does occur, as it is then a court of record, error lies from its judgments.—3 Bl. Com. 23. For a description of the several courts, public or private, general or special, consult the initial letter of the particular title of every court, e. g. Court of Admiralty, see ADMIRALTY.

The several species, however, of courts of justice have been thus classed:—

(I.) General jurisdiction, comprehending the Court Baron, the Hundred Court, the County Courts, the Court of Exchequer, the Court of Common Pleas, the Court of Queen's Bench, the Court of Chancery, the Court of Exchequer-Chamber, the House of Peers, the Courts of Assize and Nisi Prius, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the Probate and Divorce Courts, and the Court of Bankruptcy.

(II.) Ecclesiastical, military, and maritime, comprehending the Archdeacon's Court, the Consistory Court, the Court of Arches, the Court of Peculiars, the Prerogative Court, the Court of Chivalry, and the Court of Admiralty.

(III.) Special jurisdiction, comprehending the Court of Piepoudre, the Forest Courts, the Court of Sewers, the Court of Policies of Assurance (the Court of Marshalsea, the Palace Court, both abolished), the Court of the Duchy Chamber of Lancaster, the Courts of the Counties Palatine, the Courts of the Stannaries, the Borough-Courts, the Court of Requests, or Courts of Conscience, the University Courts. By 22 & 23 Vict. c. 63, the courts in one part of Her Majesty's dominions may remit a case for the opinion in law of a court in any other part thereof.

Court-Baron, a court which, although not one of record, is incident to every manor, and cannot be severed therefrom. It was ordained for the maintenance of the services and duties stipulated for by lords of manors, and for the purpose of determining actions of a personal nature, where the debt or damage was under forty shillings.

This court may be held at any place within the manor, giving fifteen days' notice, including three Sundays, of the day when the court will be held; but three or four days' notice have been deemed sufficient. It is frequently held together with the court-leet. It generally assembles but once in the year.

The freehold tenants alone are suitors to the court-baron; and it is essential to the existence of the court that there should be two suitors at the least; for since freemen can only be tried by their peers or equals, should there be but one freeman, he can then have no peer or judge, and consequently he must appeal to the court of the lord paramount. The suitors of a court-baron constitute its judges. The steward is a constituent essential part of the court, and not a mere ministerial officer, for the court cannot be holden without him.

A court-baron not being a court of record, neither the lord nor his steward can fine or imprison.

The tenants of a manor may make by-laws touching their commons and the like, to bind such tenants as assent thereto, unless they be made by prescription, or under an immemorial custom. These laws can never bind strangers. The penalty for the breach of a by-law is in the nature of a fine, rather than amercement, and is not affeerable, i. e. assissable.

Court-Lands, domains or lands kept in the lord's hands to serve his family.

Court-Leet. [Coke says, leet is a Saxon word, and comes from the verb gelathian, or gelethian (g being added euphoniæ gratiâ), i. e. convenire, to assemble together unde conventus. 4 Inst. 261. It is also said to be derived from læt, signifying censura, arbitrium, 'because this court redressed wrongs by way of judgment, against any person of the frank-pledge who had done any wrong or injury to another.' Lex. Man. 131. Others suppose it to be derived from the Saxon leod, plebs, and to mean the populi curiæ, or folkmote.—Ritson on Courts Leet. Scriven derives it from the Saxon, led, to assign or grant, being a juridical franchise held by a subject under a grant from the crown.—2 Scriv. Cop. 677, note y.] It is a court of record. Its jurisdiction and privileges were purchased of the Crown by the possessors of large estates, that the people might have justice rendered to them nearer to their own homes. This court may be appendant to a hundred as well as to a manor; and it may also be appendant to a vill or to an ancient messuage.

A leet, held by charter, must be held on the days mentioned in the charter; and when held by prescription, it must be kept at the customary time; the court leet may be adjourned, when requisite, by three proclamations. It may be held at any place within the precinct where the lord pleases, except the church, chapel, or churchyard. Usually fifteen days' notice is given. Suit to the leet is due by reason of resiancy or abode, and has no reference to tenure; it is therefore called suit-real, and not suit-service. The attendance is usually essoined on the payment of a nominal sum. Since the leet was originally granted, for the more convenient administration of justice, the lord is compellable to hold a court by mandamus, and a leet is forfeited by non-user and by acts of abuser. A long disuser of the franchise will induce a suspicion of defect of title.—1 Sir W. Bl. 47. The usurpation of a leet has been adjudged an indictable offence.—6 Mod. 183.

The steward of a court-leet is an essential officer, and should be indifferent between the lord and the law (see Powell on Courts Leet, p. 43), for he is the judge, and presides in the court wholly in a judicial character; the ministerial acts of the court, such as impanelling the jury, are executed by the bedell or bailiff, sworn to a due performance of his duty. The steward may fine or imprison, and may take a recognizance of the peace: he cannot appoint a deputy, unless he be so empowered in his patent or deed of appointment, or there exist an established custom for it. All fines are recoverable by action of debt or by distress. A fine is imposed by the court, but an amercement is generally the act of the jury; it must always be affeered in open court, by two or more persons appointed by the steward, and duly sworn, and is then recoverable by distress or action.

By-laws, embodied in the presentments and verdicts of the jury, and homage, may be good by custom.

In some manors, the jury of the court-leet choose the mayor, port-reeve, or other chief municipal officer of the borough or town to which the leet jurisdiction is appended, while, in others, the jury present in writing the candidate who may have the majority of votes, but have no control over the poll. The bailiff is sometimes chosen by the jury; but the steward or the lord may have the appointment by custom. The right to elect constables, tithing-men, and third boroughs is vested in the jury. In ancient times, ale-conners and leather-sealers were chosen at the court-leet. An officer, called the hayward, is now appointed; his duty is to keep the lanes clear, by impounding stray cattle that he may find there.

All offences cognizable in the leet are enquired of and presented by the suitors of the court, sworn and charged as a jury for that purpose; and all presentments may be removed, by certiorari, into the Queen's Bench, and then traversed. See 2 Scriv. Cop. p. 730.

Cousenage, see COSENAGE.

Cousin. [fr. cousin, Fr.; cugino, It.; consobrinus, Lat., whence cusdrin, cusrin; sobrino, Sp.] A cousin is any collateral relation except brothers and sisters and their descendants and the brothers and sisters of any ancestor. The child of A's uncle or aunt is called his cousin German, or first cousin, and the child, grandchild, &c., of such cousin is called his first cousin once, twice, &c., removed. The grandchild of A's great uncle is his second cousin, and the child, grandchild, &c., of such cousin is his second cousin, once, twice, &c., removed, and so on.

Couthutlaugh [fr. couth, Sax., knowing, and utlaugh, an outlaw], a person who willingly and knowingly received an outlaw, and cherished or concealed him; for which offence he underwent the same punishment as the outlaw himself.—Bract.

Covenable, convenient or suitable.

Covenant [fr. convenant, Fr.], an agreement, convention, or promise of two or more parties by deed in writing, signed, sealed, and delivered, by which either of the parties pledges himself to the other that something is either done or shall be done, or stipulates for the truth of certain facts. He who thus promises is called the covenantor; and he to whom it is made the covenantee. A covenant being part of a deed is subject to the general rules for the construction of such instruments: as, first, to be always taken most strongly against the covenantor, and most in favour of the covenantee; secondly, to be taken according to the intent of the parties; thirdly, to be construed ut res magis valeat quam pereat; fourthly, when no time is limited for its performance that it be performed in a reasonable time. If the covenantor covenant for himself and his heirs, it is then a covenant real, and descends upon the heirs, who are bound to perform it provided they have assets by descent; if he covenant also for his executors and administrators, his personal assets, as well as his real, are likewise pledged for the performance of the covenant, but the executors and administrators are bound by every covenant, without being named, unless it is such a covenant as is to be performed personally by the covenantor, and there has been no breach before his death. Covenants for title are frequently termed real covenants; they are usually, that the vendor is seised in fee, has power to convey, for quiet enjoyment by the purchaser, his heirs and assigns, that the land shall be holden free from incumbrances, and for further assurance. These five covenants are separate and distinct, but the first and second of them are synonymous, for if a person be seised in fee, he has a power to sell, but the converse of this proposition is not universally true. No particular technical words are requisite, for any words or form of expression which import an agreement or act will suffice. A covenant to do a thing, which upon the face of it appears to be prejudicial to the public interest, or otherwise contrary to law, is absolutely void, as is an impossible covenant, if the impossibility existed at the time of making it.

A covenant is either express or implied—it subsists either in law or in fact. An express covenant, or one in fact, is expressed in words; an implied covenant, or one in law, is that which the law implies, though not expressed in words. Express covenants are taken more strictly than implied. All covenants for the benefit of the estate run with the land, so that he who has the one is subject to the other; they bind those who come in by act of law, as the personal representatives, as well as those who come in by the act of the parties. As to what covenants shall be construed to be precedent or not, it has been laid down that the dependence or independence of covenants must be collected from the sense and meaning of the parties; and that in whatever order covenants may stand in a deed, their precedency must depend on the order of time which the intent of the transaction requires.

Covenants are inherent, that tend to the support of the land or thing granted, or are collateral to it; affirmatives or negative; executed, or that which is already done; executory, or that which is to be done.

There are cases in which equity will relieve against a forfeiture incurred by breach of covenant, when full compensation can be made; but this indulgence is not willingly extended beyond the case of a money payment. See 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, ss. 4 to 9.

The construction of covenants is the same in equity as at law. At law, a covenant must be strictly and literally performed; in equity, it must be substantially performed, according to the true intent of the parties, so far as circumstances will admit; but if by unavoidable accident, by fraud, by surprise, or by ignorance, not wilful, parties have been prevented from executing it literally, a court of equity will interfere, and if compensation can be made, will give relief. Lord Eldon said, in Iggulden v. May, 9 Ves. 333, 'though it is clear the construction of a covenant must be the same in law and in equity, I can conceive a number of cases in which, admitting the operation to be the same in law and in equity, a court of equity would reform the covenant and introduce another covenant; of which it might be equally predicted, that the construction should be the same in law and in equity.'—Shep. Touch, 160; Bac. Abr., Covenant (G); Com. Dig., Covenant (F); Vin. Abr. Covenant (O).

Covenant, action of, a species of the ex contractu actions. It lies where a party claims damages for breach of a covenant, which is, in fact, a promise under seal.

Covenant to stand seised to uses. A voluntary assurance, operating under the Statute of Uses, and by non-transmutation of possession; i. e. it does not transfer the seisin to another to raise the use in the covenantee, but that seisin remains in the covenantor, he standing seised to the use of the covenantee. It must be by deed, and not by parol, and made by a person seised of lands or tenements, and consequently cannot embrace an equity, right, or contingency, though it may be of a reversion or vested remainder, for the reversioner or remainder-man is in the seisin. It must be in consideration of marriage or blood, for a covenant to stand seised to the use of a stranger would be void. It must not be for a money consideration, for that would be a bargain and sale. But it is not necessary that the consideration of blood be expressed, for if a person covenant to stand seised to the use of his wife, son, and the like, it will be sufficient, as the consideration would be apparent. Love and affection to an illegitimate child are not sufficient considerations to raise a use; à fortiori, long acquaintance, and familiar intercourse, are not. It is not settled what degree of relationship is necessary to support this assurance; the kindred between second cousins would perhaps be sufficient, if the fact were noticed in the instrument. The consideration of this conveyance is the foundation of it; a conveyance in the form of, and void as a grant, feoffment, or release, may still take effect as a covenant to stand seised.

The only essential difference between a covenant to stand seised to uses and a bargain and sale, setting aside the external formalities required to the validity of the latter, consists in the nature of the consideration; and hence the same deed may operate for the benefit of different parties, both as one and the other; as, if 'A. covenant that in consideration that B. is his son, he shall have the land for life, and after his death, in consideration that C. has given him 100*l.*, that he shall have it in fee.' The enrolment gives such solemnity to a bargain and sale that it is said to be an estoppel; but this is not to be understood in the same sense in which an operation by estoppel is attributed to a fine or feoffment, so as to affect property afterwards acquired, but merely that the validity of the deed cannot be denied.—2 Sand. on Uses, 96; Wat. Conv. 331.

Covenant, writ of, abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36.

Coventry Act, 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 1.

Covert-Baron, said of a wife who is under the protection of her husband.

Coverture, the condition of a woman during marriage, because she is then under the cover, influence, and protection of her husband. The effect of coverture, as to the wife's person, is that it belongs of right to her husband, though should he abuse this right, the wife may have security of the peace against him. As to her property, all freeholds of which she is seised at the time of marriage, or afterwards, vest in the husband and wife during coverture, in right of the wife, and the husband is entitled to the profits and has the sole control and management, but cannot convey or charge the lands for any longer period than while his own interest continues. She can convey with her husband's concurrence, by any of the ordinary modes of assurance, duly acknowledged, as directed by the Fines and Recoveries' Act. As to her inheritable realty, the husband becomes, under certain circumstances, tenant by the courtesy, if he outlive his wife, and he and his wife may together make leases of her lands of inheritance, so as to bind her or her heirs after his interest in the property has determined. As to the wife's terms of years, and other chattels real, they belong to the husband, and may be taken in execution for his debts, and should he survive her, they are absolutely his; but if he make no disposition of them, and she survive him, they then belong to her. The husband becomes generally the absolute owner of his wife's personal chattels (except her paraphernalia), and her choses in action (provided he reduce them into possession). See 20 & 21 Vict c. 57. The wife, when acting in autre droit, as executrix, is independent of her husband. Marriage settlements and separate provisions modify, of course, his common law rights, according to the particular agreements of the parties. As a general rule, a married woman is incapable of entering into any contracts, except for necessaries, and of suing and being sued. Coverture protects her from criminal prosecution, except in cases of treason, murder, manslaughter, or cases of mere misdemeanour, or crimes committed in her husband's absence.

Covin [fr. convenio, Lat., to agree], a secret conspiracy or agreement between two or more persons to injure or defraud another.

Covinous, fraudulent.

Craspice, and Craspisce, i. e. crassus piscis, probably the grampus.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Crassa Negligentia, gross neglect.

Crastino, the morrow after.

Cravare, to impeach.

Craven, or Cravant [derived by Skinner from crave, as one that craves or begs his life: perhaps it comes originally from the noise made by a conquered cock, cradant, prov. E.; craw-don, Sc., a coward, seems the same word], a word of disgrace and obloquy, pronounced by either champion, in the ancient trial by battle, proving recreant, i. e. yielding. Glanville calls it infestum et inverecundum verbum. His condemnation was amittere liberam legem, i. e. to become infamous, and not to be accounted liber et legalis homo, being supposed by the event to have been proved forsworn, and not fit to be put upon a jury or admitted as a witness.

Creamer, a foreign merchant, but generally taken for one who has a stall in a fair or market.—Blount.

Credentials, papers which give a title or claim to confidence, as the letters of commendation and power given to an ambassador, or public minister, by the prince who sends him to a foreign court.

Credit, a transfer of goods on trust in confidence of future payment. The seller believes in the solvency and probity of the buyer, and delivers his goods to him in confidence of it; or he delivers them on the reputation of his customer. In book-keeping, the side of an account in which payments are entered is called the credit side, as contra-distinguished from the debit side.

Creditor [Lat.], one who trusts or gives credit, correlative to debtor.

Creditors' Bill, a bill in equity filed by one or more creditors, by and in behalf of himself or themselves, and all other creditors who shall come in under the decree, for an account of the assets and a due administration of the estate. These bills are allowed upon the principle, that as executors and administrators have great power of preference at law, courts of equity ought, according to the maxim that equality is equity, to interpose upon the application of any creditor, by such a bill to secure a distribution of the assets, without preference to any one or more creditors. The usual decree against the executor or administrator is (as it is commonly phrased) quod computet, that is to say, it directs the chief clerk to take the accounts between the deceased and all his creditors; and to cause the creditors, upon due public notice, to come before him to prove their debts, at a certain place, and within a limited period; and it also directs the chief clerk to take an account of all the personal estate of the deceased in the hands of the executor or administrator, and that the same be applied in payment of the debts and other charges in a due course of administration.

As soon as the decree to account is made, the executor or administrator is entitled to an injunction out of Chancery, to prevent any of the creditors from suing him at law, or proceeding in any suits already commenced, except under the direction and control of the court of equity where the decree is made. The object of the court, under such circumstances, is to compel all the creditors to come in and prove their debts before the chief clerk, they being allowed 4*l.* per cent upon their debts, from the decree to account, and 35*s.* for their costs, and to have the proper payments and discharges made under the authority of the court; so that the executor or administrator may not be harassed by multiplicity of suits, or a race of diligence encouraged between different creditors, each striving for an undue mastery and preference. But in order to prevent any abuse, by connivance between an executor or administrator and a creditor, it is now a common practice not to grant an injunction unless the answer or affidavit of the executor or administrator states the amount of the assets, and then only upon the terms of his bringing the assets into court, or obeying such other order of the court as the circumstances of the case may require. The same remedial justice is applied where the application, instead of being made by creditors, is made by legatees or trustees.—1 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 442. As to an administration summons by creditors, see Smi. Ch. Pr. 551.

Creditrix, a female creditor.

Crementum comitatus (the increase of a county). The sheriffs or counties anciently answered in their accounts for the improvement of the king's rents, above the viscontiel rents, under this title.

Crepare oculum, to put out an eye. An offence punishable among the Saxons by a fine of 50*s.* This was the highest fine.—Turner's Anglo-Saxons, v. ii. app. iii. c. ii., p. 515.

Crepusculum, or Crepusclę [Lat.], the twilight, i. e. the faint light diffused through the atmosphere by the sun, some time before rising and after setting; it is caused by the reflection of the sun's rays from the aqueous vapours and atmosphere overhead, which produce this effect in our climate to the height of forty-four miles. The morning twilight begins and the evening twilight ends when the sun is about eighteen degrees below the horizon. At the poles, where there are six months day and six months night, the twilight continues for two months, so that during a great part of the half year there is light at night.

Crescente malitiâ crescere debet et pœna.—2 Inst. 479.—(Vice increasing, punishment ought also to increase.)

Cretinus, a sudden stream or torrent.

Cretio, the period fixed by a testator within which the heir must have formally declared his intention to accept.—Civil Law.

Crier of the Court of Chancery, abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 27.

Crimen falsi (the offence of forgery).

Crimen falsi dicitur, cum quis illicitus, cui non fuerit ad hæc data auctoritas, de sigillo regis rapto vel invento, brevia, cartasve consignáverit.—Fleta, l. 1, c. xxiii.—(The crime of forgery is when any one illicitly, to whom power has not been given for such purposes, has signed writs or charters with the king's seal, either stolen or found).

Crimen furti, the offence of theft.

Crimen incendii, the offence of arson.

Crimen læsæ majestatis, the crime of injured majesty; treason.

Crimen læsæ majestatis omnia alia crimina excedit quoad pœnam.—3 Inst. 210.—(The crime of treason exceeds all other crimes in its punishment.)

Crimen raptus, the offence of rape.

Crimen roberiæ, the offence of robbery.

Crimes, violations of rights, which, considered in reference to their evil tendencies, as regards the community at large, are the subjects of indictment. They consist either of misdemeanors or felonies. In our law misdemeanor is generally used in contradistinction to felony, and comprehends all indictable offences which do not amount to felony, as perjury, battery, libels, conspiracies, &c.

It is not very easy in theory, and quite impossible according to the English law, to lay down any single principle by which to distinguish crimes from civil injuries—private from public wrongs. By the English law a distinction exists, but it seems wholly technical; depending sometimes on the situation of the agent; sometimes on the nature or relations of the thing which is the object of the act; sometimes on the manner in which the act is done; sometimes on the consequences of the act, the time of doing it, and other grounds which it would be useless to enumerate, because they can be learned thoroughly only by an acquaintance with the law itself.—4 Bl. Com. 7, n. 3, by Coleridge. See OFFENCE.

Crimina morte extinguuntur.—(Crimes are extinguished by death.)

Criminal, a person indicted for a public offence and found guilty.

Criminal conversation, adultery. See ADULTERY. The action of crim. con. is abolished by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 59; but the 33rd section gives a husband the right to claim damages from an adulterer, either in a petition for dissolution of marriage or for judicial sepation, or in a petition limited to that object, and the damages claimed must be assessed by a jury upon the same principles and subject to the same rules as were formerly applicable to the trial of actions for criminal conversation, and the court has power to direct the mode of their application, and may direct that they be settled for the benefit of the children of the marriage, or as a provision for the wife.

Criminal information, a proceeding at the suit of the Queen, without a previous indictment or presentment by a grand jury. Criminal informations are of two sorts: (1) ex officio, which is a formal written suggestion of an offence committed, filed by the Attorney-General, or in the vacancy of that office by the Solicitor-General, in the Court of Queen's Bench, without the intervention of a grand jury. It lies for misdemeanors only, and not for treasons or felonies. The offences against which they are usually directed are seditious or blasphemous libels or words, seditious riots not amounting to treason, libels upon the Queen's ministers, the judges or other high officers, reflecting upon their conduct in the execution of their official duties; obstructing such officers in the execution of their duties; against officers themselves for bribery, or for other corrupt or oppressive conduct. The information is filed in the Crown office without the previous leave of the Court. (2) Information by the master of the Crown office, which is filed at the instance of an individual, with the leave of the court; and usually confined to gross and notorious misdemeanors, riots, batteries, libels, and other immoralities. The application is for a rule to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against the party complained of, and must be founded upon an affidavit disclosing all the material facts of the case. If the court grant the rule nisi, it is afterwards, upon showing cause, discharged or made absolute. When an information is filed, either thus or ex officio, it must be tried by a petit jury of the county where the offence arose, and for that purpose, unless the case be of such importance as to be tried at bar, it is sent down by writ of nisi prius into that county, and tried either by a common or special jury, like a civil action, and, if the defendant is found guilty, he must afterwards receive judgment from the Court of Queen's Bench.—4 Bl. Com. 308.

Criminal law. This division of our jurisprudence comprises the administration of the Crown law by the Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster, consisting principally of a sort of quasi criminal law, as indictments for libels, nuisances, the repair of roads, bridges, &c., informations, quo warranto, mandamus, certiorari, and the judicial decision of questions concerning the poor laws; and the general criminal law of the kingdom as administered either in the Court of Queen's Bench or at the sessions in London and Middlesex, and at sessions and the assizes in the country.

Criminal Lunatic Asylum. See 23 & 24 Vict. c. 75.

Crocards, a sort of old base money.

Crocia, the crosier, or pastoral staff.

Crociarius, the cross-bearer, who went before the prelate.

Croft [A.S. fr. creaft, Old Eng., handy-craft, or croit, Gael., a hump], a little close adjoining to a dwelling-house or homestead, and enclosed for pasture or arable, or any particular use.

Croises, and Croisado. See CROYSES.

Croiteir, a crofter, one holding a croft.

Crop, the seeds or products of the harvest in corn.

Crore, ten millions.—Indian.

Cross-bill, answering to the reconventio of the Canon Law, as a mode of defence by cross-examination, is one filed by a defendant against the plaintiff or other defendants in the same suit, either to obtain (1) a necessary discovery of facts in aid of his defence to the original bill, or (2) full relief to all parties, touching the matters of the original bill, as in a suit for the specific performance of a written contract, which the defendant at the same time insists ought to be delivered up or cancelled, in order to protect him from the plaintiff hereafter bringing an action at law upon such contract, a relief which the defendant must pray for by a cross-bill.—Mitf. Pl. 97; Sto. Eq. Plead. s. 389, et seq.

A cross-bill should state the parties, objects and prayer of the original bill, and the proceedings thereon, also the rights of the party exhibiting the bill, which render the cross-suit necessary, or the ground on which he resists the claim of the plaintiff in the original bill, if that is the object of the new bill. It should not introduce new and distinct matters, not embraced in the original suit; for as to such matters it would be an original bill, and they cannot properly be examined at the hearing of the first suit. Where a cross-bill seeks not only a discovery but relief, care should be taken that the relief prayed by the cross-bill be equitable relief; for, to this extent it may be considered as not purely a cross-bill, but in the nature of an original bill, seeking farther aid from the court; and then the relief ought to be such as in point of jurisdiction it is competent for the court to give.—Sto. Eq. Pl. 453.

A cross-bill initiates a mere auxiliary, ancillary suit, depending altogether upon the original suit.

A cross-bill must, as a general rule, be brought before the closing of evidence in the original cause, unless the plaintiff in the cross-bill will go to the hearing upon the depositions and proofs already taken. This rule is established to prevent the danger of perjury, and the subornation of perjury, in case the parties should, after the closing of evidence, be permitted to examine witnesses de novo to the same matters to which they or others have been already examined. However, closing of evidence will be enlarged, or postponed, for the purpose of enabling the defendant to file a cross-bill upon a special application showing sufficient grounds to the court for making such an order. And when an original bill and cross-bill are filed, both causes commonly proceed to be heard together, which could not be done if the cross-bill were filed after closing of evidence in the original cause, unless the cross-bill were heard on the bill and answer. For the purpose of hearing the two causes together the cross-plaintiff is entitled to have his cause advanced upon a motion or petition of course. The two causes must be set down for hearing before the same judge, for they are considered united and parts of one and the same cause.

But although the general rule is, that a cross-bill must be filed before evidence closed, to entitle the party to take testimony in support of the facts asserted in it, independently of the answer; this rule is a restriction upon the rights of the defendant, and not upon the authority of the court; for, where it is necessary for the purposes of justice in a particular cause, the court may direct a cross-bill to be filed at any time.

The cross-bill is filed and served in the same way as an original bill, and appearance and answer are enforced in the same manner.

A cross-bill is now unnecessary in some cases in which it was formerly required. As, for example, if a bill is filed for the specific performance of an agreement, and the defendant should insist upon a different agreement from that stated by the plaintiff in the bill, and should offer to perform the specific agreement which he represents to have been made; the old practice would have required that the defendant should file a cross-bill, to entitle himself to a decree for the performance of the agreement as set up and proved by the defendant. But this would now be unnecessary, because the court will, under such circumstances, at his request, decree a specific performance of the agreement, actually set up and established in the defence.

The original plaintiff is entitled to have an answer to his interrogatories before he can be compelled to answer those of the cross-bill, but he must obtain an order for the purpose, which he may do as of course. This order allows him a certain time to answer the cross-bill after the original defendant has answered. The order can be obtained, although the cross-plaintiff may be in a situation to enforce an answer first, but it must be applied for before the cross-defendant has incurred a contempt for not answering the cross-bill. At the expiration of the time allowed to answer the cross-bill, after the original bill has been answered, the cross-plaintiff is entitled to an answer, and the cross-defendant is not entitled as of course to any further time.—Smi. Handb. 497.

The priority of answer to which the original plaintiff is entitled, may be waived and transferred to the cross-plaintiff by his amending his bill after the filing of the cross-bill, in things material, and requiring an answer; but the cross-plaintiff, upon such material amendment being made, must obtain an order, which is as of course, that the proceedings in the original bill be stayed until a certain time after the plaintiff shall have fully answered the cross-bill. Should he not then amend his bill, then the cross-plaintiff cannot stay the proceedings in the original cause until an answer to his cross-bill be filed, but can only stay or respite closing of the evidence in the original cause.

Where a defendant files a cross-bill for discovery only against the plaintiff, the answer to such cross-bill may be read and used by the party filing such cross-bill, in the same manner, and under the same restrictions as the answer to a bill praying relief may now be read and used.

The costs of a bill of discovery filed by any defendant to a bill for relief are to be costs in the original cause, unless the court otherwise orders.

A cross-bill for discovery alone has been rendered unnecessary, as a defendant can now examine a plaintiff upon interrogatories in the original suit, but a defendant has the option of still adopting the practice by cross-bill.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 19.

Also if a bill of exchange or promissory note be given in consideration of another bill or note, it is called a cross or counter bill or note.

Cross-examination, a close and rigid questioning of a witness by the counsel of the adverse party, in order to test the truth of his examination-in-chief. A witness cannot be cross-examined as to any fact which, if admitted, would be collateral and wholly irrelevant to the matter in issue, for the purpose of contradicting him by other evidence, in case he should deny the fact, and in this manner to discredit his testimony. When a witness has been once sworn to give evidence, the other party may cross-examine him, though he gave no evidence for the party who called him. Leading questions are admitted in the cross-examination of a witness, when much larger powers are given to counsel than in the examination-in chief.

Cross-remainders, reciprocal contingencies of succession, which may be implied in a will, but must always be expressed in a deed, and should be expressly limited in a will.

The broad rule is that wherever realty is devised to several persons in tail as tenants-in-common, and it appears to be the testator's intention that no part should go over until the failure of the issue of all the tenants-in-common, they take cross-remainders in tail amongst themselves.

The deductions from the authorities have been stated thus (2 Jarm. Wills. c. xlii. 471):

(1) That under a devise to several persons in tail, being tenants-in-common, with a limitation over for want, or in default of such issue, cross-remainders are to be implied amongst the devices in tail.

(2) That the above rule applies whether the devise be to two persons, or a larger number, though it may be made to them 'respectively,' and though in the devise over the testator have not used the words 'the said premises,' or 'all the premises,' or 'the same,' or any other expression denoting that the ulterior devise was to comprise the entire property, and not undivided shares.

(3) That the rule applies, in regard to executory trusts at least, though there be an express direction to insert cross-remainders among another class of objects, or a limitation over among some of the same objects; and even in direct devises an express limitation of cross-remainders among another class of objects has been held not to repel the implication.

(4) That the word 'remainder' following a devise to several in tail, will raise cross-remainders among them.

(5) That it is no objection to the implication of cross-remainders that there is an inequality among the devisees whose issue is referred to; some of them being tenants-in-tail, and others tenants for life, with remainder to their issue in tail.

(6) That a devise to the children of A. for life, and for want and in default of such issue then over, creates cross-remainders by implication for life among such devisees.

A gift to several in fee-simple as tenants-in-common, with a limitation over in case they all die under age, the share of one of the devisees dying during minority will devolve upon his representatives, unless and until the whole die under age.

Cross-remainders may be implied in wills, marriage articles, and limitations of executory or imperfect trusts, but not in deeds, and for this reason, that although in a deed a remainder may be implied, yet words of inheritance cannot, so as to determine what quantity of an estate is conferred by the remainder; otherwise, if no particular words were necessary to limit the inheritance, cross-remainders could be raised by implication in a deed as well as in a will.—Watk. Conv. 189.

Crossing checks. It is very usual for the drawers of bankers' checks to write across them the name of the payee's banker, in which case the banker on whom the check is drawn will only pay to that banker; in other cases, as when the drawer is unaware of the payee's banker, it is usual for him to write merely the words 'and Co.' leaving it to the payee to add the name of his banker. This serves the purpose of some security in case the check is lost, since it can only be paid through a banker, and moreover postpones in some measure the payment until the clearing hours in the afternoon. See BANKERS' CHEQUES.

Crown [fr. couronne, Fr.; kroone, Dut.; corona, Lat.], an ornamental badge of regal power worn on the head by sovereign princes. The word is frequently used when speaking of the sovereign herself, or the rights, duties, and prerogatives belonging to her. Also a silver coin of the value of five shillings. As to costs for and against the Crown, see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 90.

Crown cases reserved. Questions of law which arise at criminal trials (except in the case of demurrers) are now usually referred to the Court of Criminal Appeal, which sits under the authority of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78, which declares that the justices and barons shall have full power and authority to hear and finally determine the said question or questions reserved for their consideration, and thereupon to reverse, affirm, or amend any judgment which shall have been given on the indictment or inquisition, on the trial whereof such question or questions have arisen; or to avoid such judgment, and to order an entry to be made on the record that in the judgment of the said justices and barons the party convicted ought not to have been convicted; or to arrest the judgment thereon, or to order judgment to be delivered thereon.

Crown debts. It is a prerogative of the Crown to claim priority for its debts before all other creditors, and to recover them by a summary process called an extent, because thesaurus regiæ est pacis vinculum et bellorum nervi.

Every person having money belonging to the Crown is a crown-debtor. When upon inquisition a person is found to be a crown-debtor by simple contract, the debt immediately becomes a specialty; but a person giving to the Crown a bond on condition is not a bond-debtor before the condition is broken.

The places to be searched to ascertain the existence of any crown debts created or secured before the 4th of June, 1839, are the Exchequer Office and the Tax Office, among the receiver-general's bonds. Since that date, at the Common Pleas Office, pursuant to 2 Vict. c. 11. See 18 Vict. c. 15. After 31st Dec. 1859, the provisions as to re-registry contained in 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15, apply to crown debts.—22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 22, and see 23 & 24 Vict. c. 115, s. 1.

Crown office, a department belonging to the Court of Queen's Bench, commonly called the Crown side of the court. The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 20, abolished the clerks in this court, and the monopoly of their practice, throwing it open to all persons admitted or admissible to practice as attorneys of the Court of Queen's Bench; it also abolished several ancient offices, and many burthensome fees, and made the office subject to the direct control of the Lord Chief Justice. The office of Assistant Master was abolished by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 54. There are now only three officers of the crown side appointed by the Lord Chief Justice, viz. the Queen's coroner and attorney, and one master; their offices are held during good behaviour.

The business of this office may be thus stated:

1st. Original proceedings, which consist of (α) indictments for assaults and batteries; libels, nuisances, perjuries, conspiracies, non-repair of roads, bridges, &c.; (ε) informations.

2nd. Proceedings by way of supervision or appeal, exercised by means of (α) a certiorari; (ε) proceedings in error; (γ) mandamus.

3rd. Collateral proceedings, consisting of (α) articles of the peace; (ε) attachments; (γ) habeas corpus.

Two days in each week during term, viz. Wednesday and Saturday, are appropriated by the Court of Queen's Bench to the Crown business, called 'Crown Paper Days.'—Arch. Prac. of Crown Off.

Crown solicitor. The solicitor to the Treasury acts, in state prosecutions, as solicitor for the Crown in preparing the prosecution. In Ireland there are officers called Crown solicitors attached to each circuit, whose duty it is to get up every case for the Crown in criminal prosecutions. They are paid by salaries. There is no such system in England, where prosecutions are conducted by solicitors appointed by the parish, or other persons bound over to prosecute by the magistrates on each committal; but in Scotland the still better plan exists of a Crown prosecutor in every county, who prepares every criminal prosecution.

Croy, marsh land.—Blount.

Croyses, pilgrims, because they wore the sign of the cross upon their garments.—Bract. l. 5, pt. 2, c. ii.

Crustum, a purple garment mixed with many colours.

Cry de pais, or Cri de pais, hue and cry.

Cryer, an officer of a court, whose duty it is to make proclamation.

Crypta [Ital., fr. κρύπτω, Gk., to hide, being first used by the early Christians for the performance of religious services in safety], a chapel or oratory under ground, or under a church or cathedral.—Du Cange.

Cshatriya, Kshatriya, Chetterie, Khetery, a man of second or military caste.—Indian.

Cucking-stool. A chair on which females for certain offences were fastened and ducked in a pond. 'The chair was sometimes in the form of a close-stool, which contributed to increase the degradation.'—Halliwell. Cugh, Manx., excrement in children's language; Kuka, Icel. cacare Lat. Cukkynge or pysynge vesselle scaphium, Pr. Pm. 'Similiter malam cervisiam facitis, aut in cathedrâ ponebatur stercoris, aut iiij. sol. dabat prepositis.'—Domesday B. in Way. It was also called goging-stool. Gouy-stole, A. Sax., a close-stool.—Wedgw.

Cuckoldom [fr. cuckoo; cuculus, Lat., a bird which lays her eggs in the nest of another bird], the act of adultery.

Cude, a chrysom or face-cloth for a child baptised.

Cui ante divortium (to whom before divorce). A writ for a woman divorced from her husband to recover her lands and tenements which she had in fee-simple or in tail, or for life, from him to whom her husband did alienate them during the marriage, when she could not gainsay it.—Reg. Orig. 233.

Cui in vita (to whom in life). A writ of entry for a widow against him to whom her husband aliened her lands or tenements in his lifetime; which must contain in it, that during his life she could not withstand it.—Reg. Orig. 232.

Cui licet quod majus non debet quod minus est non licere.—4 Rep. 23.—(He who has authority to do the more important act shall not be debarred from doing that of less importance.)

Cui pater est populus non habet ille patrem. Co. Litt. 123.—(He to whom the people is father, has not a father.)

Cui plus licet quam par est, plus vult quam licet.—2 Inst. 464.—(He to whom more is granted than is just, wants more than is granted.)

Cuicunque aliquis quid concedit concedere videtur et id, sine quo res ipsa esse non potuit.—11 Co. 52.—(Whoever grants anything to another is supposed to grant that also without which the thing itself would be of no effect.)

Cuilibet in arte suâ perito est credendum.—Co. Litt. 125.—(Every one who is skilled in his own art is to be believed.)

Cujus est commodum ejus debet esse incommodum.—(Whose is the advantage, his also should be the disadvantage.)

Cujus est dare ejus est disponere.—2 Co. 71. (Whose is to give, his is to dispose.)

Cujus est divisio alterius est electio.—Co. Litt. 166.—(Whose is the division, the other's is the choice.)

Cujus est solum ejus est usque ad cælum et ad inferos.—Co. Litt. 4.—(Whose is the soil, his it is even to heaven and to the middle of the earth.)

This maxim is also more succinctly and elegantly expressed, Cujus est solum ejus est altum.

Cujus juris (i. e. jurisdictionis) est principale, ejusdem juris erit accessorium.—2 Inst. 493.—(An accessory matter is subject to the same jurisdiction as its principal.)

Cujusque rei potissima pars est principium. 10 Co. 49.—(Of everything the chief part is the beginning.)

Culagium, the laying up of a ship in a dock for repair.

Culpa, an act of neglect, causing damage, but not implying an intent to injure, of which the Roman jurists recognised two: (1) Culpa lata, culpa latior; magna culpa, gross neglect, treated very much like fraud; culpa magna dolus est, dolo proxima. (2) Culpa, without any epithet, or omnis culpa, culpa levis, levior; or levissima, slight neglect.—Cum. Civ. Law 279; Sand. Just. 476.

Culpa est immiscere se rei ad se non pertinenti.—2 Inst. 208.—(It is a fault for anyone to meddle in a matter not pertaining to him.)

Culpa lata dolo æquiparatur.—(A gross fault is held equivalent to fraud.)

Culpa tenet suos auctores.—(A fault binds its own authors.)

Culpæ pœna par esto. Pœna ad mensuram delicti statuenda est.—Jur. Civ.—(Let the punishment be proportioned to the crime. Punishment is to be measured by the extent of the offence.)

Culprit [fr. cull, abb. of culpabilis, and ponit, Lat., written by the clerk of arraigns, pñt, as a minute that issue was joined, or ponit se super patriam. Cul was probably intended to denote the plea, and prit, the issue; others derive it from culpâ, in a fault, and prœhensus, taken, probably a corruption of culpat, from culpatus, the term applied in old law Latin to an accused person], one who is indicted for a criminal offence; popularly mistaken for the legal denomination of a criminal.

Culreach, a caution given by a lord of regality to punish a malefactor, when he replevied from the sheriff.—Scotch Dict.

Cultura, a parcel of arable land.—Blount.

Culvertage [fr. culum and verto, Lat., to turn tail], base slavery; the confiscation of an estate.—Mat. Par. 1212.

Culward, and Culverd, a coward.

Cum adsunt testimonia rerum quid opus est verbis.—2 Buls. 53.—(Where the testimony of facts is present, what need is there of words.)

Cum confitente sponte mitius est agendum.—4 Inst. 66.—(One confessing willingly should be dealt with more leniently.)

Cum duo inter se pugnantia reperiuntur in testamento ultimum ratum est.—Co. Litt. 112.—(Where two things repugnant to each other are found in a will, the last prevails.)

Cum testamento annexo [Lat.] (with the will annexed). See ADMINISTRATOR.

Cumulative legacies, legacies so called to distinguish them from legacies which are merely repeated. In the construction of testamentary instruments, the question often arises whether, where a testator has twice bequeathed a legacy to the same person, the legatee is entitled to both, or only to one of them; in other words, whether the second legacy must be considered as a mere repetition of the first, or as cumulative, i. e. additional. In determining this question, the intention of the testator, if it appears on the face of the instruments, prevails; but if it does not so appear the following rules have been laid down:

(I.) If the same specific thing be bequeathed twice to a legatee, whether by the same instrument or not, he is entitled to one legacy only.

(II.) If the legacies be not of a specific thing, but of quantity, e. g. a sum of money:—

(1) If they are bequeathed by the same instrument, and are of equal amount, the second legacy is not cumulative, but the legatee is entitled to one legacy only.

(2) If they are bequeathed by the same instrument, but are of unequal amount, the second legacy is cumulative.

(3) If they are bequeathed by different instruments, whether they are equal or unequal in amount, the second legacy is cumulative. See 2 Williams on Executors, 1160, et seq.

Cumulative remedy, a second mode of procedure in addition to one already available.

Cuna cervisiæ, a tub of ale.

Cuneus, a mint or place to coin money; from this word coin is derived.

Cuntey-cuntey, a kind of trial by an ordinary jury.

Curagulus, one who takes care of a thing.

Curate [fr. curator, Lat.], one who has the cure of souls, the lowest degree in the church, being an officiating temporary minister regularly employed by the spiritual rector or vicar, either to serve in his absence or as his assistant. All curates ought, before they enter on their duties, to be licensed by the bishop of the diocese, and the law on the other hand has made several provisions for their proper maintenance.—28 Hen. VIII. c. 11; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106; Burn's Ecc. Law, by Tyrw. v. ii., p. 54.

Curator, a protector of property. His duty was to see that the person under his care did not waste his goods.—Civil Law; Sand. Just. 156.

Curatores viarum, surveyors of the highways.

Curatus non habet titulum.—3 Buls. 310.—(A curate has not a title.)

Curfeu, Curfew [fr. couvrir, to cover, and feu, Fr., fire], a bell which rang at eight o'clock in the evening, in the time of William the Conqueror, whereupon everyone was obliged by law to put out his fire and light. The law was abolished by Henry I. in 1100. It was called in the law Latin of the middle ages, ignitegium or pyritegium.

Curia Cancellariæ officina justitiæ.—2 Inst. 552.—(The Court of Chancery is the workshop of justice.)

Curia Parliamenti suis propriis legibus substitit.—4 Inst. 50.—(The Court of Parliament is governed by its own peculiar laws.)

Curia domini Regis non debet deficere conquerentibus in justitiâ perquirendâ.—9 Co. 83.—(The Court of our Lord the King ought not to be wanting in administering justice to the suitors.)

Curia, a court of justice. Also the class from which in the Roman provincial towns the magistrates were eligible.

Curia advisare vult (the court desires to consider), a deliberation which a court of judicature sometimes takes, where there is any point of difficulty, before they give judgment in a cause. Abbreviated in our reports thus, cur. adv. vult.

Curia cursus aquæ, a court held by the lord of the manor of Gravesend for the better management of barges and boats plying on the river Thames between Gravesend and Windsor, and also at Gravesend bridge, &c.—2 Geo. II. c. 26.

Curia claudenda, an obsolete writ to compel another to make a fence or wall, which he was bound to make between his land and the plaintiff's.—Reg. Orig. 155.

Curia domini, the lord's house, hall, or court, where all the tenants meet at the time of keeping courts.

Curia palatii, the Palace-Court. It was abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 101.

Curia penticiarum, a court held by the sheriff of Chester, in a place there called the Pendice or Pentice; probably it was so called from being originally held under a pent-house, or open shed covered with boards.—Blount.

Curia Regis. See AULA REGIS.

Curialitas, a holding of land by curtesy.—Scotch Term.

Curiality, the privileges, prerogatives, or, perhaps, retinue of a court.—Bacon.

Curiæ Christianitatis, courts of christianity; ecclesiastical courts.

Curiosa et captiosa interpretatio in lege reprobatur.—1 Buls. 6.—(A nice and captious construction is reprobated in law.)

Curnock, a measure containing four bushels, or half a quarter.

Currency, coin or bank notes, or other paper money issued by authority, and which are continually passing as and for coin.

Curriculum, the year, or the course of a year; the set of studies for a particular period, appointed by an University.

Currit tempus contra desides et sui juris contemptores.—(Time runs against the slothful, and those who slight their own rights.)

Cursitor Baron of the Exchequer, office of, abolished by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 86.

Cursitors [fr. clerici de cursu, Lat.], clerks of the court of Chancery, who made out original writs and were called clerks of course.—18 Edw. III. st. 5. The office was abolished by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 82, ss. 10, 11, and 12, and their duties were transferred to the Petty Bag Office.

Cursones terreæ, ridges of land.

Cursus curiæ est lex curiæ.—3 Buls. 53.—(The practice of the court is the law of the court.)

Curtesy of England [jus curialitatis Angliæ, Lat.], an estate which by favour of the law of England arises by act of law, and is that interest which a husband has for his life in his wife's fee-simple or fee-tail estates, general or special, after her death.

There are four circumstances necessary to the existence of this estate:—

(1) A canonical or legal marriage.

(2) Seisin of the wife; as to corporeal hereditaments, it must be a seisin in deed, either actual or virtual (Co. Litt. 29 a, n. 3; 8 Co. 96 a), but as to incorporeal hereditaments, a seisin in law is sufficient, where a seisin in deed is impossible.

(3) Birth of issue, alive and during the mother's existence (Paine's case, 8 Co. 34). It is immaterial whether the issue live or die, or whether it be born before or after the wife's seisin. If a woman inheritable marries, has issue, her husband dies, and she takes another husband and has issue, which dies, and then the wife dies, the second husband shall be tenant by the curtesy, though the issue by the first husband be living.

(4) Death of the wife. The husband's title to the curtesy is initiated at the birth of issue, and consummated at the death of his wife. No entry is necessary to complete this estate.

It is to be observed that by the custom of gavelkind, a husband may be tenant by the curtesy, without having had any issue by his wife. This curtesy is only of a moiety of the wife's lands, and ceases if the husband marry again.

All persons capable of taking freehold estates may be tenants by the curtesy; but aliens cannot, nor a person attainted of felony, unless he have issue by his wife after pardon (Co. Litt. 30 b, n. 7). A condition to restrain the husband of a feme-donee in tail from curtesy is repugnant and void.—Co. Litt. 224 a.

A husband may be tenant by the curtesy in a fee-simple or fee-tail estate, which is held in coparcenary or in common, for in each of these the inheritance is executed in possession; also in trusts and other interests, which, though in law mere rights and titles, are deemed estates in equity, and also in advowsons, rents, and commons. But there cannot be a tenant by the curtesy in the following interests:—

At the common law, if lands had been given to husband and wife, and to the heirs of their two bodies begotten, and they had issue, and the husband died, and she took another husband, and had issue, the nature of the gift was so far changed by their having issue, that the land then became descendible to all the heirs of the body of the wife by any other husband, and liable to the curtesy of such husband. To prevent this, it was provided by the statute De Donis, that where lands were given in this manner, a second husband should not be tenant by the curtesy, nor his issue inheritable.

If lands be given to a woman and to the heirs male of her body, and she marries and has issue a daughter only, and dies, her husband shall not be tenant by the curtesy; because the daughter by no possibility could inherit the mother's estate in the land.

As no estates in land are subject to curtesy but those of inheritance, wherever the inheritance is held to have never vested in the wife, the husband cannot be tenant by the curtesy. For it is the rule in the case of a tenancy by the curtesy, as well as in a tenancy in dower, that the estate shall come out of the inheritance, and not out of the freehold. Estates held in joint-tenancy are not subject to curtesy. Where an estate is given to two sisters, and the heirs of their bodies, and one marries and has issue and dies, her husband shall not be tenant by the curtesy, because the estate of the surviving sister intervenes, and the estate tail was never executed in possession. A man cannot be tenant by the curtesy of lands which are assigned to a woman for her dower. This follows from dower not being an estate of inheritance. For the same reason a woman cannot have dower of lands of which a man is tenant by the curtesy. Lord Coke says, 'A man shall not be tenant by the curtesy of a reversion or remainder expectant upon any estate of freehold, unless the particular estate be determined or ended during the coverture. The reason is, that there was no seisin of the freehold. It would be otherwise of a reversion in remainder expectant upon a lease for years, because there the wife is seised of the freehold. Copyhold estates are not liable to curtesy, unless there be an express custom to warrant it.'

The husband, from the moment of the child's birth, or of the acquisition of the property by his wife (whichever last happens), is enabled to convey an estate for his own life; before the birth of a child, he can convey a good estate for the joint lives only of himself and his wife. If he make a lease for years, reserving rent, and die, the lease is absolutely determined, so that no acceptance of rent by the heir or those in reversion, can make it good, for though his estate is quodam modo a continuance of the wife's estate, yet it is a continuance of it only for life, and he has no power to contract for or intermeddle with the inheritance; and, consequently, his lease determines with the estate whence it is derived, and the lessee becomes tenant at sufferance if he continues in possession. An estate by the curtesy, in respect of the estate tail, or of any prior estate created by the settlement, as well as a resulting use or trust to or for the settlor, is to be deemed a prior estate under the settlement within the contemplation of the Fines and Recoveries' Act (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 22) appointing a protector; the husband would therefore be the protector of the settlement.

Though this estate is styled the curtesy of England, it appears to have been the established law of Scotland, where it was called curialitas; it also prevails in Ireland by virtue of an ordinance of Henry III. The doctrine was recognised among the Romans.

It is not very easy to account for the name, 'tenant by the curtesy of England;' Littleton's explanation of it, viz. 'because this is used in no other realm but in England only' (Litt. s. 35), being obviously incorrect, since the law that a husband who had issue should retain the lands of his deceased wife during his life, prevailed among many of the northern nations. Sir Thomas Craig calls it curialitas (Crag. lib. 2, c. xxii., s. 40), from which Blackstone infers, that, 'probably our word curtesy was understood to signify rather an attendance upon the lord's court or curtis (that is, being his vassal or tenant), than to denote any peculiar favour belonging to this island; and therefore it is laid down, that by having issue, the husband shall be entitled to do homage to the lord, for the wife's lands, alone; whereas, before the issue had, they must have both done it together' (2 Com. 126). But as ideas or facts exist before they are named, the order of the cause and effect expressed by the 'therefore' at the beginning of the last sentence is probably the reverse of the true one. That is, it was not laid down, that by having issue the husband should be entitled to do or receive homage, alone, because the word curtesy signified attending or holding a court-baron; but the word curtesy was applied to this species of tenure, because the distinguishing incident (the differentia) of it was that after issue had the husband should do or receive homage, in right of his wife alone.—Bisset on Life Estates, c. iii.

Some English writers (Mirror, c. i. s. 3) ascribe the law of curtesy to Henry I.; but Nathaniel Bacon (Government, 4to, 1647, p. 105) calls it a law of counter-tenure to that of dower, and yet supposes it as ancient as the time of the Saxons, and that it was therefore rather restored by Henry I. than introduced by him. But there is no trace of this curtesy among the laws of the Saxons, nor among those we have of Henry I.—1 Reeve 298; Cham. on Est. I. c. iii. p. 92.

Curteyn, the name of King Edward the Confessor's sword, which is the first sword carried before the English sovereigns at their coronation; and it is said the point of it is broken as an emblem of mercy.—Mat. Par. in Hen. III.

Curtilage [fr. cour, Fr., court; and leagh, Sax., place], a court-yard, backside, or piece of ground lying near and belonging to a dwelling-house.

Curtiles terræ, court lands.—Spel. on Feuds.

Cussore, a term used in Hindoostan for the discount or allowance made in the exchange of rupees, in contradistinction to batta, which is the sum deducted.—Encyc. Lond.

Custantia, costs.

Custode admittendo, Custode amovendo, writs for the admitting and removing of guardians.

Custodes Libertatis Angliæ auctoritate Parliamenti, the style in which writs and all judicial processes were made out during the great revolution from the execution of King Charles I. till Oliver Cromwell was declared Protector.—12 Car. II. c. 3.

Custodia legis, in the custody of the law.

Custodiam lease, a grant from the Crown under the Exchequer seal, by which the custody of lands, &c., seised in the king's hands, is demised or committed to some person as custodee or lessee thereof.

Custom [fr. costume, It.; coustume, coutume, Fr.; costumbre, Sp.; consuetudo, Lat.], an unwritten law established by long usage and the consent of our ancestors. If it be universal, it is common law; if particular, it is then properly custom. The requisites to make a particular custom good are these: (1) It must have been used so long that the memory of man runs not to the contrary; (2) it must have been continued; and (3) peaceable; also (4) reasonable; and (5) certain; (6) compulsory, and not left to the option of every person, whether he will use it or not; and (7) consistent with other customs, for one custom cannot be set up in opposition to another.

Custom-house, the house or office where commodities are entered for importation or exportation; where the duties, bounties, or drawbacks payable or receivable upon such importation or exportation are paid or received; and where ships are cleared out, &c. The principal British custom-house is in London, but there are custom-houses subordinate to it in all the considerable seaports.

Custom-house Brokers, persons authorised by the commissioners of customs to act for parties at their option in the entry or clearance of ships, and the transaction of general business. They give a bond to the commissioners in a sum of 1,000*l.* conditioned for their good conduct, and for the purpose of enabling restitution to be made of any loss accruing by their negligence or misconduct.

Custom of Merchants [lex mercatoria, Lat.] See COMMERCE.

Customary Court-Baron, a court which should be kept within the manor for which it is held. It may be held anywhere within the manor, at the pleasure of the person holding it, unless some ancient custom require it to be held in a certain place.

The court-baron was to be held from three weeks to three weeks, or, as some think, as often as the lord chose. And it should seem clear, that the lord may hold a customary court as frequently as he pleases, and compel the attendance of his tenants who hold by villein or base services.—2 Wat. Cop. c. i., p. 9.

It is to be observed, that although there should be no freeholders of the manor, by which the court-baron or freeholders' court is lost, yet still there may be a customary court; for as these two courts are distinct (though frequently held at the same time, the same roll serving to record the proceedings of both), the want of freeholders does not preclude the lord from holding a customary court for his copyholders.—1 Cruise's Dig. tit. x. c. i., s. 19.

Customary Freeholds, or, as they are also denominated, PRIVILEGED COPYHOLDS, or copyholds of frank tenure, were known in ancient times as estates in privileged villenage or villein socage, and are estates held by custom, but not at the lord's will, in which they differ from copyholds: yet now the will of the lord in copyhold is, as we have seen, reduced to a mere fiction. These lands are of such singular nature that when they are compared with mere copyholds, they may be called freeholds, and when compared with absolute freeholds, they may be denominated copyholds. While the freehold interest or estate rests with the tenant, the freehold tenure is in the lord. (Mr. Serjeant Scriven dissents from this proposition in his work on Copyholds, vol. ii., p. 572, et seq.) They are usually transferred, by surrender, into the hands of the lord and admittance of the new tenant. Their customs, incidents, and services, are similar to those already noticed as relating to copyholds properly so called.

Mr. Cruise divides customary freeholds into two kinds: (1) Those of which the freehold is in the lord, more properly called free copyholds; and (2) those of which the freehold is in the tenant, strictly called customary freeholds. The former pass by surrender and admittance, the latter by a conveyance which passes from the grantor-tenant his freehold, followed by an admittance (or as the custom is, in some manors, by surrender and admittance), which marks the change of tenancy.—1 Cruise's Dig. tit. x. c. i., s. 9.

Customs, duties charged upon commodities on their importation into, or exportation out of, a country. They seem to have existed in England before the Conquest, but the king's claim to them was first established by 3 Edw. I. These duties were, at first, principally laid on wool, woolfels (sheep skins), and leather when exported. There were also extraordinary duties paid by aliens, which were denominated parva costuma, to distinguish them from the former, or magna costuma. The duties of tonnage and poundage, of which mention is so frequently made in English history, were custom duties; the first being made on wine by the ton, and the latter being an ad valorem duty of so much a pound on all other merchandise. When these duties were granted to the Crown, they were denominated subsidies, and as the duty of poundage had continued for a lengthened period at the rate of 1*s.* a pound, or five per cent., a subsidy came, in the language of the customs, to denote an ad valorem duty of five per cent. The new subsidy granted in the reign of Wm. III. was an addition of five per cent. to the duties on most imported commodities. The various custom duties were collected for the first time, in a book of rates published in the reign of Charles II., a new book of rates being again published in the reign of George I. But exclusive of the duties entered in these two books, many more had been imposed at different times; so that the accumulation of the duties, and the complicated regulations to which they gave rise, were productive of the greatest embarrassment. The Customs' Consolidation Act, 27 Geo. III. c. 13, introduced by Mr. Pitt, in 1787, did much to remedy these, among other inconveniences. The method adopted was, to abolish the existing duties on all articles, and to substitute in their stead one single duty on each article, equivalent to the aggregate of the various duties by which it had previously been loaded. The resolutions on which the act was founded amounted to about 3,000. A more simple and uniform system was, at the same time, introduced into the business of the custom-house. These alterations were productive of the very best effects, and several similar consolidations have since been effected, particularly in 1853, when the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, consolidated the several acts then in force for the management and regulation of customs, the prevention of smuggling, the encouragement of British shipping and navigation, the warehousing of goods, the granting of drawbacks and allowances of customs, the regulation of the trade of the British possessions abroad and of the Isle of Man. As to customs, see 8 & 9 Vict. c. 85, ss. 2, 3; c. 86, ss. 45, 139, 140; c. 87, ss. 10, 124; c. 91, s. 51; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 90, ss. 41, 42, 43; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 95, s. 14; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 47; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 54; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 5; 19 & 20 Vict. cc. 75, 83, s. 5; 20 Vict. c. 15; 20 & 21 Vict. cc. 61, 62; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 37; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 22; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 20; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 22. Customs Inland Bonding Act, 1860.—23 & 24 Vict. c. 36.

Custos Brevium (the keeper of the writs), a principal clerk belonging to the Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas, whose office it was to keep all the writs returnable into those courts. Abolished by 1 Wm. IV. c. 58.

Custos Morum, the guardian of morals. The Court of Queen's Bench is so styled.—4 St. Com. 462.

Custos Placitorum Coronæ (the keeper of the pleas of the Crown). The custos rotulorum.

Custos Rotulorum (the keeper of the rolls or records of the county). He is the principal justice of the peace within the county, but he is rather an officer or minister than a judge.

Custos Spiritualium, he that exercises the spiritual jurisdiction of a diocese, during the vacancy of any see, which, by the canon law, belongs to the dean and chapter, but, at present, in England, to the archbishop of the province by prescription.—Encyc. Lond.

Custos statum hæredis in custodiâ existentis meliorem, non deteriorem, facere potest.—7 Co. 7.—(A guardian can make the estate of an existing heir under his guardianship better, not worse.)

Custos Temporalium, the person to whom a vacant see or abbey was given by the king, as supreme lord. His office was, as steward of the goods and profits, to give an account to the escheator, who did the like to the exchequer.—Encyc. Lond.

Custuma antiqua sive magna, the old duties on wool, sheepskins or woolfels, and leather exported.

Custuma parva et nova, the alien's duty on imported and exported commodities.

Cutcherry, a court of justice in India, also a public office there where rents are paid and other business respecting the revenue transacted.

Cuthred, a knowing or skilful counsellor.

Cutpurse, one who steals by the method of cutting purses; a common practice when men wore their purses at their girdles, as was once the custom.

Cutter of the Tallies, an officer in the exchequer, to whom it belonged to provide wood for the tallies, and to cut the sum paid upon them, &c.

Cutwal, Katwal, the chief officer of police in a large town or city in India; the superintendent of the markets there.

Cycle [fr. κύκλος, Gk.], a measure of time; a space in which the same revolutions begin again; a periodical space of time.—Encyc. Lond.

Cygnets belong equally to the owners of the cock and hen.—7 Rep. 17.

Cyne-bot, or Cyne-gild, the portion belonging to the nation of the mulct for slaying the king, the other portion or 'wêr' being due to his family.

Cyning [fr. cyn, Sax.; gens, natio, Lat.], a king; a son or child of the people. It is manifestly a patronymic, like Æscing, son of Æsc; Uffing, son of Uffa; Œlling, son of Œlle; Cerdicing, son of Cerdic; Iding, son of Ida; Cryding, son of Cryda; Ætheling, son of the Æthel, or noble.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Cyphonism, a punishment used by the ancients, which some suppose to have been the smearing of the body with honey, and exposing the person to flies, wasps, &c. But the author of the notes on Hesychius says, under the word κύφων, that it is derived from the word κύπτω, to bend or stoop, and signifies that kind of punishment still used by the Chinese, called by Sir George Staunton the wooden collar, by which the neck of the malefactor is bent or weighed downward.—Encyc. Lond.

Cy-près. The Court of Chancery frequently obviates a perpetuity by applying the rule of cy-près or approximation. The principle of this doctrine is, that where a testator has two objects, one primary or general, and the other secondary or particular, which are incompatible, the particular must be sacrificed in order that effect may be given to the general object as near as may be to the testator's intention, according to law. Thus, if a testator manifest a general intention that a particular unborn devisee and his issue should take certain property, but in consequence of the interests of the issue being limited by purchase, the particular mode adopted by the testator of carrying into effect his primary intent be contrary to law, the courts have, in support of the testator's general intention to provide for the issue of the devisee, sometimes held that the issue shall take derivatively through the ancestor, by vesting an estate tail in him, which is conformable to the rules of law.

There must, however, be a clear indication of an intention that the issue of the unborn person should take estates tail, or should succeed in a mode analogous to the course in which an entail would descend. Therefore a limitation to the issue of an unborn tenant for life as the parent shall appoint, without any express gift cannot be validated by cy-près, and the limitation following the life estate fails. Again, the doctrine is not applicable where there is only a single intent to create a perpetuity, and not a general intention of providing for all the line of issue, combined with an inconsistent particular intent in regard to the mode of effecting that object. Nor is it applicable to limitations of personal estate, since that is not transmissible by entail, unless in the case of a conjoint or referential disposition of both realty and personalty, when, quoad the realty, an estate-entail vests in the unborn child, and, quoad the personalty bequeathed upon the like trusts, an absolute interest vests in such a child. The doctrine is not applicable to limitations in deeds, but is confined to the construction of wills only.

Of course, the persons or class to be made tenants-in-tail by the application of cy-près, must be entitled to a freehold interest.

The inclination of the courts is not to extend the doctrine.—Lewis on Perp. 426–454.

It is also applied to charitable bequests; it matters not how uncertain the persons or the objects may be, or whether the persons who are to take are in esse or not, or whether the legatee be a corporation capable in law of taking or not, or whether the bequest can be carried into exact execution or not, for in all these and the like cases the court will sustain the bequest, and give it effect according to its own principles. And where a literal execution becomes inexpedient or impracticable the court will execute it as nearly as it can, according to the original purpose, or, as the technical expression is, cy-près.

The doctrine as applied to charities was formerly pushed to a most extravagant length. But this sensible distinction now prevails, that the court will not decree the execution of a charitable trust in a manner different from that intended, except so far as it is seen that the intention cannot be literally executed. In that case another mode will be adopted consistent with the general intention, so as to execute it, though not in mode, yet in substance. If the mode should become by subsequent circumstances impossible, the general rule is not to be defeated, if it can in any other way be obtained. Where there are no objects remaining to take the benefit of a charitable corporation, the court will dispose of its revenues by a new scheme upon the principles of the original charities, cy-près.

There is also a modification of the strictness of the common law, as to conditions precedent in regard to personal legacies, which is at once rational and convenient, and tends to carry into effect the intention of the testator. It is, that where a literal compliance with the condition becomes impossible from unavoidable circumstances, and without any default of the party, it is sufficient that it is complied with as nearly as it practically can be, i. e. cy-près. This modification is derived from the civil law, and stands upon the presumption that the donor could not have intended to require impossibilities, but only a substantial compliance with his directions, as far as they should admit of being fairly carried into execution. It is upon this ground that courts of equity constantly hold in cases of personal legacies, that a substantial compliance with the condition satisfies it, although not literally fulfilled. Thus, if a legacy upon a condition precedent shall require the consent of three persons to a marriage, and one or more of them should die, the consent of the survivor or survivors would be deemed a sufficient compliance with the condition. And, à fortiori, this doctrine would be applied to conditions subsequent.—Sugd. Powers, 549; 1 Story's Eq. Jur. 235, and vol. ii. 386, 390.

Cyrce, a church.

Cyricbryce, a breaking into a church.

Cyrographum, an Anglo-Saxon charter, this word being written in capital letters at the top or bottom of the charter and cut through by a knife.—1 Reeve 10; Co. Litt. 229.

Czar [written more properly Tzar, Sclav.], the title of the emperor of Russia, first assumed by Basil, the son of Basilides, under whom the Russian power began to appear, about 1470.

Czarina, the title of the empress of Russia.

Czarowitz, the title of the eldest son of the czar and czarina.

D

Da tua dum tua sunt, post mortem tunc tua non sunt.—3 Buls. 18.—(Give the things which are yours whilst they are yours; after death then they are not yours.)

Dæd-bana, the actual perpetrator of a homicide.

Dagus, or Dais [fr. dais or daiz, Fr., a canopy or cloth of state], the raised floor at the upper end of a hall.

Daker, or Diker, ten hides.—Blount.

Dalus, Dailus, Dailia, a certain measure of land; such narrow slips of pasture as are left between the ploughed furrows in arable land.—Cowel.

Dam [fr. dam, Dan.; dammer, Icel.], a boundary or confinement; a mole.

Damage [fr. damnum agere, Lat.; dommage, Fr.; dicatur a demendo cum res diminutione deterior fit]. A loss or injury by the fault of another, e. g. by an unlawful act, or omission; any hurt or hindrance that a person receives in his estate; also the compensation to be fixed by the jury when they find a verdict for the plaintiff. It is plainly derived from the Anglo-Saxons, and taken in two several significations, the one properly and generally, as in cases wherein damages are founded upon the statutes, where costs are included within the word damages, and taken as such; the other relatively, when the plaintiff declares for the wrong done to him to the damage of such a sum, and this is to be taken for the wrong done before the action commenced, and cannot extend to the costs, which are future and of another nature. The plaintiff cannot recover greater damages than he has laid in the conclusion of his declaration.

In real actions no damages are recoverable. In the mixed action of ejectment the damages were ordinarily nominal (unless under 1 Geo. IV. c. 87), the actual damages sustained by the detention of the property, &c., being usually recovered in an action of trespass for mesne profits. But they can now be recovered in the ejectment by C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 214. Damages are recoverable in all personal actions, and in assumpsit, covenant, case, trover, and trespass, they are the sole object of the action, whilst in debt and detinue they are nominal; in replevin, if the action be in the detinet, the damages are measured by the actual injury sustained; but if in the detinuit, the damages are given for the injury the plaintiff has sustained by the taking only, which is usually the expenses of the replevin bond.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 28, it is enacted, 'that upon all debts or sums certain, payable at a certain time or otherwise, the jury on the trial of any issue, or on any inquisition of damages, may, if they shall think fit, allow interest to the creditor, at a rate not exceeding the current rate of interest from the time when such debts or sums certain were payable, if such debts or sums be payable by virtue of some written instrument at a certain time, or if payable otherwise, then from the time when demand of payment shall have been made in writing, so as such demand shall give notice to the debtor that interest will be claimed from the date of such demand until the time of payment; provided that interest shall be payable in all cases in which it is now payable by law.' By s. 29, 'the jury on the trial of any issue, or on any inquisition of damages, may, if they shall think fit, give damages in the nature of interest, over and above the value of the goods at the time of the conversion or seizure, in all actions of trover or trespass de bonis asportatis, and over and above the money recoverable in all actions on policies of assurance made after the passing of this act.' See C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 95; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 2.

Double and treble damages are in some cases given by particular statutes, but at common law the damages are always single. Damages may be limited, increased, or reduced, according to circumstances.—1 Reeve, 14; 2 Turner's Anglo-Sax. v. ii. app. iii. c. ii.; Sedgwick on Damages; 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 460.

Compensation or damages are usually decreed in equity only as incidental to other relief, or where some peculiar equity intervenes. The mode by which such compensation or damages has been hitherto ascertained, was either by a reference to chambers, or by directing an issue, quantum damnificatus, which was tried by a jury.—2 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 93.

Chancery labour[illegible] under the infirmity of not being able to award damages by way of compensation for a fraud, or for the non-performance of a contract relating to the sale and purchase of realty, although a 'floating idea' was once abroad as to its power in the latter case. However, the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, has amended this. The act takes effect from 1st November, 1858, and may be cited as 'The Chancery Amendment Act, 1858' (s. 17).

'In all cases in which the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction against a breach of any covenant, contract, or agreement, or against the commission or continuance of any wrongful act, or for the specific performance of any covenant, contract, or agreement, it shall be lawful for the same court, if it shall think fit, to award damages to the party injured, either in addition to, or in substitution for such injunction or specific performance, and such damages may be assessed in such a manner as the court snall direct' (s. 2).

'It shall be lawful for the Court of Chancery, if it shall think fit, to cause the amount of such damages in any case to be assessed, or any question of fact arising in any suit or proceeding to be tried by a special or common jury before the court itself; and the Court of Chancery may make all such rules and orders upon the sheriff or any other person for procuring the attendance of a special or common jury, for such assessment of damages or the trial of such question of fact, as may be made by any of the superior courts of common law at Westminster, and may also make any other orders which to the Court of Chancery may seem requisite; and every such jury shall consist of persons possessing the qualifications, and shall be struck, summoned, balloted for, and called in like manner, as if such jury were a jury for the trial of any cause in any of the said superior courts; and every juryman so summoned shall be entitled to the same rights and subject to the same duties and liabilities as if he had been duly summoned for the trial of any such cause in any of the said superior courts; and every party to any such proceeding shall be entitled to the same rights as to challenge and otherwise as if he were a party to any such cause; and generally for all purposes of or auxiliary to the assessment of damages or the trial of questions of fact by a jury before the court itself, and in respect of new trials, the Court of Chancery shall have the same jurisdiction, powers, and authority in all respects as belong to any superior Court of Common Law, or to any judge thereof for the like purposes, provided that from any order made by the court, on an application made for a new trial, there shall be the same right of appeal as from any other order of the Court,' (s. 3).

'Any question of fact and any question as to the amount of damages which shall be so ordered to be tried by a jury before the court itself shall be reduced into writing in such form as the court shall direct, and at the trial the jury shall be sworn to try the said question, and a true verdict to give thereon according to the evidence; and upon every such trial the Court of Chancery shall have the same powers, jurisdiction, and authority as belong to any judge of any of the said superior courts sitting at Nisi Prius' (s. 4).

'It shall also be lawful for the Court of Chancery, if it shall think fit, to cause the amount of such damages in any case to be assessed, or any question of fact arising in any suit or proceeding to be tried before the court itself without a jury, and to cause the evidence on the trial of that question to be taken by the oral examination of witnesses and other proofs in open court; and any question of fact, and any question as to the amount of damages which shall be so ordered to be tried before the court itself, shall be reduced into writing in such form as the court shall direct; and the verdict of the judge shall be of the same effect as the verdict of a jury under this act; and the proceedings upon and after such trial, as to the power of the court, the evidence, and otherwise, shall be the same as in the case of trial by jury under this act; provided, that in the case of a trial under this section, any person may apply for a new trial either to the judge before whom the trial was had, or to the Court of Appeal in Chancery' (s. 5).

'It shall also be lawful for the Court of Chancery, in any case in which it shall think fit so to do, to cause the amount of such damages to be assessed by a jury before any judge of one of the superior Courts of Common Law at Nisi Prius, or at the assizes, or before the sheriff of any county or city, and for that purpose to issue a precept to the sheriff of such county or city as the Court of Chancery shall think fit, or where the sheriff is interested, then to the coroner, requiring him to return, summon, and impanel a common or special jury for the purpose aforesaid, in like manner as is done in cases of writs of inquiry at common law, which are to be executed before a judge or before the sheriff; and the Court of Chancery shall have power to set aside the verdict or inquisition on such inquiry, and to direct a new inquiry, in such manner and on such terms as the court shall think fit' (s. 6).

'In any case in which all parties to a suit are competent to make admissions, any party may call on any other party by notice to admit any document, saving all just exceptions; and in case of refusal or neglect to admit, the cost of proving the document shall be paid by the party so neglecting or refusing, whatever the result of the cause may be, unless the court shall certify that the refusal to admit was reasonable; and no costs of proving any document shall be allowed unless such notice be given, except in cases where the omission to give the notice is, in the opinion of the taxing master, a saving of expense' (s. 7).

These seven sections are to extend to the Court of Chancery in Ireland; and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, with the advice and assistance of the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Justice of Appeal there, or either of them, is to make rules for procedure and for regulating fees' (ss. 8, 9).

These sections are also to extend to the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster; and the Chancellor of the Duchy, with the advice and assistance of the Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in the High Court of Chancery, or one of them, and of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine, is to make rules for procedure and for regulating fees' (s. 10).

The Lord Chancellor of England, with the advice and assistance of the Master of the Rolls, the Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and the Vice-Chancellors, or any three of them, is to make rules for procedure and for regulating fees (s. 11).

All general rules and orders made in pursuance of this act are to be laid before both Houses of Parliament immediately after their being issued, if then sitting, or within five days after their next sitting; and either house may by resolution passed within thirty-six days afterwards resolve that the whole or any of them shall cease to be binding (s. 12). Orders have been framed under this act. See Consol. Ord. 1860, xli. rr. 26–52.

Damage-cleer [fr. damna clericorum, Lat.], a fee assessed of the tenth part in the Common Pleas, and the twentieth part in the Queen's Bench and Exchequer, out of all damages exceeding five marks recovered in those courts, in actions upon the case, covenant, trespass, &c. wherein the damages were uncertain; which the plaintiff was obliged to pay to the prothonotary or the officer of the court wherein recovered, before he could have execution for the damages. This was originally a gratuity given to the prothonotaries and their clerks, for drawing special writs and pleadings; but it is now taken away by statute, and if any officer in these courts take any money in the name of damage-cleer, or anything in lieu thereof, he shall forfeit treble the value.—17 Car. II. c. 6.

Damage-feasant, or faisant (doing damage). If a stranger's beasts are found on another person's land without his leave or license, and without the fault of the possessor of the close (which may happen from his not repairing his fences), and there doing damage by feeding or otherwise, to the grass, corn, wood, &c., the person damaged may distrain and impound them, as well by night as in the day, lest the beasts escape before taken; but they cannot be sold for the damage done. By 6 & 7 Vict. c. 30, if any person shall release, or attempt to release cattle lawfully seized by way of such distress, from the pound or place where they shall be impounded, or on the way to or from such pound or place, or shall destroy such pound or place, or any part thereof, or any lock or bolt thereof, he shall, on conviction, before two justices of the peace, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5*l.*, and to payment of the reasonable charges and expenses. By 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, repealing 5 & 6 Vict. c. 59, persons impounding cattle are bound under a penalty of 40*s.* to supply them with food and water.—Woodf. Land. and T. 562.

Damageable, susceptible of hurt.

Dame [fr. dame, Fr.; dama, Sp.], a lady; also, in common use, a farmer's wife or a mistress of a family of the humbler ranks.

Damnification, that which causes damage or loss

Damnify, to endamage, to injure, to cause loss to any person.

Damnosa hæreditas, a disadvantageous or unprofitable inheritance.

Damnum absque injuria (a loss without injury). This is not actionable. Thus, if I have a mill, and a neighbour builds another mill upon his own land, per quod, the profit of my mill is diminished, yet no action lies against him, for everyone may lawfully erect a mill upon his own ground. But if I have a mill by prescription on my own land, and another erects a new mill, which draws away some portion of the stream from mine, so as to diminish its former power, an action of trespass on the case will lie against him.

Damnum fatale, fatal damage, for which bailees are not liable. Among fatal damages were included by the civilians losses by shipwreck, by lightning, or other casualty, by pirates, and by superior force. Losses by fire, burglary, and robbery, seem also to have been included. But theft was not numbered among such casualties.—Story on Bailments, 471.

Damsel [fr. demoiselle, Fr.; damigella, Ital., dimin; fr. domina, Lat.], a young gentlewoman.

Dan [fr. dominus, Lat.], the better sort of men in this kingdom; so the Spanish Don. The old term of honor for men, as we now say Master.

Danegelt, Danegeld, or Danegold [fr. denegeldum, dane, and gelt, tribute], a tribute of 1*s.* and afterwards of 2*s.* upon every hide of land through the realm, laid upon our ancestors by the Anglo-Saxons, for maintaining such a number of forces as were thought sufficient to clear the British seas of Danish pirates, who greatly annoyed our coasts. It continued a tax till the time of Stephen, and was one of the rights of the Crown.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Dane-lage, the Danish law, which was principally maintained in the midland counties, and also on the eastern coast (the parts most exposed to the visits of that piratical people) while the Danes had sway in this country.

Dangeria, a money payment, made by forest-tenants, that they might have liberty to plough and sow in time of pannage or mast feeding.—Manw. For. Laws.

Danism [fr. δανεισμα, Gk., a loan], the act of lending money on usury.

Dans et retinens nihil dat.—(Giving and retaining gives nothing.)

Dapifer (à dapes ferendo, Lat.], a steward either of a king or lord.—Spel.

Dar, keeper, holder. This word is often joined with another to denote the holder of a particular employment or office, as Chob-dar, staff-holder; Zemin dar, landholder. This compound word with i, ee, y, added to it, denotes the office of Zemindar-ee.—Indian.

Dardus, a dart.

Dare, to transfer property. When this transfer is made in order to discharge a debt, it is datio solvendi animo; when in order to receive an equivalent, to create an obligation, it is datio contrahendi animo; lastly, when made donandi animo, from mere liberality, it is a gift dono datio.—Civil Law.

Dare ad remanentiam, to give away a remainder in fee, or for ever.

Darogah, a superintendent, or overseer, as of the police, mint, &c.—Indian.

Darraign [fr. derationo, Mid. Lat.; desrener, Fr.], to clear a legal account, to answer an accusation, to settle a controversy.

Darrein, a corruption of the Fr. dernier, the last.

Darrein presentment, assize of, lay only where a man had an advowson by descent from his ancestors; it is abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36.

Date [fr. datum, Lat.], that part of a deed, writing, or letter which expresses the day of the month and year in which it was made. Dates began to be inserted in deeds in the reigns of Edward II. & III. A deed, however, is good, although it mentions no date, or has a false or impossible date, provided the real date of its delivery can be proved.

Dative or Datif, that which may be given or disposed of at will and pleasure.

Datum, a first principle; a thing given.

Daughter [fr. tochter, Germ.; θυγάτηρ, Gk.; dauhtar, Goth.; duhitri, Sanscr.; duktere, Lith.; dustr, Armen.; dear, Gael.; daktar, Lap.], an immediate female descendant.

Daughter-in-law [nurus, Lat.], the wife of one's son.

Daum, dam, a copper coin, the 40th part of a rupee.—Indian.

Dauphin, the title of the eldest sons of the kings of France. Disused since 1830.

Davata terræ, dawach, a portion of land so called in Scotland.—Skene.

Day [fr. dies, Lat.; tag, Germ.], in its largest sense the time of a whole apparent revolution of the sun round the earth, but, in its popular acceptation, that part of the twenty-four hours when it is light, or the space of time between the rising and the setting of the sun. The English, French, Dutch, Germans, Spaniards, Portuguese, and Egyptians begin their day at midnight; the Jews, Italians, and Chinese, at sun-setting; the ancient Babylonians, Persians, Syrians, and modern Greeks at sun-rising; and the Arabians and modern astronomers at noon.

In the space of a day all the twenty-four hours are usually reckoned. Therefore, in general, if I am bound to pay money on any certain day, I discharge the obligation if I pay it before twelve o'clock at night; after which the following day commences. A court will take notice of the fraction of a day, if it be necessary for the purposes of justice.—Co. Litt. 135 a.

If anything is to be done within a certain time of, from, or after, the doing or occurrence of something else, the day on which the first act or occurrence takes place is to be excluded from the computation.—Williams v. Burgess, 12 A. & E. 635; 1 Chit. Arch. by Pren. 160.

Day in banc, the return day of writs.

Day-book, a tradesman's journal; a book in which all the occurrences of the day are set down.

Day-rule or Day-writ, a permission granted to a prisoner to go out of the prison, for the purpose of transacting his business, as to hear a case in which he is concerned at the assizes, &c. Abolished by 5 and 6 Vict. c. 22, s. 12.

Day-were of land [fr. diurnalis, diuturna, Lat.], as much arable land as would be ploughed up in one day's work, or one journey, as the farmers still call it.

Dayeria, a dairy.

Daysman, an arbitrator, an elected Judge.

Deacon [fr. diacre, Fr.; diacono, It., Span. and Port.; diaconus, Lat.; διάκονος, Gk.], a minister or servant in the church, whose office is to assist the priest in divine service, and the distribution of the sacrament, &c. He may now perform any of the divine offices which a priest may, except only pronouncing the absolution and consecrating the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. By 13 Eliz. c. 12, and 44 Geo. III. c. 43, it is provided (conformably to the canons) that none shall be ordained deacon under twenty-three years, nor priest under twenty-four years of age; though as to deacons the Archbishop of Canterbury has the privilege of admitting them (by faculty or dispensation) at an earlier age. None shall be ordained either priest or deacon, without first subscribing the thirty-nine Articles of Religion; nor by 1 Eliz. c. 1, and 1 W. & M. c. 8, without first taking the oath, in lieu of the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. By 24 Geo. III. c. 35, the Bishop of London, or other bishop by him appointed, may ordain aliens to exercise the office of deacon or priest out of the dominions of the Crown, without the oath of allegiance. A deacon is not capable of any ecclesiastical promotion; yet he may be chaplain to a family, curate to a beneficed clergyman, or lecturer to a parish church.

In Scotland, an overseer of the poor, or the master of an incorporated company.

Dead bodies. Taking them up for the purpose of dissection, or otherwise, is a misdemeanor at common law, punishable by fine and imprisonment. Refusing to bury dead bodies by those whose duty it is to do so, is punishable by the temporal courts, independently of spiritual censures, on indictment or information. As to the interment of dead bodies cast on shore from the sea, see 48 Geo. III. c. 75. The Anatomy Act is the 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 75.

A gaoler cannot detain the dead body of a person in his custody under a ca. sa. until the executors of the deceased person satisfy his pecuniary claims upon the deceased.—R. v. Fox, 2 Q. B., 246; see also Jones v. Ashburnham, 4 East. 455.

Dead freight, the unsupplied part of a cargo, or the freight payable by a merchant where he has not shipped a full cargo for the part not shipped.

Deadly feud, a profession of irreconcilable hatred till a person is revenged even by the death of his enemy.

Dead man's part, the remainder of an intestate's movables, besides that which of right belongs to his wife and children. This was formerly made use of in masses for the soul of the deceased; subsequently, the administrators applied it to their own use and benefit, until the 1 Jac. II. c. 17, subjected it to distribution amongst the next of kin.

Dead-pledge [mortuum vadium], a mortgage of lands or goods.

Dead use, a future use.

Deafforested, or Disafforested, discharged from being a forest, or freed and exempted from the forest-laws.—17 Car. I. c. 16.

Dealings, business, traffic, trade.

De ambitu, of obtaining a place by bribery.

Dean [fr. δέκα, Gk., ten], an ecclesiastical governor or dignitary, so called, as he is supposed to have originally presided over ten canons or prebendaries at the least. In cathedrals of the old foundation in England, the dean is the principal of the four chief dignitaries exercising a general supervision over the other members of the capitular body, with especial reference to the cure of souls. In cathedrals of the new foundation, the duties of the deans are defined by the statutes of each chapter.

Considered in respect of the differences of office, deans are of six kinds:—(1) Deans of Chapters, who are either of cathedral or collegiate churches. (2) Deans of Peculiars, who have sometimes both jurisdiction and cure of souls, and sometimes jurisdiction only. (3) Rural Deans, deputies of the bishop, planted all round his diocese, the better to inspect the conduct of the parochial clergy, to inquire into and report dilapidations, and to examine the candidates for confirmation; and armed, in minuter matters, with an inferior degree of judicial and coercive authority. (4) Deans in the Colleges of our Universities, who are officers appointed to superintend the behaviour of the members, and to enforce discipline. (5) Honorary Deans, as the Dean of the Chapel Royal, St. James's. (6) Deans of Provinces or Deans of Bishops. Thus the Bishop of London is Dean of the province of Canterbury, and to him, as such, the archbishop sends his mandate for summoning the bishops of his province when a convocation is to be assembled.

Another division, arising from the nature of their office, is into deans of spiritual promotions, and deans of lay promotions. Of the former kind are deans of peculiars, with cure of souls, deans of the royal chapels and of chapters, and rural deans; of the latter kind are deans of peculiars without cure of souls, who therefore may be, and frequently are, persons not in holy orders.

Their appointments are either elective, as deans of chapters of the old foundation, though the Crown has, in fact, the real patronage; and donative, as those deans of chapters of the new foundation, who are appointed by the royal letters-patent. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, provides that the old deaneries (except in Wales) shall thenceforth be in the direct patronage of her Majesty, who may, on the vacancy thereof, appoint by letters patent a spiritual person to be dean; and that no person shall hereafter be capable of receiving the appointment of dean, archdeacon, or canon, until he shall have been six complete years in priest's orders, and that the dean shall reside for at least eight months in the year.

Dean, Forest of. As to the royal mines therein, see 1 & 2 Vict. c. 43.

De arbitratione facta, writ of, issued when an action was brought for a cause already settled by arbitration.

Death [Sax.], the extinction of life; the departure of the soul from the body; defined by physicians as a total stoppage of the circulation of the blood, and a cessation of the animal and vital functions consequent thereon, such as respiration, pulsation, &c.

In legal contemplation, it is of two kinds; (1) natural, i.e. the extinction of life; (2) civil, where a person is not actually dead, but is adjudged so by the law, as when a person is banished or abjures the realm, or enters into a monastery. Civil death also occurs where a man, by Act of Parliament, or judgment of law, is attainted of treason or felony; for immediately upon such attainder he loses (subject indeed to some exceptions) his civil rights and capacities, and becomes, as it were, civiliter mortuus.

As to the registration of a death, see 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 86, and 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 22; and as to an action brought for damages arising from death by accident, neglect, &c., see 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93.

Death-bed or Dying Declarations are constantly admitted in evidence. The principle of this exception to the general rule is founded partly on the awful situation of the dying person, which is considered to be as powerful over his conscience as the obligation of an oath, and partly on a supposed absence of interest in a person on the verge of the next world, which dispenses with the necessity of cross-examination. But before such declarations can be admitted in evidence against a prisoner, it must be satisfactorily proved that the deceased, at the time of making them, was conscious of his danger, and had given up all hope of recovery, and this may be collected from the nature and circumstances of the case, although the declarant did not express such an apprehension. It is not essential that the party should apprehend immediate dissolution; it is sufficient if he apprehend it to be impending.

Much consideration should be given to the state of the mind of the person whose declarations are received. Strongly as his situation is calculated to induce the sense of obligation, it must also be recollected that it has often a tendency to obliterate the distinctness of his memory and perceptions; and therefore, whenever the accounts received from him are introduced, the degree of his observation and recollection is a circumstance which it is of the highest importance to ascertain. Sometimes the declaration is of a matter of judgment, of inference, and conclusion, which, however sincere, may be fatally erroneous. The circumstances of confusion and surprise connected with the object of the declaration are to be considered with the most minute and scrupulous attention; the accordance and consistency of the fact related with the other facts established in evidence should be examined with peculiar circumspection; and the awful consequences of mistake must add their weight to all the other motives for declining to allow an implicit credit to the narrative, on the sole consideration of its being free from the suspicion of wilful misrepresentation.—Pothier, by Evans, ii. 293.

As the declarations of a dying man are admitted on a supposition that in his awful situation on the confines of a future world, he had no motive to misrepresent, but, on the contrary, the strongest motive to speak without disguise and without malice, it necessarily follows that the party against whom they are produced in evidence may enter into the particulars of his state of mind, and of his behaviour in his last moments, or may be allowed to show that the deceased was one not likely to be impressed by a religious sense of his approaching dissolution.—Phil. Evid.; Starkie's Evid.; Taylor on Evidence.

Deathsman, executioner, hangman; he that executes the extreme penalty of the law.

De bene esse [Lat., conditionally], to accept or allow a thing to be well done for the present; but when it comes to be more fully examined or tried, to stand or fall according to the merit of the thing in its own nature.

There is an examination in Chancery, which must not be confounded with a suit to perpetuate testimony, its purpose being to examine witnesses de bene esse, i.e. conditionally before issue joined. It is resorted to for the purpose of aiding a plaintiff or a defendant in a suit actually pending, in order to take the testimony of witnesses who are aged, infirm, or about to leave the country, so as to prevent its being lost to the litigant. The evidence of an only witness to a material fact may be thus taken, on the ground of the uncertainty of human life. To prevent this application from being abusively resorted to for mere delay or vexation, it must be supported by an affidavit positively deposing to the circumstances which may produce the loss of the evidence. The testimony when taken cannot be used, unless the parties consent to it, or the court make an order for that purpose.

Mr. Justice Story, in his Eq. Juris. vol. ii. p. 970, mentions a bill to examine witnesses de bene esse. There may be such a bill in America, but not, it is believed, in our Chancery.

Debenture [fr. debeo, Lat., to owe], a deed-poll, charging certain property with the repayment of money lent by a person therein named at a given interest. It is frequently resorted to by public companies to raise money for the prosecution of their undertakings. It is a kind of I.O.U. It behoves a person who is about to advance money on, or to purchase, a debenture granted by a public company to ascertain that it is issued in a manner authorised by the deed of settlement, so as to bind the shareholders, otherwise they are not liable. And the formalities of transfer should be strictly observed.

Also, a term used at the custom-house for a kind of certificate, signed by the officers of the customs, which entitles a merchant exporting goods to the receipt of a bounty or drawback.

It is enacted by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 52, s. 86, that no drawback or bounty shall be allowed upon the exportation of any goods, unless entered in the name of the real owner thereof, or of the person who had actually purchased and shipped the same, in his own name, and at his own risk, on commission.

Such owner or commission-merchant shall make and subscribe a declaration on the debenture that the goods have been actually exported, and are not to be relanded in any part of the United Kingdom, &c.; and if such owner or commission-merchant shall not have purchased the right to such drawback or bounty, he shall declare, under his hand in the entry, and in his oath upon the debenture, the person who is entitled thereto; and the name of such person shall be inserted in the cocket and in the debenture, and his receipt on the latter shall be the discharge of such drawback or bounty, s. 87. Debentures or certificates for bounty on the exportation of linens or sailcloth are exempted from duty.

Debet esse finis litium.—Jenk. Cent. 61.—(There ought to be an end of law suits.)

Debet et detinet (he oweth and detaineth). An action shall be always in the debet et detinet, when he who makes a bargain or contract, or lends money to another, or he to whom a bond is made, brings the action against him who is bounden, or party to the contract and bargain, or unto the lending of the money, &c., as by the obligee against the obligor. But if it be brought by or against an executor for a debt due to or from the testator, this, not being his own debt, must be sued for in the detinet only. N. N. B. 119.

Debet et solet (he oweth and enjoyeth). If a person sue to recover any right, whereof his ancestor was disseised by the tenant of his ancestor, then he uses the word debet alone in his writ, because his ancestor only was disseised, and the estate discontinued; but if he sue for anything that is now first of all denied him, then he uses debet et solet, by reason his ancestor before him, and he himself, usually enjoyed the thing sued for, until the present refusal of the tenant.—Reg. Orig. 140; F. N. B. 98.

Debet quis juri subjacere, ubi delinquit.—3 Inst. 34.—(Everyone ought to be amenable to the law of the place where he commits an offence.)

Debit, the left-hand page of a ledger, to which all items are carried that are charged to an account.

Debita sequuntur personam debitoris. (Debts follow the person of the debtor.)

Debitum et contractus sunt nullius loci.—7 Co. 3.—(Debt and contract are of no place.)

Debitum in præsenti, solvendum in futuro.—(A debt due at present to be paid at a future time.)

Debitum recuperatum.—(A debt recovered.)

Debitor [Lat.], a debtor. According to the Roman law, when a debtor was ordered to pay, and could not, within thirty days, find security, the judge delivered him to his creditor bound with cords or fetters of not less than fifteen lbs. weight. He was then kept in prison for sixty days, at his own expense if he chose, if not, the creditor was bound to give him not less than a pound weight of meal a day. At the end of that time he might be put to death, or sold for a slave; and when the creditor took him to himself, the treatment of the adjudged debtor was often more cruel and merciless than that of the purchased slave. In the year 325 B.C. a law passed respecting the power of the creditor over the goods of the debtor, and prohibiting him from putting his debtor in chains or fetters.

A creditor at Athens had power not only to sell his debtor into a foreign country, but even his children. Among the Jews the debtor became the slave or bondman of the creditor, who had not power to sell him. His servitude expired in the year of Jubilee.—Levit. xxv. 39, 53.

Debitor non præsumitur donare.—Jur. Civ.—(A debtor is not presumed to give.)

Debile fundamentum fallit opus.—3 Co. 231. (A bad foundation ruins the work.)

De bonis non, of the goods of a deceased person not administered.

De bonis propriis, of a person's own goods.

De bonis testatoris, of a testator's goods.

De bono et malo, Writs of. It was anciently the course to issue special writs of gaol delivery for each particular prisoner, which were called writs de bono et malo; but these being found inconvenient or oppressive, a general commission for all the prisoners has long been established in their stead.—4 Step. Com. 395.

Debt [fr. debitum, Lat.; dette, Fr.], a sum of money due from one person to another. An action of debt lies where a person claims the recovery of a liquidated or certain sum of money affirmed to be due to him; and it is generally founded on some contract alleged to have taken place between the parties, or on some matter of fact from which the law will imply a contract between them. This is debt in the debet, which is the principal and only common form. There is another species mentioned in the books, called debt in the detinet, which lies for the specific recovery of goods, under a contract to deliver them.—1 Chit. Pl. 109; Reeves, 159; 1 Selw. Nisi Prius. tit. 'Debt,' p. 569.

The order of the payment of debts and expenses out of legal assets is, in a Chancery administration suit, as follows: —

1st. Funeral expenses, which, in the case of an insolvent estate, must be but strictly reasonable and necessary only—the executor or administrator being personally liable for any excessive expenditure.

What is a strictly reasonable and necessary sum varies with the circumstances of each particular estate, and the price of the requisite articles at the particular place.

2nd. Testamentary expenses about the probate of the will, or the letters of administration in intestacy.

3rd. The costs of the creditor's suit.

4th. Crown-debts by record and specialty.

5th. Debts priorized by statute. They are money due to a parish from an overseer of the poor, by virtue of his office (17 Geo. II. c. 38, s. 3); money due from an officer of a Friendly Society to such society (10 Geo. IV. c. 56, 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 20, ss. 12 & 14); money owing for the postage of letters (17 Geo. II. c. 38, s. 3); debts due from a deceased treasurer or collector of paving commissioners, under 57 Geo. III. c. 29, s. 51; debts due by an officer to his regiment (58 Geo. III. c. 73, ss. 1 & 2); army prize money (2 Wm. IV. c. 53).

6th. Judgments in courts of record, and decrees in equity, according to their priority of time.

7th. Recognisances enrolled in a court of record.

8th. Debts by special contract, as on bonds, covenants, and other instruments under seal, for valuable consideration, and arrears for rent.

9th. Debts by simple contract, as on bills or notes, and contracts not under seal, on verbal promises or on promises implied at law. Also a debt secured by a mortgage-deed, the mortgagor not having entered into a bond or covenant to repay the debt or loan.

An equitable mortgage, with or without a written memorandum, a debt recovered by judgment of the court of Jamaica, the balance of an open and unsettled account, all the items being upon simple contract, money recovered by a judgment or sentence in France, a devastavit and a breach of trust (except in some cases of special contract), are held to be simple contract debts.

Amongst these creditors the wages of labourers, and perhaps of servants, have the preference.

10th. Judgments voluntarily confessed without any valuable consideration, and voluntary bonds for meritorious or lawful inducements.

11th. A creditor, whose debt does not carry interest, who shall come in and establish the same before the chief clerk, under a decree or order in a suit, is entitled to interest upon his debt at the rate of 4*l. per cent.* from the date of the decree, out of any assets which may remain after satisfying the costs of the suit, the debts established, and the interest of such debts as by law carry interest.—The 46th Ord. of the 26th Aug. 1841.

See Ram. on Assets, Silk v. Prime; 1 Bro. C. C. 138, n. (1766); 2 Tudor's Lead. Cases, 72–88; and Seton on Decrees, 44, et seq.

Debtee-Executor. If a person indebted to another make his creditor or debtee his executor, or if such creditor obtain letters of administration to his debtor, he may retain sufficient to pay himself before any other creditors whose debts are of equal degree.—Plowd. 543.

To secure the general body of creditors when the estate is insufficient, a creditor to whom administration is granted may be compelled to give a bond conditioned to pay pro ratâ each creditor according to his degree.

Debtor, he that owes something to another.

Debtor-Executor. At law, if a testator appoints his debtor executor, the debt is released. In equity, however, the executor is accountable for the amount of his debt, as assets of the testator.—Williams on Executors, 1180–1185.

Decalogue [fr. δεκάλογος, Gk.], the ten commandments given by God to Moses. The Jews called them the ten words, hence the name.

De cætero, henceforth.

Decanal, pertaining to a deanery.

Decanus, a dean.

Decapitation, the act of beheading.

Deccan, literally the south. A term employed by Mahometan writers to denote the country between the rivers Nerbuddah and Crishna.

Decedent, a deceased person.

Deceit [fr. deceptio, Lat.], fraud, cheat, craft, or collusion used to deceive and defraud another.

There was formerly a writ of deceit, which was an action brought in the Common Pleas, to reverse a judgment obtained in any real action, by fraud or collusion between the parties to the prejudice of the right of a third person. It is abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36.

By the civil law every person is bound to warrant a thing that he sells or conveys, although there be no express warranty; but the common law binds him not, unless there be a warranty, either in deed or in law; for caveat emptor.—1 Inst. 10, n. a.

An action on the case, in nature of deceit, may be maintained for the breach of an implied warranty, as if a merchant sell cloth to another knowing it to be badly fulled; so if an innkeeper sell wine as sound and good, which he knows to be corrupt, although there be not any express warranty, yet an action on the case in nature of deceit will lie against him, because it is a warranty in law. In cases of this kind, however, which are grounded merely on the deceit, it is essentially necessary that the knowledge of the party, or, as it is technically termed, the scienter, should be averred in the declaration, and also proved.

An action on the case, in nature of a writ of deceit, may be maintained against any person who deceives by a false assertion, and thereby injures another who has placed a reasonable confidence in him: as where a party in possession of a personal chattel sells it, and at the time of sale affirms it to be his own, when in truth it belongs to another, the vendee may recover a compensation in damages for such injuries as he can prove to have been sustained in consequence of this deceit; for the possession of a personal chattel is a color of title, and it is but a reasonable confidence which the vendee places in the vendor, when he affirms it to be his own. But where the affirmation is (as it is termed in some of the books) a mute assertion; that is, where the party deceived may exercise his own judgment; as where it is mere matter of opinion, or where he may make enquiry into the truth of the assertion, and it becomes his own fault from laches that he is deceived, in this case an action cannot be maintained; as where a person buys a horse, which the seller affirms to have two eyes, and the horse has but one only; in such case the purchaser, unless, as is quaintly observed in one of the year-books, he be blind, is remediless, for vigilantibus non dormientibus jura subveniunt.

It is to be observed that actions on the case for the breach of an express warranty, bear a strong resemblance to actions on the case in nature of deceit on implied warranties: but this distinction between them ought to be attended to, that in actions on the case in the nature of deceit, the gravamen is the deceit, and the gist of the action is the scienter; but in the action for breach of warranty, the gravamen is the breach of warranty; and where the plaintiff declares in tort for such breach, it is not necessary to allege the scienter, nor, if alleged, to prove it.

Where an article is warranted, and the warranty is not complied with, the vendee has three courses, any one of which he may pursue. (1) He may refuse to accept the article; (2) he may accept it, and bring a cross-action on the warranty; (3) he may, without bringing a cross-action, use the breach of a warranty, in reduction of damages in an action brought for the price.

Where a person, with a design to deceive and defraud another, makes a false representation of a matter inquired of him, in consequence of which the person to whom the representation is made enters into a contract, and thereby sustains an injury, an action on the case, in the nature of deceit, will lie at the suit of the party injured, against the party making the fraudulent representation, although a stranger to the contract, from the entering into which the plaintiff was damnified. It is not necessary that the defendant should have derived any advantage from the deceit, or that he should have colluded with the person who did derive the advantage, and it will be sufficient proof of fraud in these cases to show: 1st, that the fact, as represented, is false; 2ndly, that the person making the representation had knowledge of a fact contrary to it, and it is no excuse for a party to say that he did not recollect at the time the truthful fact. If the representation amount to an assurance only of a person's ability to answer an obligation, it must, to be binding, be in writing.—9 Geo. IV. c. 14, s. 6; St. Leon. Vend. & Pur. 4; 1 Selw. N. P. 640.

Decem tales (ten such). If, when a trial at bar is called on, a sufficient number of jurors do not attend, the trial must be adjourned, and a decem or octo tales, according to the number deficient, awarded, as at common law; for the 6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 37, which allows the tales de circumstantibus, is expressly confined to trials at Nisi Prius and the assizes.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 378.

Decennary, a town or tithing, consisting originally of ten families of freeholders. Ten tithings composed a hundred.—1 Bl. Com. 114.

Decet tamen principem servare leges, quibus ipse servatus est.—(It behoves indeed the prince to keep the laws by which he himself is preserved.)

Decies tantum, a writ which lay against a juror, who had taken money of either party for giving his verdict, to recover ten times as much as the sum taken.—38 Edw. III. c. 12, repealed by 6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 62.

Decimation. The punishing every tenth soldier by lot was termed decimatio legionis by the Romans. Sometimes only the twentieth man was punished (vicesimatio), or the hundredth (centesimatio); also tithing or tenth part.

Decimæ, tenths or tithes.

Decimæ debentur parocho.—(Tithes are due to the parish priest.)

Decimæ de decimatis solvi non debent.—(Tithes are not to be paid from that which is given for tithes.)

Decimæ de jure divino et canonicâ institutione pertinent ad personam. — Dal. 50. — (Tithes belong to the parson by divine right and canonical institution.)

Decimæ non debent solvi, ubi non est annua renovatio; et ex annuatis renovantibus simul semel.—Cro. Jac. 42.—(Tithes ought not to be paid where there is not an annual renovation, and from annual renovations once only.)

Deciners, Decenniers, or Doziners, such as were wont to have the oversight of the Friburgs or views of frankpledge, for the maintenance of the public peace. The limit and compass of their jurisdiction was called decenna, because it commonly consisted of ten households; as every person, bound for himself and his neighbours to keep the peace, was styled decennier.—Bract. l. 3, t. 2, c. xv.

Decision, a judgment.

Decisive oath [sacramentum decisionis, Lat.], resorted to in the civil law, where one of the parties to a suit not being able to prove his charge, offers to refer the decision of the cause to the oath of his adversary; which the adversary was bound to accept or tender the same proposal back again; otherwise the whole was taken as confessed by him.—Cod. 4, 1, 12.

Declarant, a person who makes a declaration.

Declaration, a proclamation or affirmation, open expression or publication. More properly, in law, a statement, on the plaintiff's part, of his cause of action. In a real action, it is more correctly called the count; in a personal, the declaration; but this is now the general term, being that commonly used when referring to real and personal actions without distinction.

The plaintiff must declare, in a personal action, before the end of the term next after the defendant's appearance, otherwise a judgment of non pros may be signed by the defendant. But if no such non pros be obtained, then he may declare at any time within a year next after the appearance of the defendant, unless otherwise ordered by the court or a judge; but if he do not declare within that period, he will be deemed out of court.

The declaration should correspond with the writ:—1st, in the names of the parties; 2nd, in the number of the parties; and 3rd, in the character in which they sue and are sued. It must be entitled in the proper court, and of the day of the month and year on which it is delivered or filed. It is delivered to the defendant or his attorney, when he or his attorney enters an appearance; it is filed when the defendant does not enter an appearance, and the writ is not specially endorsed.—Step. Plead. 30; 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 221, et seq.

Declarations are allowed in certain cases in lieu of oaths. By 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 62, for the abolition of unnecessary oaths, any justice of the peace, notary public, or other officer authorised to administer an oath is empowered to take voluntary declarations in the form specified in the act. And any person wilfully making such declaration false in any material particular shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. See 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, ss. 246, 254.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 66, if any person called as a witness in any court of criminal jurisdiction in England or Ireland, or required or desiring to make an affidavit or deposition in the course of any criminal proceeding, shall refuse or be unwilling from alleged conscientious motives to be sworn, it shall be lawful for the court or judge or other presiding officer or person qualified to take affidavits or depositions, upon being satisfied of the sincerity of such objection, to permit such person instead of being sworn to make his or her solemn affirmation or declaration. The act gives a form of affirmation, and attaches the penalties of perjury to false affirmations.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, s. 211, a bankrupt or his wife, with a view to their examination, may be required to make and sign a declaration that he will make true answer to all such questions as may be proposed to him respecting his property and all dealings and transactions relating thereto, and will make a full disclosure of all that has been done therewith. If, after signing such declaration, they give false evidence, they are punishable as in the case of perjury. Notwithstanding such declaration they may, if the court or a creditor requires, be examined on oath.—12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 254.

Declaration of insolvency. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, s. 72, 'If any debtor, whether a trader or not, shall file in the office of the chief registrar, or with the registrar of a district court of bankruptcy, or of a county court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy, a declaration in writing and signed by such debtor and attested by a registrar of the court or by an attorney or solicitor, that he is unable to meet his engagements, every such debtor shall be deemed thereby to have committed an act of bankruptcy at the time of filing such declaration, provided a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy shall be filed by or against him within two months from the filing of such declaration.'

Declaration of right. See BILL OF RIGHTS.

Declaration of title, an Act for obtaining a, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 67. This act, after reciting that it is expedient to enable persons having interest in land to obtain a judicial declaration of their title to the same, so as to enable them to make an indefeasible title to persons claiming under them, as purchasers, for a valuable consideration, enacts in substance: That every person claiming to be entitled to, or to have a power of disposing of, for his own benefit, land (not of copyhold or customary tenure) for an estate of fee-simple in possession absolutely or subject to incumbrances, estates, &c., or entitled to apply for the registration of an indefeasible title, under the Transfer of Land Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 53), may petition the Court of Chancery for a declaration of title. The petition must state what incumbrances, estates, rights, and interests affect the title. The court may order that the registrar appointed under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 53, shall be served with notice of the petition, whereupon he shall be made a party to and attend the proceedings, his costs being paid by the petitioner. The court, on the hearing of the petition, on being satisfied that the petitioner has proved such a possession, and has stated such a title as if established would entitle him to a declaration, shall make an order for the investigation of the title, in the same way as if the petitioner had obtained, as vendor, a decree for a specific performance of an agreement for sale of the land in question for the estate claimed in the petition. If, upon such investigation, the court is not satisfied that the petitioner has shown such a title as it would have compelled an unwilling purchaser to accept, it may dismiss the petition, subject to an appeal; but if satisfied that the petitioner has shown such a title, it shall, on the conditions mentioned in the act being complied with, make an order that on some day, not less than three months from the date of the order, a declaration shall be made establishing the title, unless in the meantime cause is shown to the contrary. No such order is to be made until the petitioner has given security for the payment of the costs which may be awarded to any person opposing the petitioner's right to the declaration; nor until the petitioner and his solicitor, and any other person whom the court may require, shall have made and filed an affidavit that to the best of their respective knowledge, information, and belief, all settlements, deeds, documents, instruments, maps, plans, and papers relating to the title have been produced, or the cause of their non-production explained, and that all facts material to the title have been disclosed. The court may dispense with such affidavit, if it think it reasonable to do so, or may permit it to be modified. When the order has been obtained, notice of it is to be given by advertisement or otherwise, as the court may direct. Before the proposed declaration of title has been made, any person may petition to be heard against it, and the court shall fix a time for the hearing of such petition, and may enlarge the time for making the declaration until it has been disposed of. On the hearing of such petition, the court may introduce restrictions or qualifications in the title sought to be declared, or may reserve the rights of any person, or may refuse to make any declaration; and if any of the title-deeds have been lost or destroyed the court may reserve the rights of all persons under such deeds. If no petition is presented, or if, when presented, no sufficient ground is shown for refusing the declaration, the court, after the expiration of the time limited for showing cause, upon being satisfied that the required notices have been given, &c., shall make a declaration that the original petitioner has such title as he sought to establish, subject to any restrictions as it may deem proper to introduce. An appeal against such declaration lies to the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and thence to the House of Lords, &c.

Similar appeal lies when the Court of Chancery dismisses the original petition, or on the hearing refuses to make the declaration of title. The declaration of title, when final, is not to be set aside for irregularity or informality in the previous proceedings. The declaration of title may be registered under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 53. Any person who has obtained a final declaration of title, on payment of the proper fees, and on production of his title-deeds, is entitled to a certificate, under the seal of the court, setting forth his title so declared, &c. But before such certificate is sealed, the petitioner must produce to the court such of his deeds and muniments of title as the court may require, and the same shall be stamped or marked by the officer issuing the certificate, for the purpose of showing that a declaration of title has been made as to the land therein comprised, or such part of it as is comprised in the declaration. The effect of the declaration of title is, that as soon as it shall have become final, it shall, in favour of any person thereafter deriving title, as a purchaser for valuable consideration, of the land therein referred to, or of any part thereof, or of any estate, right or interest therein, by, from, through, or under the person whose title has been so declared, be deemed and taken to have correctly declared the same, but save, as aforesaid, such declaration shall have no force or effect whatever as to the title of the land comprised therein.

The act contains provisions for making separate declarations and separate certificates for separate parts of the land referred to in the petition; for cancelling an original certificate, and substituting for it separate certificates; for issuing a fresh certificate when the original has been lost or destroyed. It also provides that this declaration of title shall not affect 'land-tax, succession-duty, and other rent-charge; rights of common, rents payable to the Crown, public right of way, liability to repair highways by reason of tenure, right of way, water-courses and other easements or servitudes, manorial rights and franchises, leases or agreements for lease for any time not exceeding twenty-one years, when there is occupation under the same.'

Land, when registered in the register of estates, with an indefeasible title, is to be subject to the provisions of the act under which it is registered.

After a declaration of title has been made, any person may petition that it be recalled or varied, and the court may annul it, reverse it, and cancel the certificate, subject to the same appeal as before mentioned. Power is given to the Lord-Chancellor, Master of Rolls, and Vice-Chancellor, to make general rules and orders, which must be laid before Parliament. See 'Transfer of Land Act,' post.

Declaration of trust. To prevent the inconvenience which arose from parol declarations and secret transfers of uses, the 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 7, requires that all declarations or creations of trusts, or confidences of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, shall be manifested and proved by some writing signed by the party who is by law enabled to declare such trust, or by his last will in writing. By the eighth section it is provided, 'that where any conveyance shall be made of any lands or tenements, by which a trust or confidence shall or may arise or result by the implication or construction of the law, or be transferred or extinguished by an act or operation of law, then and in any such case such trust or confidence shall be of the like force and effect as the same would have been if this statute had not been made.' And by the ninth section, 'that all grants and assignments of any trust or confidence shall likewise be in writing, signed by the party granting or assigning the same, or by such last will or devise.'

It appears that this statute does not extend to the declaration or creation of trusts of mere personalty. But in practice, a parol declaration should never be relied on, for the intention to declare a trust should be irrevocably expressed. There is no form or particular set of words, or mode of expression, prescribed for the purpose of raising a trust. Intention will create a trust, provided the object of the gift, and the gift itself, can be correctly ascertained.—1 Sand. Uses, 344.

Declaration of uses must be in writing.—29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 7.

The conveyances by bargain and sale and covenant to stand seised are in fact nothing more than declarations of uses; for the use being served out of the seisin of the bargainor and covenantor in those conveyances, they merely serve to declare the use to the bargainee and covenantee. But upon such conveyances as transmute the possession, the use may be declared by a deed or writing distinct from the conveyance by which the possession is transferred. It is now universally the practice to declare the use in the same deed immediately after the habendum.—1 Sand. Uses, 219. See APPOINTMENT.

Declarator, an action whereby something is prayed to be declared in one's favor.—Scotch Law.

Declarator of property, when the complainer, narrating his right to lands, desires he should be declared sole proprietor, and all others discharged to molest him any way.—Ibid.

Declarator of redemption, when, after a process before the Lords against the wadsetter who refuses to renounce after the order of redemption is used, the Lords force him to renounce, and by a decreet declare the lands redeemed.—Ibid.

Declaratory actions, those wherein the right of the pursuer is craved to be declared; but nothing claimed to be done by the defender. Ibid.

Declaratory decree, a binding declaration of right in equity without consequential relief. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 16, ss. 50, 51; Smi. Eq. Pr. 173.

Declaratory part of a law, that which clearly defines rights to be observed and wrongs to be eschewed.

Declaratory statutes, those which declare what the common law is and ever has been.

Declinatory plea, a plea of sanctuary, also pleading of benefit of clergy before trial or conviction. Abolished by 6 & 7 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 6.

Decoctor, a bankrupt.

Decoits, gang-robbers, Decoity, gang-robbery.—Indian.

Decollation, the act of beheading.

De consuetudinibus et servitiis, a real writ to recover rent in arrear. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

De corpore comitatus (from the body of the county).

Decoy [probably from kooy, Du., a cage], a place made for catching wild water-fowl.

Decree [fr. decretum, Lat.], an edict, a law. Also the judgment of a court of equity.

After the hearing of all parties in a cause, it is either (1) interlocutory (usually termed an order), when for the purpose of ascertaining any matter of law or fact previously to a final decree, the court directs that the further consideration of the cause be adjourned; or (2) final, where all the facts and circumstances material to be ascertained in order to enable the court to do complete justice between the parties, are so fully established by the pleadings in the cause, that no further elucidation is requisite. In the majority of contested causes the decree is interlocutory, in order to ascertain a variety of important matters.

Speaking of decrees in equity generally, without reference to the subject of the suit, they may be classed thus:—1st, decrees made on the hearing of the cause in the presence of all parties, in which case, if the plaintiff have any equity, there is a decree embracing the objects of the suit, which varies with the nature of the suit and the relief prayed; 2nd, decrees by default, as against parties who do not appear, in which case the plaintiff takes such decree as he can stand by; 3rd, decrees by consent, in which case the form of the decree depends upon the mutual agreement of the parties; and 4th, decrees taking the bill pro confesso, in which case the decree is according to the case made by the bill.—Seton's Forms of Decrees in Equity.

Courts of equity may adjust their decrees so as to meet different exigencies, and they may vary, qualify, restrain, and model the relief they give in every case, so as to suit it to mutual and adverse claims, controlling equities, and the real and substantial rights of all the parties. Nay, more, they can bring before them all parties interested in the subject-matter, and adjust their respective rights, however numerous; whereas courts of common law are compelled to limit their enquiry to the parties in the litigation before them, although other persons may have the deepest interest in the event of the suit. So that one of the most striking and distinctive features of courts of equity is, that they can adapt their decrees to all the varieties of circumstances which may arise, and adjust them to all the peculiar rights of all the parties interested; whereas courts of common law are bound down to a fixed and invariable form of judgment in general terms, altogether absolute for the plaintiff or defendant.—1 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 22.

Decreet arbitral, the award of an arbitrator. Scotch phrase.

Decreet cognitionis causâ, when the apparent heir is called to hear the debt constitute, it not being already clearly constitute by writ; and the appearing heir renounces, being charged to enter heir. It is against executors, when the nearest of kin are pursued by the executor-creditor, who has no writ to instruct his debitor to hear the debt constitute.—Id.

Decreet of comprising, when, at the day appointed in the letters, the debitor being called, the messenger offers him his lands for the money, which if he have not ready, the inquest declares the lands to belong to the creditor for his payment.—Id.

Decreet of exoneration, a judgment of the commissioners against the creditors or nearest of kin; wherein it is proven, that the executor has executed the whole testament, and that all is exhausted by lawful sentences.—Id.

Decreet of locality, modifying a stipend for a minister, dividing and proportioning the same among the heritors.—Id.

Decreet of modification, that which modifies a stipend to a minister, but does not divide or apportion it among the heritors.—Id.

Decreet of valuation, a sentence of the lords (who are now in the place of the commission), determining the extent and value of teinds.—Scotch phrase.

Decreta, judicial sentences given by the emperor as supreme judge.—Roman Law.

Decreta conciliorum non ligant reges nostros.—Mo. 906.—(The decrees of councils bind not our kings.)

Decretals, a volume of the canon law, forming the second part, so called as containing the decrees of sundry popes; or a digest of the canons of all the councils that pertained to one matter under one head.

Decretal order, a chancery order in the nature of a decree.

Decretum est sententia lata super legem.—(A decree is a sentence made upon the law.)

Decrowning, the act of depriving of a crown.

Decuriare, to bring into order.

Dedbana, an actual homicide or manslaughter.

Dedi et concessi (I have given and granted), the operative words in grants, &c. The word 'give' or the word 'grant' in a deed, executed after the 1st day of October, 1845, shall not imply any covenant in law in respect of any tenements or hereditaments, except so far as the word 'give' or the word 'grant' may, by force of any Act of Parliament, imply a covenant.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 4.

Dedication-day [festum dedicationis, Lat.], the feast of dedication of churches, or rather the feast day of the saint and patron of a church, which was celebrated not only by the inhabitants of the place, but by those of all the neighbouring villages who usually came thither; and such assemblies were allowed as lawful; it was usual for the people to feast and to drink on those days; and in many parts of England they still meet every year in villages for this purpose, on certain days which are called feasts, revels, or wakes.—Cowel.

De die in diem (from day to day).

Dedimus potestatem (we have given the power), a writ or commission to one or more private persons for the speeding of some act appertaining to a judge, or a court. It is granted most commonly upon suggestion that the party who is to do something before a judge, or in court, is so weak that he cannot travel.

On renewing the commission of the peace there issues a writ of dedimus potestatem out of Chancery, directed to some justice, to take the oath of him who is newly inserted.

Formerly the judges would not suffer litigants to appoint attorneys in any action or suit without this writ; but now, by statute, the plaintiff or defendant may appoint attornies without such process.

Dedition, the act of yielding up anything; surrendry.

Deed [fr. dæd, Sax.; dêd, gadêd, Goth.; daed, Dut.], a formal document on paper or parchment duly signed, sealed, and delivered. It is either an indenture (factum inter partes) needing no actual indentation (8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 5), made between two or more persons in different interests, or a deed-poll (charta de unâ parte) made by a single person, or by two or more persons having similar interests.

The requisites of a deed are these:—

(1) Sufficient parties and a proper subject of assurance.

(2) A legal consideration or matter of inducement.

(3) It must be written, engrossed, printed or lithographed, or partly written or engrossed, and partly printed or lithographed in any character or in any language, on paper, vellum, or parchment, since these materials best unite the two qualities of durability and difficulty of concealing alteration or erasure.

(4) The language employed should be sufficient in point of law, intelligible without punctuation, and clear without the aid of stops or parentheses.

Usage has arranged the text of a deed in a formal and well understood sequence; and although it is not absolutely necessary that a deed should be drawn in accordance with the generally received formulary, provided it exhibit the intention of the parties, yet it is not advisable to deviate from it unless in a matter of urgent necessity. A properly prepared deed then is arranged in the following parts.

(a) Commencement or exordium, date and particulars.

The commencement sets forth its style or character. The date follows in indentures and contracts, but is generally placed in the last or peroration-clause in a deed-poll. If there be no date, or an impossible date, the deed takes effect from its actual delivery. The date, however, should always be filled in before execution. The parties are described by their several names, their rank, profession, or calling, and their place of abode, except in the case of a peer. The assumption of any additional name should be stated so as to preserve identity on the face of the title. A mistake will not vitiate the instrument, if the party can be identified by extraneous evidence.—Nihil facit error nominis cum de corpore constat.

Every person who conveys any estate or interest, or enters into a covenant, or is to be bound by the deed, should be made a party to it.

Parties are classified in parts according to their several interests. Persons having joint-interests except in a deed of partition should be of the same part, but those having distinct though undivided interests should be of several successive parts. Those who are to transfer any interest, or relinquish any right should come first, and amongst them, those having legal estates before those having equitable only, and the larger interests should precede the lesser. Then consenting parties and covenantors. After these, those who take any estate or interest, and amongst these trustees follow real owners. Lastly those who are inserted to fix them with notice of the deed, as creditors, legatees, trustees, and executors.

When a person acts in two or more capacities, he should be named in distinct parts according to such several capacities.

Husband and wife are generally of the same part, except in separation deeds.

The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 5, enacts that under an indenture executed after the 1st day of October, 1845, an immediate estate or interest in any tenements or hereditaments, and the benefit of a condition or covenant respecting any tenements or hereditaments may be taken, although the taker thereof be not named a party to the same indenture.

Before this statute, however, a person not named in an indenture could and still can take a remainder, or a use, or the benefit of a trust, or any authority by a letter of attorney.

(b) Recitals. These are either narratives of past facts, or a statement of the purpose of the deed. They are not a necessary part of an assurance, yet they frequently become material as an aid to collect the intention of the parties to the instrument, and a key to its construction. Thus a recital may restrain the effect of general phraseology in the operative part of a deed, and although it is not evidence as against strangers, yet it is conclusive as to the facts which it sets forth between the parties to it, and those claiming under them.

(c) Testatum, witnessing, or operative clause, comprehending —

1. The consideration and its receipt. When a deed contains more than one testatum, the whole consideration should generally be stated in the first, unless it can be apportioned amongst the different testata. Nominal considerations are for the most part useless.

2. The name of the grantor. When he is a trustee, it should be stated at whose request he makes the deed, and if any particular mode of execution or attestation be prescribed, it should be set forth. The omission of the grantor's name may be constructively supplied, when the context shows who is intended to be the grantor.

3. The operative verbs of transfer.

4. The name of the grantee, with appropriate words of limitation.

(d) The Parcels, i.e. the description of the property affected, with any savings or exceptions.

There are three points to be attended to in describing the parcels:—(1) That the description be clear and comprehensive; (2) that it be sufficient to identify the property; and (3) that it be so connected with the description in the former deeds as to exhibit an identification of the property throughout the title.

Although the reversion and estate clauses are usually inserted in deeds, except appointments, and leases by termors, yet they do not serve any essential purpose, since by the transfer of the property, the reversion and rent and other incidents will clearly pass. The deed-clause is now obsolete, for title-muniments descend with the inheritance, to which they relate, and pass by a transfer of it without being named.

All the parts which have been enumerated are as a whole technically denominated the premises (præmissa) or the matters which precede. The premises should name all the parties, as well active as passive, i. e. both grantors and grantees, and set forth with certainty the thing granted, with any exceptions reserved. This word has also a popular sense, meaning the thing granted by the deed.

(f) Habendum, limiting and defining the interest.

This part is a non-essential formality, expressing the extent of the grantee's interest in the thing granted. The grantee should be named, and he would take although not mentioned in the former part of the deed. While nothing can be limited in the habendum which has not been given in the premises, yet it may abridge, qualify, or enlarge the premises, but where they are repugnant, the premises will operate, in preference to the habendum.

There is not any habendum in an appointment under a power, a covenant to stand seised, or a simple declaration of uses, because such deeds themselves fulfil its office by limiting the estate to be created.

(g) Tenendum. This is usually joined with the habendum, but it is unnecessary, since the tenure is never expressed, except upon a subgrant or lease reserving rent.

Where there is a declaration of uses, the words 'and assigns for ever' are omitted. In annuity-deeds, and money-assignments, the phrase, 'To have, hold, receive, and take,' is the common form of habendum.

(h) Declaration of uses in deeds operating by virtue of the Statute of Uses (27 Hen. VIII. c. 10). A person may take an estate under this declaration, although not a party to the deed.

(i) Declaration of trusts, when necessary, is usually combined with the declaration of uses.

(j) Declaration against dower in purchase-deeds succeeds the limitation of the estate.

A purchaser has lately contended that a conveyance in fee must be executed by the grantee, in order that the declaration against dower be effectual, and also that such declaration must follow the language of the Dower Act, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 105, s. 6, which is, 'shall not be entitled to dower;' but the court overruled both points, the first, because purchasers rarely executed conveyances to themselves unless they contained any covenants on their part; the second, because the word 'dowable' which was used, meant substantially the same as 'entitled to dower.'—Fairley v. Tuck (V. C. K.), 6 W. R. 9 (1857). See Collard v. Roe (V. C. S.) Ib. 348 (1858), as to purchaser's right to the estate of a dower trustee, when the tenant for life has not any power of appointment.

(k) Reddendum in leases, which reserves something to the grantor out of the estate transferred, such as rent.

The phrase 'yielding and paying' in a lease by indenture executed by the lessee will imply after entry a covenant to pay rent, in the absence of one expressed. (Platt on Covenants, 50, et seq.) It is generally advisable, except in leases pursuant to statute, to reserve the rent at large, not specifying to whom made, since the rent will be annexed to the reversion and belong to the person for the time being entitled to the latter.

(l) Conditions, conditional limitations, provisoes for cesser of interests, clauses of restraint, and for redemption, and special agreements, are generally here inserted, when stipulated for between the parties.

(m) Powers. For example, a power to lease.

(n) Covenants. The Touchstone (vol. i., p. 160, c. vii.) describes a covenant to be 'the agreement or consent by two or more by deed in writing, sealed and delivered, whereby either or one of the parties doth promise to the other that something is done already, or shall be done afterwards. And he that makes the covenant is called the covenantor; and he to whom it is made, the covenantee.' See the third Report of the Real Prop. Commissioners for a compendium of the Law relating to Covenants.

(o) The conclusion, peroration, or testimonium, connecting the contents of the deed with its signatures and seals.

All these several parts then, thus arranged, make up a formally prepared deed.

(5) The deed being engrossed, the next step is its execution, which consists of three acts, viz.—

(b) Sealing, which is a Norman usage, and makes the assurance a specialty. It is, however, but a simple formality. There should be a distinct seal for every signature.

(c) Delivery, which completes the efficacy of the deed, and whence it takes effect, if, as we have already seen, there be a false, or impossible, or no date. See DATE AND DELIVERY OF A DEED.

(6) Let it be observed, that a deed must be read before execution, if any of the parties request it, otherwise it will be void, so far as the requestor is concerned; and a false reading will avoid it so far as was misread (1 Touch. p. 56). Seeing that the draft of a deed is usually submitted to the legal advisers of the several parties to be approved of by them on their client's behalf, the request of reading seldom occurs. In strict practice, the engrossment is examined with the draft by the solicitors of the parties before an appointment for its execution is fixed.

(7) The attestation is not positively essential, unless it be required by a particular statute, or by the express terms of a power. See POWER. In practice, however, every deed is attested, in order to render it more easy of proof. One witness is enough (unless more are expressly required), since it renders the proof less difficult after death (read 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 26). A witness need not see the party execute the deed, for if such party request him to attest his signature after it has been written, and he do so, it will be sufficient.

(8) The endorsed receipt-clause acknowledging the payment of the consideration-money, signed by the recipient, should never be omitted, for although the receipt in the body of the deed is conclusive at Law between the parties themselves, Equity regards the endorsed receipt as the effectual discharge, since a future purchaser is not then required, unless he have notice to the contrary, to ascertain whether in fact the money was paid; while its absence is implied or presumptive notice of non-payment, thus charging the lands in Equity with its liquidation, and imposing on a future purchaser the necessity of requiring proof of its discharge, or, that wanting, a proper receipt from the person entitled to it (see 3 Prest. Abr. 15), when its want may be disregarded.

These are livery of seisin on feoffments; enrolment usually in Chancery of grants by the Crown; bargains and sales of freeholds, pursuant to 27 Hen. VIII. c. 16, or under the Land-tax Acts; gifts of lands to charities under 9 Geo. II. c. 36, and disentailing assurances according to 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74; and registration of assurances affecting property in Yorkshire, Middlesex, Kingston-upon-Hull, and the Bedford Levels, and annuity-deeds in the Common Pleas under 18 Vict. c. 15, s. 12.

Whilst enrolment authenticates the transaction by giving a full transcript of the assurance, registration only affords a clue to it, since it generally discloses the date, names of the parties, the parcels, and subscribing witnesses only.

(10) The stamp, which does not strengthen the efficacy of a deed, but simply renders it admissible in evidence. A deed may be stamped before or after execution. Two months are allowed to stamp it after execution, at Somerset House, without a penalty. After that period, a penalty of 10*l.* is imposed, but the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have power to remit it within twelve months from the execution of the deed. When any doubt exists as to the appropriate stamp, the Commissioners decide it with an appeal to the Exchequer. A fee of 10*s.* must be paid to them, besides any incurred penalty.—13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, ss. 14, 15; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 59, s. 13; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, ss. 17, 18.

The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, ss. 29 31), cures an objection to the production in evidence of an unstamped or deficiently stamped document, by paying to the officer of the court the amount of stamp, and penalty, and also 1*l.* additional penalty.

Though a deed may be good in point of form, as apparently possessing the external and internal circumstances necessary to its validity, yet, it may be rendered invalid from many causes which may be thus classified:—

(I.) Those making it void ab initio when it can never take effect; as (a) Where it is wanting in any of the essentials, for it is then absolutely null against all persons.

(b) Where a party has made it under threat, for then it is void as to him.

(II.) Those making it voidable, not being void from its beginning; as (a) By dissent of parties, for instance the repudiation of an infant or wife's deed, after majority or upon widowhood.

(b) By dissent of strangers, as the grantee of a deed-poll or an indenture not executed by him, disclaiming the estate thereby given to him, or a husband repudiating his wife's purchase.

(III.) Those making it void by something ex post facto; as (a) By an extra-judicial act, as razure or interlineation, or breaking off the seal, with the assent of the parties, or delivering up the deed to be cancelled. The act of a spoliator will not avoid a deed. To prevent any after-dispute, any alteration or interlineation made in a deed before execution should be particularised in the attestation clause. If a freehold estate have already passed by the deed, its cancellation will not divest such estate so as to revest it in the original owner; there must be a re-transfer to effect this.

(b) By a judicial act, as where by a decision of a court a deed is declared void (technically called a vacat of the instrument), by reason of fraud, or an illegal consideration, or that it attempts to derogate a prior and superior right.

The several species of deeds and assurances may be thus classed:—

(I.) Those which wholly operate by virtue of the Common Law, subdivided into (a) Primary or original, which create or divide estates, being

(1) Feoffment.
(2) Bargain and sale improper.
(3) Gift.
(4) Grant.
(5) Bill of sale.
(6) Lease.
(7) Exchange.
(8) Partition.

(b) Secondary or derivative, which enlarge, extinguish, delegate the dealing with, or renounce estates already created, being

(9) Release.
(10) Confirmation.
(11) Surrender.
(12) Assignment.
(13) Under-lease.
(14) Power or letter of attorney.
(15) Defeazance.
(16) Disclaimer.

(II.) Those which wholly operate by virtue of the Statute of Uses, as

(17) Appointment in exercise of a power concerning uses.
(18) Revocation and new appointment.
(19) Bargain and sale proper.
(20) Covenant to stand seised.

(III.) Those which operate partly by the Common Law and partly by the Statute Law, as

(21) Grant to uses.
(22) Statutory release.
(23) Feoffment to uses.

(IV.) Those which operate by special custom, as

(24) Surrender to a lord.
(25) Admittance of a new tenant.

(V.) Those which operate by matter of record, as

(26) Private Act of Parliament.
(27) Royal grants.
(28) Vesting orders.

(VI.) Those which charge, discharge, or enlarge, or affect or concern estates, as

(29) Bond.
(30) Warrant of attorney and cognovit actionem.
(31) Debenture.
(32) Recognizance.
(33) Deed of covenant.
(34) Declaration of trust.
(35) Appointment of new trustees.

Deed of covenant. Covenants are frequently entered into by a separate deed, for title, or for the indemnity of a purchaser or mortgagee, or for the production of title-deeds. A covenant with a penalty is sometimes taken for the payment of a debt, instead of a bond with a condition, but the legal remedy is the same in either case.

Deed-poll, a single deed in the form of a manifesto or declaration to all the world of the grantor's act and intention. If there be no recital it usually speaks in the first person, but where recitals are introduced it speaks in the third person.

Deemsters [fr. dema, Sax., a judge or umpire], Judges in the Isle of Man and in Jersey, who, without process or any charge to the parties, decide all controversies in that island; they are chosen from among the parties themselves.—Cam. Brit. & 4 Inst. 284.

Deer-fald, a park or fold for deer.

Deer hayes, engines or great nets made of cord to catch deer.—19 Hen. VIII. c. 11.

De essendo quietum de tolonio, a writ which lay for those who were by privilege free from the payment of toll, on their being molested therein.—F. N. B. 226.

De expensis civium et burgensium, an obsolete writ addressed to the sheriff to levy the expenses of every citizen and burgess of Parliament.—4 Inst. 46.

De expensis militum, a similar writ to the last, to levy the expenses of the knights of the shire for attendance in Parliament.

De facto, in fact, opposed to de jure, of right.

The 11 Hen. VII. c. 1 (A.D. 1494), was made for the protection of those who have assisted and supported the king in possession of the crown, whether his title be a good one or not; as the preamble recites it, 'to be the duty of the subject to serve their prince and sovereign lord for the time being.'

Fuller (Holy State, b. 4, c. viii.) hath given us rather a quaint, but at the same time strongly descriptive account of the perilous situation of the subject before this wise statute. 'For they lived in a troublesome world, wherein the cards were so shuffled, that two kings were turned up trumps at once, which amazed men how to play their games.'—Barr on Stat. 451.

Defamation, scandalous words spoken concerning another, tending to the injury of his reputation, for which an action on the case for damages will lie; the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 41, abolished the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts in suits for defamation as grievous and oppressive.

Default, omission of that which a man ought to do; neglect.

When a defendant has a day certain given him in court, and is then demandable, and being demanded does not appear, the court thereupon gives judgment against him by default. The defendant allows judgment by default either intentionally or through mistake or neglect; intentionally, where he has no merits, or where he does so according to a previous agreement with the plaintiff; through mistake when he delivers a plea or rejoinder, &c. so informal or defective that it is treated as a nullity; and through neglect when perhaps he has no merits, but omits to plead, rejoin, &c. within the time limited by the rules of the court for that purpose. This is an implied confession of the action. See JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT.

Where a defendant makes default at the hearing of a cause in equity, the decree is absolute in the first instance, without giving the defendant a day to show cause. and such decree shall have the same force and effect as if the same had been a decree nisi in the first instance, and afterwards made absolute in default of cause shown by the defendant.—Consol. Ord. 1860, xxiii. r. 44.

Defaulter, one who makes default.

Defeasible [fr. défaire, Fr., to make void], that which may be annulled or abrogated.

Defeazance [fr. défaire, Fr., to undo], a collateral deed accompanying another, providing that upon the performance of certain matters, an estate or interest created by such other deed shall be defeated and determined. It is of three kinds:—(1) As applicable to freeholds. This is now seldom used, as it is preferable to set forth the conditions in the deed creating the freehold, so as to be complete in itself; (2) as applicable to chattels, real and executory interests, such as covenants, rents, and annuities; and (3) as applicable to bonds, recognizances, and warrants of attorney. The first kind, when it is adopted, must be made at the same time with the assurance to which it relates, and form a part of the same transaction. The second and third kinds may be made either at the time of, or at any time after, the execution of the principal assurance.

A defeazance should recite the deed to be defeated and its date: and must be made between the same parties as are interested in the recited deed or their representatives, and with the same formalities as the deed which created the estate to be defeated; it must be of a thing defeasible, and all the conditions must be strictly performed before the defeazance can be consummated.

It having hitherto been the law for centuries that a condition in a lease not to alien without license was determined by the first license granted (Dumpor's case, 4 Co. 119; 45 Eliz. & 1 Smi. L. C. 25–35), a defeazance was frequently adopted in order to revive the condition and so virtually to limit the license to the particular assignment; but the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, provides that where any license to do any act which without such license would create a forfeiture, or give a right to re-enter, under a condition or power reserved in any lease heretofore granted, or to be hereafter granted, shall at any time after the passing of this act (13th of August 1859), be given to any lessee or his assigns, every such license shall, unless otherwise expressed, extend only to the permission actually given, or to any specific breach of any proviso or covenant made or to be made, or to the actual assignment, under-lease, or other matter thereby specifically authorized to be done, but not so as to prevent any proceeding for any subsequent breach (unless otherwise specified in such license), and all rights under covenants and powers of forfeitures and re-entry in the lease contained shall remain in full force and virtue; and shall be available as against any subsequent breach of covenant or condition, assignment, under-lease, or other matter not specifically authorized or made dispunishable by such license, in the same manner as if no such license had been given; and the condition or right of re-entry shall be, and remain in all respects as if such license had not been given, except in respect of the particular matter authorized to be done (s. 1).

Where in any lease heretofore granted, or to be hereafter granted, there is or shall be a power or condition of re-entry on assigning or underletting or doing any other specified act without license, and a license at any time after the passing of this act shall be given to one of several lessees or co-owners to assign, or underlet his share or interest, or to do any other act prohibited to be done without license, or shall be given to any lessee or owner or any one of several lessees or owners to assign or underlet part only of the property, or to do any other such act as aforesaid in respect of part only of such property, such license shall not operate to destroy or extinguish the right of re-entry in case of any breach of the covenant or condition by the co-lessee or co-lessees, or owner or owners, of the other shares or interests in the property, or by the lessee or owner of the rest of the property (as the case may be), over or in respect of such shares or interests, or remaining property, but such right of re-entry shall remain in full force over or in respect of the shares or interests or property not the subject of such license (s. 2).

Defectum, challenge propter. See CHALLENGE.

Defence [fr. defensio, Lat.], popularly a justification, protection, or guard; in law, a denial by the defendant of the truth or validity of the plaintiff's complaint.

At Common Law, a defendant, after a plaintiff has declared, must either demur or plead. One or other of these courses he is bound to take, if he mean to maintain his defence. If he do neither, but confess the plaintiff's right, or say nothing, the court immediately gives judgment for the plaintiff: in the former case as by confession—in the latter, by non pros or nil dicet.—Step. Plead. 150.

In Equity, the matters of defence which may be relied on are in their nature susceptible of two divisions, viz.: (1) into those which are dilatory, which merely delay or suspend, or obstruct the suit without touching the merits, until the impediment or obstacle insisted on is removed; and (2) into those which are peremptory and permanent, and go to the entire merits of the suit.

Dilatory defences may be again divided into four sorts; first to the jurisdiction of the court, insisting that the bill is not preferred to the proper tribunal, which is authorized to entertain the case upon its merits; secondly, to the person, that the bill is preferred by or against an improper person, not competent to maintain or defend it; thirdly, to the form of proceedings, that the suit is irregularly brought, or defective in its appropriate allegations or parties; and fourthly, to the propriety of maintaining the suit itself, because of the pendency of another suit for the same controversy.

Peremptory, or permanent defences, may be divided into two sorts; first, those which insist that the plaintiff never had any right to institute the suit; and, secondly, those which insist that the original right, if any, is extinguished or determined. Under the former head may be included the following defences:—(1) That the plaintiff has not a superior right to the defendant; (2) that the defendant has no interest; and (3) that there is no privity with the plaintiff, nor any other right to sustain the suit. Under the latter head may be included the following defences:—(1) That the right is determined by the act of the parties; or (2) that it is determined by operation of law.

The modes of defence are four, viz.: (1) by demurrer, by which the defendant demands the judgment of the court, whether he shall be compelled to answer the bill or not; (2) by plea, whereby he shows some cause why the suit should be dismissed, delayed, or barred; (3) by answer, which, controverting the case stated by the bill, confesses and avoids it: or traverses and denies the material allegations in the bill; or, admitting the case made by the bill, submits to the judgment of the court upon it; or relies upon a new case, or upon new matter stated in the answer, or upon both; (4) by disclaimer, which seeks at once a determination of a suit, by the defendant's disowning all right and interest in the matter sought by the bill. All or any of these modes of defence may be joined; and by Consol. Ord. 1860, xiv. r. 8, it is ordered, that no demurrer or plea shall be held bad and overruled upon argument, only because it does not cover so much of the bill as it might by law have extended to. And by r. 9, no demurrer or plea shall be held bad and overruled upon argument, only because the answer of the defendant extends to some part of the same matter as is covered by such demurrer or plea. Story's Eq. Plead. 345.

In Criminal matters, when a prisoner is brought to the bar and arraigned, he either confesses the charge, stands mute of malice, or does not answer directly to the charge, which may be entered as a plea of not guilty, or pleads to the jurisdiction, or in abatement, or demurs, or pleads specially in bar, or generally, that he is not guilty. In addition to these several modes of defence, there were formerly what were called declinatory pleas—the plea of sanctuary and the plea of clergy—both now abolished.—Arch. Plead. by Jervis, 72.

The defence in Ecclesiastical courts may be called the answer, in which the defendant denies, extenuates, or justifies.

The defence of one's self, and the mutual and reciprocal defence of such as stand in the relations of husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant, is a right which belongs to every person. If a man, or one standing in any of these relations to him, be forcibly attacked in his person or property, it is lawful for him to repel force by force; and the breach of the peace which happens is chargeable upon him only who began the affray. Self-defence, therefore, is justly called the primary law of nature, and it is not, neither can it be, in fact, taken away by the law of society. In the English law it is held an excuse for breaches of the peace, nay, even for homicide itself; but care must be taken that the resistance does not exceed the bounds of mere defence and prevention; for then the defender would himself become an aggressor.

Defend, to forbid or deny.

Defendant [Deft. abbrev.], the person sued in a personal action or suit, or indicted for a misdemeanor. He who is sued in a real action is called the tenant; the former term, however, is applicable to actions of every description, and is the expression most commonly used.

Defendemus, a word used in grants and donations, which binds the donor and his heirs to defend the donee, if any one go about to lay any incumbrance on the thing given, other than what is contained in the deed of donation. Bract. l. 2, c. xvi.

Defender of the faith [fidei defensor, Lat.], a peculiar title, belonging to the Sovereign of England, as that of Catholic to the King of Spain, and that of Most Christian to the King of France. These titles were originally given by the Popes of Rome; and that of Defensor Fidei was first conferred by Pope Leo X. on our King Henry VIII. as a reward for writing against Martin Luther; and the bull for it bears date quinto Idus, Octob. 1521. The Pope, on King Henry's suppressing the houses of religion at the time of the Reformation, not only sentenced him to be deprived of this title, but to be deposed also from his crown; but in the thirty-fifth year of his reign, this title was confirmed by Parliament, and has continued to be used by all succeeding sovereigns to this day.—Encyc. Lond.

Defendere se per corpus suum. To offer duel or combat as a legal trial and appeal. Abolished by 59 Geo. III. c. 46. See BATTEL.

Defendere unicâ manu, to wage law; a denial of an accusation upon oath. See WAGER OF LAW.

Defeneration [fr. de, of, and fœnero, Lat., to lend upon usury], the act of lending money on usury.

Defensa, a park or place fenced in for deer.

Defensiva, a lord or earl of the marches, who was the warden and defender of his country.—Cowel.

Defensive allegation, the mode of propounding facts relied upon as a defence by a defendant in the spiritual courts. He is entitled to the plaintiff's answer upon oath, and may thence proceed to proofs as well as his antagonist.—3 Step. Com. 450.

Defenso, that part of any open field or place that was allotted for corn or hay, and upon which there was no common or feeding, was anciently said to be in defenso: so of any meadow ground that was laid in for hay only. The same term was applied to a wood where part was enclosed or fenced, to secure the growth of the underwood from the injury of cattle.—Cowel.

Defensum, an enclosure of land, any fenced ground.

Deferred Life Annuities, granted by Commissioners for Reduction of the National Debt. See 16 & 17 Vict. c. 45, s. 2.

Deficiente uno sanguine non potest esse hæres. 3 Co. 41.—(One blood being wanting, he cannot be heir). But see 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, s. 9.

Deficit, something wanting.

De fide et officio judicis non recipitur quæstio; sed de scientiâ, sive error sit juris aut facti.—Bacon.—(A question cannot be admitted as to the good faith and honesty of a judge; but otherwise concerning his knowledge, whether he be mistaken as to the law or the fact.)

It is an ancient rule that a judge of record is not liable to an action for anything done by him in his judicial character. This immunity is given for the public good and advancement of justice; for it is obvious that to administer law properly, the judge should be free in thought and independent in character. A judge, however, is not excused for neglect of duty or misconduct, or à fortiori for corruption.

Definitive sentence, the final judgment of a spiritual court, in opposition to provisional or interlocutory judgment.

Deforcement, the holding of lands or tenements to which another person has a right; so that this includes as well an abatement, an intrusion, or a disseisin, as any other species of wrong, by which he that has a right to a freehold is kept out of possession. It is such a detainer of the freehold from him having the right of property, but not the possession under that right, as falls within none of the injuries of abatement, intrusion, disseisin, or discontinuance.—3 Step. Com. 502.

Deforceor, or Deforcor, he that overcomes and casts out by force.—Blount.

Deforciant, the person against whom the fictitious action of fine was brought. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

Deforciare, to withhold property from the right owner.

Deforciatio, a distress; a holding of goods for the satisfaction of a debt.—Paroch. Antiq. 239.

Defossion [fr. de, of, and fodio, Lat., to dig], the punishment of being buried alive.—Ash.

De frangentibus prisonam, Statute of, 1 Edw. II., st. 2, which enacts that no person shall have judgment of life or member for breaking prison, unless committed for some capital offence.

Defraudation, privation by fraud.

Defunct, one that is deceased; a dead man or woman.—Encyc. Lond.

Degradation, a deprivation of dignity; dismission from office. An ecclesiastical censure, whereby a clergyman is divested of his holy orders. There are two sorts by the canon law: one, summary, by word only; the other solemn, by stripping the party degraded of those ornaments and rights which are the ensigns of his degree. Degradation is otherwise called deposition, but the canonists have distinguished between these two terms, deeming the former as the greater punishment of the two. There is likewise a degradation of a lord or knight at common law, and also by Act of Parliament.—13 Car. II. c. 16.

Degradations, a term for waste in the French law.

Degree [fr. degré, Fr.; degrat, O. Fr.; gradus, Lat.], a step; the distance between relations; the state or condition of a person.

The stamp-duties on degrees at Oxford are repealed by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 36, s. 1; and at Cambridge by 21 Vict. c. 11, s. 1.

De grossis arboribus decimæ non dabuntur, sed de sylvâ cæduâ decimæ dabuntur.—2 R. R. 123.—(Of whole trees, tithes are not given; but of wood used to be cut, tithes are given).

Dehors [Fr.], foreign to, outside, out of the point in question.

De gratiâ speciali, certâ scientiâ, et mero motu, talis clausula non valet in his in quibus præsumitur principem esse ignorantem.—1 Co. 53.—(The clause 'Of our special grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion,' is of no avail in those things in which it is presumed that the prince was ignorant).

De idiotâ inquirendo, a common law writ to inquire whether a man be an idiot or not. It was tried by a jury of twelve men; and if they found him purus idiota, the profits of his lands and the custody of his person might have been granted by the sovereign to some subject who had interest enough to obtain them. Obsolete.—F. N. B. 232.

Dei judicium, the old Saxon trial by ordeal, so called because it was thought to be an appeal to God for the justice of a cause, and it was believed that the decision was according to the will and pleasure of Divine Providence. See ORDEAL.

De incremento (of increase).

De injuriâ suâ propriâ absque tali causâ (more compendiously called the traverse de injuriâ), a species of traverse by replication in pleading, now obsolete, which varied from the common form, and which, though confined to particular actions, and to a particular stage of the pleadings, was of frequent occurrence. It always tendered issue; but, on the other hand, differed (like many of the general issues), from the common form of a traverse, by denying in general and summary terms, and not in the words of the allegation traversed.

This species of traverse occurred in the replication in actions of trespass, trespass on the case (including the species of assumpsit), and in the plea in bar in replevin, but was not used in any other stages of the pleadings. In these actions it was the proper form, when the pleading to which it was an answer consisted merely of matter of excuse of the alleged trespass, grievance, breach of contract, or other cause of action. But if the pleading to be answered consisted of or comprised matter of title, or interest in the land, &c., the commandment of the plaintiff, or authority derived from him, matter of record, of discharge, satisfaction, or release, in any of these cases the traverse de injuriâ was generally improper, and the denial of any of these matters must have been in the common form, that is, in the words of the allegation traversed.

Where this replication had been improperly adopted, instead of an ordinary traverse, the objection could be taken by special and not general demurrer. Consult Crogate's case, 8 Rep. 672 a; Saund. 295 n. (1); Stephen's Plead. 190.

Deis or Dais. See DAGUS.

Dejeration [fr. dejero, Lat.], a taking of a solemn oath.

De jure [Lat.] (by right).

De jure decinarum, originem ducens de jure patronatus, tunc cognitio spectat ad legem civilem, i. e. communem.—Godb. 63.—(With regard to the right of tithes, deducing its origin from the right of the patron, then the cognizance of them belongs to the civil law, that is, the common law).

De jure judices, de facto juratores, respondent. (The judges answer to the law, the jury to the fact).

A fundamental rule of the common law, upon which the whole system of pleading is built. 'It is of the greatest consequence,' said Lord Hardwicke, 'to the law of England, and also to the subject, that the power of the judge and jury be kept distinct: that the judge determine the law, and the jury the fact: if ever they come to be confounded, it will prove the confusion and destruction of the law of England.'

Delamere, Forest of. See 19 & 20 Vict. c. 13.

De la plus belle, Dower, where a wife was endowed with the fairest part of her husband's estate. Being a consequence of the tenure by knight's service, it is virtually abolished by the statute 12 Car. II. c. 24, which converts those tenures into socage.

Delator [Lat.], an accuser, an informer, a sycophant.

Delatura, an accusation, also the reward of an informer.

Del credere [a phrase borrowed from the Italians, equivalent to our word guaranty or warranty, or the Scotch term warrandice], an agreement by which a factor, when he sells goods on credit, for an additional commission (called a del credere commission), guarantees the solvency of the purchaser and his performance of the contract. Such a factor is called a del credere agent. He is a mere surety liable only to his principal in case the purchaser makes default. Story on Agency, 28; Smith's Merc. Law.

Delectus personæ (the choice of a person). It is an established principle of the common law, that, as a partnership can commence only by the voluntary contract of the parties, so, when it is once formed, no third person can be afterwards introduced into the firm, without the concurrence of all the partners who compose the original firm. It is not sufficient, to constitute the new relation, that one or more of the firm shall have assented to his introduction; for the dissent of a single partner will exclude him, since it would, in effect, otherwise amount to a right of one or more of the partners to change the nature, and terms, and obligations of the original contract, and to take away the delectus personæ, which is essential to the constitution of a partnership. So stubborn, indeed, is this rule, that even the executors and other personal representatives of a partner do not, in that capacity, succeed to the state and condition of that partner. The Roman law is direct to the same purpose. It even pressed the rule to a still further extent, and held that a positive stipulation between the partners at the commencement of the partnership, that the heir or personal representative of a partner should succeed him in the partnership, was inoperative and incapable of being enforced. The common law, however, treats such a stipulation as valid and obligatory. This also, according to Pothier, was the doctrine of the old French law; and the modern code of France has expressly adopted it, in opposition to the Roman law. Such is the law of Scotland.—Story on Partnership, 6.

Delegata potestas non potest delegari.—2 Inst. 597.—(A delegated power cannot be delegated.)

The Crown may, however, delegate to an individual the power of appointing the first members of a corporation created by charter under 1 Vict. c. 78; or may nominate a person to ascertain the individuals who compose the class to whom the charter is granted.

Delegates, the High Court of, formerly the court of appeal from the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts. Abolished, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council being constituted the court of appeal in such cases. See 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 92; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 41; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 38.

Delegation, a sending away; a putting into commission; the assignment of a debt to another; the entrusting another with a general power to act for the good of those who depute him.

Delegatus debitor est odiosus in lege.—2 Buls. 148.—(A delegated debtor is hateful in law.)

Delegatus non potest delegare.—(A delegate cannot delegate.)

The person to whom an office or a duty is delegated cannot lawfully devolve the duty upon another, unless he be expressly authorised so to do. An exception to this maxim arises from an implied authority by the recognised usage of trade; as, for instance, in the case of an architect or builder, who employs a surveyor to make out the quantities of the building proposed to be erected; here the civil law maxim applies—in contractis tacitè insunt quæ sunt moris et consuetudinis—terms which are in accordance with, and warranted by custom and usage, may be tacitly imported into contracts.

Deliberandum est diu quod statuendum est semel.—12 Co. 74.—(That which is to be resolved once for all, should be long deliberated upon.)

Delictum, challenge propter. See CHALLENGE.

Delinquens per iram provocatus puniri debet mitius.—3 Inst. 55.—(A delinquent provoked by anger ought to be punished more mildly.)

Deliverance, second, writ of. The judgment of non pros in replevin at common law is, that the defendant shall have a return of the goods replevied, and his costs. The plaintiff, however, is not prevented by this judgment from proceeding, for he may sue out the judicial writ of second deliverance, in execution of which the sheriff must again take the goods from the defendant and deliver them to the plaintiff, or the writ will operate in the sheriff's hand as a supersedeas of the writ de retorno habendo, if the latter writ has not as yet been executed. The proceedings upon this writ are the same as in ordinary cases of replevin, and if the defendant have judgment either upon verdict, demurrer, or of non pros, it is for a return irreplevisable, and he shall have a writ de retorno habendo, which being executed, the plaintiff cannot have any further writ of deliverance.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1077, 1082, and 1084.

Delivery of a deed, a requisite to a good deed. Deeds take precedence according to the time of their delivery, except in the register districts, where their precedence is according to their time of registration.

The delivery may be effected either by acts or by words, i. e. by doing something and saying nothing, as merely handing it to the grantee or his agent; or by doing nothing and saying something, as 'I deliver this writing as my act and deed,' or language of a similar import; or by doing and saying something.

Delivery is of two kinds:—

(a) Absolute, when the execution perfects the deed, and there is nothing left to be done; or

(b) Conditional, which is the handing of the writing to some third person, to be delivered by him as the act and deed of the grantor, when certain specified conditions shall be performed. Until the conditions are performed the instrument is called an escrow, scrowl, or writing.

Delivery of deeds. Where a bill in equity, seeking a discovery of deeds and writings, prays relief founded on the deeds or writings, of which the discovery is sought; if the relief so prayed be such as might be obtained at law (if the deeds or writings were in the custody of the plaintiff), he must annex to his bill an affidavit that they are not in his custody or power, and that he knows not where they are, unless they are in the hands of the defendant; otherwise the bill will be demurrable.—Story's Eq. Plead. 375.

De lunatico inquirendo, writ, a process issued to inquire into the condition of a person's mind. The Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices of Appeal, to whom, by special autho-vity from the sovereign, the custody of idiots and lunatics is intrusted, may, upon petition or information, grant a commission in the nature of the writ de lunatico inquirendo (which is analogous to that de idiotâ inquirendo), to inquire into the party's state of mind. If the party be found non compos, the care of his person, with a suitable allowance for his maintenance, is usually committed to one of his relations or friends, then called his committee.

The practice in lunacy cases has been amended by the Lunacy Regulation Acts, 1853 and 1855, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 70, and 18 Vict. c. 13, and the General Orders of the 7th November, 1853, promulgated pursuant thereto. See IDIOTS and LUNATICS.

Demand [fr. demando from mando, Lat., manudare, to hand-give; mander, Fr., to bid], a claim, a challenging, the asking of anything with authority, a calling upon a person for anything due. It is either in deed, written or verbal, as a demand for rent, or an application for payment of a debt, or in law, as an entry on land, distraining for rent, bringing an action.

Demandant. He who is actor or plaintiff in a real action, because he demands lands.—Co. Litt. 127.

Demandress, a female demandant.

Demease, death.

De medietate linguæ (of a moiety of tongue) jury. The 6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 47, enacts that, on the prayer of any alien indicted for felony or misdemeanor, the sheriff or other proper minister shall, by command of the court, return for one-half of the jury a competent number of aliens, if so many there be in the town or place where the trial is had; and if not, then so many aliens as shall be found in the same town or place, if any; and that no such alien juror shall be liable to be challenged for want of freehold or other qualification required, but that every such alien may be challenged for any other cause. This kind of jury is not allowed in a civil action, nor in cases of treason.

Indictments against scholars or privileged persons, belonging to the University of Oxford, are tried by a jury de medietate, half of freeholders and half of matriculated persons, before the High Steward of the University, or his deputy, in pursuance of the charter 7th June, 2 Hen. IV. confirmed by the statute 13 Eliz. c. 29.—2 Reeve, 461.

Demeine, Demain, or Demesne [fr. demaine, Fr.], that part of the lands of a manor which the lord has not granted out in tenancy, but which is reserved for his own use and occupation.

De melioribus damnis, judgment. Where the jury, by mistake, sever the damages between several defendants in an action of trespass, the plaintiff may cure the defect by taking judgment de melioribus damnis against one, and entering a nolle prosequi as to the other.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 462.

Demesnial, pertaining to a demesne.

Demidietas, a half or moiety.

De minimis non curat lex.—Cro. Eliz. 353.—(The law cares not about very trifling matters.) See ACCRETION.

Demise, a grant by lease; it is applied to an estate either in fee or for term of life or years, but most commonly to the latter; it is used in writs for any estate.—2 Inst. 483.

The operative word 'demise' in a lease implies an absolute covenant on the part of the lessor, or person leasing, for the lessee's or termor's quiet enjoyment during the term, which, however, may be qualified by a more limited express covenant.

Also the death of the Sovereign, demissio regis vel coronæ, an expression which signifies merely a transfer of property; for when we say the demise of the Crown, we mean only that in consequence of the disunion of the Sovereign's natural body from his body politic, the kingdom is transferred or demised to his successor, and so the royal dignity remains perpetual.—Plowd. 177.

Demise, and Redemise, mutual leases of the same land, or something out of it. It is properly used upon the grant of a rent-charge, &c.

Demi-official, partly official or authorised.

Demi-vill, a town consisting of five frecmen, or frank-pledges.—Spelman.

Democracy [fr. démocratie, Fr.; democrazia, Ital.; democracia, Sp.; democratia, Lat.; of δημοκρατία, of δῆμος, the people, and κρατέω, Gk., to exercise power over], one of the three forms of government; that in which the sovereign power is neither lodged in one man, as in a monarchy, nor in the nobles, as in an oligarchy, but in the collective body of the people.

De molendino de novo erecto non jacet prohibitio.—Cro. Jac. 429.—(A prohibition lies not against a newly-erected mill.)

Demonstrative legacy. A legacy of quantity is ordinarily a general legacy; but there are legacies of quantity in the nature of specific legacies, as of so much money, with reference to a particular fund for payment. This kind of legacy is called by the civilians a demonstrative legacy: and it is so far general, and differs so much in effect from one properly specific, that if the fund be called in or fail, the legatee will not be deprived of his legacy, but be permitted to receive it out of the general assets; yet the legacy is so far specific, that it will not be liable to abate with general legacies upon a deficiency of assets.—2 Wm. Exors. 1043.

De morte hominis nulla est cunctatio longa. Co. Litt. 134.—(Concerning the death of a man no delay is long.)

Dempster, the chief judge of a Tinwald Court in the Isle of Man. See Scott's Peveril of the Peak, c. v.

Demurrage, a term used in commercial navigation, signifying an allowance made to the owners of a ship by the freighter, for detaining her in port longer than the period agreed upon for her sailing. It is usually stipulated in charter-parties and bills of lading, that a certain number of days, called running or working or lay days, shall be allowed for receiving or discharging the cargo, and that the freighter may detain the vessel for a further specified time, or as long as he pleases on payment of so much per diem for such overtime. When the contract of affreightment expressly stipulates that so many days shall be allowed for discharging or receiving the cargo, and so many more for over-time, such limitation is interpreted as an express stipulation on the part of the freighter, that the vessel shall in no event be detained longer, and that if detained he will be liable for demurrage. This holds even in cases where the delay is not occasioned by any fault on the freighter's part, but is inevitable. If, for example, a ship be detained, owing to the crowded state of the port, for a longer time than is allowed by the contract, demurrage is due; and it is no defence to an action for demurrage that it arose from port regulations, or even from the unlawful acts of the custom-house officers. Demurrage is not, however, claimable for a delay occasioned by the hostile detention of the ship, or the hostile occupation of the intended port; nor is it claimable for any delay wilfully occasioned by the master, or owners, or crew of the vessel. The claim for demurrage ceases as soon as the ship is cleared out and ready for sailing, though she should be detained by adverse winds or tempestuous weather.—3 Chit. Com. Law, 426; Abbott on Shipping; Maude & Pollock on Shipping.

Demurrer [fr. demoror, Lat.; or demorrer, Fr., to wait or stay], a pleading which admits the facts as stated in the pleading of the opponent, and referring the law arising thereon to the judgment of the court, waits until by such judgment the court decides whether he is bound to answer.

At Common Law, by the C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 50, either party may object by demurrer to the pleading of the opposite party, on the ground that such pleading does not set forth sufficient ground of action, defence, or reply, as the case may be; and where issue is joined on such demurrer, the court shall proceed and give judgment according as the very right of the cause and matter of law shall appear unto them, without regarding any imperfection, omission, defect in, or lack of form; and no judgment shall be arrested, stayed, or reversed for any such imperfection, omission, defect in, or lack of form.

No pleading shall be deemed insufficient for any defect which could heretofore only be objected to by special demurrer (s. 51).

Either party may, by leave of the court or judge, plead and demur to the same pleading at the same time, upon an affidavit by such party or his attorney if required by the court or judge, to the effect that he is advised and believes that he has just ground to traverse the several matters proposed to be traversed by him, and that the several matters sought to be pleaded as aforesaid by way of confession and avoidance are respectively true in substance and in fact, and that he is further advised and believes that the objections raised by such demurrer are good and valid objections in law, and it shall be in the discretion of the court or a judge to direct which issue shall be first disposed of (s. 80).

The party demurring may give a notice to the opposite party to join in demurrer in four days, which notice may be delivered separately or endorsed on the demurrer, otherwise judgment.

No motion or notice for a concilium shall be required; but demurrers as well as all special cases, special verdicts, and appeals from county courts, shall be set down for argument in the special paper at the request of either party, four clear days before the day on which the same are to be argued, and notice thereof shall be given forthwith by such party to the opposite party.

Four clear days before the day appointed for argument, the plaintiff shall deliver copies of the demurrer-book, special case, special verdict, or appeal cases, with the points intended to be insisted on to the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, or Common Pleas, or Lord Chief Baron, as the case may be, and the senior puisne judge of the Court in which the action is brought, and the defendant shall deliver copies to the other two judges next in seniority; and in default thereof by either party, the other party may on the day following deliver such copies as ought to have been delivered by the party making default; and the party making default shall not be heard until he shall have paid for such copies, or deposited with the master a sufficient sum to pay for such copies. If the statement of the points have not been exchanged between the parties, each party shall, in addition to the two copies left by him, deliver also his statement of the points to the other two judges, either by marking the same in the margin of the books delivered, or on separate papers.

When there shall be a demurrer to part only of the declaration or other subsequent pleadings, those parts only of the declarations and pleadings to which such demurrer relates shall be copied in the demurrer-books; and if any other parts shall be copied, the master shall not allow the costs thereof on taxation, either as between party and party, or as between attorney and client.—Rules, H. T., 1853, 14–17; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 912.

A demurrer, in equity, is in the nature of a declinatory exception in the civil law, which was always put in before the prætor, ante litem contestatam. It may be to the whole bill, or a part only of the bill.

Whenever any ground of defence is apparent on the bill itself, either from the matter contained in it, or from defect in its frame, or in the case made by it, the proper mode of defence is by demurrer. A demurrer is an allegation by a defendant, which, admitting the matters of fact alleged by the bill to be true, shows, that as they are therein set forth they are insufficient for the plaintiff to proceed upon or to oblige the defendant to answer; or that for some reason apparent on the face of the bill, or because of the omission of some matter which ought to be contained therein, or for want of some circumstance which ought to be attendant thereon, the defendant ought not to be compelled to answer. It therefore demands the judgment of the court whether the defendant shall be compelled to make answer to the plaintiff's bill, or to some certain part thereof.

It is either general or special; general, when no particular cause is assigned, except the usual formulary (to comply with the rules of the court), that there is no equity in the bill; special, when the particular defects or objections are pointed out. The former will be sufficient (though special causes are usually stated) when the bill is defective in substance. The latter is indispensable where the objection is to the defects of the bill in point of form. It must be signed by counsel, but it is not put in upon oath, as it asserts no fact, and relies merely upon matter on the face of the bill. Where a demurrer is put into the whole bill for causes apparent on the record, if those causes are overruled the defendant will be allowed to assign other causes of demurrer ore tenus (by word of mouth), at the argument.

Demurrers to original bills, praying relief, may properly be divided into three classes:—

(1) To the jurisdiction, subdivided into four heads:—

(α) That the subject is not cognizable by any municipal court of justice.

(β) That the subject is not within the jurisdiction of a court of equity.

(γ) That some other court of equity is invested with the proper jurisdiction.

(δ) That some other court possesses the proper jurisdiction.

(2) To the person of the plaintiff, subdivided thus:—

(α) That the plaintiff is not entitled to sue, by reason of some personal disability.

(β) That the plaintiff has no title to the character in which he sues.

(3) To the matter of the bill, either as to its substance, or as to its form and frame; first, demurrers to substance may be subdivided thus:—

(α) That the value of the subject of the suit is too trivial to justify the court in taking cognizance of it; or, as the phrase usually is, that the suit is unworthy of the dignity of the court. The rule is not to entertain a bill under the value of 10*l.* or 40*s.* per annum in land, except in special cases, such as charity, fraud, &c.

(β) That the plaintiff has no interest in the matter, or no proper title to institute a suit concerning it.

(γ) Where a bill does not show any equity in the plaintiff to the relief which he seeks.

(δ) Though the plaintiff has an interest in the matter and a title to institute a suit concerning it, yet he has no right to call upon the defendant to answer his demand.

(ϵ) Want of interest of the defendant in the matter of the suit.

(ζ) That the object of the bill is to enforce a penalty or forfeiture.

Second, demurrers to the frame and form of the bill, subdivided into:—

(α) Defect of form.

(β) Multifariousness.

(γ) Want of proper parties, or misjoinder of parties.

As to demurrers to bills of discovery, see DISCOVERY.

Demurrers to bills not original or secondary may be thus stated: (1) To cross-bills, same as original bills, but the converse of this proposition is not universally true. A demurrer for want of equity will not hold to a cross-bill filed by a defendant in a suit, against the plaintiff in the same suit, touching the same matter. For, being drawn into the court by the plaintiff in the original bill, he may avail himself of the assistance of the court without being put to show a ground of equity to support its jurisdiction; as a cross-bill is generally considered as a matter of defence. (2) To bills of review, and to bills in the nature of bills of review, that there is a defect in the framing. (3) To bills to impeach decrees for fraud, that there is no fraud. (4) To bills to suspend or to avoid the operation of decrees, rarely, if ever, resorted to. (5) To bills to carry decrees into execution, that the plaintiff has no right, or that the decree is erroneous.—Story's Eq. Plead. 348–470.

A defendant has twelve days after appearance to demur to a bill. The plaintiff must set a demurrer down for argument within twelve days after filing, if it be to the whole bill, and three weeks, if to part of the bill, otherwise he is held to have submitted thereto, unless in the meantime he serve an order for leave to amend bill, but the vacations are not to be reckoned in this case.—Consol. Ord. 1860, xiv. rr. 14, 15, and xxxvii. r. 3; Smi. Eq. Pr. 288.

As to evidence, if a witness, in equity, object to answer a question, or any part of it, he must state his objection in the form of a demurrer, which is taken down in writing, either by the examiner or by the commissioner, from the mouth of the witness, and after giving notices and copies thereof, the matter is argued by counsel in court. At common law, when it is thought by counsel that the facts proved do not maintain the issue, the question whether they do or do not being merely a question of law, a demurrer may be offered, which takes from the jury and refers to the court, the application of the law to the fact, but this practice has been almost entirely superseded by simply moving the court for a new trial, besides if there were any evidence to go to the jury, the demurring party would fail; a risk too serious to be hazarded.—1 Chit Arch. Prac. by Pren. 439.

In criminal prosecutions, a demurrer may be resorted to, when the fact as alleged is allowed to be true, but the defendant takes exception in point of law to the sufficiency of the indictment or information on the face of it, as if he insist that the fact as stated is no felony, treason, or whatever the crime is alleged to be. It is seldom resorted to.—7 Geo. IV. c. 64, ss. 20, 21; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 25; 4 Bl. Com. 333.

Demy-sangue, half-blood.

Den, a valley.—Blount.

Den, and Strond, a liberty for ships or vessels to run or come ashore.—Pla. tem. Ed. I.

Dena terræ, a hollow place between two hills; a little portion of woody ground; a coppice.

Denariate, as much land as is worth one penny per annum.

Denarii, a sort of ready money.

Denarii de caritate, customary oblations made to a cathedral church at Pentecost.

Denarii S. Petri (commonly called Peter's pence), an annual payment on St. Peter's feast of one penny from every family to the Pope, during the time that the Roman Catholic religion prevailed in this kingdom.

Denarius, the chief silver coin among the Romans, worth 8*d.*, it was the seventh part of a Roman ounce; also an English penny. The denarius was first coined five years before the first Punic war, B. C. 269. In later times a copper coin was called denarius.—Smith's Dict. Antiq.

Denarius Dei, God's penny, or earnest given and received by parties to contracts, &c., paid in former times to the church or poor.

Denarius tertius comitatus, a third part or penny of the county paid to its earl, the other two parts being reserved to the Crown.—Paroch. Antiq. 418.

Denbara [fr. den, Sax., a vale, and berg, a barrow or hog], a pen for hogs; a swine-court. Cowel.

Denelage [Dane], the laws which the Danes enacted whilst they had the dominion in England.

Denial. See TRAVERSE.

Denization, the act of enfranchising, or making free.

Denizen [fr. dónaison, donison, O. Fr., a gift], an alien born, but who has either obtained, ex donatione regis, letters-patent to make him (either permanently or for a time) an English subject, or has acquired the privileges of a natural-born subject, pursuant to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66. He is in a kind of middle state, between an alien and natural-born subject, and partakes of both of them. He may hold lands by purchase or devise, which an alien may not, but cannot take by inheritance; for his parent, through whom he must claim, being an alien, had no heritable blood; and therefore could convey none to his son. And upon a like defect of inheritable blood, the issue of a denizen, born before denization, cannot inherit to him, but his issue born after may. And no denizen can be of the Privy Council, or either House of Parliament, or have any office of trust, civil or military, or be capable of any grant of lands, &c., from the Crown.—2 Step. Com. 443.

Denominatio fieri debet à dignioribus.—(Denomination should be deduced from the more worthy.)

De nomine proprio non est curandum cum in substantiâ non erretur; quia nomina mutabilia sunt, res autem immobiles.—6 Co. 66.—(As to the proper name, it is not to be regarded, where it errs not in substance; because names are changeable, but things immutable).

De non apparentibus, et non existentibus, eadem est ratio.—5 Rep. 6.—(As to things not apparent, and those not existing, the rule is the same).

De non residentiâ clerici regis, an ancient writ where a parson was employed in the royal service, &c. to excuse and discharge him of non-residence.—2 Inst. 264.

De novo (afresh; anew).

De novo damus, a clause in a charter, rendering it, in effect, an original.

De nullo, quod est suâ naturâ indivisibile, et divisionem non patitur, nullam partem habebit vidua, sed satisfaciat ei ad valentiam.—Co. Litt. 32.—(A widow shall have no part of that which in its own nature is indivisible, and is not susceptible of division; but let the heir satisfy her with an equivalent.)

Denshiring of land (otherwise called burn-beating), a method of improving land by casting parings of earth, turf, and stubble, into heaps, which, when dried, are burned into ashes for a compost.

Denumeration, the act of present payment. Scott.

Deodand [fr. Deo dandum, Lat.], a personal chattel which had been the immediate occasion of the death of any reasonable creature was forfeited to the Crown, to be applied to pious uses, and distributed in alms by the high almoner; but the right to deodands had been for the most part granted out to the lords of manors, or other liberties, to the perversion of their original design. The law made the following extraordinary distinction, that no deodand was due where an infant under the age of discretion was killed by a fall from a cart, or horse, or the like, not being in motion, whereas if an adult person fell thence, and was killed, the thing was certainly forfeited. In all indictments for homicide, the instrument of death and the value were presented and found by the grand jury (as that the blow was given by a certain bludgeon, value 9*d.*), that the Crown or the grandee might claim the deodand; for it was no deodand unless it was presented as such by a jury of twelve men.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 99; 1 Bl. Com. 300. It is abolished by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 62.

De onerando pro ratâ portionis, an ancient writ, where a person was distrained for rent, which ought to be paid by others proportionably with him.—F. N. B. 234; New. Nat. Br. 586.

De odio et atiâ, an obsolete writ, which commanded the sheriff to inquire whether a prisoner charged with murder was committed on general cause of suspicion, or merely propter odium et atiam, for hatred and ill-will, with a view, if the latter were found the case, of afterwards issuing another writ to admit him to bail.—1 Reeves, 252.

Deor hege, the hedge enclosing a deer park.

Departure [fr. decessus, Lat.], in pleading, when a party deserts the ground that he took in his last antecedent pleading, and resorts to another. It can never take place till the replication, and it occurs more frequently in the rejoinder.

The rule against departure is evidently necessary to prevent the retardation of the issue. For while the parties are respectively confined to the grounds they have first taken in their declaration or plea, the process of pleading will exhaust, after a few alternations of statement, the whole facts involved in the cause, and thereby develope the question in dispute. But if a new ground be taken in any part of the series, a new state of facts being introduced, the result is consequently postponed. Besides, if one departure were allowed, the parties might, on the same principle, shift their ground as often as they pleased; and an almost indefinite length of altercation might, in some cases, be the consequence.—Step. Plead. 451.

Depeculation, a robbing of the prince or commonwealth; an embezzling of the public treasure.

Deponent [fr. depono, Lat., to lay down], a person who makes an affidavit; a witness; one who gives his testimony in a court of justice.

Depopulatio agrorum, destroying and ravaging a country.

Deportation, transportation, exile into a remote part of the kingdom, with prohibition to change the place of residence; exile, an abjuration, which is a deportation for ever into a foreign land, was anciently with us a civil death.—Ayliffe.

Depose, to lay down; to lodge; to degrade from a throne or high station.

Deposit, money lodged with a person as an earnest or security for the performance of some contract. Also a naked bailment of goods to be kept for the bailor without recompense, and to be returned when the bailor shall require it. The appellation and the definition are both derived from the civil law, Depositum est, quod custodiendum alicui datum est. It is, in the civil law, divisible into two kinds: (1) necessary, made upon some sudden emergency, and from some pressing necessity; as, for instance, in case of a fire, a shipwreck, or other overwhelming calamity, when property is confided to any person whom the depositor may meet without proper opportunity for reflection or choice, and thence it is called miserabile depositum; (2) voluntary, which arises from the mere consent and agreement of the parties. The common law has made no such division. There is another class of deposits, called involuntary, which may be without the assent, or even knowledge of the depositor; as lumber, &c., left upon another's land by the subsidence of a flood or unusual tide, and goods lodged in a similar manner by a whirlwind.

The civilians again divide deposits into simple deposits, made by one or more persons having a common interest, and sequestrations, made by one or more persons, each of whom has a different and adverse interest in controversy touching it; and these last are of two sorts, conventional, or such as are made by the mere agreement of the parties, without any judicial act; and judicial, or such as are made by order of a court in the course of some proceeding.

There is another class of deposits called irregular, as when a person, having a sum of money which he does not think safe in his own hands, confides it to another, who is to return to him, not the same money, but a like sum, when he shall demand it. There is also a quasi deposit, as where a person comes lawfully to the possession of another person's property, by finding it; and a special deposit of money or bills in a bank, where the specific money, the very silver or gold coin, or bills deposited, are to be restored, and not an equivalent.—Story on Bailments, tit. 'On deposits,' chap. ii.

A deposit of title-deeds as a security for the repayment of a borrowed sum of money, constitutes an equitable mortgage. See EQUITABLE MORTGAGE.

Depositary, one with whom anything is lodged in trust, as depository is the place where it is put. The obligation on the part of the depositary is, that he keep the thing with reasonable care, and, upon request, restore it to the depositor, or otherwise deliver it, according to the original trust.

Deposition, death; depriving a person of a dignity, &c.; also the act of giving public testimony; evidence put down in writing by way of answer to interrogatories, exhibited for that purpose.

It is an incontrovertible rule at common law, that when the witness himself may be produced, his deposition cannot be read, for it is not the best evidence. But it may be read not only where it appears that the witness is actually dead, but in all cases where he is dead for all purposes of evidence; as where diligent search has been made for the witness and he cannot be found; where he resides in a place beyond the jurisdiction of the court; or where he has become lunatic or attainted. See DE BENE ESSE; PERPETUATE TESTIMONY, BILLS TO. As to depositions in criminal proceedings, see 7 Geo. IV. c. 65; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42.

Depositor, one who makes a deposit.

De prærogativâ regis, the statute 17 Edward II. st. 1, which enacts, in affirmance of the common law, that the king shall have ward of the lands of natural fools, taking the profits, without waste or destruction, and shall find them necessaries; and after the death of such idiots, he shall render the estate to the heirs, in order to prevent such idiots from aliening their lands, and their heirs from being disinherited.

Deprivation, taking away from a clergyman his patronage, vicarage, or other spiritual promotion or dignity, either, first, by sentence declaratory in the proper court for fit and sufficient causes; such as attainder for treason or felony, or conviction of other infamous crime; for heresy, infidelity, gross immorality, and the like; or for farming or trading contrary to law, after two former convictions for the same offence; or, secondly, in pursuance of divers penal statutes, which declare the benefice void, for some nonfeasance or neglect, or else some malfeasance or crime, as for simony; for maintaining any doctrines in derogation of the sovereign's supremacy, or of the thirty-nine articles, or of the book of common prayer; for neglecting to read the liturgy and articles in the church, and to declare assent to the same within two months after induction; or for using any other form of prayer than the liturgy of the Church of England, or for continued neglect, after order of the bishop followed by sequestration, to reside on the benefice, in all which and similar cases the benefice is ipso facto void, without any formal sentence of deprivation.—3 Step. Com. 37.

Deputy [fr. député, Fr.; from deputatus, Lat.], one who governs and acts instead of another, or who exercises an office, &c. in another man's right. A deputy cannot be appointed unless the grant of the office authorises such appointment, as where it is to one to exercise by deputy, &c. By 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, every sheriff is directed to appoint a sufficient deputy, having an office within a mile of the Inner Temple Hall, for the receipt of writs, granting warrants thereon, making returns thereto, and accepting all rules and orders made as to the execution of any process or writ directed to the sheriff. As to the appointment of deputy recorder, see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 89, s. 7.

A deputy differs from an assignee, in that an assignee has an interest in the office itself, and does all things in his own name, for whom his grantor shall not answer, except in special cases; but a deputy has not any interest in the office, and is only the shadow of the officer in whose name he acts. A deputy cannot make a deputy.—9 Rep. 49.

There is a distinction in doing an act by an agent and by a deputy, whom the law deems such. An agent can only bind his principal when he does the act in the name of the principal. But a deputy may do the act in his own name, and sign his own name, and the principal will be thereby bound, for a deputy has, in law, the whole power of his principal.

Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 84.

Deputy Steward, a steward of a manor may depute, or authorize another to hold a court; and the acts done in a court so holden will be as legal as if the court had been holden by the chief steward in person. So an under-steward or deputy may authorise another as sub-deputy, pro hâc vice, to hold a court for him; such limited authority not being inconsistent with the rule delegatus non potest delegare.

This deputy or under-steward may be appointed either in writing or by parol, although the appointment of the chief steward should not contain an express authority for that purpose.

De quibus sur disseisin, a writ of entry now abolished.

Der [fr. dar, Brit,], water.

Deraign, or Dereyn [fr. derationare, Lat.; deraigner, or deragner, Fr.], to confound, to displace, also to prove.—Glanv. l. 2, c. iii. Also to justify, or refuse to clear one from, an accusation.

De rationabili bonorum parte, a writ, anciently given to the wife and children of a man, to recover their reasonable parts of his goods, which he could not bequeath away from them; a custom now utterly abolished, for a man has a full power of disposition over his goods and chattels.

Derelict Lands, those suddenly left by the sea, as when the sea shrinks back below the usual water-mark. Vessels forsaken at sea are called derelict ships.

Derivativa potestas non potest esse major primitivâ.—Noy; Wing. 66.—(The derivative power cannot be greater than the primitive.)

Derivative Conveyances, secondary deeds, which presuppose some other conveyance primary or precedent, and only serve to enlarge, confirm, alter, restrain, restore, or transfer the interest granted by such original conveyance. See DEED.

Derogation, the act of weakening or restraining a former law or contract.

Derogatory-clause in a person's will, a sentence or secret character inserted by the testator, of which he reserves the knowledge to himself, with a condition that no will he may make thereafter should be valid, unless this clause be inserted word for word. This is done as a precaution to guard against later wills being extorted by violence, or otherwise improperly obtained. By the law of England such a clause would be void as tending to make the will irrevocable.

Descender, writ of formedon in, an abolished process.—F. N. B. 21.

Descent, one of the two chief methods of acquiring an estate in lands. It is the hereditary succession of property vested in a person by the operation of law, i. e. by his right of representation as heir-at-law. It is defined, in the interpretation clause of the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, as 'the title to inherit lands by reason of consanguinity, as well where the heir shall be an ancestor or collateral relation as where he shall be a child or other issue.' See CANONS OF INHERITANCE.

Descent cast, the devolving of reality upon the heir on the death of his ancestor intestate. It does not take away or defeat a right of entry or action after 31st December, 1833.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Desertion, the criminal offence of abandoning the naval or military service without license. See the Annual Mutiny or Marine Mutiny Acts; also, an abandonment of a wife or children. By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 16, a sentence of judicial separation may be obtained either by the husband or wife on the ground of desertion, without cause, for two years and upwards, and see s. 21, as to orders for the protection of the property of wives deserted by their husbands. See also 21 & 22 Vict. c. 108, s. 8.

Designatio justiciariorum est à rege; jurisdictio vero ordinaria à lege.—4 Inst. 74.—(The appointment of justices is by the king, but their ordinary jurisdiction by the law.)

Designatio personæ, the description of a person or a party to a deed or contract.

Designatio unius est exclusio alterius, et expressum facit cessare tacitum.—Co. Litt. 210.—(The appointment of one is the exclusion of another, and that which is expressed makes that which is understood to cease.)

Designs, copyright in. These productions of genius, whether ornamental or useful, are protected by statute. See COPYRIGHT.

De similibus ad similia eâdem ratione procedendum est.—(From like to like we are to proceed by the same rule.)

De similibus idem est judicium.—7 Co. 18.—(In like cases the judgment is the same.)

De son tort (of his own wrong), executor. If a stranger take upon himself to act as executor, without any just authority (as by intermeddling with the goods of the deceased, and many other transactions), he is called in law an executor of his own wrong, de son tort, and is liable to all the trouble of an executorship, without any of the profits or advantages; but the doing of acts of necessity or humanity, as locking up the goods or burying the corpse of the deceased, will not amount to such an intermeddling as will charge a man as executor of his own wrong. Such an one cannot bring an action himself in right of the deceased; but actions may be brought against him. And in all actions by creditors against such an officious intruder he shall be named as executor generally; for the most obvious conclusion which strangers can form of his conduct is, that he has a will of the deceased wherein he is named executor, but has not yet taken probate thereof. He is chargeable with the debts of the deceased so far as assets come to his hands; and, as against creditors in general, he is allowed all payments made to any other creditor in the same or a superior degree, himself only excepted. And though as against the rightful executor or administrator he cannot plead such payment, yet it shall be allowed him in mitigation of damages; unless, perhaps, upon a deficiency of assets, whereby the rightful executor may be prevented from satisfying his own debt.—1 Wms. Ex. 225-240.

Despacheurs, persons appointed to settle cases of average.

Desperate debt, a hopeless debt; an irrecoverable obligation.

Despitus, a contemptible person.

Desponsation, the act of betrothing persons to each other.

Despot [fr. δεσπότης, Gk., a governor, a ruler], an absolute prince; one who governs with unlimited authority. The word in its origin signified the same with the Latin herus, and the English master. The Emperor Alexius, surnamed the Angel, created the dignity of despot, and made it the first after that of emperor, above that of Augustus, Sebastocrator, or Cæsar. The despots were usually the emperor's sons or sons-in-law, and their colleagues or co-partners in the empire, as well as their presumptive heirs. Under the successors of Constantine the Great the title of Despot of Sparta was given to the emperor's son or brother, who had the city of Sparta, or Lacedæmon, by way of appennage. Despot is at present a title of quality given to the princes of Wallachia, Servia, and some of the neighbouring countries.—Encyc. Lond.

Despotism, absolute power.

Desrenable [Fr.], unreasonable.

Destitute wayfarers, as to relief of, see 11 & 12 Vict. c. 110, ss. 1, 10; and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103, s. 2.

Desubito, to weary a person with continual barkings, and then to bite, provided against by old laws.—Leg. Alured, 26.

Desuetude, that which is obsolete.

Detachiare, to seize or take into custody another person's goods, &c. by attachment or other process of law.—Cowel.

Detainer, forcible. See Forcible Entry.

Detainer, unlawful. The wrongful keeping of a person's goods, although the original taking may have been lawful. As if I distrain another's cattle, damage feasant, and before they are impounded he tenders me sufficient amends; now, though the original taking was lawful, my subsequent detention of them after tender of amends, is not lawful, and he shall have an action of replevin against me to recover them, in which he shall recover damages for the detention, and not for the caption, because the original taking was lawful.—3 Step. Com. 539.

Detainer, writ of, one of the five forms of process prescribed by the 2 Wm. IV. c. 39, s. 1, for the commencement of a personal action against a person already in the prison of one of the courts. Superseded by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 1, 2.

A process lodged with the sheriff against a person in his custody is called a detainer; the officer, therefore, always searches the sheriff's office to see if there be any detainers lodged there against a person in his custody, before he discharges him.

De tallagio non concedendo, 34 Edw. I. st. 4. See 2 Reeves, 104.

Determinable freeholds, estates for life, which may determine upon future contingencies before the life for which they are created expires. As if an estate be granted to a woman during her widowhood, or to a man until he be promoted to a benefice; in these and similar cases, whenever the contingency happens—when the widow marries, or when the grantee obtains a benefice—the respective estates are absolutely determined and gone. Yet, while they subsist, they are reckoned estates for life; because the time for which they will endure being uncertain, they may by possibility last for life, if the contingencies upon which they are to determine do not sooner happen.—2 Bl. Com. 121.

Detinet (he detains), a species of action of debt, which lies for the specific recovery of goods, under a contract to deliver them.—1 Reeves, 159.

Detinue, a personal action at law arising ex delicto. It may be maintained by one who has either an absolute or a special property in goods against another, who is in actual possession, either by delivery or finding, &c. of such goods, and refuses to re-deliver them. The plaintiff seeks to recover the goods in specie, or in failure thereof the value, and also damages for the detention.

The grounds of the action are: (1) a property in the plaintiff, either absolute or special (at the time of action brought) in personal goods, which are capable of being ascertained; (2) a possession in the defendant by bailment, finding, &c.; (3) an unjust detention on the part of the defendant.—1 Selw. N. P. 660.

As to the actual recovery of a chattel detained, see C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 78, and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 2.

Detinuit (he detained).

Detratari, to be torn in pieces by horses.—Fleta, l. 1, c. xxxvii.

Detunicare, to discover or lay open to the world.—Matt. Westm. 1240.

Deus solus hæredem facere potest non homo.—Co. Litt. 7.—(God alone, and not man, can make an heir.)

Devadiatus, or Divadiatus, an offender without sureties or pledges.

Devastavit (he has wasted), a devastation or waste of the property of a deceased person, by an executor or administrator by extravagance or misapplication of the assets, for which he is liable, as the creditors or legatees cannot be prejudiced by his misconduct.—2 Wm. Exs. 1629, et seq.

Devenerunt, an obsolete writ, heretofore directed to the escheator on the death of the heir of the king's tenant, under age and in custody, commanding the escheator that, by the oaths of good and lawful men, he inquire what lands and tenements, by the death of the tenant, came to the king.—Dyer, 860.

De ventre inspiciendo, writ, an original process issuing out of Chancery on petition, for the security of the next heir (i. e. verus hæres, not hæres apparens), or on behalf of a tenant in tail, or hæres factus as a devisee in fee, in tail, or for life, to guard them against supposititious births.

The first writ issued on these occasions is to see whether the widow be with child, and quando paritura; and if the jury (which is composed of men and women, though the search is made by the latter) find her with child, then she is (in strictness) to be removed by a second writ, issuing out of the Common Pleas (where the first is returnable), to a castle (so are the old authorities) where the sheriff is to keep her safely; but it has been held that there is no occasion to execute the writ in that strict manner, provided people of skill have, from time to time, free access to the widow, and may be present at the birth.—1 Mad. Chan. 11.

There does not exist an analagous writ in order to protect the succession to personal estate against such a fraud. The method would then be to try the legitimacy of the child after its birth.

Devest, or Divest [fr. de and vestis, Lat.], to deprive, to take away; opposite to invest, which is to deliver possession of anything to another.

Devil on the neck, an instrument of torture, formerly used by the Papists to extort confessions, &c. It was made of several irons, which were fastened to the neck and legs, and wrenched them together so as to break the back.—Cowel.

Devisable, capable of being devised.

Devisavit vel non. An issue sent from the Court of Chancery to a court of law, to try the validity of a paper asserted and denied to be a will disposing of real estate, to ascertain whether or not the testator did devise, or whether or not that paper was his will.

Devise [fr. deviser, Fr., to sort into parcels], a gift of lands, &c. by a last will and testament. The giver is called the devisor, the person to whom the lands are given, the devisee.

Devoire [Law Fr.], a duty; a tax of custom.

Devonshiring. See DENSHIRING.

Deuterogamy [fr. δεύτερος, Gk., second, and γάμος, marriage], a second marriage.

Dewan, Duam, place of assembly; native minister of the revenue department; and chief justice in civil causes, within his jurisdiction; receiver-general of a province. This term is also used to designate the principal revenue servant under a European collector, and even of a Zemindar. By this title the East India Company were receivers-general of the revenues of Bengal under a grant from the Great Mogul.—Indian.

Dewanny, Duannee, the office or jurisdiction of a Dewan.

Dewanny. Court of Adawlut. A court for trying revenue and other civil cases.—Indian.

Dextrarius, one at the right hand of another.

Dextras dare, to shake hands in token of friendship; or to give up oneself to the power of another person.—Wats. 332.

Diaconate, the office of a deacon.

Dialectics, that branch of logic which teaches the rules and modes of reasoning.

Diallage [fr. διαλλαγή, Gk., interchange], a rhetorical figure in which arguments are placed in various points of view, and then turned to one point.—Encyc. Lond.

Dialogus de Scaccario. This has generally passed as the work of Gervase of Tilbury; but Mr. Madox thinks it was written by Richard Fitz-Nigel, Bishop of London, who succeeded his father in the office of treasurer, in the reign of Richard I., and was therefore qualified for such an undertaking. This book treats, in the way of dialogue, upon the whole establishment of the exchequer, as a court and an office of revenue; giving an exact and satisfactory account of the officers and their duties, with all matters concerning that court, during its highest grandeur, in the reign of Henry II. This is done in a style somewhat superior to the law-Latinity of those days.—1 Reeves, 220.

Dianatic, a logical reasoning in a progressive manner, proceeding from one subject to another.—Encyc. Lond.

Diarium, daily food, or as much as will suffice for the day.—Du Cange.

Diasperatus, stained with many colours.—Mon. Ang. t. 3, p. 314.

Dica [fr. δέκα, Gk., ten], a tally for accounts.

Dicast [fr. δικαστής, Gk.], an officer in ancient Greece answering nearly to our juryman.

Dice, all games played with dice, except backgammon, are unlawful.—4 Step. Com. 353.

Dictores, arbitrators.

Dictum, an arbitrament; an award.

Diem clausit extremum, a writ which issued out of Chancery to the escheator of the county, upon the death of any of the king's tenants in capite, to inquire by a jury of what lands he died seised, and their value, and who was his next heir.—F. N. B. 251, and see 4 Step. Com. 81.

Dies amoris (the day of love), the appearance day of the Term on the fourth day, or quarto die post. It was the day given by the favour and indulgence of the court to the defendant for his appearance, when all parties appeared in court, and had their appearance recorded by the proper officer.

Dies cedit, the right to the thing is fixed; dies venit, the thing may be demanded. Two expressions in Roman law which signify the vesting or fixing of an interest, and the interest becoming a present one.—Sand. Just. 322.

Dies datus, the day of respite given to a defendant.

Dies dominicus non est juridicus.—Co. Litt. 35.—(A dominical day, i. e. a Sunday, is not a court day.)

Dies fasti, nefasti, et intercisi (business days, holidays, and half-holidays).

For the purpose of the administration of justice all days were divided by the Romans into fasti and nefasti. Dies fasti were the days on which the prætor was allowed to administer justice in the public courts; they derived their name from fari (fari tria verba; do, dico, addico, Ovid, Fast i. 45, &c.); Varro, De Ling. Lat. vi. 29, 30, edit. Muller; Macrob. Sat. i. 16. On some of the dies fasti comitia could be held, but not on all.—Cic. pro Sext. 15, with the note of Manutius.

Dies nefasti were days on which neither courts of justice nor comitia were allowed to be held, and which were dedicated to other purposes. Varro, l. c. According to the ancient legends, they were said to have been fixed by Numa Pompilius, Liv. i. 19. One part of a day might be fastus, while another was nefastus.—Ovid, Fast i. 50.

Dies inceptus pro completo habetur.—(A day begun is held as complete.)

Dies incertus pro conditione habetur.—(An uncertain day is held as a condition.)

Dies juridicus, a court-day.

Dies marchiæ, the day of meeting of English and Scotch, which was annually held on the marches or borders to adjust their differences and preserve peace.

Dies non juridicus, not a court-day.

Diet [fr. dies, Lat., an appointed day, Skinner; or diet, an old German word, meaning a multitude, Junius], a deliberative assembly of princes or estates. The term is principally applied to the general meetings of the states of Germany. The statute of Nottingham, 10 Edw. III. s. 3, relating to excess in diet (de cibariis utendis) is repealed by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 64.

Dieta, a day's journey; a day's work.

Dieu et mon droit (God and my right), the motto of the royal arms, first assumed by Richard I.

Dieu et son acte (the visitation of God), words often used in our law. It is a maxim that the act of God, or inevitable accident, shall prejudice no man, actus Dei nemini facit injuriam.

Diffacere, to destroy.

Difficile est ut unus homo vicem duorum sustineat.—4 Co. 118.—(It is difficult that one man should sustain the place of two.)

Difforciare rectum (to take away or deny justice).

Diffranchisement, the act of taking away the privileges of a city, or a borough town.

Digama, or Digamy [fr. διγαμία, Gk.], second marriage; marriage to a second wife after the death of the first; as bigamy in law is having two wives at once. Originally a man who married a widow or married again after the death of his wife was said to be guilty of bigamy.—Co. Litt. 40 b, n.

Digest, generally a compilation or distribution of a subject into various classes or departments; particularly the Pandects of Justinian in fifty books, containing the opinions and writings of eminent lawyers, digested in a systematical method. See PANDECTS.

Dignitary [fr. dignus, Lat., worthy], a clergyman advanced to a bishop, dean, archdeacon, prebendary, &c. But there are prebendaries without cure or jurisdiction, who are not dignitaries.—3 Inst. 155.

Dignities, a species of incorporeal hereditament, in which a man may have a property or estate. They were originally annexed to the possession of certain estates in land, and created by a grant of those estates; or, at all events, that was the most usual course. And although they are become little more than personal distinctions, they are still classed under the head of real property; and, as having relation to land, in theory, at least, may be entailed by the Crown, within the Statute de Donis; or limited in remainder, to commence after the determination of a preceding estate-tail in the same dignity. See PEOPLE.

Dijudication, judicial distinction.

Dilapidation, decay; a kind of ecclesiastical waste, either voluntary, by pulling down, or permissive, by suffering the chancel, parsonage house, and other buildings thereunto belonging to decay. An action for dilapidations lies, either in the spiritual court by the canon law, or in the courts of common law, and it may be brought by the successor against the predecessor if living, or if dead, then against his executors; and against an alienee, if it were made over to him to defeat the remedy for dilapidations.—13 Eliz. c. 10; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 108, s. 19. See 3 Step. Com. 67.

Dilationes in lege sunt odiosæ.—(Delays in law are hateful.)

Dilatory pleas, a class of defence at common law, founded on some matter of fact not connected with the merits of the case, but such as may exist without impeaching the right of action itself. They are either pleas to the jurisdiction, showing that by reason of some matter therein stated the case is not within the jurisdiction of the court; or pleas in suspension, showing some matter of temporary incapacity to proceed with the suit; or pleas in abatement, showing some matter for abatement or quashing the declaration. These pleas must be verified by affidavit or otherwise, and pleaded within four days from delivery of declaration.—4 Anne, c. 16. They are in general not allowable after a plea in bar. All dilatory pleas, including those in suspension, as well as pleas to the jurisdiction, are sometimes inaccurately classed as pleas in abatement.—Step. Plead. 50; 1 Chit. on Plead. 718.

All declinatory and dilatory pleas in equity are properly pleas, if not in abatement, at least in the nature of pleas in abatement; and, therefore, in general, the objections founded thereon must be taken, ante litem contestatam, by plea, and are not available by way of answer, or at the hearing. And it has been said that pleas of these kinds may be successively pleaded, one after another, in their proper order; that is to say, first, declinatory pleas; secondly, dilatory pleas; and thirdly, pleas in bar. For it has been said, that though no man shall be permitted to plead two dilatories at separate times, nor several bars, because he may plead them all at once, yet, after a plea to the jurisdiction, he may be admitted to plea in bar, because it is consistent with those pleas to plead in bar at the same time.—Story's Eq. Plead. 549.

In criminal cases, a plea in abatement or dilatory plea, is founded on some matter of fact extraneous to the indictment, tending to show that it is defective in point of form; and has principally occurred in the case of a misnomer, i. e. a wrong name or a false addition to the defendant. But see the powers of amendment given to the judges by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, ss. 1, 2, 25.

Diligence, care, of which there are infinite shades, from the slightest momentary thought to the most vigilant anxiety; but the law recognises only three degrees of diligence. (1) Common or ordinary, which men, in general, exert in respect of their own concerns; the standard is necessarily valuable with respect to the facts, although it may be uniform with respect to the principle. (2) High or great, which is extraordinary diligence, or that which very prudent persons take of their own concerns. (3) Low or slight, which is that which persons, of less than common prudence, or indeed of prudence at all, take of their own concerns.

The civil law is in perfect conformity with the common law. It lays down three degrees of diligence, ordinary (diligentia), extraordinary (exactissima diligentia), slight (levissima diligentia).—Story on Bailments, 19.

Diligiatus [fr. de lege ejectus, Lat.], outlawed.

Dilligrout, pottage formerly made for the king's table on the coronation day. There was a tenure in serjeanty, by which lands were held of the king by the service of finding this pottage at that solemnity.—39 Hen. III.

Dimetæ, the ancient Latin name of the people who inhabited Carmarthenshire, Pembrokeshire, and Cardiganshire.

Dimidietas, the moiety or half of a thing.

Diminution, the act of making less, opposed to augmentation. In proceedings for reversal of judgment, if the whole record be not certified, or not truly certified by the inferior court, the party injured thereby, in both civil and criminal cases, may allege a diminution of the record, and cause it to be rectified.

Dimissory Letters, where a candidate for holy orders has a title in one diocese and is to be ordained in another, the proper diocesan sends his letters dimissory directed to some other ordaining bishop, giving leave that the bearer may be ordained, and have such a cure within his district.—Cowel.

Dinarchy [fr. δίς, Gk., and ἀρχή, dominion], a government of two persons.

Diocesan, belonging to a diocese; a bishop, as he stands related to his own clergy or flock.

Diocesan Courts, the consistorial courts of each diocese, exercising general jurisdiction of all matters arising locally within their respective limits, with the exception of places subject to peculiar jurisdiction: deciding all matters of spiritual discipline—suspending or depriving clergymen—and administering the other branches of the ecclesiastical law.—3 Step. Com. 14.

Diocese, or Diocess [fr. diocese, Fr.; diocesi, Ital. and Span.; διοίκησις, fr. διοικέω, to govern, Gk.; diœcesis, Lat.], the circuit of every bishop's jurisdiction; it is divided into archdeaconries, each archdeaconry into rural deaneries, and rural deaneries into parishes.—Co. Litt. 94.

Dioichia, the district over which a bishop exercised his spiritual functions.

Diploma [fr. διπλόω, Gk., to fold double, consisting of two leaves], a royal charter or prince's letters-patent. An instrument given by colleges and societies, on commencement of any degrees. A license for a clergyman to exercise the ministerial function, or a physician, &c. to practise his art.

Diplomacy, a knowledge of the interests of different states, and the policy of foreign courts, &c. by means of ambassadors, envoys, consuls, &c. As to diplomatic relations with Rome, see 11 & 12 Vict. c. 108. Persons holding diplomatic pensions under 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 116, may be elected members of the House of Commons.—22 & 23 Vict. c. 5.

Diplomatics (should not be confounded with diplomacy), the art of judging of ancient charters, public documents or diplomas, &c. and discriminating the true from the false.

It will not be out of place to subjoin here some rules that may serve as guides in the proper selection of historical documents. (1) The authority of any chartulary or public act is preferable to that of a private writer, even though he were contemporary. These public registrars it is always necessary to consult, if possible, before having recourse to the authority of private letters; and a history that is not supported by such public vouchers must in consequence be very imperfect. (2) When public acts are found to accord with the testimony of contemporary authors, there results a complete and decisive proof, the most satisfactory that can be desired, for establishing the truth of historical facts. (3) The testimony of a contemporary author ought generally to be preferred to that of an historian, who has written long after the period in which the events have happened. (4) Whenever contemporary writers are defective, great caution must be used with regard to the statements of more modern historians, whose narratives are often very inaccurate, or altogether fabulous. (5) The unanimous silence of contemporary authors on any memorable event is of itself a strong presumption for suspecting, or even for entirely rejecting, the testimony of very recent writers. (6) Historians who relate events that have happened anterior to the times in which they lived, do not, properly speaking, deserve credit, except in so far as they make us acquainted with the sources whence they have drawn their information. (7) In order to judge of the respective merits of historians, and the preference we ought to give some beyond others, it is necessary to examine the spirit and character of each, as well as the circumstances in which they are placed at the time of writing.—Encyc. Lond.; Kock's Europe, Introd.

Direct, an epithet for the line of ascendants and descendants in genealogical succession.

Director, a superintendent; one who has the general management of a scheme, design, or speculation.

Directors of convict prisons. See 13 & 14 Vict. c. 39; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3.

Directors, persons appointed or elected according to law, authorised to manage and direct the affairs of a corporation or company. The whole of the directors collectively form the board of directors. They are generally invested with certain powers by the acts of the legislature, to which they owe their existence.

Directory statute. The term directory, when applied to a statute which enjoins or forbids the doing of certain acts, is used in two different senses:—

(I.) As opposed to declaratory, i. e. a statute which merely declares what the common law is.—1 Bl. Com. 54 & 86.

(II.) As opposed to imperative. When a statute directs that an act should be done in a specified manner, or authorises it upon certain conditions, if a strict compliance with its provisions is not essential to the validity of the act, it is said to be directory, but if such compliance is essential, it is said to be imperative. See per Lord Mansfield, in R. v. Loxdale, 1 Burr. 447; Dwarris on Statutes, 606.

Dirimant impediments, absolute bars to marriage, which would make it null ab initio.

Disability, incapacity to do any legal act. It is divided into two classes: (1) absolute, which, while it continues, wholly disables the person; such are outlawry, excommunication, attainder, and alienage; (2) partial, as infancy, coverture, idiotcy, lunacy, and drunkenness.

Disabling statutes, acts of Parliament restraining and regulating the exercise of a right or the power of alienation.

Disadvocare, to deny a thing.

Disafforest, to throw open; to reduce from the privileges of a forest to the state of common ground.

Disagreement, the refusal by a grantee, lessee, &c., to accept an estate, lease, &c., made to him; the annulling of a thing that had essence before. No estate can be vested in a person against his will, consequently no one can become a grantee, &c., without his agreement; the law implies such an agreement until the contrary is shown, but his disagreement renders the grant, &c., inoperative. If an infant purchase an estate, he may, on coming to full age, disagree thereto; and if he do not agree thereto, his heirs, after his death, may waive it. If a person of unsound mind purchase an estate, he cannot afterwards disagree thereto himself; but if he does not recover, or after recovery dies without agreement, his heir may disagree thereto. If a feme coverte purchase an estate, her husband may disagree thereto; and if he neither agrees nor disagrees, the purchase is good during the coverture, but after his death, notwithstanding his agreement, the wife may disagree thereto, and so after her death may her heirs, if she does not herself agree thereto. Persons who purchase an estate under duress may disagree thereto when the duress ceases.—See Co. Litt. 2 b, 3 a, 380 b; 3 Preston's Abstracts, 104; 2 Bl. Com. 292; Vin. Abr. [Disagreement.]

Disalt, to disable a person.—Litt.

Disappropriation. See APPROPRIATION.

Disbarring, expelling a barrister from the bar, a power vested in the benches of each of the four inns of court, subject to an appeal to the fifteen judges.

Disboscatio, a turning wood-ground into arable or pasture.

Discarcare, to unlade a ship or vessel.

Disceit. See DECEIT.

Discent. See DESCENT.

Discharged Prisoners' Aid Act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 44.

Discharge, Order of. See ORDER OF DISCHARGE AND BANKRUPTCY.

Disclaimer, a renunciation or a denial by a tenant of his landlord's title, either by refusing to pay rent, denying any obligation to pay, or by setting up a title in himself or a third person, and this is a distinct ground of forfeiture of the lease or other tenancy, whether of land or tithe; and where a tenant for a term of years under a lease delivered up possession of the premises and the lease, in fraud of his landlord, to a person who claimed under a hostile title, and not with the intention that he should hold under the lease, it was held that the term and lease were thereby forfeited. But a qualified denial, as an offer to pay rent, if the claimant, by derivative title, will adduce reasonable evidence of his right, will not necessarily amount to a disclaimer.

A devisee in fee may, by deed, without matter of record disclaim the estate devised, and after such disclaimer has no interest in the estate.—1 Chitty's Gen. Prac. 287.

An executor may, before probate, disclaim the executorship, and the executor of an executor may, before probate of the will of his own testator, disclaim to be the executor of the first testator, but he cannot so disclaim after he has proved the will of his own testator; for he thereby becomes, to all intents, his complete executor, and consequently the executor of the first testator. When an executor is, by the will, appointed trustee of any portion of the testator's personal effects, he cannot, after probate, disclaim the trusts: but where the executor is by the will made trustee of real estate devised to him alone, or to him and other persons in trust, it is considered doubtful whether even after probate he may not disclaim the office of trustee of the real estate.—Watkin's Conv. 438.

A trustee who has not accepted may disclaim, but a conveyance by him of the trust-estate to a co-trustee would amount to an acceptance of the trusts. An estate of freehold may be disclaimed as well by deed as by matter of record, and even by conduct; but a deed is the best evidence of disclaimer.—1 Sander's Uses, 426; 2 Hayes's Introd. 72. The word 'disclaim' is introduced in the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 77, to obviate a question whether a married woman may disclaim.—7 Cru. Dig. app. 12.

It is also a mode of defence in equity where the defendant renounces all claim to the subject of the demand made by the plaintiff's bill. But it can seldom be put in without an answer; for if the defendant have been made a party by mistake, having had an interest which he may have parted with, the plaintiff may require an answer sufficient to ascertain whether that is the fact or not; and if, in truth, it is so, an answer seems necessary to enable the plaintiff to make the proper person a party, instead of the defendant disclaiming. A mere disclaimer, therefore, is scarcely to be deemed sufficient or proper, except where the bill simply alleges that the defendant claims an interest in the property in dispute, without more; for under such circumstances, if he claim no interest, that is a sufficient answer to the allegation.—Story's Eq. Plead. 642.

As to disclaimer of patent. See 2 Step. Com. 34.

Discontinuance, an interruption or breaking off. This happens when he who had an estate-tail made a larger estate of the land than by law he was entitled to do: in which case the estate was good, so far as his power extended who made it, but no further. Finch, L. 190; 1 Rep. 44. The learning relative to discontinuances has now become of no account, as far as future transactions are concerned, not merely in consequence of the abolition of fines, but by the effect of the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, which provides (s. 39) that no discontinuance shall thereafter avail to take away the right of entry. Discontinuance was a wrong so forcible as to take away at once the right of entry; while disseisin, abatement, or intrusion did not, unless followed by a descent-cast, take away that right.

A discontinuance at common law thus arises: If a defendant plead only to part of a declaration, and say nothing as to the remainder, the plaintiff is entitled to sign judgment against him by nil dicit, as to the unanswered part of the declaration. But if the plaintiff demur or reply to the plea, without signing judgment for the part not answered, the whole action is said to be discontinued. A discontinuance is cured, however, after verdict, by the statute of Jeofails, 32 Hen. VIII. c. 30; and after judgment, by nil dicit, confession, or non sum informatus, by 4 Anne, c. 16. And as the entries of continuances are abolished (Rule 31, T. T. 1853), it may become a question in what cases a discontinuance will now amount to error.—Step. Plead. 247.

A rule to discontinue is obtained by a plaintiff, when he finds that he has misconceived his action, or that for some defect in the pleadings, or other reason, he will not be able to maintain it. It is granted only to plaintiffs; even an avowant in replevin cannot have it. The terms are in the discretion of the court, but it is always granted upon payment of costs.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1470.

To entitle a plaintiff to discontinue after plea pleaded, it shall not be necessary to obtain the defendant's consent, but the rule shall contain an undertaking on the part of the plaintiff to pay the costs, and a consent that if they are not paid within four days after taxation, defendant shall be at liberty to sign judgment of non pros.—Rule 23, H. T. 1853.

By the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 159, 'the plaintiff in error, whether in fact or law, shall be at liberty to discontinue his proceedings by giving to the defendant in error a notice, headed in the court and cause, and signed by the plaintiff in error, or his attorney, stating that he discontinues such proceedings, and thereupon the defendant in error may sign judgment for the costs of, and occasioned by, the proceedings in error, and may proceed upon the judgment on which the error was brought.' As to discontinuance in ejectment, see Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, ss. 200, 201.

There is no need of a formal discontinuance of an action before a plaintiff proves his debt, or enters his claim against a bankrupt-defendant, under a bankruptcy, for the proof or entry itself operates as a discontinuance of it.—12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 182.

Discontinuare nihil aliud significat quam intermittere, desuescere, interrumpere.—Co. Litt. 325.—(To discontinue signifies nothing else than to intermit, to disuse, to interrupt.)

Discovert, a widow; a woman unmarried; one not within the bonds of matrimony.

Discovery, revealing or disclosing a matter.

The Courts of Common Law have, until a very recent period, laboured under the infirmity of not being able to compel a litigant in their courts to disclose any fact resting merely within his knowledge, or discover any document in his power or possession, which would aid them either in the enforcement of a right, in the repelling of an unjust demand, or in the redress of a wrong; an infirmity which the equity-judges cured, by compelling such a party to disclose the fact, or discover the document, upon his oath, in his answer to a bill of complaint, filed by the opposite party for the purpose, which bill is, therefore, emphatically denominated a bill of discovery, its nature being an original bill, not praying relief.

The late V. C. Wigram, in his work, entitled 'Points in the Law of Discovery,' epitomised the two cardinal principles on this subject, in the two following propositions:—

(1) It is the right, as a general rule, of a plaintiff in equity to exact from the defendant a discovery upon oath as to all matters of fact which, being well pleaded in the bill, are material to the plaintiff's case about to come on for trial, and which the defendant does not by his form of pleading admit.

(2) The right of a plaintiff in equity to the benefit of the defendant's oath is limited to a discovery of such material facts as relate to the 'plaintiff's case,' and does not extend to a discovery of the manner in which the 'defendant's case' is to be exclusively established, or to evidence which relates exclusively to his case. The book (2nd edit. 1840) quoted above (in which these propositions are numbered 26 Prop. II. p. 27, Prop. III. p. 15, and form the main text for the whole commentary of the book), and the 'excellent work' of Hare, on Discovery, contain a complete exposition of the law on this subject.

Let us take a glance at the requirements necessary to the maintenance of a discovery-suit. It will sometimes be necessary, for the more perfect understanding of the subject, to explain its inseparable practice, although theory and principle are the main discussion of this article.

The bill, then, which initiates it must exhibit such a case as renders the discovery material to the party filing it, in order to support or defend the action, either pending, or about to be commenced without delay, in the Common Law Court. It must also set forth, with reasonable certainty, his legal title and interest, which must be vested in præsenti; a grievance constituting a valid ground for the action or defence; and the description of any documents which may be required; together with the interest of the party, against whom the bill is filed, and the particular matter about which the discovery is sought. The bill, if filed by the defendant or expected defendant-at-law, should pray an injunction to restrain the action-at-law until the defendant in such discovery-suit shall have brought in his answer, and until the further order of the Court of Equity.

It appears that an affidavit is not necessary to accompany the bill, when its object is for a mere discovery without any relief; since this could only hitherto have been obtained in the Court of Chancery.

As to the circumstances, which will justify the defendant in Equity in resisting the discovery sought by the bill, they may be thus briefly enumerated:—

The defendant may file a demurrer to the bill, when it discloses a defect or informality, on these grounds:—

(1) That the case made by the bill is not such as Equity assumes a jurisdiction over to compel a discovery; since it discloses

(a) Proceedings not of a purely civil nature, but of a criminal character.

(b) Proceedings not in controversy in any court, but only before arbitrators.

(c) Proceedings depending in a court, having the power to compel the discovery sought; or (d) Proceedings against public policy, or barred by a statute of limitations.

(2) That the discovery is in aid of a non-sustainable action.

(3) That the bill omits to state whether the action is commenced, or intended so to be.

(4) That the discovery is wholly or partially immaterial.

(5) That the bill is filed by or against persons not being parties to the action to be aided.

(6) That the defendant has no interest in the controversy, but is simply a disinterested witness.

(7) That there is a want of that privity which alone entitles the plaintiff to the discovery sought from the defendant.

(8) That the discovery sought would disclose the defendant's title; and this is a conclusive objection, since to sift the titles of others, from curiosity or malice, cannot be endured, as it would tend to shake the general security of property 'by which method all purchases might be blown up.'

(9) That the discovery may perhaps expose the defendant to a criminal charge, ecclesiastical censure, penalty, or forfeiture, or compel him to self-crimination.

The rule protecting a defendant from such a perilous discovery is founded on an obvious public policy; but it does not apply where a statute compels the discovery, as for instance the Stock Jobbing Act 7 Geo. II. c. 8, s. 2, or the Sworn Brokers Act, 57 Geo. III. c. 60, or where the plaintiff is solely entitled to take advantage of the penalty, or forfeiture, and he has expressly waived it; or where the defendant has stated that he has already incurred the penalty; or where the penalty is the result of a covenant or special agreement; for a man may, by contract, put himself out of the protection given by the rules of the court.—Robinson v. Kitchin, 25 Law Jour. Ch. 354.

(10) That the discovery seeks the disclosure of facts confided to the defendant in his character of counsel, attorney, solicitor, or arbitrator.

(11) That the defendant has equal Equity with the plaintiff, and is, therefore, entitled to be protected from a discovery, which may endanger, disturb, or delay, his present rights, as a purchaser for value without notice of the plaintiff's claim.

(12) That the discovery is sought of official governmental communications or state-documents.

Should any of these objections be not apparent on the bill, the defendant may bring them forward, if they exist, by plea, which is merely a special answer, and in effect suggests that the plaintiff has omitted to state in his bill a fact, which if stated therein would have rendered the bill demurrable. This is also the proper mode of defence, when Equity has no jurisdiction in the matter, or when the plaintiff is laboring under some personal disability, or when he is not entitled to the character in which he sues, or when the discovery sought is merely a matter of legal defence barring the action at law, or when the value of the matter involved is beneath the dignity of the court.

When a demurrer has been filed to the bill, the question raised by it is argued in the first instance.

If the Equity-Judge allow the demurrer, the bill is out of court, and the suit is at an end; but if the demurrer be overruled, this is not a final decision of the suit, but the defendant must then resort to other modes of defence. If a plea be filed to the bill, the court proceeds to adjudicate upon it at once. If the plea is bad in form or in substance, it is set down for argument on these points of law, and if overruled, the defendant is driven to his defence upon some other pleading; but if the plea is held good in form and substance, the plaintiff may then take issue upon its truth, and upon its second hearing the cause will be finally disposed of.

When a defendant cannot evade the discovery sought of him, either by demurrer or plea, or if his demurrer or plea fail upon argument, he should then submit to put upon the file of the court a full and sufficient answer, upon which he will be compellable to produce any documents admitted by him to be in his possession at the trial at Law, without the further aid of the Court of Equity. It must, however, be observed that a defendant by an answer may have the benefit of every possible ground of defence.

This suit, seeking only a discovery from the defendant, never progresses to a hearing before the Court of Equity; and therefore, the bill cannot be dismissed for want of prosecution; since the suit determines with the sufficiency of the defendant's answer. After this event, however, one step can be taken, and that is by the defendant, who may obtain an order as of course for the payment of his taxed costs by the plaintiff, who is bound to pay them. Should, indeed, the suit have become abated, it cannot be revived for the mere purpose of costs.

The deficiencies at Common Law upon the subject of suitor-testimony and disclosure have been in a great measure supplied by statutory authority.

The legislature, seeing how many transactions are effected by the parties alone, no other persons being present, and, therefore, no disinterested testimony relating to it being producible, has very properly exploded the unreasonable maxim, nemo testis esse debet in propriâ causâ, which frequently amounted to a positive denial of justice, and has enacted, that the parties to an action at law shall be competent and compellable to give evidence on the trial of such action—thus admitting litigants to give evidence, the credibility of which is to be decided by a jury.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 2, amended by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 83, as to the husbands and wives of the parties giving testimony with certain exceptions.

As to the discovery of documents, it has now been provided, that whenever an action or other legal proceeding is pending in a superior court of Common Law, such court and any of its judges may, on the application of either of the litigants, compel the opposite party to allow the applicant to inspect all documents in his custody, or under his control, relating to such action or proceeding; and, if necessary, to take examined copies of them, or to procure them to be duly stamped, in all cases in which hitherto a discovery might have been obtained in a Court of Equity, at the instance of such applicant.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 6. Also that, 'upon the application of either party to any cause or other civil proceeding in any of the superior courts, upon an affidavit of such party of his belief that any document to the production of which he is entitled for the purpose of discovery or otherwise is in the possession or power of the opposite party, it shall be lawful for the court or judge to order that the party against whom such application is made, or if such party be a body corporate that some officer to be named of such body corporate, shall answer on affidavit, stating what documents he or they has or have in his or their possession or power, relating to the matters in dispute, or what he knows as to the custody they, or any of them, are in; and whether he or they objects or object (and if so on what grounds) to the production of such as are in his or their possession or power; and upon such affidavit being made, the court or judge may make such further order thereon as shall be just' (The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854—17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 50). This Act also empowers the parties to an action at law to examine one another as witnesses, either upon interrogatories or orally, before the cause is brought to an issue. See ss. 51–57.

Discretio est scire per legem quid sit justum. 10 Co. 140.—(Discretion is to know through law what is just.)

Discount [fr. dis and conté, Fr.], abatement; a sum of money deducted from a debt in consideration of its payment before the stipulated time. The creditor, by receiving his money before it is due, is able to put it out at interest during the interval, and he should therefore only receive such a sum as if put out at interest would produce the amount of the debt when it would become due. It is usually said to be of two kinds; viz. discount of bills, and discount of goods; but they are essentially the same. The rule for calculating discount on correct principles is as follows:—

As the amount of 100*l.*, together with interest on it at the given rate for the given time,
Is to the given sum or debt;
So is 100*l.* to the present worth, or
So is the interest of 100*l.* for the given time
To the discount of the given sum.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

The usual method of allowing discount, by deducting from the amount of the debt the interest which it would produce at the given rate during the given time, is inaccurate. The true discount for any given sum, for any given time, is such a sum as would, if put out at interest in that time, amount to the interest of the sum to be discounted; the proper discount, therefore, to be received for the immediate advance of 100*l.* due twelve months hence, is not 5*l.* but 4*l.* 15*s.* 2½*d.*, for this sum will, at the end of the year, amount to 5*l.*, which is what the 100*l.* would have produced.

Discussion. By the Roman law sureties were not primarily liable to pay the debt for which they became bound as sureties; but were liable only after the creditor had sought payment from the principal debtor, and he had failed to pay. This was called the benefit or right of discussion. Under those systems of jurisprudence which adopt the Roman law, and under the present law of France, the rule is similar; and the obligation contracted by the surety with the creditor is, that the latter shall not proceed against him until he has first discussed the principal debtor, if he is solvent. This right the surety enjoys, as the beneficium ordinis vel excussionis. And, again, if other persons are joined with him in the obligation as sureties, he is not in the first instance to be proceeded against for the whole debt, but only for his share of it, if his co-sureties and co-obligees are solvent. This is commonly known as the benefit of division, or beneficium divisionis. If the suit should be brought in a different country from that where the contract or obligation is made, the right of discussion or division would still belong to the surety, as an incident to his contract, although it did not exist by the law of the place where the suit was brought (lex fori). The converse proposition would be equally true. The same rules as to the lex loci contractûs applies to the lien of a vendor, upon a real estate sold for the payment of the purchase money, according to the law of England; the lien given for the purchase money upon goods or merchandise sold, by the civil law and by the law of some modern countries; the right of stoppage in transitu of the vendor of goods, in case of the insolvency of the purchaser in the course of the transit; the lien of the holder of a bottomry bond on the thing pledged; the lien of mariners on the ship for their wages; the priority of payment in rem, which the law sometimes attaches to peculiar, debts or to particular persons. In these and like cases, where the lien or privilege is created by the lex loci contractûs, it will generally, although not universally, be respected and enforced in all places where the property is found, or where the right can be beneficially enforced by the lex fori. And on the other hand, where the lien or privilege does not exist in the place of the contract, it will not be allowed in another country, although the local law, where the suit is brought, would otherwise sustain it.—Story's Confl. of Laws, 456.

Dismissal of Bill. A bill in equity may be dismissed by the court at the hearing. Also by the plaintiff before decree, when he is not able to prosecute his suit effectually, either as against all the defendants, or as against such of them as he thinks he can dispense with. After decree the bill can only be dismissed upon re-hearing or appeal; and by the defendant either for want of prosecution, or upon an abatement of the suit by the death of the plaintiff or otherwise.—Smi. Eq. Pr. 364.

Dismortgage, to redeem from mortgage.

Disparagement [fr. dis, apart, and par, Lat., equal], the matching an heir in marriage under his degree or against decency.—Co. Litt. 107.

Dispark, to throw open a park, to set at large.

Dispatches [fr. despercher, Fr., to send away quickly, to discharge], a packet of letters, &c. sent by a public officer on some affair of state or public business.

Dispauper, when a person by reason of his poverty is admitted to sue in formâ pauperis, and afterwards, before the suit be ended, acquires any lands or personal estate, or is guilty of anything whereby he is liable to have this privilege taken from him, then he loses the right in formâ pauperis, and is said to be dispaupered.

Dispensation, an exemption from some law, a permission to do something forbidden, an allowance to omit something commanded.

Dissection. The anatomical examination of a dead body. It is regulated by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 75, 'An Act for regulating Schools of Anatomy.' The 16th section repeals so much of 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, as authorised the dissection after execution of the body of a person convicted of murder.

Disseise, to dispossess, to deprive.

Disseisee, a person turned out of possession.

Disseisin [fr. dissaisin, Fr.], a wrongful putting out of him that is seised of the freehold, not, as in abatement or intrusion, a wrongful entry, where the possession was vacant; but an attack upon him who is in actual possession, and turning him out; it is an ouster from a freehold in deed, as abatement and intrusion are ousters in law.—3 Step. Com. 502.

Disseisinam satis facit, qui uti non permittit possessorem, vel minus commode, licet omnino non expellat.—Co. Litt. 331.—(He makes disseisin enough who does not permit the possessor to enjoy, or makes his enjoyment less beneficial, although he does not expel him altogether.)

Disseisor, a person who unlawfully puts another out of his land.

Disseisoress, a woman who unlawfully puts another out of his land.

Dissenters, Protestant seceders from the Established Church, formerly denominated Nonconformists, and descended from the Puritans.

They are usually divided into the four denominations of Presbyterians, Independents, Methodists, and Baptists; but as to Church government, the Baptists are Independents. With respect to the penal laws, which tend to the enforcement of legal uniformity, they are either abrogated or made subject to important relaxations or exceptions. The 19 Geo. III. c. 44, provides that any dissenting preachers or teachers may keep schools or instruct youth; the 9 Geo. IV. c. 17, repealed the Corporation and Test Acts, and a new form of declaration substituted in lieu of taking the Sacrament. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 45, provides for meeting-houses or chapels founded for dissenters; and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 59, protects them from molestation. See 18 & 19 Vict. c. 81; and 3 Step. Com. 54, et seq.

Dissignare, to break open a seal.

Dissimilium dissimilis est ratio.—Co. Litt. 191.—(Of dissimilars the rule is dissimilar.)

Dissolution, the act of breaking up an assembly; loosening anything compacted or united. A partnership may be dissolved either by a proper notice, or effluxion of time, as agreed upon in the articles of partnership, or by death, marriage, lunacy, bankruptcy, insolvency, or decree in equity, &c.—Story on Partnership, 383. As to dissolution of Railway Companies, see 9 & 10 Vict. c. 28; and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 83.

A dissolution is the civil death of the Parliament, and is effected in three ways:—(1) By the Sovereign's will, expressed either in person or by representation, which is a branch of the royal prerogative. (2) By the demise of the Crown. The 7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 15; 6 Anne, c. 7; and 37 Geo. III. c. 127, enact that the Parliament in being shall continue for six months after the death of any king or queen, unless sooner prorogued or dissolved by the successor; that if the Parliament be, at the time of the king's death, separated by adjournment or prorogation, it shall, notwithstanding, assemble immediately; that in case of the demise of the king between the dissolution of a Parliament and the day appointed by the writs of summons for the new one, the last preceding Parliament shall immediately convene for six months, unless sooner prorogued or dissolved by his successor; and that in the event of the king's death on or after the day appointed for assembling the new Parliament, but before it has assembled, then the new Parliament shall, in like manner, convene for six months, unless sooner prorogued or dissolved. (3) By length of time, i. e. seven years.—1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 38.

Distrain, to make seizure of goods or chattels by way of distress.

Distrainer, or Distrainor, he who seizes a distress.

Distraint, seizure.

Distress [fr. distringo, Lat., to bind fast; districtio, Mid. Lat., whence distraindre, Fr.], a taking, without legal process, of a personal chattel from the possession of a wrong-doer into the hands of a party grieved, as a pledge for the redressing an injury, the performance of a duty, or the satisfaction of a demand. The power of distress is derived either: (1) from common right—as where a person seised in fee grant out a lesser estate with the reversion to himself, and a reservation of rent or other certain services, the law gives him this remedy for such rent or services without any express provision; (2) from special powers—as where one not being the reversioner, and consequently not able to distrain of common right, may, on granting a lease, reserve to himself by express stipulation the power of distraining. A distress may be made of common right for all rent-service, and by particular reservation for rent-charges, and also for rents-seck since the 4 Geo. II. c. 28, s. 5, extended the same remedy to rents-seck, rents of assize, and chief-rents, and thereby in effect abolished all material distinction between them. With respect to fee-farm-rents, it has been held that distress is not incident to them, unless the case be brought within the 4 Geo. II. c. 28, s. 5.—Bradbury v. Wright, 2 Dougl. 624.

Distress may also be made on cattle damage feasant, for annuities and rent-charges, rates and taxes, amerciaments in a court-baron, penalties and tolls imposed by by-laws, and under the Tithe Commutation Act, 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 71.

Accepting security for the rent, as a bill of exchange, or promissory note, will not take away the right to distrain, for the rent is of a higher nature, and the acceptance of a security of an unequal degree is no extinguishment of the claim. It may be generally stated that so long as the rent is in arrear the landlord has the power of distraining for it, and nothing but payment or tender will take away such power. The right to distrain depends upon an actual demise to the tenant at a fixed rent. All persons seised in fee, who have granted out a lesser estate with a reservation of rent, may distrain for rent in arrear. A mortgagee after giving notice of the mortgage to the tenant in possession under a lease prior to the mortgage, may distrain for the rent in arrear at the time of the notice, as well as for rent which may accrue after such notice, although he was not in the actual seisin of the premises, nor in the receipt of the rents and profits at the time it became due; but he may not distrain for rent due upon a lease made by the mortgagor after the mortgage, unless he has accepted rent from the tenant, or has given him notice to pay rent and the tenant has acquiesced. See Moss v. Gallimore, 1 Smith, L. C. 542. Executors before probate and administrators may distrain, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, ss. 37, 38. Receivers appointed by the Court of Chancery can distrain, and need not apply first to the court for a particular order for that purpose. By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 9, it is enacted, 'that when the reversion expectant on a lease made either before or after the passing of this act, of any tenements or hereditaments of any tenure, shall, after the said 1st day of October, 1845, be surrendered or merge, the estate which shall for the time being confer as against the tenant under the same lease, the next vested right to the same tenements or hereditaments, shall, to the extent and for the purpose of preserving such incidents to, and obligations on, the same reversion, as, but for the surrender or merger thereof, would have subsisted, be deemed the reversion expectant on the same lease.'

All chattels and personal effects found upon the premises may be distrained, whether they belong to the tenant or a stranger, except goods of third persons which happen to be upon the tenant's premises in the way of his trade; goods in the hands of a factor; beasts of the plough; goods and utensils of trade, while there is any other property on the premises, or whilst they are in actual use; cattle and goods of a temporary guest at an inn, &c.; fixtures being part of the freehold; goods in the custody of the law; wearing apparel, if in actual use; and animals, feræ naturæ.

A distress cannot be made in the night, i. e. after sunset and before sunrise (except in the case of cattle damage feasant, otherwise they might escape), nor on the same day on which the rent becomes due; but must be made within six years from its becoming due. The 8 Anne, c. 14, ss. 6, 7, gives a landlord power to distrain, within six calendar months, after determination of the lease, but it must be made during the continuance of the landlord's title or interest, and also during the possession of the tenant. By 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 2, distresses for the recovery of any rent may be made at any time within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make them shall have first accrued; but (by s. 42) no arrears of rent can be recovered by distress, action, or suit, but within six years next after the same shall have become due, &c. It must be made upon the land whence the rent issues, and the whole of what is due should be distrained for at one time. The outer door of the house can in no case be broken open; but if the outer door be open, the person distraining may justify breaking open an inner door or lock, to find any goods distrainable. The distress may be made either by the landlord himself, or by an authorised agent, who is called a bailiff, under a warrant of distress. An inventory of as many goods as are judged sufficient to cover the rent distrained for, and also the charges of the distress, must then be made, which is served personally on the tenant, together with a notice of the fact of the distress having been made, and the time when the rent and charges must be paid, or the goods replevied. When the distress has been thus made, it is always the safer way to remove the goods immediately, and in the notice to acquaint the tenant whither they are removed. In many cases, however, the tenant, for his own convenience, requests the landlord to permit them to remain on the premises, and consents to allow him to retain possession beyond the five days given for replevying; in such cases a written consent should be procured, and some person left in possession of the goods upon the premises. As to the landlord's right of following for thirty days goods fraudulently removed, see 11 Geo. II. c. 19.

The landlord cannot sell the goods distrained before the expiration of the five days, i. e. five times twenty-four hours, allowed by the statute 2 W. & M. sess. 1, c. 5, which five days are inclusive of the day of the sale, but exclusive of the time of the sale; therefore the distress may be removed on the sixth day. Before sale an appraisement must be made by two sworn appraisers; and the sheriff's office should be searched to see if the goods have been replevied. If there be any surplus from the sale, it must be handed over to the tenant. But where the value of the goods distrained is not sufficient to cover the rent, &c., a second distress will be allowed. 17 Car. II. c. 7, s. 4. The expenses of distresses for less than 20*l.* are regulated by 57 Geo. III. c. 93.

The remedies for a wrongful distress are replevin; an action of trespass de bonis asportatis, or quare clausum fregit, for damages; an action of detinue for the thing distrained itself, or trover for its value. The remedy for an irregular distress is an action of trespass, or on the case, for the special damage, 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 19. The proper remedy for an excessive distress is a special action on the case founded upon the statute of Marlborough, 52 Hen. III. c. 21.—Woodfall's Land. and Tenant, by Horn, 347; Smith's Land. and Tenant, by Maude.

Distress infinite, one that has no bounds with regard to its quantity, and may be repeated from time to time, until the stubbornness of the party is conquered. Such are distresses for fealty or suit of court, and for compelling jurors to attend.—3 Bl. Com. 231.

Distresses, pledges taken by the sheriff from those who came to fairs, for their good behaviour: which, at the end of the fair or mercat, were delivered back, if no harm were done.—Scotch term.

Distribution, the act of dealing out to others; dispensation. The Statute of Distributions (sometimes called a Parliamentary Will), 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 10, explained by 29 Car. II. c. 3, enacts, that the surplusage of intestates' personal estate (except of femes covert, the administration and enjoyment of whose estates belong, by the principle of the common law, to their husbands) shall, after the expiration of one full year from the death of the intestate, be distributed in the following manner: one-third shall go to the widow of the intestate, and the residue in equal proportions to his children, or, if dead, to their representatives, that is, their lineal descendants; if there be no children or legal representatives subsisting, then a moiety shall go the widow, and a moiety to the next of kindred, in equal degree, and their representatives; if no widow, the whole shall go to the children; if neither widow nor children, the whole shall be distributed amongst the next of kin, in equal degree, and their representatives; but no representatives are admitted among collaterals farther than the children of the intestate's brothers and sisters. The intestate's mother-in-law takes nothing. The following relations are considered as of the same degree of kindred:—(1) parents and children; (2) grandfather, grandson, and brother; (3) great-grandfather, great-grandson, uncle, and nephew; (4) great-great-grandfather, great-great-grandson, great-uncle, great-nephew, first cousin. The half-blood take equally with the whole blood, in the same degree.—2 Wm. Ex. 1335, et seq. The 19 & 20 Vict. c. 94, abolishes all special local customs concerning the distribution of personal estates of intestates.

Distributive finding of the issue. The jury are bound to give their verdict for that party who, upon the evidence, appears to them to have succeeded in establishing his side of the issue. But there are cases in which an issue may be found distributively, i. e. in part for plaintiff and in part for defendant.—Step. Plead. 91.

District [fr. districtus, Lat.], the circuit or territory within which a person may be compelled to appear.—Cowel. Circuit of authority; province.—Encyc. Lond.

District parishes, ecclesiastical divisions of parishes for all purposes of worship, and for the celebration of marriages, christenings, churchings, and burials; formed at the instance of 'Her Majesty's Commissioners for building New Churches.' See 3 Step. Com. 116, et seq.

Districtione scaccarii. The 51 Hen. III. st. 5, relating to distresses in the Exchequer for the King's debts.

Districtio, a distress, a distraint.

Distringas (that you distrain), anciently called constringas, a writ addressed to the sheriff, and issued to effect various purposes. The cases in which it was used in common law proceedings may be thus stated:—

(1) A distringas to compel appearance, where defendant has a place of residence within England or Wales. This writ is abolished by the C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 24, and the practice provided for by s. 17 substituted in its stead.

(2) A distringas nuper vicecomitem, to compel the late sheriff to sell goods, &c. or to bring in the body, is obsolete.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 637, 658.

(3) A distringas in detinue, a special writ of execution to compel defendant to deliver the goods by repeated distresses of his chattels; or a scire facias might be issued against a third person in whose hands they might happen to be, to show cause why they should not be delivered; and if the defendant still continued obstinate, then (if the judgment had been by default or on demurrer) the sheriff summoned an inquest to ascertain the value of the goods and the plaintiff's damages, which (being either so assessed, or by the verdict in case of an issue) were levied on the goods or person of the defendant.—1 Rol. Ab. 797. See DETINUE. As to Distringas in quare impedit, see QUARE IMPEDIT.

(4) A distringas juratores, a jury process, abolished by C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 104.

In equity, a distringas is issued in these two cases:—

(1) Against a corporation aggregate; the first process to compel appearance is distringas, and on its return, an alias distringas, and then a pluries are issued, and upon the return of the latter, if default is made, an order nisi for a sequestration is obtained as of course, and if no cause shown, the order will be made absolute. 11 Geo. IV. & 1 Wm. IV. c. 36.

(2) When a transfer of stock, or the payment of dividends by the Bank of England is sought to be immediately restrained, then instead of moving or petitioning the Court of Chancery for a restraining order, a distringas may be issued, pursuant to 5 Vict. c. 5, s. 5.

The Consol. Ord. 1860, Ord. xxvii., provides for the mode of obtaining this writ, by directing, that 'any person claiming to be interested in any stock transferable at the Bank of England, standing in the name or names of any other person or persons, or body politic or corporate in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, may, by his solicitor, prepare a writ of distringas pursuant to the form set out in the first schedule to the 5 Vict. c. 5, and may present the same for sealing at the office of the Clerks of Records and Writs, leaving there an affidavit duly sworn by the person, or one of the persons applying for such writ, or his solicitor, that the party is beneficially interested in the stock, which should be particularly described in the affidavit.

'Such writ of distringas, and all process thereunder, may, at any time, be discharged by the order of the court, to be obtained, as of course, upon the petition of the person on whose behalf the writ was issued, or to be obtained upon the application, by motion on notice, or by petition duly served, of any other person claiming to be interested, in the stock sought to be affected by such writ, the court awarding costs according to its discretion.

'Where the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, after having been served with a copy of a writ of distringas, and a notice not to permit the transfer of the stock in such notice and in the said affidavit specified, or not to pay the dividends thereon, receive a request from the person in whose name or names such stock is standing, or some person on his behalf, or representing him, to allow such transfer, or to pay such dividend, the said Governor and Company shall not by force or in consequence of such distringas be authorised, without the order of this court, to refuse to permit such transfer to be made, or to withhold payment of such dividends for more than eight days after the date of such request.'

The effect of this writ is temporary; if, therefore, the person who obtained it wish to continue the restraint upon the transfer, he must either obtain a restraining order, or file a bill against the party interested in the fund, and move for a writ of injunction against the bank, pursuant to 40 Geo. III. c. 36.

Disturbance, annoyance; also the wrongful obstruction of the owner of an incorporeal hereditament in its exercise or enjoyment. There are five sorts of this injury, viz. disturbance of (1) franchise, (2) common, (3) ways, (4) tenure, and (5) patronage.—3 Step. Com. 526–530.

Disturbance of Divine worship, an offence against the public peace. See 3 Step. Com. 42 and 58.

Disturber. If a bishop refuse or neglect to examine or admit a patron's clerk, without reason assigned or notice given, he is styled a disturber by the law, and shall not have any title to present by lapse; for no man shall take advantage of his own wrong.—2 Bl. Com. 278.

Dittay, the manner of proceeding against a criminal in the Court of Justiciary.—Scotch Law.

Ditto [fr. detto, Ital.], the aforesaid, or the same.

Divan [an Arabic or Turkish word], a council-room, a state-chamber, a raised bench or cushion at the upper end of a Turkish room upon which the principal persons sit.

Diversité des Courtes, a law treatise supposed to be written in the early part of the 16th century.

Diversity, a plea by a prisoner in bar of execution, alleging that he is not the same who was attainted; upon which a jury is immediately impanelled to try the collateral issue thus raised, viz. the identity of the person; and not whether he is guilty or innocent, for that has been already decided.—4 Bl. Com. 396.

Dives costs, full, as contradistinguished from pauper costs.

Divest. See DEVEST.

Divide et impera, cum radix et vertex imperii in obedientium consensu rata sunt.—4 Inst. 35. (Divide and govern, since the foundation and crown of empire are established in the consent of the obedient.)

Dividend, a share, the part allotted in division; the interest paid on the public funds; the division of a bankrupt's or insolvent's effects.

Dividenda, an indenture; one part of an indenture.—Old Records.

Divinatio, non interpretatio, est, quæ omnino recedit à literâ.—Bacon.—(It is guessing, not interpretation, which altogether departs from the letter.)

Divine Service, tenure by, an obsolete holding, in which the tenants were obliged to perform some special divine services, as to sing so many masses, to distribute such a sum in alms, &c.—Litt. s. 137.

Divisa, a device, award, or decree; also a devise; also bounds or limits of division of a parish or farm, &c.—Cowel. Also a court held on the boundary, in order to settle disputes of the tenants.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Divisibilis in semper divisibilis.—(A thing divisible may be for ever divided.)

Divorce [fr. divortium, Lat.], the dissolution of the marriage contract; it is either total, by dissolution of the marriage, or partial, by judicial separation. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 108.

As the ancient Hebrews paid a stipulated price for the privilege of marrying, they seemed to consider it the natural consequence of making a payment of that kind that they should be at liberty to exercise a very arbitrary power over their wives, and to renounce or divorce them whenever they chose. This state of things, as Moses himself clearly saw, was not equitable as respected the woman, and was very often injurious to both parties. Finding himself, however, unable to overrule feelings and practices of very ancient standing, he merely annexed to the original institution of marriage a very serious admonition to this effect: viz. that it would be less criminal for a man to desert his father and mother than, without adequate cause, to desert his wife. He also laid a restriction upon the power of the husband so far as this, that he would not permit him to repudiate the wife without giving her a bill of divorce. He further directed that the husband might receive the repudiated wife back, in case she had not, in the meanwhile, been married to another person.

He had liberty to divorce her if he saw in her the nakedness of a thing. The meaning of this expression, however, was sharply contested in the later times of the Jewish nation. The school of Hillel contended that the husband might lawfully put away the wife for any cause, even the smallest. The mistake committed by the school of Hillel in taking this ground was, that they confounded moral and civil law. It is true, as far as the Mosaic statute or the civil law was concerned, the husband had a right thus to do; but it is equally clear that the ground of legal separation must have been, not a trivial, but a prominent and important one, when it was considered that he was bound to consult the rights of the woman, and was amenable to his conscience and his God. The school of Shammai explained the phrase 'nakedness of a thing' to mean actual adultery. This interpretation of the phrase gives to the law a moral aspect, and assigns a reason, as the ground of divorce, of the truest moral nature; but the truth is that the phrase, in itself considered, will not bear this interpretation, and the law, beyond question, was designed to be merely a civil and not a moral one.—Jahn's Bib. Antiq. c. x., s. 160.

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, the Court for, a tribunal recently established by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, amended by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 108, 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 144, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 81.

Divortium dicitur à divertendo, quia vir divertitur ab uxore.—Co. Litt. 235.—(Divorce is called from divertendo, because a man is diverted from his wife.)

Doab, or Doowab, any tract of country included between two rivers.—Indian.

Do, ut des (I give, that you may give).

Do, ut facias (I give, that you may perform).

Dock [fr. docke, Fle., a birdcage], the place or cage in a court of criminal law in which a prisoner is placed during his trial.

Docket, Docquet [fr. tocyn, W., a slip or ticket], or Dogged, a list; a brief writing on a small piece of paper or parchment, containing the effect of a greater writing; a register. As to the docquet of a decree in Chancery, see Smith's Ch. Pr. 469.

Doctor and Student. Saint Germain is an author who gained considerable note in the reign of Henry VIII. by this famous book. The first dialogue of this work came out in 1518, in Latin, with the following title, 'Dialogus de Fundamentis Legum Angliæ et de Conscientiâ.' The second dialogue was printed in English, in 1530, and the next year there appeared a translation of the first dialogue. Both afterwards passed several editions, under the title of 'Doctor and Student.' The 'Doctor and Student' consists of two dialogues between a doctor of divinity and a student of the common law. These contain discussions on the grounds of our law, and where objections had been stated to some of its rules and maxims, it is endeavoured to reconcile them with reason and good conscience. The whole is treated in a popular way, with the freedom and language of conversation, conveying, by means of objections and their answers, not an unsatisfactory account of many principles and points of the common law.—4 Reeves, c. xxx. pp. 416, 418.

Doctors' Commons, an institution near St. Paul's Cathedral where the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts were held. In 1768 a royal charter was obtained, by virtue of which the members of the society and their successors were incorporated under the name and title of 'The College of Doctors of Laws exercent in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts.' The college consists of a president (the Dean of the Arches for the time being) and of those doctors of laws who, having regularly taken that degree in either of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and having been admitted advocates in pursuance of the rescript of the Archbishop of Canterbury, shall have been elected fellows of the college in the manner prescribed by the charter. By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, ss. 116, 117, power is given to the college to sell their real and personal property and to surrender their charter of incorporation, and upon surrender the college is to be dissolved.

Documents, records, writings, precepts, instructions, or directions.

Doe, John, the fictitious plaintiff in ejectment, whose services are dispensed with since the abolition of the fiction by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76.

Dog [fr. dogge, Icel.; dogghe, Du.] The 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, explained by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60, s. 2, prohibits, under a penalty, the use of any dog for the purposes of draught.

Dog-draw, the manifest deprehension of an offender against venison in a forest, when he is found drawing after a deer by the scent of a hound led in his hand; or where a person has wounded a deer or wild beast, by shooting at him, or otherwise, and is caught with a dog drawing after him to receive the same.—Manwood, p. 2, c. viii.

Dog stealing is punishable, on summary conviction, for the first offence, by six months' imprisonment and hard labour, or fine not exceeding 20*l.* beyond the value of the dog. A second offence is, however, an indictable misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment, and hard labour not exceeding eighteen months, or by both. Similar punishment is provided for persons found in possession of dogs or their skins, knowing them to have been stolen, and a justice may order the restoration of the stolen property to the owner. Corruptly taking money or reward, to aid in the recovery of a stolen dog, is punishable by imprisonment and hard labor for eighteen months. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. xcvi., ss. 18, 19, 20, and 21.

Dogger, a light ship or vessel; dogger-fish, fish brought in ships.

Dogger-men, fishermen that belong to dogger-ships.

Dogma, an ordinance of the senate.—Civil Law.

Doitkin, or Doit [fr. duit, Du.; daoto, Venet., da otto soldi, a piece of eight soldi], a base coin of small value, prohibited by 3 Hen. V. c. 1.

Do law [facere legem, Lat.], to make law.

Dole, the act of distribution or dealing; a portion or lot; a boundary mark, e. g. a post or mound of earth.

Dole-fish, the share of fish which the fishermen yearly employed in the north seas customarily receive for their allowance.

Dole-meadow, one wherein the shares of divers persons are marked by doles or landmarks.

Doles, or Dools, slips of pasture left between the furrows of ploughed land.

Dolg-bote [fr. dolg., Sax., wound, and bote, recompense], a recompense for a scar or wound.

Dolosus versatur generalibus.—2 Co. 34.—(A deceiver deals in generalities.)

Dolus auctoris non nocet successori.—(The fraud of a predecessor prejudices not his successor.)

Dolus circuitu non purgatur. — Bacon. — (Fraud is not purged by circuity.)

Dolus est machinatio, cum aliud dissimulat aliud agit.—Lane, 47.—(Deceit is an artifice, since it pretends one thing and does another.)

Doli capax (capable of crime).

Doli incapax (incapable of crime).

Dolus malus (opposed to dolus bonus, artifice which the law considers honestly employed) means fraud.—Sand. Just. 195.

Domboc, or Dombec [Sax.], dome-book.

Dome, or Doom [Sax.], a judgment, sentence, or decree.

Deme-book [liber judicialis, Lat.], a book composed under the direction of Alfred, for the general use of the whole kingdom, containing the local customs of the several provinces of the kingdom. This book is said to have been extant so late as the reign of Edward IV., but it is now lost. It probably contained the principal maxims of the common law, the penalties for misdemeanors, and the forms of judicial proceedings. This much at least may be collected from the injunctions to observe it which were found in the laws of Edward the Elder, son of Alfred.—1 Bl. Com. 64.

Alfred has generally been styled the legum Anglicanarum conditor, as Edward the Confessor is the restitutor; but, Palgrave says, 'the authentic code of the legislature does not support these assertions. The laws of Alfred abound in valuable regulations of criminal jurisprudence, but they are entirely silent with respect to those institutions which, according to later historians, are to be ascribed to his sound policy and wisdom.'—Rise and Prog. of Eng. Commonwealth, 46. And see 2 Hallam's Mid. Ages, 402.

Domesday, or Domesday-book [liber judiciarius vel censualis Angliæ, Lat.], a most ancient record made in the time of William the Conqueror, and now remaining in the Exchequer fair and legible, consisting of two volumes, a greater and lesser; the greater containing a survey of all the lands in England, except the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Durham, and part of Lancashire, which, it is said, were never surveyed; and excepting Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk, which three last are comprehended in the lesser volume. There is also a third book, which differs from the others in form more than in matter, made by command of the same king. And there is a fourth book kept in the Exchequer, which is called Domesday, and, though a very large volume, is only an abridgment of the others. Likewise a fifth book is kept in the Remembrancers' Office in the Exchequer, which has the name of Domesday, and is the same as the fourth above mentioned. Our ancestors had many dome-books. The question whether lands are ancient demesne or not is to be decided by the Domesday of Wm. I., whence there is no appeal. The addition of day to this Dome-book, was not meant for an allusion to the final day of judgment, as most persons have conceived, but was to strengthen and confirm it, and signifies the judicial decisive record or book of dooming justice and judgment.—Spelman; 1 Reeves, 219.

Domesmen [hence, Æg deme, I judge], judges or men appointed to doom and determine suits and controversies. See DAYSMEN.

Domestics, menial servants, so called from being intra mœnia domûs (within the walls of a house). The contract between them and their masters arises upon the hiring. In this country it is usual to engage domestic servants at a fixed amount of wages per annum. But there is generally no express stipulation as to the time that the service is to last; and when the terms are not otherwise defined, the contract is thus understood, that either party may determine the service at pleasure, upon a month's warning or upon payment of a month's wages. A clerk or person who serves in an office of business, though employed in some sense intra mœnia domûs, is nevertheless no menial within the sense here used. If hired without any mention of time, he is engaged by the year (at least if the wages be payable by the year or quarter), and cannot be turned off at a month's notice, like a common domestic.—2 Step. Com. 243, 247.

Domicellus, a better sort of servant in monasteries; also an appellation of a king's bastard. Encyc. Lond.

Domicile, the place where a person has his home.

By the term 'domicile,' in its ordinary acceptation, is meant the place where a person lives or has his home. In this sense, the place where a person has his actual residence, inhabitancy, or commorancy, is sometimes called his domicile. In a strict and legal sense, that is properly the domicile of a person where he has his true fixed permanent home and principal establishment, and to which, whenever he is absent, he has the intention of returning (animus revertendi).

Two things, then, must concur, to constitute domicile: first, residence; and, secondly, the intention of making it the home of the party. There must be the fact and the intent; for as Pothier has truly observed, a person cannot establish a domicile in a place, except it be animo et facto.

From these considerations and rules the general conclusion may be deduced, that domicile is of three sorts; domicile by birth, domicile by choice, and domicile by operation of law. The first is the common case of the place of birth, domicilium originis; the second is that which is voluntarily acquired by a party, proprio marte; the last is consequential, as that of the wife arising from marriage.—Story's Confl. of Laws, c. iii. The best definition, as applied to an acquired domicile, is—that place in which a man has voluntarily fixed the habitation of himself and family, not for a mere special or temporary purpose, but with the present intention of making a permanent home, until some unexpected event shall occur to induce him to adopt some other permanent home. — Lord v. Colvin, 4 Drew, 366.

It is a clearly established rule that the validity of a will, disposing of personal estate, is regulated by the law of the country in which the deceased was domiciled at the time of his death. The application of this rule to the cases of British subjects dying abroad, and of foreigners dying in this country, leaving wills, gave rise to great inconvenience, to remove which two statutes have been passed.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. cxiv., 'An Act to amend the law with respect to Wills of Personal Estate made by British subjects,' it is enacted that every will, &c., made out of the United Kingdom by a British subject (whatever may be the domicile of such person at the time of making the same, or at the time of his or her death) shall, as regards personal estate, be held to be well executed, for the purpose of being admitted in England or Ireland to probate, and in Scotland to confirmation, if the same be made according to the forms required either by the law of the place where it was made or by the law of the place where the deceased was domiciled when it was made, or by the laws then in force in that part of Her Majesty's dominions where he had his domicile of origin (s. 1). Every will, &c., made within the United Kingdom by any British subject (whatever may be the domicile of such person at the time of making the same, or at the time of his or her death) shall, as regards personal estate, be held to be well executed, and shall be admitted in England and Ireland to probate, and in Scotland to confirmation, if it be executed according to the forms required by the laws for the time being in force in that part of the United Kingdom where the same is made (s. 2). No will, &c., shall be held to be revoked, or to have become invalid, nor shall the construction thereof be altered by reason of any subsequent change of domicile of the person making the same (s. 3). Nothing in this act shall invalidate any will or other testamentary instrument, as regards personal estate, which would have been valid if the act had not been passed, except as such will, &c., may be revoked or altered by any subsequent will, &c., made valid by the act (s. 4). This act shall extend only to wills, &c., made by persons who die after the passing of the act (s. 5).

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. cxxi., 'An Act to amend the law in relation to the Wills and Domicile of British subjects dying whilst resident abroad, and of Foreign subjects dying whilst resident within Her Majesty's dominions,' after reciting that, by reason of the present law of domicile, the wills of British subjects, dying whilst resident abroad, are often defeated, and their personal property administered in a manner contrary to their expectations and belief, and it is desirable to amend such law, but the same cannot be done effectually without the consent and concurrence of foreign states, it is enacted in substance: That whenever Her Majesty shall, by convention with any foreign state, agree that the provisions of the act shall be applicable to British subjects, and to the subjects of such foreign state, Her Majesty, by order in council, may direct, and after the publication of such order in the 'Gazette,' no British subject, resident at the time of his death in the foreign country named in such order, shall be deemed to have acquired a domicile in such country, unless he shall have been resident therein for one year immediately preceding his decease, and shall have made and deposited in a public office of such foreign country (to be named in the order) a declaration in writing of his intention to become domiciled in such country; and every British subject dying resident in such country, but without having so resided, and made such declaration, shall be deemed, for all purposes of testate or intestate succession as to moveables, to retain the domicile he possessed at the time of his going to reside in such foreign country (s. 1). After such convention, order in council, and publication in the 'Gazette,' no subject of such foreign country, who at the time of his death shall be resident in Great Britain or Ireland, shall be deemed to have acquired a domicile therein, unless he have been so resident for one year preceding his death, and have deposited with the Secretary of State for the Home Department a similar declaration (s. 2). The act is not to apply to naturalised foreigners (s. 3).

Domigerium, power over another; also danger.—Bract. l. 4, t, 1, c. x.

Domina, a title given to honorable women, who anciently, in their own right of inheritance, held a barony.

Dominant tenement, a term used in the civil and Scotch law relating to servitudes, meaning the tenement or subject in favor of which the service is constituted, as the tenement over which the servitude extends is called the servient tenement. See Bell; Smith's Dict. of Antiq. tit. 'Servitudes;' and Gale on Easements.

Dominica. See 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 125; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 57; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 57.

Dominica in ramis palmarum, Palm Sunday.

Dominical, that which denotes the Lord's Day, or Sunday.

Dominicide [fr. dominus, Lat., master, and cædo, to kill], the act of killing one's lord or master.

Dominium directum, the dominion of the soil, placed either mediately or immediately in the Crown.

Dominium utile, the possessory title to the soil, or the right to its use and profits, designated by the term seisin. It is the highest interest which a subject can acquire in realty.

Dominium non potest esse in pendenti.—(Lordship cannot be in suspense.)

Dominus. This word, prefixed to a man's name, in ancient times, usually denoted him a knight or a clergyman, a gentleman or a lord of the manor; also a principal in the Roman Law.

Dominus aliquando non potest alienare.—(A lord sometimes cannot alienate.)

Dominus capitalis loco hæredis habetur, quoties per defectum vel delictum extinguitur sanguis sui tenentis.—Co. Litt. 18.—(The supreme lord takes the place of the heir, as often as the blood of the tenant is extinct through deficiency or crime.)

Dominus litis, the master or controller of a suit or litigation; also an advocate who, after the death of his client, prosecuted a suit to sentence for the executor's use.—Civ. Law.

Dominus navis, the absolute owner of a ship.

Dominus non maritabit pupillum nisi semel. Co. Litt. 9.—(A lord cannot give a ward in marriage but once.)

Dominus rex nullum habere potest parem, multo minus superiorem. (The king cannot have an equal, much less a superior.)—1 Reeves, 115.

Domitæ naturæ, tame and domestic animals, as horses, kine, sheep, poultry, &c.

Domitellus, a title anciently given to the French kings' natural sons. See DOMICELLUS.

Dommages interêts [Fr.], damages.

Domo reparandâ, a writ that lay for one against his neighbour, by the anticipated fall of whose house he feared a damage and injury to his own.—Reg. Orig. 153.

Domus conversorum, an ancient house built or appointed by King Henry III. for such Jews as were converted to the Christian faith; but King Edward III., who expelled the Jews from this kingdom, deputed the place for the custody of the rolls and records of the Chancery.

Domus Dei, the House of God, applied to many hospitals and religious houses.

Domus sua cuique est tutissimum refugium. 5 Rep. 92.—(To every one his own house is the safest refuge.)

Dona clandestina sunt semper suspiciosa.—3 Co. 81.—(Clandestine gifts are always suspicious.)

Domus procerum, the House of Lords, abbreviated into Dom. Proc. or D. P.

Donary, a thing given to sacred uses.

Donatio mortis causâ, a gift of personal property in prospect of death; a death-bed disposition; an initiate gift of personalty consummated by the giver's death.

It is derived from the civil law; Justinian's Inst. lib. 2, tit. 7, shows its nature To render this kind of gift valid, it (1) must be made by the giver, when ill, in anticipation of his death; (2) must be intended to take effect only upon his death by his existing illness, for his recovery from that illness, or his subsequent personal revocation of the gift, as by resuming its possession, will defeat it; and (3), a traditio or delivery, either actual or symbolical, of the subject of the gift, or of the instrument which represents it, must be made to the donee, either for his own use, or upon trust for another person, or for a particular purpose. It is to be observed that the gift of a cheque upon a banker is not good as donatio mortis causâ, because it is a gift which can only be made effectual by obtaining payment of it in the donor's lifetime, and is revoked by his death. See Tate v. Hilbert, 2 Ves. Jun. iii. (1793). And so a promissory note not payable to bearer.

The following is a critical case upon this subject:—E. on his death-bed gave his wife a cheque on his bankers for 1,000*l.* A few days afterwards, E. told B., a friend, that he wished to give Mrs. E. 1,000*l.* and had drawn a cheque in her favor upon his bankers, but he was afraid they would not pay the cheque over the counter, and he wished B. to take the cheque, and give Mrs. E. B.'s own cheque in exchange. This was done, and E.'s cheque was paid into B.'s bankers, who received the money two hours before E.'s death. B.'s cheque was post dated. Being crossed, and Mrs. E. not having any banker, the money was not received by her, but after the death of E. she obtained an uncrossed cheque from B., which was duly paid. It was held by the Master of the Rolls that E.'s cheque was given to B. in E.'s life-time in trust for Mrs. E., and that she was entitled to the 1,000*l.*; and by the Lords Justices upon appeal, that it was a good donatio mortis causâ, and that Mrs. E. was entitled to the 1,000*l.* Bouts v. Ellis, 4 De G. M. & G. 249; 17 Beav. 121; and see Tate v. Leithead, Kay, 658. This kind of gift resembles a legacy, but differs from a gift inter vivos, inasmuch as it is ambulatory, incomplete, and revokable during the donor's life; is liable to his debts upon a deficiency of assets; may be made to his wife, and is subject to legacy duty; 36 Geo. III. c. 52, s. 7; and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76. It, however, differs from a legacy, in that it does not need probate, for the donee's title being directly derived from the giver in his life-time, it is not a testamentary act; and it is taken against and not from, the executor, whose assent to its enjoyment is not necessary. It is so vested in the donee, that he has a right, in case of personal estate, to compel the donor's executor or administrator to carry into effect the intention manifested by the person whom he represents; as, for example, if the donation be a bond, to compel the executor or administrator to allow the donee to use his name in suing upon the bond, he being indemnified, for it has become a trust for the donee. See 1 Williams on Executors, 686.

Donatio non præsumitur.—(A gift is not presumed.)

Donatio perficitur possessione accipientis.—Jenk. Cent. 109.—(A gift is perfected by possession of the receiver.)

Donatio principis intelligitur sine præjudicio tertii.—Davis, 75 b.—(A gift of the prince is understood, without prejudice of a third party.)

Donationum alia perfecta, alia incepta et non perfecta; ut si donatio lecta fuit et concessa, ac traditio nondum fuerit subsecuta.—Co. Litt. 56.—(Some gifts are perfect, others incipient or not perfect; as if a gift were read and agreed to, but delivery had not then followed.)

Donative, a species of advowson, when the Queen or any subject by her license founds a church or chapel, and ordains that it shall be merely in the gift or disposal of the patron; subject to her visitation only, and not to that of the ordinary; and vested absolutely in the clerk by the patron's deed of donation without presentation, institution, or induction. This is said to have been anciently the only way of conferring ecclesiastical benefices in England. If the patron once waive the privilege of donation and present to the bishop, and his clerk is admitted and instituted, the advowson becomes presentative, and shall never be donative any more.—2 Bl. Com. 23.

Donatory, the person on whom the king bestows his right to any forfeiture that has fallen to the Crown.—Scotch Law.

Donator nunquam desinit possidere antequam donatarius incipiat possidere.—Dyer, 281.—(He who gives never ceases to possess before that the receiver begins to possess.)

Donatrix, a female giver. See DONOR.

Donee [fr. dono, Lat.], one to whom a gift is made.

Don grant et render, a fine sur, was a double fine, comprehending the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, &c., and the fine sur concessit, and might have been used to create particular limitations of estates; whereas the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, &c., conveyed nothing but an absolute estate, either of inheritance or at least of freehold.—1 Step. Com. 571.

Donis conditionalibus, Statute de, 13 Edward I. c. 1, A.D. 1226, otherwise called Westminster the Second. At the date of this statute a gift to a man and the heirs of his body, provided that if he had no heirs the lands should revert, was construed to give the donee a conditional fee, which enabled him, after issue begotten, to alien the land, and thereby to disinherit the issue, and to deprive the donor of his right of reverter. This interpretation is declared by this statute to be 'contrary to the minds of the givers, and the form expressed in the gift:' wherefore it is ordained that the 'will of the giver, according to the form in the deed of gift manifestly expressed, be henceforth observed; so that they to whom the land is given under such condition, shall have no power to alien the land so given, but that it shall remain unto the issue of them to whom it is given after their death, or shall revert to the giver or his heirs if issue fail, or there is no issue at all. And if a fine be levied hereafter upon lands so given, it shall be void in law.' The intolerable mischief introduced by this statute was got rid of by the fictitious proceedings of common recoveries, which were abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, an act that has completely unfettered these estates.

Donor, a giver, a bestower, one who gives lands to another in tail, &c.

Doom [fr. dom. A.S., judgment; fr. deman, to deem or form a judgment], judicial sentence; judgment.

Doomsday-book. See DOMESDAY-BOOK.

Doorkeeper of the Court of Chancery. His office is abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 27.

Dormant claim, a claim in abeyance.

Dormant partners, those whose names are not known or do not appear as partners, but who nevertheless are silent partners, and partake of the profits, and thereby become partners, either absolutely to all intents and purposes, or at all events in respect to third parties. Dormant partners, in strictness of language, mean those who are merely passive in the firm, whether known or unknown, in contradistinction to those who are active and conduct the business of the firm, as principals. Unknown partners are properly secret partners; but in common parlance they are usually designated by the appellation of dormant partners. They are held responsible as partners until retirement to third parties, although they may not be so chargeable inter sese.—Story on Partnership, 95, 113, 155, 350; Gow on Partnership; Collyer on Partnership.

Dormiunt aliquando leges, nunquam moriuntur.—2 Inst. 161.—(The laws sometimes sleep, never die.)

Dorture [contracted from dormiture], a dormitory; a place to sleep in.

Dos rationabilis vel legitima est cujuslibet mulieris de quocunque tenemento tertia pars omnium terrarum et tenementorum, quæ vir suus tenuit in dominio suo ut de feodo, &c.—Co. Litt. 336.—(Reasonable or legitimate dower belongs to every woman of a third part of all the lands and tenements of which her husband was seised in his demesne, as of fee, &c.)

Dos de dote peti non debet.—4 Co. 122.—(Dower from dower ought not to be sought.)

Dossale, hangings of tapestry.

Dotal, relating to the portion of a woman; constituting her portion; comprised in her portion.

Dotation, the act of giving a dowry or portion; endowment in general.

Dote assignanda, a writ that lay for a widow, where it was found by office that the king's tenant seised of lands in fee, or fee-tail, at his death, and that he held of the king in chief, &c.—F. N. B. 26; Reg. Orig. 297.

Dote unde nihil habet, a writ of dower that lies for the widow against the tenant, who bought land of her husband in his lifetime, whereof he was solely seised in fee-simple or fee-tail, and of which she is dowable.—F. N. B. 147.

Doti lex favet; præmium pudoris est, ideò parcatur.—Co. Litt. 31.—(The law favors dower; it is the reward of chastity, therefore let it be preserved.)

Dotis administratione, admeasurement of dower, where the widow holds more than her share, &c.

Double avail of marriage, the double of the value of the vassal's wife's tocher, due to the superior, when the vassal refused a wife equal to him and offered by the superior; but this was modified to three years' rent of the vassal's free estate.—Scotch Law.

Double complaint, a grievance made known by a clerk or other person, to the archbishop of the province against the ordinary, for delaying or refusing to do justice in some cause ecclesiastical, as to give sentence, institute a clerk, &c. It is termed a double complaint, because it is most commonly made against both the judge and him at whose suit justice is denied or delayed; the effect whereof is, that the archbishop taking notice of the delay, directs his letters, under his authentical seal, to all clerks of his province, commanding them to admonish the ordinary, within a certain number of days, to do the justice required, or otherwise to appear before him or his official, and there allege the cause of his delay; and to signify to the ordinary that if he neither perform the thing enjoined, nor appear and show cause against it, he himself, in his court of audience, will forthwith proceed to do the justice that is due.—Cowel.

Double or treble costs. The true mode of estimating the amount of double costs was, first to allow the successful party the single costs, including the expenses of witnesses, counsels' fees, &c., and then allow him one-half of the amount of the single costs, without deducting counsels' fees, &c. Treble costs consisted of the single costs, half of the single costs, and half of that half. But these costs are repealed by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97, which enacts that the successful party shall be entitled only to full and reasonable costs, to be taxed by the proper officer, which taxation shall, as in ordinary cases, be subject to review.

By 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 18, 'if any party shall sue another in any county court for any debt or other cause of action for which he hath already sued him, and obtained judgment, in any other court, the proof of such former suit having been brought and judgment obtained may be given, and the party so suing shall not be entitled to recover in such second suit, and shall be adjudged to pay three times the cost of such second suit to the opposite party.'

Double, or treble damages, are given, in some cases, by particular statutes, but at common law the damages are always single. They are not reckoned in the same manner as double and treble costs, but arithmetically.

Double entry, a term among merchants to signify that books of account are kept in such a manner that they present the debit and credit of every transaction. It is used in contradistinction to single entry.

Double-distilled equity, the mortgage of an equity of redemption.—Cook v. Gregson, 4 W. R. 582 (1856).

Double insurance, where a person, being fully insured by one policy, effects another on the same subject with other insurers, he may recover the amount of his actual loss against either set of insurers. But as insurance is a contract of indemnity only, the law will not allow him to recover beyond that amount; and if he obtain full satisfaction upon either of his policies, the under-writers upon this are entitled to contribution from the underwriters upon the other. If the policies are of the same date, all the underwriters on the several policies are equally bound to return to the assured the premiums paid by him for the sum insured above the value of the subject matter of insurance in proportion to their subscription, but if of different dates, and the amount insured in the first set of policies is not equal to the value of the subject matter, the underwriters on the last set of policies are alone liable for a return of the premium.—Park on Insurance, 422; 1 Arnold on Insurance, 345, et seq.

Double pleading. This is not allowed either in the declaration or subsequent pleadings. Its meaning with respect to the former is, that the declaration must not, in support of a single demand, allege several distinct matters, by any one of which that demand is sufficiently supported. With respect to the subsequent pleadings, the meaning is, that none of them is to contain several distinct answers to that which preceded it; and the reason of the rule in each case is, that such pleading tends to several issues in respect of a single claim.

The object of this rule being to enforce a single issue upon a single subject of claim, admitting of several issues, where the claims are distinct, the rule is accordingly carried no further than this in application. The declaration, therefore, may, in support of several demands, allege as many distinct matters as are respectively applicable to each. So the plea, though it must not contain several answers to the whole of the declaration, may nevertheless make distinct answers to such parts of it as relate to different matters of claim or complaint; the power, however, of alleging in a plea distinct matters, in answer to such parts of the declaration as relate to different claims, seems to be subject to this restriction—that neither of the matters so alleged be such as would alone be a sufficient answer to the whole. So in the replication and other subsequent parts of the series, a severance of pleading may take place in respect of several subjects of claim or complaint.

A pleading will be double that contains several answers, whatever be the class or quality of the answer. Matter will suffice to make a pleading double though it be ill pleaded, but matter immaterial cannot operate to make a pleading double. No matter pleaded only as a necessary inducement to another allegation will operate to make a pleading double, that is, no matters, however multifarious, will operate to make a pleading double, that together constitute but one connected proposition or entire point.—Step. Plead. 285.

Double rent. By 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 18, it is enacted, that in case any tenant or tenants shall give notice of his, her, or their intention to quit the premises, and shall not accordingly deliver up the possession thereof at the time in such notice contained, the said tenant or tenants, his, her, or their executors or administrators, shall, from thenceforward, pay to the landlord double the rent or sum which he, she, or they should otherwise have paid. A tenant who has given notice, and paid double rent, may quit without fresh notice. The acceptance of single rent, which has accrued due subsequently to the notice, is, it seems, a waiver of the landlord's right to double rent, although it does not necessarily imply that the tenancy should continue. The double rent is recoverable either by distress or action at law. See Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant and Smith's Landlord and Tenant.

Double value. By 4 Geo. II. c. 28, s. 1, it is enacted, that if any tenant or tenants for life, or tenants for years, or persons coming in under or in collusion with them, hold over any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, after the determination of their estates, after demand made, and notice in writing given, for delivering the possession thereof, by the landlord, or the person having the reversion or remainder therein, or his agent thereunto lawfully authorised, such tenant or tenants so holding over shall pay to the person so kept out of possession, at the rate of double the yearly value of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments so detained, for so long a time as the same are detained; to be recovered by action of debt, against which recovery there shall be no relief in equity. See Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant and Smith's Landlord and Tenant.

Double voucher, when a recovery was had, and an estate of freehold was first conveyed to any indifferent person against whom the præcipe was brought, and then he vouched the tenant-in-tail, who vouched over the common vouchee. For if a recovery were had immediately against a tenant-in-tail, it barred only the estate in the premises of which he was then actually seised, whereas, if the recovery were had against another person, and the tenant-in-tail were vouchee, it barred every latent right and interest which he might have in the lands recovered.—2 Bl. Com. 359. Recoveries were abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

Double waste. When a tenant, bound to repairs, suffers a house to be wasted, and then unlawfully fells timber to repair it, he is said to commit double waste.

Doubles, letters-patent.—Cowel.

Doubtful sex. The ancients have several fables founded on the idea of the union of the qualities of the male and female in the same individual. One of the personages who was supposed to be thus endowed was named Hermaphroditus, i. e. Mercurio Venus (for Ἑρμῆς is Mercury, and Ἀφροδιτή is Venus), because, according to the classic fable, he was the son of Mercury by his sister Venus. In the woods where he frequently hunted a nymph called Salmacis lived, who greatly admired him, for he was very beautiful, but a great woman-hater. She often tempted the young man, but was often repulsed, yet she did not despair. She lay in ambush at a fountain where he usually came to bathe, and when he was in the water she also leaped in; but she could not overcome his extraordinary modesty. Thereupon, it is said, she prayed to the gods above, that the bodies of both might become one, which was granted. Hermaphroditus was amazed when he saw this change of his body; and desired that, for his comfort, some other person might be like him. He obtained his request; for whoever washed himself in that fountain (called Salmacis, in the country of Caria) became an Hermaphrodite, that is, had both sexes.—Ovid's Metam. l. 4.

From this modest youth, then, came the term, as applicable to this class of beings. The researches of modern anatomists have completely set at rest the long-debated question of hermaphroditism, in the vulgar acceptation of the word. It is anatomically and physiologically impossible. Yet is it equally well established that many cases of extraordinary mal-formation have occurred, but they are either males, with some unusual organisation or position of the urinary or generative organs, or females with an enlarged clitoris, or prolapsed uterus; or individuals in whom the generative organs have not produced their usual effect in influencing the development of the body. Thus it is evident that instead of combining the powers of both sexes, they are for the most part incapable of exerting any sexual function.

Yet the prejudices of ancient nations seem to have marked these unfortunate individuals as objects of persecution, and to have subjected them to the operation of the most absurd and cruel laws. Diodorus mentions that they were burnt by the Athenians and Romans. At an early period of Roman history a law was enacted that every child of this description should be shut up in a chest and thrown into the sea; and Livy gives an instance, where, on some difficulty with respect to the sex of a newly-born infant, it was directed to be thrown into the sea—tanquam fœdum et turpe prodigium. Livy, xxvii. 37; Eutropius, iv. 36. The Jewish Talmud, we are told, contains many ordinances founded on the apparent predominance of sex. The canon and civil laws have also many enactments concerning them. An old French law allowed them great latitude. It enacted that they should choose one sex, and keep to it. The Hindoo Institutes of Menu provide for singular contingencies.—The Chinese, by Davis, vol. i., p. 221. These absurd notions and practices have now disappeared; but the subject is important on many accounts, as these unusual deviations often render the sex of an individual doubtful, and impose even on professional men.

Our common law on this subject is thus laid down: a monster having deformity in any part of its body, yet if it have human shape, may inherit. And every heir is either a male, or a female, or an hermaphrodite, that is, both male and female. And an hermaphrodite, who is also called androgynus, shall be heir either as a male or female, according to that kind of sex which prevails, and accordingly it ought to be baptized. The same rule—hermaphroditus tam masculo quam fœminæ comparatur secundum prævalescentiam sexus incalescentis—guides in cases concerning tenants by the courtesy.—2 Bl. Com. 247.

M. St. Hilaire remarks that 'legislation, admitting only two grand classes of individuals on whom it imposes duties, and grants different and almost opposite rights, according to their sex, does not truly embrace the entire of the cases; for there are subjects who have really no sex, such as neuter hermaphrodites, and hermaphrodites mixed by superposition; and on the other hand, certain individuals, the bisexual hermaphrodites, who present the two sexes united in the same degree.'—Lancet (n. s.), vol. xii., p. 48.

Dow [fr. do, Lat.], to give or endow.

Dow-purse. A considerable sum of money anciently put into a plate, and presented by the bridegroom to the bride on the wedding night as a sort of purchase of her person.—Old Scholiast. This custom was not peculiar to Rome; it obtained among the Greeks (ὄρθριον δῶρον) likewise, as among the Jews, and is found among many eastern nations. It also prevailed under the name of morgengabe, or morning present, over a great part of the north of Europe, where some faint traces of it are still to be found; and something of the kind was customary in many parts of England, and perhaps is so still under the name of dow-purse.—Stock. Juv. 128.

Dowable, entitled to dower.

Dowager, a widow endowed.

Dowager queen, the widow of the king. As such she enjoys most of the privileges belonging to her as queen consort. It is not treason to conspire her death or violate her chastity, because the succession to the crown is not thereby endangered. No man, however, can marry her without a special license from the sovereign, on pain of forfeiting his lands or goods.—1 Bl. Com. 233.

Dower [fr. dos dotis, Lat., a marriage-gift; dotare, douer, Fr., endow, to furnish with a marriage portion. Dotarium, M. Lat., dotaire, prov.; douaire, Fr., a dowry or marriage provision; douairière, a widow in possession of her portion, a dowager], the right which a wife (not being an alien, unless she be naturalised or made a denizen) has in the third part of the lands and tenements of which her husband dies possessed in fee-simple, fee-tail-general, or as heir in special tail, which she holds from and after his decease, in severalty by metes and bounds, for her life, whether she have issue by her husband or not, and of what age soever she may be at her husband's decease, provided she be past the age of nine years.

The circumstances necessary to create dower are: 1st, marriage, which must be duly celebrated between parties canonically qualified to enter into such a contract, in conformity to the maxim, ubi nullum matrimonium, ibi nulla dos. But if the marriage be dissolvable, and it be not annulled in the lifetime of the husband, the widow will be entitled to her dower. The fact of marriage is proved by the bishop's certificate; 2nd, the husband must be seised in law of the estate out of which the wife claims dower, if the marriage were solemnised on or before the 1st January, 1834, but seisin is since rendered unnecessary by the Dower Act, which shall be presently explained; and 3rd, the wife's estate is consummated by her husband's death.

The original law of dower became among our ancestors, with the increase of alienation, highly inconvenient and obstructive of the free course of conveyances. The legislature, by the 27 Hen. VIII. c. 10 (the Statute of Uses), set about a method of diminishing the evil by providing a jointure in lieu of dower. By effect of this statute no widow can claim both jointure and dower. Jointure, in its strict acceptation, meant a joint estate, limited to both husband and wife; but it is now understood to be a sole estate limited only to the wife. To a strict legal jointure these six things are requisite:—1. The provision for the wife must take effect in possession or profit immediately after the husband's death; 2. It must be for her own life at least, and not pour autre vie, or for any term of years, or for any smaller estate. But the widow will be bound by the acceptance of a precarious interest if she were adult at the time she agreed to the jointure; 3. It must be made to herself and no other in trust for her; 4. It must be made in satisfaction of the whole, and not of part of her dower; 5. It must be either expressed or averred to be in satisfaction of dower; and 6. It may be made either before or after marriage; if made after marriage, she may waive it, and claim her dower, unless it be provided by act of parliament.

But this statutable bar was found highly inconvenient, and recourse was had to many ingenious devices to prevent or defeat dower, but they were all more or less imperfect, and at length gave way to the universal practice of making an artificial form of conveyance, which obtained the name of a conveyance to uses to bar dower. The land was conveyed to such uses as the owner should appoint, and, in default of appointment to him for life, and on the determination of his estate in his lifetime, to a trustee and his heirs for the life of the owner in trust for him, and on the determination of the estate of the trustee, to the owner and his heirs.

An equitable bar of dower was deemed sufficient as between vendor and purchaser; as if a wife contract before marriage to relinquish her dower, either in consideration of a substituted provision, or of marriage, which is valuable in itself, and the highest consideration known to the law.

'The general result is,' as the Real Property Commissioners reported, 'that the right to dower exists beneficially, in so few instances, that it is of little value considered as a provision for widows, and we believe it may be confidently asserted that it is never calculated on as a provision by females who contract marriage, or their friends: yet there is so much of uncertainty in the modes by which dower is prevented, that the actual or possible existence of the right is a very frequent and serious impediment to the transfer of property, and the ascertaining in each case that it does not exist in the widows of any of the persons through whom the property has passed, or procuring the necessary acts to be done for preventing or barring it, where it does or may exist, or securing the future production of the evidence of its non-existence, are the causes of frequent and great delay and expense attending such transfers. Thus where there is no person who can derive any benefit from the law of dower, that law exists often as a clog to the transfer of property, sometimes as a legal pretext for delaying the performance of a contract, and sometimes as the inevitable cause of, or a mischievous temptation to, litigation. Generally we conceive that the right to dower may be said to exist to the injury of proprietors and purchasers, and to a comparatively small extent for the benefit of widows, and to some extent also to their injury, in leading them into, or involving them in, litigation.

'The true principle (as we think) on which the law of dower was originally established, and on which it has a claim on the grounds of justice and policy (without sacrificing the general convenience) to be supported, is, that it should be considered as that interest in an estate of inheritance which the law takes from the heir of a deceased proprietor for the support of his widow, whose claims, in natural justice and policy, appear to stand at least on an equal footing with the claims of the heir; it is so far analogous to the provision which a law established in more modern times has made for the widow out of the husband's personal estate undisposed of by his will. By combining this principle with another of high and perhaps paramount importance, a principle which the law has carefully established almost to its fullest extent, viz. that a right of alienation should be inseparably incident to property of every description, we think that the law of dower may be put on a footing more beneficial on the whole to widows, and free from nearly all the present inconveniences and mischiefs.'

This report led the way to the passing of the Dower Act, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 105, which places a wife's right to dower entirely at the mercy of her husband.

The first section is the glossary clause, and enacts 'that the words and expressions hereinafter mentioned, which in their ordinary signification have a more confined or a different meaning, shall, in this act, except where the nature of the provision or the context of the act shall exclude such construction, be interpreted as follows:—

'"Land," to extend to manors, advowsons, messuages, and all other hereditaments, whether corporeal or incorporeal (except such as are not liable to dower), and to any share thereof.

'Every word importing the singular number only, to extend and be applied to several persons or things, as well as one person or thing.

'When a husband dies beneficially entitled to any land for an interest not dowable at law, and such interest, whether wholly equitable, or partly legal and partly equitable, is an estate of inheritance in possession, or equal thereto (other than estate in joint-tenancy), his widow is entitled, in equity, to dower out of the same land (s. 1).'

This section has abolished a great anomaly. Dower is considered as a mere legal right, and did not attach unless the husband was, during the coverture, solely seised in possession of the legal inheritance; it was held, therefore, that equity ought not to create the right where it did not subsist at law, and that a wife was not dowable of a trust estate. Yet a man might then, as now, be tenant by the courtesy of his deceased wife's trust estate; a seemingly partial diversity, for which Lord Chancellor Talbot said he could see no reason, but which, as he found it settled, he did not feel himself at liberty to correct (3 P. Wms. 234). This distinction is abolished, and dower is made to attach, in equity, upon the beneficial interest in possession of a sole owner of the inheritance, whether the ownership be exclusively equitable, or be in part composed of a legal estate enjoyed beneficially.

The widow is not entitled to dower out of the estates of joint-tenants, because of the right of survivorship.

When a husband shall have been entitled to a right of entry or action in any land, and his widow would be entitled to dower out of the same if he had recovered possession thereof, she shall be entitled to dower out of the same, although her husband have not recovered possession thereof, provided the dower be sued for or obtained within the period during which such right of entry or action might be enforced (s. 3).

Before this act a seisin was necessary, as we have seen, but a seisin in law was sufficient, i.e. where the inheritance in lands and hereditaments, of which a man died seised or possessed, descends upon his heir, who dies before entry or possession; if the heir had left a widow she would have had dower.

No widow shall be entitled to dower out of any land which shall have been absolutely disposed of by her husband in his lifetime or by his will (s. 4). All partial estates and interests, and all charges created by any disposition or will of a husband, and all debts, incumbrances, contracts, and engagements to which his land shall be subject or liable, are valid and effectual as against the right of his widow to dower (s. 5). A widow shall not be entitled to dower out of any land of her husband when, in the deed by which it was conveyed to him, or by any deed executed by him, it shall be declared that his widow shall not be entitled to dower out of such land (s. 6). A widow shall not be entitled to dower out of any land of which her husband shall die wholly or partially intestate, when, by his will he declares his intention that she shall not be entitled to dower out of such land, or out of any of his land (s. 7). The widow's right to dower shall be subject to any conditions, restrictions, or directions, which shall be declared by her husband's will (s. 8). Where a husband devises any land out of which his widow would be entitled to dower if the same were not so devised, or any estate or interest therein, to or for the benefit of his widow, she shall not be entitled to dower out of or in any land of her husband, unless a contrary intention appear by the will (s. 9).

These sections contain the essential alterations made by this act, and put the widow's dower altogether in the husband's power. It used to be a principle, that, after a title to dower had once attached, it was not in the power of the husband alone to defeat it by any act in the nature of alienation or charge, whether voluntarily, as by deed or will, or involuntarily, as by bankruptcy, &c.; and that, therefore, all interests created by the husband after the attachment of title to dower, were voidable as to that part of the land which was recovered in dower.

The fourteenth section enacts, 'that this act shall not extend to the dower of any woman who shall have been, or shall be, married on or before the 1st January, 1834, and shall not give to any will, deed, contract, engagement, or charge executed, entered into, or created before the said 1st January, 1834, the effect of defeating or prejudicing any right to dower.'

There is great obscurity in this section, and it gave rise to two serious questions: (1) Whether a title to dower was within the Fines and Recoveries Act, so that a woman married on or before the 1st January, 1834, could extinguish her title by a deed acknowledged under the act? and it has been long settled that, in every case requiring the wife's conveyance, the substituted assurance, under the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, applies. (2) Whether the dower of a woman married on or before 1st January, 1834, out of lands purchased by the husband after that day, may be excluded by a declaration, alienation, &c., under the Dower Act? The sound opinion seems to be, that the new law was made exclusively for women married after the 1st January, 1834, and, therefore, inasmuch as the titles to dower, attaching after 1st January, 1834, of women married on or before that day, cannot be defeated by a declaration or otherwise, under this act; it follows, as a reasonable consequence, that such women cannot claim dower out of equitable estate under the second section of this act. This saving clause, which continues to a large class of wives the old provisions, will have the effect of prolonging the practice of inserting limitations to prevent dower, in order to render the fact of marriage on or before the 1st January, 1834, immaterial to the future title. In practice, the ordinary uses to prevent dower are inserted together with the declaration. Mr. Fearne invented these uses.—Cont. Rem. 347.

The tenth section enacts, that no gift or bequest made by any husband to or for the benefit of his widow, of or out of his personal estate, or of or out of any of his land not liable to dower, shall defeat or prejudice her right to dower, unless a contrary intention be declared by his will.

Acceptance of a bequest of personalty neither did, nor, since this act, does, operate in bar of dower, unless an intention to that effect can be unequivocally established. See Ayres v. Wilson, 1 Ves. sen. 230.

Nothing in the act prevents any Court of Equity enforcing any covenant or agreement, entered into by or on the part of the husband not to bar his widow's right to dower out of his lands, or any of them (s. 11); so that it should be ascertained by a purchaser of an estate free of dower, under this act, that the vendor has not entered into any agreement not to bar his widow's dower.

Nothing in the act is to interfere with any rule of equity by which legacies bequeathed to widows, in satisfaction of dower, are entitled to priority over other legacies (s. 12).

The principle alluded to in this clause is, that where a general legacy is given in consideration of a debt owing to the legatee, or of his relinquishing any right or interest, inasmuch as such a bequest cannot be treated as a bounty, like other bequests, but as the purchase-money for such right or interest, payment of it will be preferred to any other general legacies, which are merely voluntary, and, therefore, a legacy given to a widow in satisfaction of dower does not, in the event of a deficiency of assets, abate in proportion to the other legacies. This principle, however, only applies to cases where, on the testator's death, his widow is entitled to dower.

No widow is now entitled to dower ad ostium ecclesiæ, or ex assensu patris (s. 13).

The right to dower is consummated upon the husband's death, but the widow has no estate in the lands until the heir assign the dower, unless the precise portion of land has been particularly specified. If the property be capable of division, and held by the husband in severalty, dower must be assigned by metes and bounds, but if otherwise, it must be done in a special and certain manner. If the heir or terretenant refuse to assign the dower, the widow has several remedies for recovering it. Where no dower has been assigned, the writ of dower unde nihil habet will lie, but if any part have been assigned, the writ of dower will lie. The widow may file a bill in Chancery, for she labors under so many difficulties at law, from the embarrassment of trust terms and other matters, that equity will fully assist her not only in establishing her right at law, but also in completely relieving her when such right is ascertained.

No arrears of dower, nor any damages on account thereof, are recoverable by action or suit, for more than six years next before the commencement of such action or suit, by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 40. But the action, it appears, may be brought within sixty years after right accrued.

Dower unde nihil habet, Writ of, the remedy for a widow to whom no dower had been assigned within the time limited by law. —3 Bl. Com. 183. Abolished by 'The Common law Procedure Act, 1860' (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126), s. 26.

Dower, Writ of right of, the remedy for a widow who had been deforced of part of her dower.—3 Bl. Com. 183. Abolished by 'The Common Law Procedure Act, 1860' (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126), s. 26.

Dowl and deal [fr. dal, Brit., divisio, from dælan, Sax., whence dealing], a division.

Dowle Stones, stones dividing lands, &c.—Cowel.

Downing Street Public Offices Extension Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 95, extended by 22 Vict. c. 19.

Dowress, a widow entitled to dower.

Dowry [dos mulieris, Lat.], otherwise called maritagium, or marriage goods, that which the wife brings the husband in marriage. This word should not be confounded with dower.—Co. Litt. 31.

Dozein, a territory or jurisdiction. See DECINERS.

Dozen peers, twelve peers assembled at the instance of the barons, in the reign of Henry III., to be privy counsellors, or rather conservators of the kingdom.

Draco Regis, the standard ensign or military colors borne in war by our ancient kings, having the figure of a dragon painted thereon. Rog. Hoved. 1191.

Draft, or Draught, a bill drawn by one person upon another for a sum of money; an order in writing to pay money; also a rough copy of a legal document, &c., to be settled previously to a fair copy being made for engrossment.

Dragoman, an interpreter in the East.

Drainage of settled estates. By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 56, which repealed 3 & 4 Vict. c. 55, the owners of limited interests in settled estates may apply to the Court of Chancery by petition for leave to make permanent improvements therein, 'by draining the same with tiles, stones, or other durable materials; or by warping, irrigation, or embankment in a permanent manner, or by erecting any buildings thereon of a permanent kind, incidental or consequential to such draining, warping, irrigation, or embankment, and immediately connected therewith.' The Court of Chancery, upon such an application, and proof that the money advanced has been duly expended, may make a charge on the inheritance, to be repaid by equal annual instalments, not less than 12 nor more than 18 in number, with interest thereon, in the meantime, payable half-yearly; or in the case of buildings, by equal annual instalments, not less than 15, nor more than 25 in number. As to the course of proceeding in Chancery, see Orders 4th March, 1846.

By the Public Money Drainage Acts, tenants for life, and other owners of land, may obtain advances from government for works of drainage, which may be completed within five years; such advances to be repaid by a rent-charge on the land, after the rate of 6*l.* 10*s.* rent-charge for every 100*l.* advanced, and to be payable for the term of twenty-two years. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 101, explained and amended by 10 Vict. c. 11; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 38; 11 & 12. Vict. c. 119; 13 Vict. c. 31; and 19 Vict. c. 9. By the Private Money Drainage Act, 1849, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 100, amended by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 9, the owner of any land in Great Britain or Ireland may, with the sanction of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, borrow or advance money for the improvement of such land by works of drainage, such money, with interest, not exceeding five per cent. per annum, to be charged on the inheritance of the land, by way of a rent-charge, which is to be personal estate, for the term of twenty-two years.

Drana, or Drecca, a drain or water-course. See also 24 & 25 Vict. c. 133.

Drapery [pannaria, Lat.], used as a head in our old statute books, and extended to the making and manufacturing of all sorts of woollen cloths.

Drawback, a term used in commerce to signify the remitting or paying back upon the exportation of a commodity of the duties previously paid on it.

A drawback is a device resorted to for enabling a commodity affected by taxes to be exported and sold in the foreign market on the same terms as if it had not been taxed at all. It differs in this from a bounty, that the latter enables a commodity to be sold abroad for less than its natural cost, whereas a drawback enables it to be sold exactly at its natural cost. 'Drawbacks,' as Dr. Smith has observed, 'do not occasion the exportation of a greater quantity of goods than would have been exported had no duty been imposed. They do not tend to turn towards any particular employment a greater share of the capital of the country than would go to that employment of its own accord, but only to hinder the duty from driving away any part of that share to other employments. They tend not to overturn that balance which naturally establishes itself among all the various employments of the society, but to hinder it from being overturned by the duty. They tend not to destroy, but to preserve, what it is in most cases advantageous to preserve—the natural division and distribution of labor in the society.' Were it not for the system of drawbacks it would be impossible, unless when a country enjoyed some very peculiar facilities of production, to export any commodity that was more heavily taxed at home than abroad. But the drawback obviates this difficulty, and enables merchants to export commodities loaded at home with heavy duties, and to sell them in the foreign market on the same terms as those fetched from countries where they are not taxed.

Most foreign articles imported into this country may be warehoused for subsequent exportation. In this case they pay no duties on being imported; and, of course, get no drawback on their subsequent exportation.

Sometimes a drawback exceeds the duty or duties laid on the article; and in such cases the excess forms a real bounty of that amount, and should be so considered.

It is enacted by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 52, that no drawback or bounty shall be allowed upon the exportation from the United Kingdom of any goods, unless such goods shall have been entered in the name of the person who was the real owner thereof at the time of entry and shipping, or of the person who had actually purchased and shipped the same, in his own name and at his own liability and risk, on commission, according to the practice of merchants, and who was and shall have continued to be entitled in his own right to such drawback or bounty except in the cases therein-after provided for (s. 86).

No drawback shall be allowed upon the exportation of any goods, unless such goods be shipped within three years after the payment of the duties inwards thereon. And no debenture for any drawback or bounty upon the exportation of any goods shall be paid after the expiration of two years from the shipment of such goods; and no drawback shall be allowed upon any goods which, by reason of damage or decay, shall have become of less value for home use than the amount of such drawback; and all goods so damaged, which shall be cleared for drawback, shall be forfeited; and the person who caused such goods to be so cleared shall forfeit 200*l*., or treble the amount of the drawback, at the option of the commissioners of customs (s. 90).

No drawback or bounty shall be allowed upon goods exported and cleared as being press-packed, unless the quantities and the qualities of the same be verified by oath of the master packer thereof, or, in case of his unavoidable absence, by oath of his foreman (s. 93).

No goods cleared for drawback or bounty, or from any warehouse, shall be carried to be put on board ship for exportation, except by a person authorised for that purpose by license of the commissioners of customs (s. 94).

Draw-latches, thieves, robbers, wasters, and roberdsmen.—5 Edw. III. c. 14; 7 Ric. II. c. 5.

Drawee, the person on whom a bill of exchange is drawn, who is called, after acceptance, the acceptor.

Drawer, the person making a bill of exchange and addressing it to the drawee.

All persons of age, and of sound mind and understanding (or compotes mentis), females as well as males (but not a married woman, except by the authority of her husband, or where her husband is under some civil incapacity), alien-friends, trustees, agents, guardians, executors and administrators, and other persons acting en autre droit, partners, acting within the scope of the business of the partnership, and corporations, acting through the instrumentality of an agent, for purposes and objects authorised by, and within the scope of, their charters, and à fortiori, if express authority is given to them, may become drawers or other parties to bills of exchange.

Dreit. DROIT, which see.

Drenches, or Drenges, tenants in capite. They are said to be such as, at the coming of William the Conqueror, being put out of their estates, were afterwards restored to them, on their making it appear that they were the true owners thereof, and neither in auxilio or consilio against him.—Spelm.

Drengage, the tenure by which the drenches or drenges held their lands.

Drift of the Forest [agitatio animalium in forestâ, Lat.], a view or examination of what cattle are in a forest, chase, &c., that it may be known whether it be surcharged or not; and whose the beasts are, and whether they are commonable. These drifts are made at certain times in the year by the officers of the forest; when all cattle are driven into some pound or place enclosed, for the before-mentioned purposes, and also to discover whether any cattle of strangers be there, which ought not to common.—Man. p. 2, c. xv.

Drift-land, Drofland, or Dryfland, a yearly rent paid by some tenants for driving cattle through a manor.—Encyc. Lond.

Drince-lean, a contribution of tenants in the time of the Saxons towards a potation of ale, provided to entertain the lord or his steward.

Drivers, &c. of public carriages. As to their misconduct, see 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 120; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, s. 35; and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 22.

Drofdenn, a grove or woody place where cattle were kept.

Droit [Fr.], right, justice, equity. There were many writs of droit or right used in our law, but they were all abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, except a writ of dower, or writ of dower unde nihil habet.

Droits of Admirálty, the perquisites attached to the office of Admiral of England (or Lord High Admiral). Prince George of Denmark, the husband of Queen Anne and Lord High Admiral, resigned the rights to these droits to the Crown, for a salary, as Lord High Admiral, of 7,000*l.* a year. When the office was vacant, they belonged of right to the Crown. Of these perquisites, the most valuable is the right to the property of an enemy seized on the breaking out of hostilities. Large sums were obtained by the Crown on various occasions in the course of the last great war for the seizure of the enemy's property, most of which, however, were eventually given up to the public service. In the arrangement of the Civil List, during the last two reigns, it was settled that whatever Droits of Admiralty accrued were to be paid into the Exchequer for the use of the public. The Lord High Admiral's right to the tenth part of the property captured on the seas has been relinquished in favor of the captors.

Droit d'aubaine [jus albinatus, Lat., i. e. alibi natus, born elsewhere], in French law, a right of the king, entitling him, at the death of an alien, to all he was worth, unless he had a peculiar exemption.—Spelm.

Droit-droit, or jus duplicatum, a double right, i. e. the right of possession joined with the right of property, which makes a complete title to lands, tenements, and hereditaments. And when to this double right the actual possession is also united, when there is, according to the expression in Fleta, juris et seisinæ conjunctio, then, and then only, is the title to property completely legal.—2 Bl. Com. 199.

Droit ne done pluis que soit demaunde.—2 Inst. 286. (Justice gives no more than is demanded.)

Droit ne poet pas morier.—Jenk. Cent. 100.—(Right cannot die.)

Dromoes, dromos, dromunda, ships of great burden; men-of-war.—Walsing. 1292.

Droog, a fortified hill or rock.—Indian.

Drovers, those that buy cattle in one place to sell in another.—Willes, 590.

Dru, a thicket or wood.—Domesday Book.

Drunkenness, intoxication with strong liquor; habitual inebriety. It is an offence against the public economy, and punishable by statutes 4 Jac. I. c. 5, and 21 Jac. I. c. 7, ss. 1, 3, with the forfeiture of 5*s.* to be paid within one week after conviction to the churchwardens, for the use of the poor; and upon a second conviction, the offender shall be bound with two sureties in 10*l.* for his good behaviour. See 9 Geo. IV. c. 61, s. 35. By the law of England drunkenness is no excuse for a crime. 'A drunkard,' says Sir Edward Coke (1 Inst. 247), 'who is voluntarius dæmon, has no privilege thereby; but what hurt or ill soever he doth, his drunkenness doth aggravate it: nam crimen ebrietas et incendit et detegit.'

The Scotch law is thus explained by Mr. Alison:—Drunkenness is no excuse for crimes; 'but, on the other hand, if either insanity has supervened from drinking, without the panel's having been aware that such an indulgence in his case leads to such a consequence; or if it have arisen from the combination of drinking with a half crazy or infirm state of mind, or a previous wound or illness, which rendered spirits fatal to his intellect, to a degree unusual in other men, or which could not have been anticipated, it seems inhuman to visit him with the extreme punishment which was suitable in the other case. In such a case the proper course is to convict; but in consideration of the degree of infirmity proved, recommend to the royal mercy.'—Prin. Crim. Law of Scot. 654.

Drunkenness sometimes causes a short access of delirium or mania, to which the name of delirium tremens, or mania à potu, is given. This state may continue some days or even weeks. It differs from drunkenness, in that the latter disappears in twelve or fifteen hours at most, if not renewed by drink. Certainly the individual seized with this delirium is not responsible for his actions; and if he is to be punished for the immorality of the cause of his reprehensible act, a large number of the insane must also be included in a similar infliction.—Orfila's Leçons, 2nd edit. vol. ii., p. 127.

The late Mr. Justice Story (Mason's Rep. vol. v. p. 28), said, 'the question made at the bar is, whether insanity, whose remote cause is habitual drunkenness, is, or is not, an excuse in a court of law for a homicide committed by the party while so insane, but not at the time intoxicated or under the influence of liquor. We are clearly of opinion that insanity is a competent excuse in such a crime. In general, insanity is an excuse for the commission of every crime, because the party has not the possession of that reason which includes responsibility. An exception is when the crime is committed by a party while in a fit of intoxication, the law not permitting a man to avail himself of the excuse of his own gross vice and misconduct to shelter himself from the legal consequences of such crime. But the crime must take place and be the immediate result of the fit of intoxication, and while it lasts, and not, as in this case, a remote consequence, superinduced by the antecedent exhaustion of the party, resulting from gross and habitual drunkenness. However criminal in a moral point of view such an indulgence is, and however justly a party may be responsible for his acts arising from it to Almighty God, human tribunals are generally restricted from punishing them. since they are not the acts of a reasonable being. Many species of insanity arise remotely from what, in a moral view, is a criminal neglect or fault of the party; as from religious melancholy, undue exposure, extravagant pride, ambition, &c. Yet such insanity has always been deemed a sufficient excuse for any crime done under its influence.' But although drunkenness is no excuse for crime, a contract made by a person when so drunk as to be unable to understand what he is doing, is invalid, at all events, if the person with whom the contract is made is aware of the fact.—Gore v. Gibson, 13 M. & W. 623.

Dry-cræft, witchcraft; magic. Celt. dravi, magician; draoidheadh, magic; hence also druid.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Dry exchange [cambium siccum, Lat.], a term invented in former times for the disguising and covering of usury; in which something was intended to pass on both sides, whereas nothing passed but on one side, in which respect it was called dry; punished by 3 Hen. VII. c. 5.

Dry-multures, corn paid to the owner of a mill, whether the payers grind or not.—Scotch Law.

Dry-rent, a rent reserved without clause of distress. See RENT-SECK.

Duces tecum (you shall bring with you), subpœna. If a person, even if he be a party to a cause, have in his possession any written instrument, &c., which would be evidence at the trial, instead of the common subpœna, he is served with a subpœna duces tecum, commanding him to bring it with him and produce it at the trial. Upon being served with a copy of this subpœna, he must attend at the trial with the instrument required, and produce it in evidence, unless he have some lawful or reasonable excuse for withholding it, of the validity of which excuse the court, and not the witness, is to judge. It is no excuse that the legal custody of the instrument belongs to another, if it be in the actual possession of the witness; but if it tend to criminate himself or his client (if the witness be an attorney), or if it be his title-deed, the court will not compel him to produce it. Where these objections do not apply, it seems that the writings in a man's possession are as much liable to the calls of justice as are the faculties of speech and memory. There can be no difference in principle between obliging a man to state his knowledge of a fact, and compelling him to produce a written entry in his possession which proves the same fact. Not only a man's estate, but even his liberty or life, may depend upon written evidence, which is the exclusive property of a stranger.

If the witness, instead of bringing the papers, &c., required, deliver them to the opposite party, by whom they are withheld, the court will allow secondary evidence of the contents of them to be given, without a notice to produce the originals. A witness, producing papers under a subpœna duces tecum, need not be sworn unless he be examined.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 353.

No subpœna for the production of an original record shall be issued unless a rule of court or the order of a judge shall be produced to the officer issuing the same, and filed with him, and unless the writ shall be made conformable to the description of the document mentioned in such rule or order.—Rule 32, H. T. 1853. As to the practice under this writ in Chancery, see Smi. Ch. Pr. 421, and Consol. Ord. 1860.

Duces tecum licet languidus, a writ directed to the sheriff upon a return that he cannot bring his prisoner without danger of death, he being adeò languidus; whereupon the court grants a habeas corpus in the nature of a duces tecum licet languidus. But this is now out of use; and where the person's life would be endangered by removal, the law will not permit it to be done.

Duchy of Cornwall. As to the limitation of actions and suits by the Duke of Cornwall, see 23 & 24 Vict. c. 53. As to leases of the possessions of the duchy, see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 50, s. 49, and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 49. See STANNARY COURTS.

Duchy Court of Lancaster, a tribunal of special jurisdiction, held before the chancellor of the duchy, or his deputy, concerning all matters of equity relating to lands holden of the Crown in right of the duchy of Lancaster; which is a thing very distinct from the county palatine (that has also its separate chancery, for sealing of writs, and the like), and comprises much territory which lies at a vast distance from it; as particularly a very large district surrounded by the city of Westminster. The proceedings in this court are the same as on the equity side of the Court of Chancery, so that it seems not to be a court of record; and, indeed, it has been holden that the Court of Chancery has a concurrent jurisdiction with the duchy court, and may take cognisance of the same causes.—3 Bl. Com. 78. See COUNTY PALATINE.

Ducking-stool. See CASTIGATORY.

Ducroire [Fr.], guaranty; equivalent to DEL CREDERE, which see.

Due [fr. dû, Fr.], anything owed. That which one contracts to pay or perform to another; that which law or justice requires to be paid or done. Also that which office, rank, or established rules of right or decorum require to be given or performed.

It should be observed that a debt is said to be due the instant that it has existence as a debt; it may be payable at a future time.

Duel, in our ancient law, a legal combat between persons in a doubtful case for the trial of the truth, long since disused. In modern times a duel is a combat with weapons between two persons upon some quarrel precedent; wherein, if one of them is killed, the other and the seconds are guilty of murder, whether the seconds fight or not.—Hawk. Pl. 47; Beccaria, 38 & 39. An unpremedidated sudden fight is a rencontre.

Dues, certain payments; rates or taxes.

Duke [fr. dux, Lat.; duc, Fr.], the highest title of honor next to the Prince of Wales. His consort is called a duchess. It is a mere title of dignity, without giving any domain, territory, or jurisdiction over the place whence the title is taken.

It was originally a Roman dignity, denominated à ducendo, leading or commanding. Accordingly the first dukes (duces) were the ductores exercituum, commanders of armies. Under the emperors, the governors of provinces in war time were styled duces. In aftertimes the same denomination was also given to the governors of provinces in time of peace.—Encyc. Lond. In Genesis we read of dukes, but they were heads of families.

Duke of Exeter's Daughter, a rack in the Tower, so called after a minister of Henry VI., who sought to introduce it into this country.

Dulocracy [fr. δοῦλος, Gk., a servant, and κράτος, power], a government where servants and slaves have so much license and privilege that they domineer.

Dum bene se gesserit (while he shall conduct himself well).

Dum fuit infra ætatem (while he was within age), an abolished writ whereby one who had made a feoffment of his lands while an infant, might, when he came of full age, recover them. Within age, he might enter into the land, and take it back again, and by his entry he was remitted to his ancestor's right.—F. N. B. 192.

Dum fuit in prisonâ (while he was in prison), an abolished writ of entry that lay to restore a man to lands which he had aliened under duress of imprisonment.—2 Inst. 482.

Dum non fuit compos mentis (while he was not of sound mind), an abolished writ that lay when a man, not of sound mind, had aliened any lands or tenements to recover them from the alienee.—F. N. B. 449.

Dum sola, whilst single or unmarried.

Dumb-bidding. In sales at auctions, when the amount which the owner of the thing sold is willing to take for the article is written, and placed by the owner under a candlestick, or other thing, and it is agreed that no bidding shall avail unless equal to that; this is called dumb-bidding.

Dun, a mountain or high open place; also an importunate creditor.

Duna, a bank of earth thrown out of a ditch.—Old Records.

Dungeon [fr. donjon, originally the principal building of a district or fortress, which from its position or structure had the command of the rest; fr. dominio, domnio, Lat. (as domnus for dominus), domgio, dongeo (as Fr. songer from somniare), donjon. Donjon in fortification is generally taken for a large tower or redoubt of a fortress where the garrison may retreat in case of necessity.—Bail. The name of dungeon has finally been bequeathed to such an underground prison as was formerly placed in the strongest part of a fortress.—Wedgw. The tower in which prisoners were kept, whence all prisons eminently strong were called dungeons], a close prison, dark or subterraneous.

Dunio, a double, a kind of base coin less than a farthing.—Old Records.

Dunnage, pieces of wood or other material placed against the sides and bottom of the hold of a vessel, to stow the cargo.

Dunsets, people that dwell on hilly places.—Old Records.

Dunum, or Duna [fr. dunnarium, Lat.], a down or hill.

Duo non possunt in solido unam rem possidere.—Co. Litt. 368.—(Two cannot possess one thing in entirety.)

Duo sunt instrumenta ad omnes res aut confirmandas aut impugnandus—ratio et auctoritas.—8 Co. 16.—(There are two instruments either to confirm or impugn all things—reason and authority.)

Duodena, a jury of twelve men.

Duodena manu, twelve witnesses to purge a criminal of an offence.

Duplex querela (a double plaint), a process ecclesiastical, which is in the nature of an appeal from the ordinary to his next immediate superior, as from a bishop to the archbishop; and if the superior court adjudge the cause of refusal to be insufficient, it will grant institution to the appellant.—1 Burn, 160. See DOUBLE COMPLAINT.

Duplicate, second letters-patent, granted by the Lord Chancellor in the same terms as the first when the latter were void; a copy or transcript of a deed, letter, account, or other writing; the ticket given by a pawnbroker to the pawner of a chattel. Duplicates of despatches, and of important letters, are frequently sent by another conveyance as a precaution against the risk of their miscarriage. The copy which first reaches its destination is treated as an original.

Duplicate Will, where a testator executes two copies of his will, one to keep himself, and the other to be deposited with another person. Upon application for probate of a duplicate will, both copies must be deposited in the registry of the Court of Probate.

Duplicatio, the Roman pleading answering to our rejoinder.

Duplicationem possibilitatis lex non patitur. 1 R. R. 321.—(The law does not allow a duplication of possibility.)

Duplicity. See DOUBLE PLEADING.

It is a general rule in equity, that a plea ought not to contain more defences than one, and that a double plea is informal and multifarious, and therefore improper. For if two matters of defence may be thus offered, the same reason will justify the making of any number of defences in the same way by which the ends intended by a plea will not be obtained, and the court will be compelled to give instant judgment upon a variety of defences, with all their circumstances, as alleged by the plea, before they are made out in proof; and, consequently, will decide upon a complicated case, which may not exist. It may then be laid down as a rule, that several facts can never be pleaded in one plea, unless they are all conducive to a single point, on which the defendant means to rest his defence; for, otherwise, it will be open to the charge of duplicity and multifariousness.

The reasoning as to duplicity in a plea does not, perhaps, in its full extent, apply with equal force to the case of two several bars, pleaded as several pleas, though to the same matter; and it may be said that such pleading is admitted at law, and ought, therefore, to be equally so in equity. But it should be considered that a plea is not the only mode of defence in equity; and that, therefore, there is not the same necessity, as at law, for admitting this kind of pleading. But, although the ordinary course of practice in courts of equity does not admit of several pleas, yet, where great inconvenience might otherwise be sustained in a particular case, the court will sometimes, in its discretion, allow several pleas.—Story's Eq. Plead. 498.

Durante, during; as durante bene placito, during pleasure; durante minore ætate, during minority; durante viduitate, during widowhood; durante vitâ, during life.

Durbar, a court, a hall of audience, a levee.—Indian.

Durden, a copse, a thicket in a valley.

Duress [fr. duresse, Fr.; durities, Lat., constraint], imprisonment, compulsion.

Duress is either by imprisonment or by threats. In order to constitute duress by imprisonment, either the imprisonment or the duress consequent upon it must be tortious and unlawful. Duress by threat has been thus divided:—Through fear (1) of loss of life; (2) of loss of member; (3) of mayhem; (4) of imprisonment.

By the common law, a contract made during duress is not void, but voidable; and the person upon whom it is practised may avail himself of the duress, as a special defence to an action thereupon at any time. But the person who has employed the force cannot allege it as a defence, if the contract be insisted upon by the other.

The rule in equity is, that where a person is not a free agent, and is not able to protect himself, the court will protect him. The maxim of the common law is—Quod alias bonum et justum est, si per vim vel fraudem petatur, malum et injustum efficitur.—(What otherwise is good and just, if sought by force or fraud, becomes bad and unjust.) On this account, courts of equity watch with extreme jealousy all contracts made by a person while under imprisonment; and if there is the slightest ground to suspect oppression or imposition in such cases, they will set the contract aside. Circumstances also of extreme necessity and distress of the party, although not accompanied by any direct restraint or duress, may, in like manner, so entirely overcome his free agency as to justify the court in setting aside a contract made by him on account of some oppression or fraudulent advantage, or imposition, attendant upon it.—Story's Comm. Eq. Jurisp., vol. i., p. 201.

Duress by threat (per minas) is also an excuse for some crimes, though not all, for although a man be violently assaulted and has no other possible means of escaping death but by killing an innocent person, this fear or force shall not acquit him of murder; for he ought rather to die himself than escape by the murder of an innocent person. But in such a case he is permitted to kill the assailant; for there the law of nature and self-defence, its primary canon, have made him his own protector. It is to be observed, too, that the compulsion which takes away guilt must be the fear of no less than present death, or grievous bodily harm; for the mere apprehension of having houses burned, or goods destroyed or injured, is not sufficient.—Steph. Com., vol. i., p. 145; ii., p. 63; iv., p. 117.

Durham, County Palatine of. This jurisdiction, which was vested, until a very recent period, in the Bishop of Durham for the time being, is now taken from him by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 19, which is amended by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 45, and vested as a separate franchise and royalty in the Crown.

Dursley, blows without wounding or bloodshed; dry blows.—Blount.

Dustuck, a term used in Hindostan for a passport, permit, or order, from the English East India Company. It generally meant a permit under their seal, exempting goods from the payment of duties.—Encyc. Lond.

Dusty-foot. See PIEPOUDRE.

Dutch Auction, the setting up of property for sale by auction above its value, and gradually lowering the price till some person takes it.

Duty [fr. debere, Lat.; dovere, Ital.; deuvre, O. Fr., of which last the participle at one time was probably deuté, corresponding to dovuto, Ital., duty, right, equity, and afterwards contracted to deu and mod. du, due.—Wedgw.], a tax, an impost, or imposition; also an obligation. See PENSION.

Dwined, dwindled; consumed.

Dying Declarations. See DEATH-BED DECLARATIONS.

Dyke-Reed, or Dyke-Reve, an officer who has the care and oversight of the dykes and drains in fenny countries.

Dynast, a ruler or government.

Dynasty [fr. δυναστεία, Gk., power], a race or succession of kings of the same line or family. Such were the dynasties of Egypt, China, &c.

Dysnomy [fr. δύς, Gk., and νομός, law], the act of making bad laws.

Dyvour (otherwise Bare-man), a Scotch term for a person involved in debt, and unable to pay his creditors; synonymous with the word bankrupt.

E.

Ea [Sax], the water or river; also the mouth of a river on the shore between high and low watermark.

Eadem causa diversis rationibus coram judicibus ecclesiasticis et secularibus ventilatur.—2 Inst. 622.—(The same cause is argued upon different principles before ecclesiastical and secular Judges.)

Eadem mens præsumitur regis quæ est juris et quæ esse debet, præsertim in dubiis.—Hob. 154.—(The mind of the sovereign is presumed to be coincident with that of the law, and with that which it ought to be, especially in ambiguous matters.)

Ea est accipienda interpretatio quæ vitio caret.—Bacon.—(That interpretation which is free from fault is to be received.)

Ea quæ in curiâ nostrâ ritè acta sunt debitæ executioni demandari debent.—Co. Litt. 289.—(Those things which are properly transacted in our court ought to be committed to a due execution.)

Ealder, or Ealding, an elder or chief. See ADELING.

Ealderman, or Ealdorman, the name of a Saxon magistrate; alderman, analogous to earl among the Danes; and senator among the Romans. See ALDERMAN.

Ealdor-biscop, an archbishop.

Ealdorburg [Sax.], the metropolis; the chief city. Obsolete.

Ealehus [fr. eale, Sax., ale, and hus, house], an alehouse.

Ealhorda [Sax.], the privilege of assizing and selling beer. Obsolete.

Earl [fr. eorl, Sax.; eoryl, Erse; comes, Lat.], a title of nobility, formerly the highest in England, now the third, ranking between a marquis and a viscount, and corresponding with the French Comte and the German Graf. The title originated with the Saxons, and is the most ancient of the English peerage. William the Conqueror first made this title hereditary, giving it in fee to his nobles; and allotting them for the support of their state the third penny out of the sheriff's court, issuing out of all pleas of the shire, whence they had their ancient title shiremen. At present the title is accompanied by no territory, private or judicial rights, but merely confers nobility and an hereditary seat in the House of Lords. In official instruments they are called by the sovereign, 'trusty and well-beloved cousins,' an appellation as ancient as the reign of Henry IV. For some time after the Norman conquest they were called counts, and their wives are still called countesses.—Encyc. Lond.; 1 Bl. Com. 398. Earl meant originally a man of noble birth as opposed to Ceorl.

Earl Marshal of England, a great officer of state who had anciently several courts under his jurisdiction, as the court of chilvary, and the court of honour. Under him is the herald's office, or college of arms. He was also a judge of the Marshalsea court now abolished. This office is of great antiquity, and has been for several ages hereditary in the family of the Howards.—3 Bl. Com. 68, 103; 3 St. Com. 459.

Earldom, the seigniory of an earl; the title and dignity of an earl.

Earles-penny, money given in part payment.

Earmark, a note for identification. Money has no earmark.

Earnest [fr. eornest, Sax.], the sum paid by the buyer of goods in order to bind the seller to the terms of the agreement. It is enacted by the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds, 29 Ch. ii. c. 3, that 'no contract for the sale of any goods, wares, and merchandizes, for the price of 10*l.* sterling, or upwards, shall be allowed to be good, except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold, and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part payment, or that some note or memorandum in writing of the said bargain be made and signed by the parties to be charged by such contract, or their agents thereunto lawfully authorised.'

As to what amount is sufficient earnest, Blackstone lays it down, that 'if any part of the price is paid down, if it be but a penny, or any portion of the goods is delivered by way of earnest, it is binding.' To constitute earnest the thing must be given as a token of ratification of the contract, and it should be expressly stated so by the giver.—3 Chit. Com Law, 289.

Ear-witness, one who attests or can attest anything as heard by himself.

Easement, a privilege without profit, which the owner of one neighbouring tenement hath of another, existing in respect of their several tenements by which the one (called the servient) tenement is obliged to suffer or not to do, something on his own land for the advantage of the owner of the other (called the dominant) tenement, e. g. a right of way, or right of passage of water. It is the servitus of the civil law. An easement is an incorporeal hereditament, which from its nature can only be created by grant: hence the origin of all easements may be referred to a grant by the owner of the servient tenement either expressed or implied. In the majority of cases the right is founded upon the implication of a grant, the terms of which can only be ascertained from the actual enjoyment of the easement. Such implication arises in two ways:—1. By the severance of one tenement into two parts; 2. By prescription. See Gale on Easements by Willes.

East India Company, a famous association, originally established for prosecuting the trade between England and India, which they acquired a right to carry on exclusively. Since the middle of the last century, however, the company's political affairs had become of more importance than their commerce.

But the act for the better government of India, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106, after reciting that it is expedient that India should be governed by and in the name of Her Majesty, enacts that the government of the territories in the possession or under the government of the East India Company, and all powers in relation to government vested in or exercised by the said Company in trust for Her Majesty, shall cease to be vested in or exercised by the said Company; and all territories in the possession or under the government of the said Company, and all rights vested in, or which, if this act had not been passed, might have been exercised by the said Company in relation to any territories, shall become vested in Her Majesty, and be exercised in her name; and for the purposes of this act India shall mean the territories vested in Her Majesty as aforesaid, and all territories which may become vested in Her Majesty by virtue of any such rights as aforesaid (s. 1). India shall be governed by and in the name of Her Majesty, and all rights in relation to any territories which might have been exercised by the said Company if this act had not been passed, shall and may be exercised by and in the name of Her Majesty as rights incidental to the government of India; and all the territorial and other revenues of or arising in India, and all tributes and other payments in respect of any territories which would have been receivable by or in the name of the said Company if this act had not been passed, shall be received for or in the name of Her Majesty, and shall be applied and disposed of for the purposes of the government of India alone, subject to the provisions of this act (s. 2). See 22 & 23 Vict. c. 41, and 23 & 24 Vict. cc. 87, 88 and 130; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 67; and Steph. Com. vol. i., p. 112; iii. 260.

East Indies is a popular geographical term not very well defined, but generally understood to signify the continents and islands to the east and south of the river Indus, as far as the borders of China, including Timor and the Moluccas, but excluding the Philippine Islands, New Guinea, and New Holland. China and the Philippine Islands were, however, included within the limits of the East India Company's peculiar privileges.

Easter [fr. Ostern, Ger., supposed to be derived from the name of the Teutonic goddess Ostera (oster, to arise), celebrated by the ancient Saxons early in the spring], a feast of the church held in memory of our Saviour's resurrection. The Greeks and Latins call it pascha, passover, to which Jewish feast our Easter answers.

This feast has been annually celebrated since the time of the apostles, and is one of the most considerable festivals in the Christian calendar, being that which regulates and determines the times of all the other moveable feasts. The rule for the celebration of Easter, fixed by the council of Nice, in the year 325, is, that it be held on the Sunday which falls upon or next after the full moon which happens next after the 21st March, that is, the Sunday which falls upon or next after the first full moon after the vernal equinox, and as such it stands in the rubric of the Church of England. And if the full moon that comes next after the 21st of March fall upon a Sunday, Easter shall not be that Sunday, but the one after it. The reason of this decree was, that the Christians might avoid celebrating their Easter at the same time with the Jewish passover, which according to the institution of Moses was held the very day of the full moon.

An astronomical Easter is impossible, unless the festival be sometimes kept on one day on the east of a variable meridian, and on another day on the west; the difference being a week. It might happen, for instance, that those on one side of the meridian of London would have to keep Easter a Sunday after those on the other side: nay, astronomical tables are exact enough to make it possible that a true astronomical Easter should be observed on one Sunday in St. Paul's, and on another in Westminster Abbey; and as astronomy advances, it is perfectly conceivable that the true astronomical Easter should be one Sunday or another in St. Paul's only, according as it is to be solemnised, at one end or other of the building.—Encyc. Lon.; Wheat. Com. Pr.

Easter-offerings or Easter-dues, small sums of money paid to the parochical clergy by the parishioners at Easter, as a compensation for personal tithes, or the tithe for personal labour.

Easter Term, formerly called a moveable term, but now it is fixed, beginning on the 15th of April, and ending on the 8th of May in every year. See 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, s. 6; 1 Wm. IV. c. 3, s. 3. If the whole or any number of the days intervening between the Thursday before and the Wednesday next after Easter-day, fall within Easter Term, there are to be no sittings in banc on any of such intervening days; but the term is, in such case, to be prolonged, and continue for such number of days of business as shall be equal to the number of the intervening days before mentioned, exclusive of Easter-day; and the commencement of the ensuing Trinity Term is in such case to be postponed, and its continuance prolonged for an equal number of days of business. In case the day of the month on which any term is to end shall fall to be on a Sunday, then the Monday next after such day shall be deemed and taken to be the last day of the term; and in case any of the days between the Thursday before and the Wednesday next after Easter shall fall within Easter Term, then such days shall be deemed and taken to be a part of such term, although there shall be no sittings in banc on any of such intervening days. It is a non-issuable term, no assizes following it.

Easterling, a coin struck by Richard II., which is supposed to have given rise to the name of sterling, as applied to English money.

Eastinus, an easterly coast or country.

Eat inde sine die, words used on the acquittal of a defendant, that he may go thence without a day, i. e. be dismissed without any further continuance or adjournment.

Eaves-droppers, persons who listen under walls or windows, or the eaves of a house, to hearken after discourse, and thereupon to frame slanderous and mischievous tales. They are a common nuisance, and presentable at the courtleet, or are indictable at the sessions, and punishable by fine and finding sureties for good behaviour.—2 Hawk. P. C. c. x., s. 58.

Eberemorth, Eberemors, Ebere-murder. See ABEREMURDER.

Ecce modo mirum, quod fœmina fert breve regis, non nominando virum conjunctum robore legis.—Co. Litt. 132 b.—(Behold, indeed, a wonder! that a woman has the king's writ without naming her husband who by law is united to her).

Ecchymosis [fr. ἐκχύμωσις, Gk., extravasation of blood], an appearance of livid spots on the skin, occasioned by an extravasation of the blood from a vein between the flesh and skin. It is in fact an effusion or spreading of blood into the cellular tissue, produced by violent contusion; it is sometimes extended to a considerable distance beyond the seat of the injury. When the quantity of blood is sufficiently large to produce a tumor or swelling of any magnitude, it is called a thrombus. This subcutaneous hæmorrhage may be produced from strictly internal causes, as coughing, vomiting, efforts at stool, &c. There should be a careful discrimination between ecchymosis and sugillation, which is applied to those hard spots, of various sizes, which are noticed on the bodies of the dead, after they become rigid and cold, and which is to be ascribed to the effects of gravitation. The blood obeys physical laws, and hence, if a dead body be placed upon its back, it is found in the lowest parts, as the back, and the posterior portions of the lungs. So well is this established, that if a body be reversed and placed with its face downward, the lividity will change places and occupy the front part of the body. A discriminating mark between ecchymosis and sugillation is the following: when the discoloration is the effect of external violence, a congestion of thick concrete blood will be found, but in the spontaneous spot, the blood, on incision, will be found fluid.

Rieux proposes the question, whether contusions and their consequence, ecchymosis, can be produced on the dead body? The inquiry is important, not only from the possibility that injury may be inflicted on a corpse for the purpose of implicating an innocent person, but also from the rough treatment that bodies brought to the dissecting-room often receive. Upon this subject Dr. Christison makes the following remarks:—'For some hours after death, blows will cause appearances which, in point of colour, do not differ from the effects of blows inflicted recently before death. The discoloration, like lividity or sugillation, generally arises from an effusion of the thinnest possible layer of the fluid part of the blood on the outer surface of the true skin, but sometimes also from an effusion of thin blood into a perceptible stratum of the true skin itself. Dark fluid blood might even be effused into the subcutaneous cellular tissue in the seat of the discoloration, so as to blacken or redden the membranous partitions of the adipose cells, but this last effusion is seldom extensive.'—Quoted by Beck. Med. Jurisp. 534.

Ecclesia, a church, an assembly, a parsonage.

Ecclesia ecclesiæ decimas solvere non debet.—Cro. El. 479 —(A church ought not to pay tithes to a church.)

Ecclesia est domus mansionalis Omnipotentis Dei.—2 Inst. 164.—(The church is the mansion-house of the Omnipotent God.)

Ecclesia est infra ætatem et in custodiâ domini regis, qui tenetur jura et hæreditates ejusdem manutenere et defendere.—11 Co. 49.—(The church is within age, and in the custody of the king, who is bound to uphold and defend its rights and inheritances.)

Ecclesia fungitur vice minoris; meliorem conditionem suam facere potest, deteriorem nequaquam.—Co. Litt. 341.—(The church enjoys the privilege of a minor; it can make its own condition better, but not worse.)

Ecclesia non moritur.—2 Inst. 3.—(The church does not die.)

Ecclesiæ magis favendum est quam parsonæ.—God. Rep. Can. 172.—(The church is to be more favoured than the parson.)

Ecclesiarch [fr. ἐκκλησία, Gk., church, and ἀρχός, a chief], the ruler of a church.

Ecclesiastic, or Ecclesiastical, something belonging to or set apart for the church, as distinguished from civil or secular, with regard to the world.

Ecclesiastical Authorities, principally the clergy under the sovereign, as temporal head of the church, set apart from the rest of the people or laiety, in order to superintend the public worship of Almighty God and the other ceremonies of religion, and to administer spiritual counsel and instruction.

The several orders of the clergy are—I. Archbishops and bishops. II. Deans and chapters. III. Archdeacons. IV. Rural Deans. V. Parsons (under whom are included appropriators) and vicars. VI. Curates. Churchwardens or sidesmen, and parish clerks and sextons, inasmuch as their duties are connected with the church, may be considered to be a species of Ecclesiastical Authorities.

Ecclesiastical Benefice. See Advowson, Benefice.*

Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, a body corporate, erected by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 77, empowered to suggest measures conducive to the sufficiency of the established church, to be ratified by orders in council. Church Estates' Commissioners are appointed ex officio members of this corporation. See a list of the statutes under Church Building Commissioners' Acts, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 124.

Ecclesiastical Corporations, corporations created for the furtherance of religion, and for the perpetuation of the rights of the church, the members of which are exclusively spiritual persons. They are of two kinds: corporations sole, viz. bishops, certain deans, parsons and vicars; and corporations aggregate: viz. deans and chapters, and formerly prior and convent, abbot and monks, and the like.

The ordinary is their visitor, by the common law. The pope formerly, and now the Crown as supreme ordinary, is the visitor of the archbishop or metropolitan; the metropolitan has the charge and coercion of all his suffragan bishops, and the bishops in their several dioceses are, in ecclesiastical matters, the visitors of all deans and chapters, of all parsons and vicars, and of all other spiritual corporations.—1 Bl. Com. 470.

Ecclesiastical Courts [curiæ Christianitatis, Lat.] are the archdeacon's court, the consistory courts, the court of arches, the court of peculiars, the prerogative courts of the two archbishops, the faculty court, and the privy council, which is the appeal court.

Ecclesiastical Division of England is into provinces, dioceses, archdeaconries, rural deaneries, and parishes.

Ecclesiastical Law, the law administered in the ecclesiastical courts; it is derived from the civil and canon law.

Ecdicus [fr. ἔκδικος, Gk., from ἐκ and δίκη, justice], an attorney or proctor of a corporation; a recorder.—Civ. Law.

E converso (on the contrary; on the other hand).

Edderbreche [Sax.], the offence of hedge-breaking. Obsolete.

Edestia [fr. ædes, Lat.], buildings.—Old Records.

Edia, ease; aid or help.

Edict [fr. edictum, Lat.], a proclamation, command, or prohibition; a law promulgated.

Edictal citation, a summons against a foreigner not within Scotland, but who has a landed estate there, or against a native who is out of Scotland. The citation is published at the market-cross of Edinburgh and pier and shore of Leith, and is authorised partly by necessity, partly by the idea that whoever is possessed of property there, will have left a warrant with some one to attend to his interest in that court where alone any question in relation to it can be tried.—Scotch Law.

Edictum Theodorici. This is the first collection of law that was made after the downfall of the Roman power in Italy. It was promulgated by Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, at Rome, in the year A.D. 500. It consists of 154 chapters, in which we recognise parts taken from the Code and Novellæ of Theodosius, from the Codices Gregorianus and Hermogenianus, and the Sententiæ of Paulus. The edict was doubtless drawn up by Roman writers, but the original sources are more disfigured and altered than in any other compilation. This collection of law was intended to apply both to the Goths and the Romans, so far as its provisions went; but when it made no alteration in the Gothic law, that law was still to be in force.—*Savigny, Geschichte des R. Ejectione custodiæ [ejectment de garde, Fr.], a writ that lay against him who had cast out the guardian from any land during the minority of the heir.—Reg. Orig. 162. There were two other writs not unlike this; the one termed ravishment de gard, and the other droit de gard.

Ejectione firmæ (ejection of a farm).

Ejectment, the only mixed action at common law, and the creature of Westminster Hall, the whole method of proceeding in which was anomalous, and depended on fictions invented and upheld by the courts for the convenience of justice, in order to escape from the inconveniences which were found to attend the ancient forms of real and mixed actions.

This possessory action is mixed, because it seeks to recover the possession of land (which is real), and damages and costs for the wrongful withholding of the land (which are personal). The title to lands and tenements is tried by this action, whether the title be to an estate in fee, fee-tail, for life, or for years. It is a more comprehensive mode of trying title than by an action of trespass, for in trespass damages alone are recovered, while in ejectment, besides damages, the possession of the land itself can be acquired, as well as the title ascertained, and thus it is better adapted to the ends of substantial justice. And although the damages in ejectment are merely nominal, except in the case of landlord and tenant, under 1 Geo. IV. c. 87, yet actual damages for the injury sustained by the rightful party, in having been kept out of possession of the land by the wrongful party, from the accrual of his title to the recovery of possession, can be obtained by an action of trespass for mesne profits.

Until abolished by the C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 168, this action exhibited the most remarkable string of fictions then recognised by the courts of common law. The original mode of proceeding was this:—The party having the right of entry upon the land entered upon it, and being then in possession, he there upon the land sealed and delivered a lease for years to some third person, who, having entered thereunder, remained in possession until the prior tenant, or he who had the previous possession, entered and ousted him, or until some other person, called the casual ejector, either by accident or previous arrangement, came upon the land and ejected him, whereupon the lessee brought his action against the casual ejector, or the prior tenant. If the action were brought against the casual ejector, and not against the tenant in possession, the courts of law, not suffering the tenant to lose his possession without an opportunity of defending it, promulgated a rule that no plaintiff should proceed in ejectment to recover lands against a casual ejector, without giving notice to the tenant in possession, if there were any, and making him a defendant if he pleased. But during the Protectorate, Lord Chief Justice Rolle, who then presided in the Upper Bench, introduced the fictitious mode of proceeding which formed the practice now abolished. Since much trouble and formality attended the actual making of the lease, entry, and ouster, as above described, no lease was sealed (except in the case of vacant possession), no entry and ouster actually made (unless to avoid a fine, which, though abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, yet an entry must still be made to avoid a fine, commenced before the passing of this act), the plaintiff and defendant were fictitious persons, and all the preliminaries were purely ideal, for the sole purpose of trying the title. The action was commenced by the party claiming title delivering to the party in possession a declaration, in which the plaintiff (John Doe) and the defendant (Richard Roe) were fictitious persons. The declaration stated that a lease of the premises in question for a term of years had been made by the party claiming the title (who was the real plaintiff) to John Doe, who entered upon the land by virtue of such demise, and that afterwards Richard Roe, the casual ejector, entered and ousted John Doe, during the continuance of his term. Appended to this declaration was a notice, signed by Richard Roe, addressed to the tenant in possession (who was the actual defendant) informing him of the action brought by the lessee, and that Richard Roe had no title to the premises, and advising him to appear at a certain time and defend his title, otherwise he, Richard Roe, would suffer judgment by default, by which the actual tenant would be turned out of possession by the sheriff.

The plaintiff, in order to maintain his action at the trial, must have made out these four points: viz. title, lease, entry, and ouster. The real defendant, therefore, was admitted to defend upon condition of his entering into a consent rule to confess, at the trial of the cause, the lease of the lessor, the entry of the plaintiff John Doe, and the ouster by Richard Roe. These requisites being fictitious, could not have been proved, and if not confessed a nonsuit would have been the consequence, but by the actual defendant's confession of them, he agreed not to avail himself of the want of such proof, but to rest his defence entirely upon the merits of his title. And to prevent his breaking his engagement, a condition was added, that in such case he should pay the costs of the suit, and should allow judgment to be entered against the casual ejector (Richard Roe).

The title of the action, after the tenant's appearance, stood thus: — Doe (the fictitious lessee), on the demise of ——— (the lessor or person really claiming the title), against ——— (the real defendant, the casual ejector, Richard Roe, having withdrawn).

The plaintiff must have the legal title, for it is a strict rule that the legal title must prevail even over an equitable one. It is a maxim that the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of that of his adversary; for his possession gives him a right against every one who cannot establish a good title, and it is sufficient for him if he can show the real title of the land to be out of the plaintiff. It suffices, however, to prove undisturbed possession of an estate by the claimant or his ancestor for twenty years, from which the highest title is to be presumed, until the contrary be proved. The rule that the plaintiff in ejectment must recover on the strength of his own title, is qualified in its application to the case of landlord and tenant, for a tenant who has come in under the plaintiff will not be allowed to controvert his title, although he might show that it had subsequently expired.—Adams's Eject. c. iv.

Besides the legal title, the plaintiff must have a right of entry upon the lands. By the 39th sect of 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, no descent-cast, discontinuance or warrantry, happening after 31st December, 1833, shall defeat a right of entry or action for the recovery of land. All titles are therefore converted into possessory titles, thus making this action of universal application. The 2nd and 3rd sections of the same act do away with the doctrine of non-adverse possession, and a very numerous class of cases connected therewith. The same statute limits the length of time necessary to take away a right of entry, and to bring ejectment, the 2nd section enacting that, after the 31st December, 1833, no person shall make an entry or distress, or bring an action to recover any land or rent, but within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress, or to bring such action, shall have first accrued to some person through whom he claims; or if such right shall not have accrued to any person through whom he claims, then within twenty years next after the time at which the right, &c., shall have first accrued to the person making or bringing the same. In the construction of this act, this right shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time set forth in the 3rd section, i. e. when the person claiming such land or rent, or some person through whom he claims, shall, in respect of the estate or interest claimed, have been in possession or in receipt of the profits of such land, and shall, while entitled thereto, have been dispossessed or have discontinued such possession or receipt, then such right shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time of such dispossession or discontinuance of possession, or at the last time at which any such profits or rent were or was to be received.

And when the person claiming such land or rent shall claim it of some deceased person who shall have continued in such possession or receipt in respect of the same until his death, and shall have been the last person entitled thereto who shall have been in such possession or receipt, then such right shall be deemed to have first accrued at his death.

And when the person claiming, &c., shall claim in respect of an estate or interest in possession, granted, appointed, or otherwise assured by any instrument (other than a will) to him, or some person through whom he claims, by a person being in respect of the same in the possession or receipt of the profits of the land, or in the receipt of the rent, and no person entitled under such instrument shall have been in such possession or receipt, then such right shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time at which the person claiming as aforesaid, or the person through whom he claims, became entitled to such possession or receipt by virtue of such instrument.

And when the interest claimed shall have been in reversion or remainder or other future estate or interest, and no person shall have obtained the possession or receipt of the profits or rents, then such right shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time at which such interest came into possession.

And when the person claiming, or the person through whom he claims, shall have become entitled by reason of any forfeiture or breach of condition, then such right shall be deemed to have first accrued when such forfeiture was incurred, or such condition was broken.

The 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th sections annul the effect of mere entry, continual claim, possessio fratris, and other modes of constructive possession, and require a written acknowledgment (not upon a stamp) from the party in possession or in receipt of the profits of the land, to the person entitled, or his agent, as the only equivalent to actual possession, so as to preserve the right of entry, and prevent the statute from running in cases where some other than the person really admitted is in possession or receipt of the profits of the land.

The 15th section reserves a right for five years after the passing of the act, in all cases where the possession was not adverse at the time of its passing.

To persons who are under the disabilities of infancy, coverture, idiocy, lunacy, unsoundness of mind, or absence beyond seas when the right of entry accrues, a right of action is allowed for ten years after the disability ceases, or the person under disability dies, which shall first happen; provided that in such cases the action is brought within forty years after the right of entry accrues, though the disability may have continued the whole of that time. And no further time is to be allowed in case of a succession of disabilities. Provided that lands and rents may be recovered by spiritual and eleemosynary corporations sole, within two incumbencies, and sixty years, or (in case that period should not amount to sixty years) within sixty years.

The 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 28, after reciting that doubts of the effect of the above act had been entertained as to mortgages, declares and enacts that it shall be lawful for any person entitled under any mortgage of land, being land within the definition contained in the 1st section of the said act, to make an entry or bring an action or suit to recover such land within twenty years next after the last payment of any part of the principal money or interest, although more than twenty years may have elapsed since the time at which the right to make such entry, &c., shall have first accrued.

An action of ejectment may be brought by the following persons, provided they have both the legal title, and the right of entry or possession:—

An alien, born out of the allegiance of Great Britain, whose father or grandfather on the father's side, was a natural-born subject (7 Anne, c. 5; 4 Geo. II. c. 21; and 13 Geo. III. c. 21).

Assignees of a bankrupt's estate; all the bankrupt's real and personal property, which he may be possessed of at the time of his bankruptcy, or which he may acquire before obtaining his certificate, vesting in the assignees by virtue of their appointment; except his copyhold or customary tenements, which are disposed of by the court, the vendees compounding for the customary fines (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, s. 117, and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 210), and also the bankrupt's estates-tail (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, ss. 56–73).

Assignees of an insolvent's estate (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 51).

Attainted felon before office found; Bargainee under a bankruptcy (1 Wils. 276); churchwardens and overseers of the poor for lands belonging to the parish (59 Geo. III. c. 12, s. 17).

Committee of a lunatic (1 Wm. IV. c. 65).

Conusee of a statute-merchant or staple (Co. Litt. 42 a).

A copyholder or his heir (Doe d. Tressider v. Tressider, 1 Gale & D. 70); lessees of copyholders (Cro. Eliz. 536); and widows entitled to freebench (Ambl. 299).

Corporations, either aggregate or sole (Doe d. The London Dock Company v. Knebell, 2 Mood & R. 66).

Devisees and legatees. They may maintain ejectment for a chattel real, either against the executor, or a stranger, but the executor's assent to the bequest must be shown (6 Barn. & Cres. 112; Young v. Holmes, 1 Stra. 70).

Grantee of rent-charge, with power to enter and retain until satisfaction (1 Saun. 112). Also grantees of lords of manors (Doe d. Cosh v. Loveless, 2 Barn. & Ald. 453).

Guardians in socage—also called guardians by the common law. It only arises when the infant is entitled to some estate in lands, and then the guardianship devolves upon his next of kin to whom the inheritance cannot possibly descend, as where the estate descended from his father, in this case his uncle by the mother's side cannot inherit, and therefore shall be guardian (Litt. 123; 2 Roll. Abr. 41); and testamentary guardians (12 Car. II. c. 24, s. 8), but not a guardian for nurture, for he has nothing to do with the land as such.

Infants, upon giving security for costs (2 T. R. 159.)

Lay Impropriators for tithes.

Lords of manors (Adams's Eject. 44).

Mortgagee. Where the premises have been let for years, and afterwards mortgaged, the tenant cannot be ejected by the mortgagee, and it is doubtful whether he could recover, even if he had given notice to the tenant, that it was not intended to disturb his possession, but only to require the rent to be paid to him, and not to the mortgagor. But where the lease has been made subsequently to the mortgage, without the mortgagee's privity, he may recover against the tenant, without giving such notice, because the mortgagor has no power to lease, not subject to every circumstance of the mortgage; and therefore such a tenant is a trespasser, and may be ejected by the mortgagee without notice to quit (8 T. R. 2; 1 Dougl. 21). The mortgagee may immediately proceed to eject the mortgagor, after default, without notice of demand of possession, unless the mortgage-deed operate as a redemise of the premises to the mortgagor until default —Adams's Eject. 42.

Personal representatives (29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 12; 1 Vict. c. 16, s. 6).

Persons having adverse and uninterrupted possession for twenty years (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, ss. 16, 17); and persons claiming under an award (13 East, 15).

Rectors or vicars for tithes against persons claiming title thereto, but not for refusing to set them out, nor where there is a composition, nor after sequestration (Dyer, 116 b; 3 Campb. 447).

Reversioners and assignees of the reversion upon a right of re-entry for condition broken (32 Hen. VIII. c. 34).

Tenants, whether for life, for years, in tail, or in fee, and whether joint, in common, or coparcenary (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 17, s. 12); and also by elegit and fi. fa. (Bull. N. P. 104).

Trustees of real estates (Adam's Eject. 60).

This action is maintainable for anything, whether corporeal or incorporeal, upon which an entry can be made, or the sheriff can give possession; and if it be brought to recover water (as ponds or streams), it must be described as so many acres of land covered with water.—Run. Eject. 126; Ad. Eject. c. ii.

A notice by a landlord to his tenant to quit is only necessary where the time of quitting is not agreed upon between the parties; for, where a lease is determinable on a certain event or at a fixed time, it is not necessary to give such notice, both parties being apprised of the determination of the term (1 T. R. 54, 162). A notice is not necessary, where the possession is adverse, or where the relation of landlord and tenant does not subsist; as if the tenant had attorned to another person, or done some act disclaiming the landlord's title. But if the acts done by the tenant do not amount to a disavowal of the landlord's title, he has a right to have notice (Bull. N. P. 96). A notice to quit is generally necessary in order to determine a tenancy from year to year; and a tenancy at will, in consequence of its inconveniences, is construed by the courts as a tenancy from year to year, if they can find any foundation for so construing it (4 Taunt. 128). This notice must end with the year of the tenancy, and must be given at least half a year (182 days) previously; but if the rent be payable on the usual quarterly feast-days, a notice to quit on the next but one is sufficient. When the landlord intends to enforce his claim for double value, if the tenant hold over, it is necessary that the notice to quit be in writing (4 Geo. II. c. 28, s. 1); but for the purpose of an ejectment, a parol notice is sufficient, unless the notice is required to be in writing by express agreement between the parties (5 Esp. 196). But it is the general practice to give written notices, and it is a precaution which should always, when possible, be observed, as it prevents mistake, and renders the evidence certain and correct.

Payment of rent as for a year's rent up to a particular day is primâ facie evidence of the commencement of the tenancy at that day (5 Esp. p. 173). The notice should be served personally upon the tenant in possession; but if personal service cannot be effected, it will be sufficient to leave it with the wife or servant, at the tenant's usual place of residence, explaining its nature and contents (4 T. R. 464).

If a landlord receive rent, accrued due, after the expiration of a notice to quit, it is a waiver of the notice, provided the rent be received qua rent, and this is a question for a jury (6 T. R. 219; 9 East. 314 n). So if he distrain for such rent (1 H. B. 311).—Ad. Eject. 73–117.

As to the practical proceedings, they may be thus epitomised:—

1st. In ordinary cases, where there is a tenant in possession, the action is commenced by a writ of ejectment, which is in force for three months. In it the property sought to be recovered must be described with reasonable certainty. The defendant has sixteen days to appear. A person not named in the writ may obtain an order to appear, upon an affidavit showing that he is in possession of the land either by himself or his tenant. A defendant may defend for a part only of the property, on giving four days' notice of it after appearance. There are not any pleadings, but an issue is made up and tried before a jury. A special case may be stated for the opinion of the court, by consent and by leave of a judge. The trial of the issue may be ordered to take place in any county. The jury may find a special verdict, or either party may tender a bill of exceptions. Judgment, either for the claimant or defendant, may be signed and execution issued (which is either a fi. fa., elegit, or habere facias loquelam) on the fifth day in term after the verdict, or within fourteen days after the verdict, whichever shall first happen, unless otherwise ordered. The death of a party shall not abate the action, but there are given modes of procedure under special circumstances. A defendant may confess the action, and a claimant may discontinue. Error may be brought upon the judgment, the defendant giving bail.

If a tenant do not forthwith give notice to his landlord of an ejectment having been brought against him, he forfeits three years' rack rent of the premises, recoverable by action (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, ss. 168–221; Gen. R. 112–114). A plaintiff in a second ejectment for the same premises against the same defendant, may be ordered to give security for costs after the appearance (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 93).

2nd. As to proceedings in ejectment upon a vacant possession, see the C. L. P. A. 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76), s. 170.

The person who has the right of entry may, if the premises be unoccupied and vacant, peaceably and without force, enter and take possession of them, without bringing an ejectment; though it is better to proceed by ejectment, more especially where he claims adversely to the person last in possession. What is a vacant possession? It is a nice question. A distinction must here be made between actual abandonment of possession and discontinuance to occupy, still retaining the virtual possession. Locking up the premises and quitting is an instance of actual abandonment; leaving anything, such as hay in a barn, will be an instance of discontinuance of possession. In the former case the landlord must proceed in the ejectment as upon a vacant possession; in the latter in the ordinary way.

The 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 16, and 57 Geo. III. c. 52, give power to two justices of the peace, when premises are deserted by a tenant, and no sufficient distress is to be found upon them to answer the arrears of rent, to give possession of them to the landlord.

3rd. Proceedings in ejectment by landlord, for forfeiture by non-payment of rent:—

And, first, where there is a sufficient distress upon the premises, the proceeding must be at Common Law; but before the ejectment is brought (the proceedings of which have been previously described, according as the tenant is in possession, or the possession is vacant), a demand of the rent must be made, unless there is an express agreement dispensing with such demand. And inasmuch as the Common Law does not favour forfeitures, great strictness is required in this respect. The landlord, or another person under a formal power, must go in person, upon some notorious place on the land, as before the front door of the dwelling-house (unless the lease specify a place for payment of rent, and then, upon the place pointed out), on the last day on which the rent can be paid, to save a forfeiture, at sunset, and demand the precise sum due, although, in fact, nobody is present upon the part of the tenant to answer; if the rent be not then paid, the landlord is entitled to bring his ejectment. This proceeding is seldom practised, both on account of the nicety of the demand, and because the tenant, by filing a bill in equity, may obtain an injunction staying proceedings, upon paying the arrears of rent.

Secondly, where there is not a sufficient distress upon the premises, the ejectment is then regulated by the C. L. P. A. 1852, ss. 210–212, which enacts, that where a half-year's rent shall be in arrear, and a right of re-entry has been reserved by the express terms of the lease, and no sufficient distress can be found on the premises to countervail the arrears of rent, the landlord or lessor may, without any demand or re-entry, serve a writ in ejectment; but the tenant, by paying the rent and costs, can obtain relief at law or in equity. The proceedings are the same as in ordinary cases, mutatis mutandis.

4th. The proceedings in ejectment upon the determination of a tenancy are regulated by the C. L. P. A. 1852, ss. 213–215.

5th. Possession can be obtained by summary proceedings before two justices, under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 74, where the term exceeds not seven years, and the rent is not more than 20*l.*, no fine being reserved; and in a county court where neither the value of the premises nor the rent payable in respect thereof exceeds 50*l.* a year, and where no fine or premium shall have been paid.—19 & 20 Vict. c. 8, s. 50.

6th. As to proceedings in ejectment by a landlord whose right of entry accrues after Hilary or Trinity Terms, see the C. L. P. A. 1852, ss. 217, 218.

7th. As to ejectment by mortgagee, see the C. L. P. A. 1852, ss. 219, 220.

The resulting action of trespass for mesne profits, i. e. the amount of the yearly value of the premises, may be brought as soon as actual possession is obtained (except in the case of landlord and tenant, under 1 Geo. IV. c. 87, when these actual damages are given, as already shown). It should be brought in the name of the plaintiff who has recovered in the ejectment, against the person who had judgment against him in the ejectment, or against the executors or administrators, for the profits received within six calendar months before the death of the testator or intestate; the action must then be brought within six months after they have taken upon themselves the administration of the estate.

The Statute of Limitations, as to all the profits, excepting those which may have accrued within the last six years, will be a defence. The damages may be beyond the mere rent or annual value of the premises, as compensation for the plaintiff's trouble, &c.; but ground-rent paid by the defendant will be deducted by the jury from the damages; and if less than 40*s.* damages be recovered, unless the judge certify, the plaintiff shall have no more costs than damages. If the action is brought pending error, execution will be stayed until the error is determined. In other respects the action is the same as in ordinary proceedings.—2 Selw. Nisi Prius, tit. Eire, or Eyre [fr. iter, Lat.], the court of justices itinerant, and justices in eyre. They were, anciently, sent with a general commission into divers counties to hear such causes as are termed pleas of the Crown; and this was done for the ease of the people, who must else have been brought to the Queen's Bench, if the cause were too high for the county court: it is said they were sent but once in seven years. The eyre of the forest is the justice-seat, which, by an ancient custom, was held every three years by the justices of the forest journeying up and down for that purpose.—Bract. l. 3, c. xi.

Electio est interna, libera, et spontanea separatio unius rei ab aliâ, sine compulsione, consistens in animo et voluntate.—Dyer, 281.—(Election is an internal, free, and spontaneous separation of one thing from another, without compulsion, consisting in intention and will.)

Electio semel facta, et placitum testatum, non patitur regressum.—Co. Litt. 146.—(Election once made, and plea witnessed, suffers not a recall.)

Election, the act of selecting one or more from a greater number for an office; also the exercise of his choice by a man left to his own free will to take or to do one thing or another.

The doctrine of election, strictly so called, is derived from the civil law, and is the obligation imposed upon a person to choose between two inconsistent or alternative rights or claims, in cases where there is a clear intention of the person from whom he derives one, that he should not enjoy both. Every case of election, therefore, presupposes a plurality of gifts or rights, with an intention, expressed or implied, of the person who has a right to control one or both, that one should be a substitute for the other. The person who is to take has a choice, but he cannot enjoy the benefits of both. It has been said that the doctrine constitutes a rule of law, as well as of equity; and that the reason why courts of equity are more frequently called upon to consider the subject, is, that in consequence of the forms of proceeding at law, the person cannot be put to elect.—2 Story's Equity Jurisp. c. xxx.

As to a defendant in equity compelling a plaintiff to elect between two proceedings, it is ordered by the Consol. Ord. 1860, xlii. 5 & 6, that 'A defendant whose answer is not excepted to or set down for hearing on former exceptions, alleging that the plaintiff is prosecuting him in this court and also at law for the same matter, may, upon the expiration of eight days after his answer or further answer is filed, obtain, as of course, on motion or petition, the usual order for the plaintiff to make his election in which court he will proceed. And that a defendant whose answer is excepted to, alleging that the plaintiff is prosecuting him in this court and also at law for the same matter, may by notice in writing require the plaintiff to set down the exceptions within four days from the service of the notice. And if the plaintiff does not do so, such defendant is entitled as of course, on motion or petition, to obtain the usual order for the plaintiff to make his election in which court he will proceed.'

But though it is a general rule that when a party is suing in equity he shall not be allowed to sue at law for the same thing, yet the case of a mortgagee forms an exception, he having a right to proceed in equity and at law at the same time, nor will the court stay the proceedings at law, unless the defendant bring in the money.—Rees v. Parkinson, 2 Anst. 497.

As to the election of members of Parliament, see Rogers on Elections. The manner of proceeding on election petitions is regulated by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 36; and see as to Ireland 25 & 26 Vict. c. 92.

Election-Auditors, officers annually appointed, to whom is committed the duty of taking and publishing the account of all expenses incurred at parliamentary elections. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, ss. 18, 26-28.

Electiones fiant ritè et liberè sine interruptione aliquâ.—2 Inst. 169.—(Let elections be made rightly and freely, without any interruption.)

Elector, he that has a vote in the choice of any officer; a constituent; also the title of certain German princes who formerly had a voice in the election of the Emperor of Germany.

Electric Telegraphs, establishment of. See 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, ss. 13, 14.

Elects, officers of the College of Physicians.

Eleemosyna, alms.

Eleemosyna Regis, and Eleemosyna Aratri, or Carucarum, a penny which King Ethelred ordered to be paid for every plough in England towards the support of the poor.—Leg. Ethel. c. i.

Eleemosynæ, possessions belonging to the church.—Blount.

Eleemosynaria, the place in a religious house where the common alms were deposited, and thence by the almoner distributed to the poor.

Eleemosynarius, the almoner or peculiar officer who received the rents and gifts, and in due method distributed them to pious and charitable uses.

Eleemosynary Corporations, artificial bodies, constituted for the perpetual distribution of the free alms or bounty of the founder of them. Of this kind are all hospitals for the maintenance of the poor, sick, and impotent, and all colleges both in our universities and out of them, which are founded for the promotion of piety and learning by proper regulations and ordinances, and for imparting assistance to the members of those bodies, in order to enable them to prosecute their devotions and studies with greater care and assiduity. These eleemosynary corporations, though in some things partaking of the nature of ecclesiastical bodies, are, strictly speaking, lay, and not ecclesiastical, even though composed of ecclesiastical persons: and, accordingly they are not subject to the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, or to the visitations of the ordinary or diocesan in their spiritual characters.—3 Step. Com. 132, 148 & 149.

Elegit (he has chosen), a judicial writ of execution founded on the Statute of Westminster II. (13 Edw. I. c. 18) issuing out of the court where the record or other proceeding is upon which it is grounded, and addressed to the sheriff, who, by virtue of it, gives to the judgment-creditor the lands and tenements of the judgment-debtor, to be occupied and enjoyed until the money due on such judgment is fully paid; during the time he so holds them he is called tenant by elegit, whose interest is denominated an estate of freehold, defeasible upon a condition subsequent. His interest, however, is really a chattel, and passes to the executor.

The writ of elegit now extends to all the debtor's lands, instead of a moiety as before; and also the debtor's customary and copyhold lands, subject to the rights of the lord of the manor; and also lands over which the debtor has any disposing power, which he may, without the assent of any other person, exercise for his own benefit; and also trust estates, estates in reversion, or leases for lives or years, rent-charges, lands in ancient demesne, the wife's lands which the husband has during coverture, lands of a bishop, and terms for years. But the following property cannot be extended: an advowson in gross, because it cannot be valued at any certain rent towards payment of the debt; the glebe belonging to an ecclesiastical benefice; or the churchyard, because these are each solum Deo consecratum; a rent-seck, for it cannot be delivered ut liberum tenementum; and any tenement that cannot be granted over; also an estate vested in a purchaser or mortgagee.—18 & 19 Vict. c. 15, s. 11.

If judgment be obtained against two, and one of them die before execution, the judgment survives as to the personalty, but not as to the realty; that is, the judgment binds the goods of the survivor only, but it binds the lands both of the survivor and the deceased.

Upon the receipt of the elegit, the sheriff must impannel a jury, who are to inquire of all the goods and chattels of the debtor, and appraise the same, and also to inquire as to his lands and tenements, and their value; upon such inquisition had, the sheriff is to deliver to the execution-creditor all the goods and chattels of the debtor (except his oxen and beasts of the plough) at the value set upon them by the jury; and if the goods be sufficient to satisfy the debt, the lands cannot be extended. If, however, the goods be insufficient, the sheriff is to proceed to make and deliver execution to the execution-creditor of all the lands, &c., of the debtor, and must return the writ, in order that the inquisition may be recorded in the court out of which the elegit issued. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 98, abolished poundage on this writ.

If no land be extended upon an elegit, the plaintiff may, of course, have an elegit into another county; or even if lands be extended upon the first elegit the plaintiff, on a suggestion that the defendant has more lands, either in the same or in another county, may have another elegit. But where land is extended under an elegit, no other writ of execution but an elegit can be sued out against the defendant, unless the plaintiff be evicted from the lands extended, or the elegit be ineffective or void.

The sheriff delivers only legal possession of the lands, or rather a right of entry, and not actual possession; if, therefore, the execution-creditor cannot enter without force, he should proceed by ejectment. As soon as the plaintiff shall have fully satisfied his judgment out of the extended value of the land, the defendant may recover his land, either by ejectment, scire facias ad rehabendam terram, bill in equity, or reference to one of the masters of the court to ascertain the amount of the rents and profits received, and order that, if it appear that the debt, damages, and costs are satisfied, possession shall be delivered to the defendant.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 670. As to an elegit in Equity, see Sm. Eq. Pr. 157.

Elimination, the act of banishing or turning out of doors; rejection.

Elinguation, the punishment of cutting out the tongue.

Elisors, electors; chosen persons. In cases of challenge to the sheriff and coroners for partiality, &c., the jury process is directed to two clerks of the court, on two persons of the county named by the court, and sworn. Then these elisors indifferently name or choose the jury, and their return is final, no challenge being allowed to the array.—Co. Litt. 158.

Eloigne, or Eloine [fr. éloigner, Fr.], to put at a distance; to remove one far from another.

Eloignment, removal; sending to a distant place.

Elongata, a return made by a sheriff in replevin, that cattle, &c., are not to be found, or are removed, so that he cannot make deliverance, &c.

Elongatus, a return to a writ de homine replegiando, that the man is out of the sheriff's jurisdiction, whereupon a process is issued, called a capias in withernam, to imprison the defendant himself without bail or main-prize, until he produces him.

Elopement, the voluntary departure of a wife from her husband, to live with an adulterer in breach of her matrimonial vow.

Elul, the twelfth month of the Jewish civil year, and the sixth of the ecclesiastical. It consisted of only twenty-nine days, and answered nearly to our August.

Ely [perhaps fr. ἕλος, Gk., a marsh, or helig, C. Br., a willow], the ancient city and metropolis of the county of Cambridge.

The Isle of Ely was never a county palatine but it was a royal franchise, which, however, by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 87, was taken away from the bishop, whose secular authority is now vested in the Crown.

Emancipatio. A solemn act by which a paterfamilias divests himself of his power over his filius-familias, so that the filius-familias may become sui juris. There are three forms of emancipatio. (1) The old emancipation, which was by several mancipationes, followed by several enfranchisements. The mancipatio, or solemn sale, destroyed the patria potestas and put the filius-familias in mancipio, which was a kind of slavery. The enfranchisement by the purchaser made the filius-familias sui juris. As the enfranchiser acquired all rights of patronage, the father, on occasion of the last mancipatio, added the trust-clause (fiducia contracta), i. e. an express condition that the purchaser should remancipate the filius-familias to the paterfamilias, so that having ceased to be a paterfamilias, and being only an ordinary purchaser, he might himself enfranchise his child, and so acquire the rights of patronage.

(2) The Anastasian emancipation, introduced by Anastasius. It consisted in obtaining an imperial rescript, authorising the emancipation which was to be registered with the proper officer. In this way a filius-familias might be emancipated in his absence, which could not be done by the old form per æs et libram, since the purchaser had to lay hold of the thing.

(3) The Justinian emancipation, a mere declaration of the paterfamilias before the magistrate, no leave being required for the purpose (recta via).—Cum. C. L. 36.

Embargo [fr. embargar, Sp., a prohibition to pass], a stop, arrest, or detention of ships; a prohibition imposed in time of war by a belligerent state upon merchant ships against their leaving port for a time specified.

Embassador. See AMBASSADOR.

Embassage, or Embassy, the message or commission given by a sovereign or state to a minister, called an ambassador, empowered to treat or communicate with another sovereign or state; also the establishment of an ambassador.

Embezzlement, the appropriation to his own use by a servant or clerk of money or chattels received by him for and on account of his master or employer. Embezzlement differs from larceny in this, that in the former the property misappropriated is not at the time in the actual or legal possession of the owner, whilst in the latter it is. The distinctions between larceny and embezzlement are often extremely nice and subtle; and it is sometimes difficult to say under which head the offence ranges. Unless the offender is a clerk or a servant, whose business it is to receive money for his master, he is not guilty of embezzlement. But if he have been employed to receive it in a single instance, he need not be a general servant. And where a servant is sent to do a particular thing, for which he is to receive a specified sum and not less, and he is paid a less sum, and appropriates it, this is not an embezzlement, for he does not receive the money by virtue of his employment.—4 C. & P. 390.

Embezzlement by a clerk, or servant, or person employed as such, of any chattel, money, or valuable security, is a felony punishable by penal servitude for a term not exceeding fourteen and not less than three years, or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, and in the case of a male under the age of sixteen by whipping in addition to imprisonment (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 68). Embezzlement by persons in the service of her Majesty, or by a constable or other person employed in the police is a felony punishable in the same manner, with the exception of whipping (s. 70). Embezzlement by any officer or servant of the Bank of England or Bank of Ireland is a felony punishable by penal servitude for life, or not less than three years, or imprisonment not exceeding two years (s. 73).

In the same indictment any number of distinct acts of embezzlement, not exceeding three, committed against Her Majesty, or the same master, or employer, may be charged if committed within the space of six months from the first to the last act. In an indictment for embezzling money or any valuable security, it is sufficient to allege the embezzlement to be of money without specifying the particular coin or valuable security; such an allegation shall be sustained if the offender shall be proved to have embezzled any amount, although the particular species of coin or valuable security of which such amount was composed shall not be proved, or if he shall be proved to have embezzled any piece of coin or any valuable security, or any portion of the value thereof, although such piece of coin or security may have been delivered to him in order that part of the value thereof should be returned to the party delivering the same, or to some other person, and such part shall have been returned accordingly (s. 71).

If upon the trial of any person indicted for embezzlement, &c., it shall be proved that he took the property in question in any such manner as to amount in law to larceny, he shall not by reason thereof be entitled to be acquitted, but the jury shall be at liberty to return as their verdict that such person is not guilty of embezzlement, &c., but is guilty of simple larceny, or of larceny as a clerk, servant, or person employed for the purpose or in the capacity of a clerk or servant, &c., as the case may be, and thereupon such person shall be liable to be punished in the same manner as if he had been convicted upon an indictment for such larceny; and if upon the trial of any person indicted for larceny it shall be proved that he took the property in question in any such manner as to amount in law to embezzlement, &c., he shall not by reason thereof be entitled to be acquitted, but the jury shall be at liberty to return as their verdict, that such person is not guilty of larceny, but is guilty of embezzlement, &c., and thereupon such person shall be liable to be punished in the same manner as if he had been convicted upon an indictment for such embezzlement, &c.; and no person so tried for embezzlement, &c., or larceny as aforesaid shall be liable to be afterwards prosecuted for larceny, &c., or embezzlement upon the same facts.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 72. As to the fraudulent misappropriation of property by bankers, merchants, brokers, attornies, or agents, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 86; by trustees, ss. 80 & 86; by directors, members, or public officers of bodies corporate or public companies, ss. 81, 86. See Arch. Crim. Consol. Stat. 275, et seq.

Emblements [fr. emblavance de bled, Fr., corn sprung or put above ground], the growing crops of those vegetable productions of the soil which are annually produced by the labor of the cultivator. They are deemed personal property, and pass as such to the executor or administrator of the occupier, whether he were the owner in fee, or for life, or for years, if he die before he has actually cut, reaped or gathered the same; and this, although being affixed to the soil, they might for some purposes be considered, whilst growing, as part of the realty.

If a tenant for life or pur auter vie die, his executor or administrator is entitled to emblements, for the estate was determined by the act of God; and it is a maxim in the law that actus Dei nemini facit injuriam. The advantages of emblements are extended to parochial clergy by 28 Hen. VIII. c. 11, but a parson who resigns his living, or forfeits it by his own act, is not entitled to emblements, although his lessee is. By devise, the devisee may, without express words, be entitled to the growing crops. But a legatee of the goods, stock, and moveables on a farm, is entitled to growing corn in preference as well as to the devisee of the land as to the executor. So, a tenant at will or sufferance, the duration of whose tenancy is uncertain, is, if the lessor suddenly determine the tenancy, entitled to emblements. And, at common law, fructus industriales, as growing corn and other annual produce, which would go to the executor upon death, may be taken in execution; but the appraisement and sale thereof are regulated by statute; and, by statute, growing crops may be distrained upon, and sold when ripe. But a crop of natural grass growing at the time of the death of a tenant for life or in fee, and although fit to cut for hay, does not belong to his executor, but goes to the remainderman. A landlord is entitled to emblements on growing crops, in case of forfeiture by the tenant's own acts, and so is a mortgagee.—1 Chit. Gen. Prac. 91.

Where the lease or tenancy of any farm or lands held by a tenant at rackrent shall determine by the death or cesser of the estate of any landlord entitled for his life, or for any other uncertain interest, instead of claims to emblements, the tenant shall continue to hold and occupy such farm or lands until the expiration of the then current year of his tenancy, and shall then quit upon the terms of his lease or holding in the same manner, as if such lease or tenancy were then determined by effluxion of time or other lawful means, during the continuance of his landlord's estate; and the succeeding landlord or owner shall be entitled to recover and receive of the tenant in the same manner as his predecessor or such tenant's lessor could have done if he had been living, or had continued the landlord or lessor, a fair proportion of the rent for the period which may have elapsed from the day of the death or cesser of the estate of such predecessor or lessor to the time of the tenant so quitting; and the succeeding landlord or owner and the tenant respectively shall, as between themselves and as against each other, be entitled to all the benefits and advantages and be subject to the terms, conditions, and restrictions, to which the preceding landlord or lessor and such tenant respectively would have been entitled and subject in case the lease or tenancy had determined in manner aforesaid at the expiration of such current year. Provided always that no notice to quit shall be necessary or required by or from either party to determine any such holding and occupation as aforesaid.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 25, s. 1.

Emblers de gentz [Fr.], a stealing from the people. The phrase occurs in our old rolls of Parliament:—Whereas divers murders, emblers de gentz, and robberies are committed, &c.—Rot. Parl. 21 Edw. III. n. 62.

Embraceor [fr. embrasour, Fr.], he that, when a matter is in trial between party and party, comes to the bar with one of the parties, having received some reward so to do, and speaks in the case; or privately labours the jury, or stands in the court to survey and overlook them, whereby they are awed or influenced, or put in fear or doubt of the matter.—19 Hen. VII. c. 13. But counsel, attornies, &c., may speak in the case for their clients and not be embraceors.

Embracery, an attempt to influence a jury corruptly in favour of one party in a trial, by promises, persuasions, entreaties, money, entertainments, and the like. The punishment for this misdemeanor in the person embracing and the juror embraced is by the common law, and also by statute 6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 61, fine and imprisonment.

Embring days [fr. embers, cineres, Lat., because our ancestors, when they fasted, sat in ashes, or strewed them on their heads], those days which the ancient fathers called quatuor tempora jejunii, are of great antiquity in the church; they are observed on Wednesday, Friday and Saturday next after Quadragesima Sunday, or the first Sunday in Lent, after Whitsuntide, Holyrood-day in September, and St. Lucy's-day, about the middle of December. Brit. c. liii. Our almanacs call the weeks in which they fall the Ember-weeks, and they are now chiefly noticed on account of the ordination of priests and deacons; because the canon appoints the Sundays next after the Ember-weeks for the solemn times of ordination; though the bishops, if they please, may ordain on any Sunday or holiday.—Encyc. Lon.; Wheat. Com. Pr.

Emendals, an old word still made use of in the accounts of the society of the Inner Temple; where so much in emendals at the foot of an account on the balance thereof, signifies so much money in the bank or stock of the houses, for reparation of losses, or other emergent occasions.—Spelm.

Emendare, to make amends for any crime or trespass committed. And a capital crime, not to be atoned by fine, was said to be inemendabile.—Leg. Canut. 2.

Emendatio, the power of amending and correcting abuses, according to stated rules and measures.

Emergent year, the epoch or date whence any people begin to compute their time. Our emergent year is sometimes the year of the creation, but more usually the year of the birth of Christ. See CALENDAR.

Emigration Commissioners. See 18 & 19 Vict. c. 119, s. 6.

Emigration of Paupers. See 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 76, s. 62; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 29; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 110, s. 5; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103, s. 20; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 101, s. 4.

Eminence, an honorary title given to cardinals. They were called illustrissimi and reverendissimi until the pontificate of Urban VIII.

Eminent domain, the right which a government retains over the estates of individuals to resume them for public use.

Emissary, a person sent upon a mission as the agent of another; also a secret agent sent to ascertain the sentiments and designs of others, and to propagate opinions favourable to his employer.

Empalement, a mode of inflicting punishment, by thrusting a sharp pole up the fundament.—Encyc. Lon.

Empannel [fr. panne, Fr.], the writing or entering by the sheriff, on a parchment schedule or roll of paper, the names of a jury summoned by him.—Cowel.

Emparlance. See IMPARLANCE.

Emperor [fr. empereur, Fr., imperator, Lat.], a sovereign prince who bears rule over large kingdoms and territories; a monarch of title and dignity superior to a king. The title imperator was by the early Romans conferred on renowned and victorious generals who acquired great power and dominion, and was by degrees extended to signify a commander-in-chief sent upon important military service. After the time of the Antonines the term was applied to the sovereign ruler of the Roman Empire, and after the fall of the Western Empire, the title was assumed by Charlemagne, the founder of the second or German Empire. When the German branch of the Carlovingian family became extinct, the imperial crown became elective, and so continued until the last century. The title of Emperor of Germany was given up by Francis II., who, in lieu of it, assumed the title of Emperor of Austria. The title of Emperor of the French was assumed by Napoleon I., and has been again assumed by Napoleon III. The sovereign of Russia is also styled emperor. King Edgar, in an old charter, styles himself Imperator.

Emphyteusis, the jus emphyteuticarium, or as it is more generally called emphyteusis, was the right of enjoying all the fruits, and disposing at pleasure of the property of another, subject to the payment of a yearly rent (pensio or canon) to the owner. Formerly the lands of the Roman municipalities, or of the college of priests, used to be let for different terms of years, sometimes for a short term, such as that of five years, sometimes for a term amounting almost to a perpetuity, under the name of agri vectigales (Gai. iii. 145). Afterwards the lands of private individuals were let in a similar manner, and were also comprehended under the term agri vectigales. The emperors let their patrimonial lands in a similar way, and these lands so let were termed emphyteuticarii (C. xi. 58, 61), a name arising from there being a new ownership, or what almost amounted to an ownership, engrafted (ἐν, φυτεύω) on the real dominium. Either shortly before or in the time of Justinian, the two rights, that of the ager vectigales, and that of emphyteusis, were united under the common name of emphyteusis, and subjected to particular regulations. Both lands and buildings could be subject to emphyteusis (Nov. vii. 3, 1, 2). The emphyteuta, as the person who enjoyed the right was termed, besides enjoying all the rights of usufructuary, could dispose of the thing or rather of his rights over it in any way he pleased (Nov. vii. 3, 2); he could create a servitude over it or mortgage it (D. xiii. 7, 16, 2); he had a real action (which, however, was said to be a utilis vindicatio, because he was not the owner, but only in the place of one) to defend or assert his rights; and at his death his rights were transmitted to his heirs (Nov. vii. 3).

He was obliged to pay his pensio under any circumstances, whether he actually benefitted by his emphyteusis or not, because the payment of rent was an acknowledgment of the title of the dominus. He was also bound to use the thing over which his right extended, so that it was not deteriorated in value at the time his right expired (Nov. vii. 3, 2).—Sand. Just. 226.

Empire, the dominion or jurisdiction of an emperor; the region over which the dominion of an emperor extends; imperial power; supreme dominion; sovereign command.

Emplead, to indict; to prefer a charge against; to accuse.

Emporium [fr. ἐμπόριον, Gk., a trading-place], a place for wholesale trade in commodities carried by sea. The name is sometimes applied to a seaport town, but it properly signifies only a particular place in such a town. The word is derived from ἔμπορος, which signifies in Homer a person who sails as a passenger in a ship belonging to another person (Od. ii. 319; xxiv. 300); but in later writers it signifies the merchant or wholesale dealer, and differs from κάπηλος, the retail dealer, in that it is applied to the merchant who carries on commerce with foreign countries, while the κάπηλος purchases his goods from the ἔμπορος, and retails them in the market-place.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Emption, the act of buying; a purchase.

Emptor, a buyer or purchaser.

Empture, bought, hired.—Scott.

Enabling statute, 32 Hen. VIII. c. 28, A.D. 1540. By the common law, all persons may make leases to endure so long as their interest in the land continues, but no longer. This statute enabled first a tenant-in-tail to make a lease for three lives, or twenty-one years, to bind his issue. Secondly, a husband seised in right of his wife in fee-simple or fee-tail, to make a similar lease to bind his wife and her heirs, provided she join therein. Thirdly, ecclesiastical persons seised of an estate of fee-simple in right of their churches (not parsons or vicars who are seised for life only), to make leases to bind their successors. But certain requisites must be observed in making those leases.—2 Bl. Com. 219. This act is repealed by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, s. 35, except so far as relates to leases made by persons having an estate in the right of their churches. There are other enabling statutes, by which ecclesiastical lands may be leased. See Platt on Leases, 238–312; and Woodf. L. & T. 22, et seq. A consolidation of these acts would be very desirable.

Enach, the satisfaction for a crime; the recompense for a fault.—Scotch term.

Enact, to act, perform, or effect; to establish by law; to decree.

Enbrever, to write down in short.—Brit. 56.

Encaustum. See INCAUSTUM.

Enceinte, pregnant, big with child.

Encheason [old law Fr.], cause; occasion. Skin.; Cowel; Bailey.

Endenize, or Endenizen, to make free; to enfranchise.

Endite. See INDITE.

Endorsement, superscription; writing on the back; ratification.

Endowed. The Endowed Schools Act, 1860, 23 Vict. c. 11.

Endowment, wealth applied to any person or use. The assuring dower to a woman; the setting forth a sufficient portion for a vicar towards his perpetual maintenance, when the benefice is appropriated.—Cowel.

En eschange il covient que les estates soient égales.—Co. Litt. 50.—(In an exchange it is necessary that the estates be equal.)

Enfeoffment, the act of investing with any dignity or possession; also the instrument or deed by which a person is invested with possessions.

Enfranchise, to make free, or incorporate a person in a society, &c.

Enfranchisement, investiture of the privileges of a denizen; also the act of incorporating a person into a society.

As to enfranchisement of copyholds, see COPYHOLD.

England [fr. eng, Teut., narrow, strait, a nook]. Verstegan, in p. 147 of his Restitution of Decayed Intelligence in Antiquities, quaintly observes as follows:—'To come now unto the cause of the general calling of our ancestors by the name of Englishmen, and our country consequently by the name of England, it is to be noted, that the seven petty kingdoms of Kent, South Saxons, East English, West Saxons, East Saxons, Northumbers, and Mercians came in fine one after another, by means of the West Saxons, who subdued and got the sovereignty of all the rest, to be all brought under one monarchy under King Egbert, King of the said West Saxons. This king, then, considering that so many different names as the distinct kingdoms before had caused were no more necessary, and that as the people were all originally of one nation, so was it fit they should again be brought under one name; and although they had had the general name of Saxons, as unto this day (1605) they are of the Welsh and Irish called, yet did he rather choose and ordain that they should be all called Englishmen, as but a part of them before was called, and that the country should be called England. To the affectation of which name of Englishmen, it should seem he was chiefly moved in respect of Pope Gregory, his alluding the name of Engelisce unto Angellyke. The name of Engel is yet at this present in all the Teutonic tongues, to wit, the high and low Duitsh, &c., as much to say as Angel, and if a Dutchman be asked how he would in his language call an Angellykeman, he would answer ein Engelsch-man, and being asked how in his own language he would or doth call an Englishman, he can give no other name for him, but even the very same that he gave before for an Angellykeman, that is, as before is said, ein Engelsch-man; Engel being in their tongue an Angel; and English, which they write Engelsche, Angellyke. And such reason and consideration may have moved our former kings, upon their best coin of pure and fine gold, to set the image of an angel, which may be supposed has as well been used before the Roman conquest as since.

'Thus the name generally of Saxons was by the ordinance of noble King Egbert, about the year of our Lord 800, brought into the general name of Englishmen, which being a name of such glory, as the derivation showeth it, ever may they with all increase of honor therein continue.

'The country was accordingly called Engaland, and by abbreviation England, a name which well accords unto two significations, for first it seems to have had it by reason of the English people, whose land it now was; and secondly, in regard of the form or fashion thereof, for that it grows unto a narrowness both towards the north and towards the west: the name of the first, or old England, whereof before I have spoken, having risen (as most apparently it seemeth) for like cause and reason of the straightness or narrowness thereof.'

Enlarger l'estate, a species of release which enures by way of enlarging an estate, and consists of a conveyance of the ulterior interest to the particular tenant; as if there be tenant for life or years, remainder to another in fee, and he in remainder releases all his right to the particular tenant and his heirs, this gives him the estate in fee.—1 *Step. Enrolment, register, record; writing in which anything is recorded.

By the Statute of Enrolments, 27 Hen. VIII. c. 16, every bargain and sale of a freehold interest is to be enrolled in Chancery within six [lunar] months after its date.

No assurance by a tenant-in-tail, under the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, will have any operation unless it be enrolled in the Court of Chancery within six calendar months after its execution, which enrolment will be sufficient of itself, even where the conveyance is by bargain and sale, within the Statute of Enrolments. This provision does not extend to copyholds, the enrolment then being on the court-rolls of the manor.

If a party to a suit in equity, who has obtained a decree or order, is desirous of preventing a rehearing of the cause before the judge pronouncing the same, or of preventing an appeal to the Lord Chancellor, or Lords Justices of Appeal, it must be enrolled. So also where a decree is pronounced either by the Master of the Rolls, or one of the Vice-Chancellors, and the party, instead of appealing to the Lord Chancellor, or Lords Justices of Appeal, is desirous of appealing at once to the House of Lords, the decree must first be enrolled. The effect of enrolling a decree of the Lord Chancellor is to prevent its being reheard by him. After a decree is enrolled, it can only be reversed or altered either by appeal to the House of Lords or by bill of review. It may be enrolled immediately after it has been passed and entered, unless a caveat have been entered, and then, if the party entering it does not present his petition of appeal or rehearing within twenty-eight days, the enrolment may be perfected. By Consol. Ord. 1860, xxiii. r. 24, the expenses of enrolment of decrees and orders are diminished: and by Ord. xxii. r. 16, the defendant has power to vacate the enrolment under certain circumstances. The enrolment may be vacated generally where the merits have not been gone into, or the decree was obtained and enrolled through the neglect of the opposite solicitor, or where it was obtained by surprise.

Entering short. When bills not due are paid into a bank by a customer, it is the custom of some bankers not to carry the amount of the bills directly to his credit, but to 'enter them short' as it is called, i. e. to note down the receipt of the bills, their amounts, and the times when they become due in a previous column of the page, and the amounts when received are carried forward into the usual cash column. See Giles v. Perkins, 9 East, p. 13. Sometimes instead of entering such bills short, bankers credit the customer directly with the amount of the bills as cash, charging interest on any advances they may make on their account, and allow him at once to draw upon them to that amount. If the banker becomes bankrupt, the property in bills entered short does not pass to his assignees, but the customer is entitled to them if they remain in his hands, or to their proceeds, if received, subject to any lien the banker may have upon them.

Entierty [fr. entier, Fr.], the whole.

Entire Tenancy, a sole possession by one person, called severalty, which is contrary to several tenancy where a joint or common possession is in one or more.

Entireties, Tenancy by. Where an estate is conveyed or devised to a man and his wife during coverture, they are said to be tenants by entireties, that is, each is said to be seised of the whole estate, and neither of a part. The consequence is, that the husband's conveyance alone will not have any effect against his wife's surviving. The husband being seised of the whole estate during coverture, either in his own right or jure uxoris, can of course part with that interest; but to make a complete conveyance of all the interests held in entirety, the wife must concur. Tenants by entireties are seised per tout, and not per my et per tout. This species of tenancy seems to be an exception to the rule that the husband and wife are one person in law; if they are to be considered as one person, the husband should be able to convey alone, which in this case he cannot do.—Watk. Conv. 170.

Entirety, the whole; completeness.

Entrepôt [Fr.], a warehouse or magazine for the deposit of goods.

Entry, the depositing of a document in the proper office or place; actual entry on land is necessary to constitute a seisin in deed, and is necessary in certain cases, as, e. g. to perfect a common law lease.

When a person without any right has taken possession of land, the party entitled may make a formal but peaceable entry, which is quite an extrajudicial and summary remedy, on such lands, declaring that thereby he takes possession, which notorious act of ownership is equivalent to a feodal investiture by the lord; or he may enter on any part of it in the same county, declaring it to be in the name of the whole; but if it lie in different counties, he must make different entries for the notoriety of such entry and claim. This remedy by entry takes place in three only of the five species of ouster—viz. abatement, intrusion, and disseissin; for as in these the original entry of the wrongdoer was unlawful, they may therefore be remedied by the mere entry of him who has right. But upon a discontinuance or deforcement, the owner of the estate cannot enter, but is driven to his action; for herein the original entry being lawful, and thereby an apparent right of possession being gained, the law will not suffer that right to be overthrown by the mere act or entry of the claimant.—1 Inst. 57.

An action must be brought within twenty years next after a right of entry first accrued, ten years being allowed after the determination of disabilities, provided it be not more than forty years in the whole. No continual or other claim upon or near any land shall preserve any right of making any entry or distress, or of bringing an action. No descent-cast which may happen or be made after the 31st of December, 1833, shall toll or defeat any right of entry or action for the recovery of land. All writs of entry and real actions by which lands might have been formerly recovered, except dower, dower unde nihil habet, and quare impedit, are abolished.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

In Scotch law, it refers to the acknowledgment of the title of the heir, &c., to be admitted by the superior.

This title, which seems to have been introduced by the Jutes of Kent, occurs frequently in the laws of the kings of that district, the first mention of it being in Ethb. 13. Its more general use among us dates from the later Scandinavian invasions; and though originally only a title of honor, it became in later times one of office, nearly supplanting the older and more Saxon one of 'ealdorman.'—*Anc. It was an old custom that upon certain feasts some lay person should plait his hair, and put on the garments of a bishop, and in them pretend to exercise episcopal jurisdiction, and do several ludicrous actions, for which reason he was called bishop of the boys; and this custom obtained here long after several constitutions were made to abolish it.—Blount. Such an officer is mentioned in the statutes of some of the cathedrals of the old foundation in England

Equitable Defences at Common Law. 'The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854' (ss. 83–86), enables any defendant, or plaintiff in replevin, to plead the facts which would entitle him, if judgment were obtained against him, to relief in equity from such judgment on equitable ground, by way of defence; such a plea to begin with the words, 'For defence on equitable grounds,' or words to the like effect. Should such equitable defence arise after the period during which it could be pleaded, it may then be set up by way of auditâ querelâ. The plaintiff is allowed to avoid such defence by a replication upon equitable grounds, commencing with the words, 'For replication on equitable grounds,' or words to the like effect. There is a right reserved to the court of law, or any judge of it, to strike out upon discretionary terms any equitable plea or replication which cannot be dealt with at law so as to do justice between the parties. Under these circumstances, it is presumed that a litigant will be remitted to the Court of Chancery for the purpose of vindicating his equitable rights.

The effect of this statutory jurisdiction is not to bring Chancery suits into the Common Law Courts, but simply to enable defendants in actions to set up what would be absolute defences in equity.

Equitable Estates, one of the three kinds of property in lands and tenements; the other two being legal property and customary property.

That is properly an equitable estate or interest, for which a court of equity affords the only remedy: and of this nature especially, is the benefit of every trust, express or implied, which is not converted into a legal estate by the Statute of Uses. The rest are equities of redemption, constructive trusts, and all equitable charges.—Burton's Comp. c. viii.

Equitable Lien. See LIEN.

Equitable Mortgage. The following mortgages are equitable:

(1) Where the subject of a mortgage is trust property, which security is effected either by a formal deed or a written memorandum, notice being given to the trustees in order to preserve the priority.

(2) Where it is an equity of redemption, which is merely a right to file a bill or claim in equity to redeem the estate.

(3) Where there is a written agreement only to make a mortgage, which creates an equitable lien on the land.

(4) Where a debtor deposits the title-deeds of his estate with his creditor or some person on his behalf, without even a verbal communication. The deposit itself is deemed evidence of an executed agreement or contract for a mortgage for such estate.

This transaction, which appears to be a judicial repeal of the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 4, is extensively resorted to, and is known in practice as an equitable mortgage by deposit of title-deeds. The title-deeds may be deposited at different times, if it be in pursuance of the original contract, and, perhaps, a deposit of the conveyance to the mortgagor will alone constitute an equitable mortgage. A deposit of a material portion of the title-deeds to an estate is a sufficient equitable mortgage of such property.—Lacon v. Allen, 4 W. R. 693 (1856). When it is proposed to effect an equitable mortgage of joint-stock shares, the shareholder and depositary should give notice to the company's officer that the former has agreed to make the deeds of his shares a security for a sum of money which the latter is advancing on them, as this converts the officer into a trustee of the deeds for the lender. The shareholder should sign an agreement to execute a formal mortgage whenever required; and it would be proper, in order to denude himself of every symbol of possession, to hand over the certificates, though this does not appear to be absolutely essential.

The deposit will extend to and cover subsequent advances, upon proof that they were made upon the faith of such security, or that the deposit was originally made as a security, as well for the first as for any subsequent advance, or that the original deposit was continued with an agreement for a further advance. Where a deposit of deeds has been made with a firm, if it is the intention of the parties that the deposit should be for the benefit of any of its future members, such intention should either be expressly stated in the memorandum made on the deposit, or be proved by parol evidence; but dealings with the new firm may afford sufficient evidence of a new agreement with them, so as to give them the benefit of the deposit.

A deposit of title-deeds is good against the Crown, if made before their depositor became its debtor, either by record or specialty, and also against the creditors of their bankrupt-depositor, unless it is plainly a fraudulent preference. An equitable mortgagee, who advanced his money bonâ fide, may protect his equitable estate, and gain priority, by obtaining the legal estate from his debtor, even in contemplation of his bankruptcy.—Hiern v. Mill, 13 Ves. 122 (1806). Such a depositary retains his right in equity, to enforce his security against the title of a creditor under a subsequent judgment, although the latter may have acquired the legal seisin and possession of the land under an elegit, without notice of the equitable mortgage.—Whitworth v. Gaugain, 3 Hare 416 (1844), affirmed by Lord Lyndhurst, 1 Ph. 728. A depositee of title-deeds is entitled to priority over a subsequent legal mortgagee or purchaser, who lent or paid his money with notice of the deposit, but not in the absence of such notice; for then the equities of these parties being equal, the law must prevail.

A deposit in the hands of one person will not secure an advance made by another person, unless the former person be merely a trustee, who has not lent any money upon it.

An equitable mortgage being a contract for a mortgage, the mortgagee may file a bill or claim in Equity, either for a legal mortgage, a foreclosure and conveyance, or a sale.

Where an equitable mortgagor is a trader liable to bankruptcy, the deposit should be accompanied by a written memorandum; because then, in case of bankruptcy, the mortgagee will be entitled to the costs of his petition to the court for the sale of the property. These he will not be entitled to in the absence of such a memorandum. See Lord Loughborough's General Order in Bankruptcy, of the 8th March 1794, and the Rules in Bankruptcy, 55–58.

Where an equitable mortgagee is satisfied upon a bankruptcy, no release from him is necessary, nor will the expense of it, if taken, be allowed in the solicitor's bill.

A mere depositary of a lease cannot be compelled to take a legal assignment so as to enable the lessor to sue him at law on the covenants in the lease, nor is he liable to them until he has made himself legal assignee.

Equitable Waste. See WASTE.

Equity [fr. æquitas, Lat.] There seems to be some confusion with regard to the meaning of Equity, as a scheme of jurisprudence, distinct from the common and ecclesiastical laws. This confusion would appear to be a result of not sufficiently distinguishing before defining. 'Equity' is obviously an equivocal term: the difficulty then lies in drawing dividing lines between the several senses in which it is used. Its three leading senses, however, are distinguishable in this way:—

(1) Taken broadly and philosophically, Equity means to do to all men as we would they should do unto us, compendiously enjoined in the Justinian Pandects, honeste vivere, alterum non lædere, suum cuique tribuere. This is Natural Equity, which, being derived from the principles of universal truth and justice, prescribes piety and reverence towards GOD, the Maker and Disposer of us all; honesty and benevolence to one another, by doing good and eschewing evil; and chastity and temperance in our own life and actions. It is clear, that human tribunals cannot cope with so wide a range of duties as Natural Equity comprehends; not only on account of the difficulty of framing laws to enforce them, but also from the impracticability of compelling such obligations as piety, gratitude, charity, and kindness, which are binding in conscience only; not to say anything of the doubtful policy (even if it were practicable) of reducing moral motives to legal compulsions.

(2) Taken, however, in a less universal sense, Equity is used in contradistinction to strict law. This is Moral Equity, which should be the genius of every kind of human jurisprudence; since it expounds and limits the language of the positive laws, and construes them not according to their strict letter, but rather in their reasonable and benignant spirit.

Aristotle, in his discussion concerning Moral Equity, Ethics, B. V. c. x., calls it the correction of mere law, which (being altogether universal, and it not being possible to treat a subject exhaustively, when speaking universally) takes the most obvious case, from an impossibility of providing for every possible predicament in express words. Now, this fault is not in the law, nor the legislature, but in the nature of the thing itself; for the subject-matter of human conduct is altogether of this description. When, therefore, the law speaks universally, and a matter happens somewhat differing from the case provided for, then it is proper that where the legislator falls short, and has erred from speaking generally, to fill up the deficiency, as the legislator would himself direct if he were present, or as he would have included in the law, if he had anticipated the matter. This, then, is the nature of Moral Equity, that it is a rectification or correction of justice, where it is deficient from speaking universally, for this is the reason why all things are not directed by positive law, that on every casual subject it is impossible to forecast a law. And Lord Bacon has said, 'there is no law under Heaven which is not supplied with Equity; for summum jus, summa injuria; or as some have it summa lex, summa crux.' If thou take all that the words of the law giveth thee, thou shalt sometimes do against the law! From the application of Moral Equity to 'fetch out the sense of the legislator,' spring the several rules for the interpretation of law, and the guidance of that judgment which, unfettered by the mere letter, decides a controversy in accordance with the spirit of the given provision.

Ratio legis est anima legis. So that Moral Equity, being the sound and judicial exposition of a law, is, or ought to be, the active principle at work in every court of justice. In omnibus, maxime tamen in jure, æquitas spectanda est.

(3) But it is in neither of these senses that Equity is to be understood as the substantial justice which is expounded by our courts of Chancery. It is here accepted in a more limited and technical sense, and may be called Municipal Equity, and described as the system of supplemental law administered in Chancery, and founded upon defined rules, recorded precedents, and established principles, to which it closely adheres; the judges, however, liberally expounding and developing them, in order to meet novel exigencies. While it aims to assist the defects of the common law, by extending relief to those rights of property which the strict law does not recognise, and by giving more ample and distributive redress than the ordinary tribunals afford, it by no means either controls, mitigates, or supersedes the common law, but rather guides itself by its analogies, and does not assume any power to subvert its doctrines. This is amply shown by two well-known maxims of the Court of Chancery, viz. Æquitas sequitur legem, and Where the Equities are equal the Common Law must prevail.

The grand characteristic of Municipal Equity is displayed in the nature and extent of its redress. Not content, as the Common Law generally is, to adjudicate strictly and absolutely in rem, i. e. upon the transaction itself, as it is presented by the litigants; Equity insists upon the conscientious obligations of the suitors, and by adjudicating in personam, compels an actual completion of the matter intended to be accomplished by the parties, adjusting, qualifying, and restraining their several and sometimes conflicting rights, duties, and interests. It also grapples with anticipated injuries, by preventing the perpetration of meditated or threatened mischief; a very wholesome prerogative, since an interdictive power is more valuable and frequently of much greater efficacy than a merely compensative or punitory function.

An Equity Judge pronounces his decision upon the proofs, arguments, and merits presented to him without the assistance of a jury; yet, if a serious doubt be entertained as to a question of fact, the court may direct an issue upon it to be tried by a judge and jury at common law, and may now itself impannel a jury to award damages to an injured party either in addition to or in substitution for an injunction or specific performance, pursuant to 'The Chancery Amendment Act, 1858,' 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27. The mode of taking evidence has lately undergone considerable alteration by the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 28, which abolished the system of examining witnesses upon written interrogatories, unless specially ordered by the court; and enacted by its sections 30, 31, and 32, that allegations shall be verified by affidavit, unless either party elect to have the evidence taken orally either by an examiner, in town, or one specially appointed in the country, who then records it in the form of a narrative, the witnesses being subjected to examination-in-chief, cross-examination, and re-examination in the presence of the suitors, their counsel, and solicitors; the public, however, or a short-hand writer, not being admitted unless allowed by such examiner. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, ss. 28–41, and Orders of the 7th of August, 1852, pl. 31–39, and of 13th Jan. 1855. Also Wright v. Wilkin, 6 W. R. (V. C. K.) 643 (1858).

Any attempt to trace the origin and growth of Equity Jurisprudence can only excite curiosity, without satisfying inquiry; for, although less ancient than the common law, yet, like many a venerable institution, its birth is hidden among the disruptions of systems during our elder time, and its progress shrouded amidst the haze and palpable obscure of our mediæval history; so that authenticity is unattainable, and all that is left to an antiquary, examining the sparse and disjected materials, is at best the moulding of an ingenious theory, or the construction of a plausible myth.—See 4 Reeves, 368; 5 Ibid. 158.

The jurisdiction of Chancery is fourfold:—

1st. The Common Law or Ordinary jurisdiction, by which the Lord Chancellor is a privy councillor, and prolocutor of the House of Lords. The writs for a new parliament issue out of this department; but in case of a vacancy during the session, the Speaker, on the motion of a member, directs the Clerk of the Crown, by warrant, to issue a new writ. The Petty Bag Office is in this jurisdiction; it is a Court of Common Law and of Record; pleas of scire facias to repeal letters-patent are here exhibited, together with many other matters, and all original writs issue hereout.

2nd. The Statutory jurisdiction. Here the Lord Chancellor exercises his power under the celebrated Habeas Corpus Act, inquires into charitable uses, and hears appeals in bankruptcy. Under this jurisdiction the judges in Chancery are entrusted with numerous authorities which are conferred upon them wholly and solely by acts of parliament. The statutes which regulate or enlarge the Equity jurisdiction are not to be classed under this division.

3rd. The Specially Delegated jurisdiction. Under this head the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices of Appeal have exclusive authority over the persons and property of idiots and lunatics.

4th. The Equity or Extraordinary jurisdiction. It has been suggested, and with great propriety, that the usual arrangement of Equity principles is by no means analytical or clear, and that the particulars of such jurisdiction would have been better arranged under two principal branches—as, first, in favor of creditors or claimants who seek to establish some claim; and, secondly, on behalf of parties who seek to resist some present or future claim. Such an arrangement would, no doubt, be more lucid and philosophical; but inasmuch as the best treatises have adopted the usual divisions of the subject, I will follow them, rather than this more preferable system, because, from being more known, they will be less confusing.

The Equity or Extraordinary jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, then, is distributable into three subdivisions, namely:—

(I.) The Assistant, being auxiliary to the Common Law, under which range matters of—

(c) Removal of improper impediments, and prevention of unconscientious defences, at Common Law.

(d) Giving effect to, and relieving from the consequences of, Common Law judgments.

(II.) The Concurrent with the Common Law, comprehending—

(a) The remedial correction of fraud.

(c) Accident.

(g) Interpleader.

(h) The delivery up of documents and specific chattels.

(i) The specific performance of agreements.

And

(III.) The Exclusive, relating to

(c) The equitable rights of wives.

(d) Legal and equitable mortgages.

(e) The assignment of choses en action.

(g) The appointment of receivers.

Equity Courts. See CHANCERY.

Equity of Redemption. There is no clearer instance of the beneficent interposition of municipal equity to supply the deficiencies of a strict common law than its operation on the conscience of a mortgagee, who, although he has become absolute owner of the legal estate in the pledged property (no matter how much its value might exceed the loan), on account of the breach of the condition for repayment of the loan within the strict time, yet is compelled to reconvey the legal estate to the mortgagor, who applies to equity to redeem it before foreclosure, and within 20 years of the last written acknowledgment (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 28), on payment of the principal, interest and costs, equity treating the breach of the condition as a penalty which it abhors; and the retention for the mortgagee's own benefit of that which was intended simply as a pledge, as contrary to the soul and spirit of substantial justice.

This right or equity of redemption is, in the contemplation of the Court of Chancery, the ancient estate in the property without change of ownership. It is therefore subject to all the limitations to which other equitable estates are liable. It is treated as an equitable asset. While an equity of redemption of a mortgage in fee is liable to forfeiture for treason only, the equity of redemption of a mortgage by demise is forfeitable for felony as well as treason.

An equity of redemption may be mortgaged toties quoties, until it is barred by a decree in equity, and each incumbrancer of it has preference according to his priority in time.

The following dangers and disadvantages attend this species of security:—

That a prior mortgagee may be postponed to a subsequent mortgagee, who, having advanced the loan without notice of such prior mortgagee, afterwards acquires the legal estate.

That the first mortgagee may, either before or after the mortgage of the equity of redemption, in the absence of any notice of it, make further advances and tack them to his first security, to the displacement of the mesne mortgage. In order to guard against this disparagement, the mortgagee of an equity of redemption should not only inquire of the first mortgagee the amount of his loan, but must give him express notice of his own advance. And notice of it should be put on the principal title-deed, in order to avoid the chance of the mortgagor redeeming the first mortgage, and conveying the legal estate to a person without notice of the mesne mortgage, who would thus gain a preference to such unintimated equitable mortgage.

That the mortgagor may have secretly effected a prior charge on the equity of redemption. And although the perpetration of so gross a fraud would forfeit his equity of redemption pursuant to 4 & 5 Wm. III. c. 16, yet this will be small consolation to such a mortgagee.

That such a mortgagee has not any legal remedy, so as to affect the estate itself, but only equitable relief.

Equity of a Statute, the reason and spirit of a statute, and not its mere letter.

Equity to a Wife's Settlement. While our common law permits a husband to possess himself absolutely of the whole of his wife's personal property and the profits of her realty, and affords him every facility to enforce his right thereto, in consideration of the obligation which, upon marriage, he contracts of maintaining her and his children by her; yet, inasmuch as the common law is defective in not possessing any means of insuring the performance of the duty imposed upon the husband, since, in many cases, he might have it in his power to alien all the property to which he is entitled jure mariti, or upon his becoming bankrupt or insolvent it would vest in his assignees for the benefit of his creditors, and thus his wife, however great may have been her fortune, might, with her children, be left utterly destitute; equity exercises its parental care, and compels him, whenever he or any person claiming in his right is obliged to sue for the recovery of the wife's property in Chancery, to make a settlement of some portion of it, which is entirely in the discretion of the court (unless it be under 200*l.* or 10*l.* in annual payments, and the husband is not insolvent), on his wife (provided her conduct have been proper and virtuous, and she is otherwise unprovided for, or inadequately provided for), as its condition for giving him assistance, since 'he who asks equity must do equity;' and the court will enforce this right, whether the wife be a plaintiff or defendant in the proceedings. The general rule is to settle one-half, but the whole will be settled if the husband be insolvent or have deserted his wife, or there has been a dissolution of marriage on the ground of his adultery.—Barrow v. Barrow, 3 Eq. Rep. 149 (1854); Morgan v. Morgan, 2 Eq. Rep. 1270 (1854).

The court will not, at the present day, in judging of the wife's right to a settlement, take into account what the husband has already received. Recent decisions have quite overturned this notion, which was once entertained. And the wife of a man who is domiciled in a country according to the law of which he is absolutely entitled to all her personal property, of whatever nature, has not equity to a settlement out of an equitable chose en action in England. The court will not settle the reversionary interest of a married woman, but a supplemental bill must be filed when the interest falls into possession.

Should he refuse to make the settlement directed, the court will preserve the capital of the property for the wife and children, and order the interest to be accumulated for her benefit, should he have had a large portion through the wife, which he has spent, unless indeed he be actually starving for want of a maintenance. If the husband desert his wife, and leave her destitute, equity will not allow him to touch either the principal or income of the property, but will direct a maintenance from it for the wife and children (if any). And maintenance will sometimes be given to the wife where she has been obliged to leave her husband on account of his cruelty.

Equity will also direct a settlement to be made on the wife out of her equitable estate, upon her own application, through her next friend, against her husband, or those claiming under him. If, however, before any proceeding in Chancery be commenced, the property be paid or transferred to the husband, it will then be too late to apply to the court for its aid to insist upon a settlement out of it on the wife and children. But a settlement cannot be thus avoided after proceedings have been initiated. If the wife be of full age, and had not been a ward of court, married without its consent, she can waive her equity, and that of her children, to a settlement, and consent that the whole property be given up to her husband.

If a wife wish to waive her equity to a settlement, her consent to her husband having her property must be formally taken upon her examination in court, or under a commission issuing from the court. Where the wife waives her equity to a settlement, and consents to her husband having her property, an affidavit must be made by the husband and wife, either that there was no settlement upon their marriage, or if there was a settlement, it should be produced, and an affidavit made by the husband and wife that there was no other settlement, and that the settlement itself does not affect the property which the wife consents to her husband having.

The settlement directed by the court usually extends to the children; but the equity to a settlement is strictly personal to the wife. If, therefore, she die before asserting her right, her children cannot insist upon a settlement. When the wife has entered into a contract, or has obtained a decree for a settlement, the interests of the children will not then be defeated if she die without waiving it. The court will not render any assistance to a wife who leaves her husband without adequate cause, or who has been guilty of adultery.

If the husband, prior to the marriage, settle property upon his wife, either expressly or impliedly, in consideration of the fortune she then is, or may afterwards become, entitled to, the wife being a party to such settlement, she will not be entitled to any settlement out of her equitable property, whether her husband's settlement be adequate or not, for he has then become the purchaser of his wife's property; but if his settlement be made after marriage in consideration of his wife's equitable property, then, if it be not adequate, the court will allow the wife a further settlement out of such equitable estate.—Lady Elibank v. Montolieu, 5 Ves. 737 (1801), and Murray v. Lord Elibank, 10 Ves. 84 (1804), and 13 Ves. 1 (1806), and 1 White and Tudor's Lead. Cases, 285–323. It is becoming the practice, when the property is small, to order it into court, and the dividends to be paid to the wife during her life; this saves the costs of a settlement.

Equuleus, a kind of rack for extorting confessions, at first chiefly practised on criminals, but afterwards made use of against the Christians. It was made of wood, having holes at certain distances, with a screw, by which a criminal was stretched to the third, sometimes to the fourth or fifth hole, his arms and legs being fastened on the equuleus with cords; and thus was hoisted aloft, and extended in such a manner, that all his bones were dislocated. In this state, red-hot plates were applied to his body, and he was goaded in the sides with an instrument called ungula.—Encyc. Lond.

Era. See ÆRA.

Eregimus (we have erected).

Eriach [Irish], recompence for murder.—Spenser's Ireland.

Ern [locus secretus, Lat.], the names of places ending in ern are said to imply a melancholy situation.

Erotomania [fr. ἔρως, love, and μανία, frenzy], sometimes also called Erotico-mania, a disease of the brain characterised by a morbid condition of mind, and frequently by delusion, on sexual subjects. The distinction between it and Nymphomania is that in the latter, although the condition of mind is similar, the disease is caused by a local disorder of the sexual organs reacting on the brain.

Errant [itinerant], applied to justices on circuit, and bailiffs at large, &c. See EYRE.

Erraticum, a waif or stray.

Error. Error must be brought within six years after judgment, signed or entered of record, or if the person entitled to bring error be then under any of the disabilities of infancy, coverture, lunacy, or absence beyond seas, within six years after the removal of the disability. If the opposite party be at the time judgment is signed or entered of record beyond the seas, then within six years after his return. The writ of error is abolished, and a memorandum of the error in law delivered to the master is in lieu of it; the master files it, and gives a note of its receipt, a copy of which, with a statement of the grounds of error, being served on the opposite party or his attorney, supersedes the execution, upon proper bail being given within four clear days after lodging the memorandum alleging error. The assignment of and joinder in error in law are not necessary; but a suggestion to the effect that error is alleged by the one party, and denied by the other, is entered on the judgment-roll in the form prescribed by the act. If the defendant in error, however, intend to rely upon the proceeding in error being barred by lapse of time, or by release of error, or other like matter of fact, he may give four days' written notice to the plaintiff in error, to assign error as heretofore, instead of entering the suggestion; and he must, within eight days, plead thereto the bar by lapse of time, or release of error, or other like matter of fact; and thereupon such proceedings may be had as heretofore. The roll is made up, and the suggestion entered by the plaintiff in error within ten days after the service of the note, otherwise the defendant may sign judgment of non pros. The judgment-roll is now brought into court instead of a transcript. Either party alleging error in fact may deliver to one of the masters a memorandum in the form prescribed by the act, intituled in the court and cause, and signed by the party or his attorney, alleging that there is error in fact in the proceedings, together with an affidavit of the matter of fact in which the alleged error consists; the master files them, and delivers to the party lodging them a note of their receipt, a copy of which note and affidavit is served on the opposite party or his attorney; and such service has the same effect, and the same proceedings may be had thereafter as were heretofore had after the service of the rule for allowance of a writ of error in fact. Plaintiff may discontinue his proceedings in error upon giving notice, and a defendant may confess the error, and consent to a reversal of the judgment.

Neither death nor marriage abates the proceedings.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 146–167; Gen. R. 64–69.

Error in law lies from the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer of Pleas, to the Exchequer Chamber, and thence to the House of Lords, after affirmance or reversal in the Exchequer Chamber.

Error will also lie from inferior courts of record, where the proceedings are according to the course established by the common law, to the Court of Queen's Bench, and then to the House of Lords after judgment of inferior court affirmed or reversed in Queen's Bench.

Where there is any error in the process, or the error is in fact, and not in law, error lies to the same court to examine its own record and rectify the error. For the practice, see 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 546, et seq.

As to error in criminal cases:—

After a judgment given against a prisoner, either at sessions or the assizes, if there be a substantial defect in the indictment, or error apparent on the record, such judgment may be reversed by the Queen's Bench. But it is necessary previously to obtain the Attorney-General's fiat, which, in misdemeanors, on sufficient cause shown, is granted as a matter of course; but in felonies, it is granted only ex merâ gratiâ. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 68; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78; and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 32.

Error fucatus nudâ veritate in multis est probabilior; et sæpenumero rationibus vincit veritatem error.—2 Co. 73.—(Varnished error is in many things more probable than naked truth; and very frequently error conquers truth by reasoning.)

Error, qui non resistitur, approbatur.—Doct. and Stud. c. 70.—(An error, which is not resisted, is approved.)

Erubescit lex filios castigare parentes.—8 Co. 116.—(The law blushes when children correct their parents.)

Esbrancatura, cutting off branches or boughs in forests, &c.—Hov. 784.

Escaldare, to scald. It is said that to scald hogs was one of our ancient tenures in serjeanty.—Lib. Rub. Scaccar' MS. 137.

Escambio [fr. cambier, Span., to change], a license granted to make over bills of exchange to another beyond the sea. Abolished by 59 Geo. III. c. 49, s. 11.

Escape [fr. échapper, Fr., to fly from], a violent or private evasion out of some lawful restraint; as where a man is arrested or imprisoned, and gets away before he is delivered by due course of law. Escapes are either in civil or criminal cases.

(1) Civil. They are either voluntary, by the express consent of the keeper, after which he never can take his prisoner again (though the plaintiff may retake him at any time), but the sheriff must answer for the debt, and he has no remedy over against the person escaping; or, negligent, where a prisoner escapes without his keeper's knowledge or consent, and then upon fresh pursuit the defendant may be retaken, even on a Sunday, and the sheriff shall be excused, if he have him again, before any action brought against himself for the escape. If the sheriff carry a defendant in his custody out of the county, except in conveying him by the most convenient route to the county gaol, he will be guilty of suffering an escape, and might even be liable to an action by the defendant for a false imprisonment.—3 Bl. Com. 415.

(2) Criminal. An escape of a person lawfully arrested for felony or misdemeanor is an offence against public justice, and punishable by fine or imprisonment. Officers and others negligently permitting a felon to escape are punishable by fine, but voluntarily permitting an escape amounts to the same kind of offence and is punishable in the same degree as the offence of which the prisoner is guilty, and for which he is in custody, whether treason, felony, or trespass; although, before the conviction of the principal party, the officer thus neglecting his duty may be fined and imprisoned for a misdemeanor.—4 Step. Com. 294.

Escape-warrant, a process addressed to all sheriffs, &c., throughout England, to retake an escaped prisoner, even on a Sunday, and commit him to proper custody.—1 Anne, c. 6.

Escapio quietus, delivered from that punishment which, by the laws of the forest, lies upon those whose beasts are found upon forbidden land.

Escapium, that which comes by chance or accident.—Cowel.

Esceppa, a measure of corn.

Escheat [eschet or échet formed from the word eschoir or échoir, Fr., to happen], a species of reversion: it is a sort of caducary inheritance, and a fruit of seignory, the lord of the fee, from whom or from whose ancestor the estate was originally derived, taking it as ultimus hæres upon the failure, natural or legal, of the intestate tenant's family.

An escheat is partly in the nature of a purchase as well as of a descent; it is a purchase so far as it is necessary for the lord to enter on the reverted property, in order to complete his full ownership of it; and it is a descent, because the escheated estate follows the seignory, and is inherited along with it, by the lord's heir-at-law. The lord, on the escheat, takes the estate by a title paramount to the tenant, since he is in of an estate, out of which the tenant's interest was originally derived or carved. It is then a mixed title, being neither a pure purchase nor a pure descent, but in some measure compounded of both.

It differs from a forfeiture, in that the latter is a penalty for a crime personal to the offender, of which the Crown is entitled to take advantage by virtue of its prerogative; while an escheat results from tenure only, and arises from an obstruction in the course of descent; it originated in feudalism, and respects the intestate's succession. So, while forfeiture affects the rents and profits only, escheat operates on the inheritance.

Escheat arises, then, where there is not any heir-at-law, which may be either by defect of lineage, whereby the descent is at an end (ob defectum sanguinis, or tenentis in the case of an alien); or by the commission of treason or felony (pro delicto tenentis.)

It arises from default of heirs, when the tenant dies without any lawful and natural-born relations on the part of any of his ancestors, or when he dies without any lawful and natural-born relations on the part of those ancestors from whom the estate descended, or where the intestate tenant, having been a bastard or denizen, does not leave any lineal descendants, since he cannot have any collateral descendants.

It arises from corruption of blood, when the tenant has been attainted of treason or murder.

The following estates escheat, viz.: a fee-simple; an estate-tail, where the tenant-in-tail has in himself the reversion in fee, otherwise the estate would pass to the reversioner; and a copyhold estate.

The following interests do not escheat, viz.: gavelkind, propter delictum tenentis; a rent-charge; a right of common, free warren, or indeed any kind of inheritance which does not lie in tenure, because they rather become extinct; a trust estate, for where the beneficiary dies without heirs, the trustee shall retain the land for his own benefit; an estate given to a corporation and their successors, for it reverts to the donor on the corporation being dissolved, unless perhaps it had been granted over to another before the dissolution; an equity of redemption; and money to be laid out in land.

The lord by escheat may distrain for rent as incident to the reversion; but he cannot take advantage of a condition for re-entry, because he is not heir to the lessor; he is also entitled to outstanding terms, and to all the charters, &c., yet he is liable to the incumbrances of the last tenant, because they are annexed to the possession of the land, without regard to any privity; he is, however, not bound to execute a trust.

Since the lord's right to an escheat arises solely from the want of a tenant, it follows that an alienation either by deed or will, by the tenant, will bar the escheat. If an infant make a feoffment in person, and then die heirless, the estate will not escheat; but if the livery of seisin be made by attorney, that will not prevent the estate from escheating propter defectum sanguinis, neither will a mere contract for sale bar the lord.

The statute-law has made an exception to the general law of escheat in the case of a trustee or mortgagee dying intestate and heirless, for the protection of the beneficiaries or mortgagor. See 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, ss. 14, 15, 16, 19, 46, 47.

A descent can be traced through an attainted ancestor.

The law of escheat is seldom called into action in modern times, and when its application is required the Crown usually waives its prerogative by making a grant, in order to restore the estate to the family of the attainted person, or to effectuate any disposition of it, which the former tenant may have contemplated.—7 Ves. 71.

Eschaeta derivatur à verbo Gallico eschoir, quod est accidere, quia accidit domino ex eventu et ex insperato.—Co. Litt. 93.—(Escheat is derived from the French word eschoir, which signifies to happen, because it falls to the lord from an event and from an unforeseen circumstance.)

Eschaetæ vulgò dicuntur quæ decidentibus iis quæ de rege tenent, cum non existit ratione sanguinis hæres, ad fiscum relabuntur.—Co. Litt. 13.—(Those things are commonly called escheats which revert to the exchequer from a failure of issue in those who hold of the king, when there does not exist any heir by consanguinity.)

Escheator [fr. escaetor, Lat.], an officer anciently appointed by the lord treasurer, &c., in every county, to make inquests of titles by escheat, which inquests were to be taken by good and lawful men of the county, impannelled by the sheriff.—4 Inst. 225.

Escheccum, a jury or inquisition.

Eschipare, to build or equip.

Escot [Fr.], a tax formerly paid in boroughs and corporations towards the support of the community, which is called scot and lot.

Escrow, a writing under seal delivered to a third person, to be delivered by him to the person whom it purports to benefit, upon some condition. Upon the performance of the condition it becomes an absolute deed; but if the condition be not performed it never becomes a deed. It is not delivered as a deed, but as an escrow, i. e. a scrowl or writing which is not to take effect as a deed till the condition be performed.—Co. Litt. 36 a; 2 Bl. Com. 307. See Delivery of Deed.

Escuage [fr. escu, Fr., a shield], a pecuniary instead of a military service. This kind of feudal tenure was called scutagium in Latin, or servitium scuti (the service of the shield), scutum being then a well-known denomination for money.—Co. Litt. 68 b.

Escurare, to scour or cleanse.

Esglise, a church.

Esketores, robbers or destroyers of other men's lands and fortunes.

Eskippamentum, skippage; tackle or ship furniture.

Eskipper, to ship.

Eskippeson, shipping or passage by sea.

Eslisors. See Elisors.

Esne, a hireling of servile condition.

Esnecy [fr. æsnesia, Lat.], a private prerogative allowed to the eldest coparcener, where an estate descends to daughters for want of an heir male, to choose after the inheritance is divided.—Fleta, l. 5, c. x.

Esplees [fr. expetiæ, Lat.], the products of land; as the hay of meadows, herbage of pasture, corn of arable land, rents, services, &c.; also the lands, &c., themselves.—Termes de la Ley.

Espousals [fr. sponsalia, Lat.; espouse, Fr.], the act of contracting or affiancing a man and woman to each other; the ceremony of betrothing.

Esquire [fr. escuyer, Fr.; scutum, Lat.; σκῦτος, Gk., an hide of which shields were made and afterwards covered], he who attended a knight in time of war, and carried his shield; whence he was called escuyer in French, and scutifer or armiger, i. e. armour-bearer, in Latin. No estate, however large, confers this rank upon its owner.

Esquires may be divided into five classes: he who does not belong to one or other of them may or may not be a gentleman, but is no esquire.

(I.) The younger sons of peers and their eldest sons.

(II.) The eldest sons of knights and their eldest sons.

(III.) The chiefs of ancient families are esquires by prescription.

(IV.) Esquires by creation or office. Such are the heralds and serjeants-at-arms, and some others, who are constituted esquires by receiving a collar of S. S. Judges and other officers of state, justices of the peace, and the higher naval and military officers are designated esquires in their patents and commissions. Doctors in the several faculties, and barristers-at-law, are considered as esquires, or equal to esquires. None of these offices convey gentility to the posterity of the holders.

(V.) The last kind of esquires are those of Knights of the Bath, each of whom appoints two to attend upon him at his installation, and at coronations.

Essartum, woodlands turned into tillage by uprooting the trees and removing the underwood.—Old Records.

Essendi quietum de tolonio, a writ to be quit of toll; it lies for citizens and burgesses of any city or town, who, by charter or prescription, ought to be exempted from toll, where the same is exacted of them.—Reg. Orig. 258.

Essoin, Essoigne, Assoign [fr. essonium, Lat.; essoine, Fr.; ex priv., and soing, cura; ab angustiâ, curâ, vel labore liberare, which is a more probable derivation than ἐξομνύσθαι, Gk.; though it signifies to excuse by means of an oath which is the precise nature of an essoin. See Spelman, voc. 'Essoiniare'], an excuse for him who is summoned to appear and answer to an action, or to perform suit to a court-baron, &c., by reason of sickness or infirmity, or other just cause of absence.

The causes of excuse called essoins allowed in the king's court were many. The principal essoin was that de infirmitate, which was of two kinds: 1. De infirmitate veniendi. 2. De infirmitate resiantiæ, of which the first was afterwards called de malo veniendi; the latter de malo lecti. See 1 Reeves, 115 and 405 for other essoins.

Formerly the first general return day of the term was called the essoign day, because the court sat to receive essoigns; but when essoigns were no longer allowed to be cast, i. e. obtained, in personal actions, the court discontinued such sittings. Still it was considered the essoign day for many purposes, until the 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, s. 6, did away with the essoign day for all purposes, as part of the term.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 157.

Essoiniator, a person who made an essoin.

Essoins, Statute of, 12 Edw. II. st. 2. See 2. Reeves, 303.

Est ipsorum legislatorum tanquam viva vox; rebus et non verbis legem imponimus.—10 Co. 101. (It is the characteristic of legislators themselves, as though they were a living voice; we impress law by actions not by words.)

Est quiddam perfectius in rebus licitis.—Hob. 159.—(There is something more perfect in things allowed.)

Estache [fr. estacher, Fr., to fasten], a bridge or stank of stone or timber.—Cowel.

Estandard, Estendart, or Standard, an ensign for horsemen in war.

Estanques, wears or kiddles in rivers.

Estate [fr. status, Lat.; état. Fr.], the condition and circumstance in which an owner stands with regard to his property. It is used in two senses: (1) technically, as the quantity of interest in realty owned by a person; and (2) popularly, as the realty itself. It is either legal, customary, or equitable.

Blackstone considers legal estates in a threefold view, thus:—

(1) The quantity of interest or duration, divided into

(A) Freeholds of inheritance, which are subdivided into:—

(α) Absolute, or fee-simple.

(β) Limited fees; which are (a) qualified or base fees, and (b) fees conditional at the common law, afterwards called fees-tail, in consequence of the Statute de Donis, which may be (i.) general or special, (ii.) male or female, (iii.) given in frank-marriage.

(B) Freeholds not of inheritance, subdivided into:—

(α) Conventional, or created by the act of the parties: they are (a) estates for one's own life, (b) estates pur auter vie, (c) general grant, without expressing any term at all.

(β) Legal, or created by operation of law: they are (a) tenancy in tail after possibility of issue extinct, (b) tenancy by the courtesy of England, (c) tenancy in dower.

(C) Estates less than freehold, subdivided into:—

(α) Estates for years.

(β) Estates at will.

(γ) Estates at sufferance.

(D) Estates upon condition, subdivided into:—

(α) Estates upon condition implied.

(ϐ) Estates upon condition expressed, and these are either precedent or subsequent: (a) precedent, which must be performed before an estate can vest or be enlarged; (b) subsequent, by the failure or non performance of which an estate already vested is defeated; such are (i.) estates held in vadio, gage, or pledge, which are of two kinds, vivum vadium, or living pledge or vifgage, and mortuum vadium, dead pledge or mortgage; (ii.) estates by statute merchant or statute staple; (iii.) estates by elegit.

(2) The time of enjoyment either

(A) In possession, or

(B) In expectancy, subdivided into:—

(a) Remainders created by convention of parties, and are (a) vested, (b) contingent or executory, (c) cross.

(ϐ) Reversions arising by operation of law.

(3) The number and connection of the tenants: either

(A) Severalty,

(B) Joint-tenancy,

(C) Coparcenary,

(D) Common,

Estate ad remanentiam, an estate in fee simple.—Glanv. l. 7, c. i.

Estates of the Realm, the three branches of the Legislature—the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons. A notion is entertained by many that the three estates of the realm are the King, the Lords, and the Commons. This, however, is an error. Hallam, in his 'Middle Ages,' vol. iii. c. viii., part 3, p. 105, note b, says: 'A notion is entertained by many people, and not without the authority of some very respectable names, that the King is one of the three estates of the realm, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal together forming the second, as the Commons in Parliament do the third. This is contradicted by the general tenor of our ancient records and law books; and indeed the analogy of other governments ought to have the greatest weight, even if more reason for doubt appeared upon the face of our own authorities. But the instances where the three estates are declared or implied to be the nobility, clergy, and commons, or at least their representatives in Parliament, are too numerous for insertion.' See also 2 Step. Com. 390, 4 Inst. 1.

Estoppel [fr. estoupir, Fr., i. e. oppilare, obstipare, Lat.], a conclusive admission, which cannot be denied, or controverted. It is of three kinds:—

(1) By matter of record, which imports such absolute and incontrovertible verity, that no person against whom it is producible shall be permitted to aver against it. A record generally concludes the parties thereto, and their privies, whether in blood, in law, or by estate.

(2) By deed. No person can be allowed to dispute his own solemn deed, which is therefore conclusive against him, and those claiming under him, even as to the facts recited in it. The general rule is that an indenture estops all who are parties to it, while a deed-poll only estops the party who executes it, since it is his sole language and act.—Shep. Touch. 53.

(3) In pais, as that a tenant cannot dispute his landlord's title. See 2 Smi. L. C. 585–665.

Estoveria sunt ardendi, arandi, construendi, et claudendi.—13 Co. 68.—(Estovers are of firebote, ploughbote, housebote, and hedgebote.)

Estoveriis habendis, a writ for a wife judicially separated to recover her alimony or estovers. Obsolete.

Estovers, or Estouviers [fr. estoffer, Fr., to furnish, or estover, Fr., i. e. fovere, Lat., to keep warm, cherish, sustain, or defend]. Bote, any kind of sustenance; also a wife's alimony. See COMMON.

Estrays, such valuable animals as are found wandering in a manor or lordship, the owner whereof is not known; in which case the law gives them to the sovereign, and they now most commonly belong to the lord of the manor by special grant from the Crown. But they must be proclaimed in the church, and two market towns next adjoining to the place where they are found; and then, if no person claim them, after proclamation and a year and a day passed, they belong to the sovereign or his substitute, without redemption, even though the owner were a minor, or under any other legal incapacity. The doctrine of estrays is only applicable to animals domitæ naturæ.—2 Step. Com. 568.

Estreat, the true extract, copy, or note of some original writing or record, and especially of recognizances, fines, amercements, &c. entered on the rolls of a court to be levied by the bailiff or other officer.—F. N. B. 57; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 99, and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, s. 28.

Estreciatus, streightened, applied to roads.

Estrepe, to make spoils in lands to the damage of another.

Estrepement [fr. estropier, Fr., to lame, extirpare, Lat.], any spoil or waste made by tenant for life, upon any lands or woods, to the prejudice of him in reversion; also making land barren by continual ploughing. The writ of estrepement was abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Ethanim, the seventh month of the Jewish sacred year, and the first of their civil; it answered partly to September and partly to October. After the captivity it was called Tizri.—Brown's Dict. of Bible.

Ethelling, or Ætheling. See ADELING.

Et non, a phrase that might have been used in pleading, instead of absque hoc, in the negative part of a special traverse. See ABSQUE HOC.

Evasion, the act of escaping by means of artifice; a trick or subterfuge.

Eventus est qui ex causâ sequitur; et dicitur eventus quia ex causis evenit.—9 Co. 81.—(An event is that which follows from the cause and is called an event because it arises from causes.)

Eventus varios res nova semper habet.—Co. Litt. 379.—(A new matter always produces various events.)

Eves-droppers. See EAVES-DROPPERS.

Eviction [fr. evinco, Lat., to overcome], dispossession; also a recovery of land, &c. by form of law.

Evidence, proof, either written or unwritten, of allegations in issue between parties.

The leading rules of evidence are the following:—

(1) The sole object and end of evidence is, to ascertain the truth of the several disputed facts or points in issue; and no evidence ought to be admitted which is not relevant to the issues.

(2) The point in issue is to be proved by the party who asserts the affirmative; according to the maxim affirmanti non neganti incumbit probatio. But where one person charges another with a culpable omission or breach of duty, this rule will not apply, for the person who makes the charge is bound to prove it, though it may involve a negative, since it is one of the first principles of justice, not to presume that a person has acted illegally, till the contrary is proved.

(3) It will be sufficient to prove the substance of the issue.

(4) The best evidence must be given of which the nature of the thing is capable. The exceptions to this rule are: (a) where it is necessary to prove an entry in a public book, the original need not to be shown; but from a principle of general convenience, an examined copy will be admitted; (b) in the case of all peace-officers, justices of the peace, constables, &c. it is sufficient to prove that they acted in these characters, without producing their appointments; (c) an admission of a fact by a party to a suit has, in many cases, been considered sufficient to dispense with strict and regular proof, which would otherwise have been necessary.

(5) Hearsay evidence of a fact is not admissible. The following cases are clearly distinguishable from hearsay evidence:—The testimony of a deceased witness, who has been examined upon oath, on the trial of a former action between the same parties, and where the point at issue is the same as in the second action, is admissible on the trial of the second action, and may be proved by one who heard him give evidence; for such evidence on the former trial was not given in an extrajudicial matter, but upon oath; the parties to the action were the same, the point in issue was the same, and an opportunity was given for cross-examination. Hearsay is often admitted in evidence as part of the transaction which becomes the subject of inquiry; the meaning of which seems to be, that where it is necessary in the course of a cause to inquire into the nature of a particular act, or the intention of the person who did the act, proof of what the person said at the time of doing it is admissible in evidence, for the purpose of showing its true character. The exceptions to the rule excluding hearsay evidence are the following:—Death-bed declarations (which see); hearsay evidence in questions of pedigree, public right, custom, boundaries, &c.; also, old leases, rent-rolls, surveys, &c. have been received in favor of persons claiming under the lessors; declarations against interest; rectors' and vicars' books as to the receipt of ecclesiastical dues in favor of their successors; also entries in the books of a tradesman by his deceased shopman, who therein supplies proof of a charge against himself, have been admitted as a proof of the delivery of goods, or of other matter therein stated within his own knowledge. But the 7 Jac. I. c. 12, enacts, that the shop-book of a tradesman shall not be evidence, in any action for wares delivered, or work done, above one year before the bringing of the action, except the tradesman or his executor shall have obtained a bill of debt or obligation of the debtor for the said debt, or shall have brought against him some action within a year next after the delivery of the wares, or the work done. See PAROL EVIDENCE; and SECONDARY EVIDENCE.—Phil. Evid. c. 7. ss. 3–7; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, ss. 15, 26, 27; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 113; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 83; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, ss. 20–31, 46–57; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 113; 22 Vict. c. 20; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 6.

The rules of evidence are the same in civil and in criminal courts, for a fact must be established by the same evidence, whether it be followed by a civil or a criminal consequence. Lord Melville's case, 29 How. St. Tr. 76 b.

Eundo, morando, et redeundo (in going, remaining, and returning).

Eunomy [fr. εὐνομία, Gk.], a constitution of good laws.

Evocation, withdrawing a case from the cognizance of an inferior court.—Fr. Law.

Ewage [fr. eau, Fr., water], toll paid for water-passage. See AQUAGE.

Ewbrice [fr. ew, Sax., marriage, and bryce, breaking], adultery.

Ewe [fr. euva], law.

Ewry, an office in the royal household where the table linen, &c. is taken care of.

Ex abundanti cautelâ (from abundant care).

Ex antecedentibus et consequentibus fit optima interpretatio.—2 Inst. 317.—(The best interpretation is made from the context.)

Exaction, a wrong done by an officer, or one in pretended authority, by taking a reward or fee for that which the law allows not, whereas extortion is where an officer takes more than is due, when something is due to him. The punishment is fine and imprisonment.—Co. Litt. 368.

Exactor regis, the king's collector of taxes; also a sheriff.

Ex æquo et bono (in equity and good conscience).

Examination, the act of eliciting by questions a person's knowledge of facts or science. A witness undergoes three examinations; (1) Examination-in-chief, which is made by the party calling him; (2) Cross-examination by the opposite party; and (3) Re-examination, by the party who called the witness, which is confined to matters arising out of the cross-examination, and supports the examination-in-chief.

Examination of Articled Clerks. See Appendix to Wharton's Manual for Articled Clerks.

Examiners in Chancery. There are two appointed to examine witnesses in town in causes depending in the court. Special examiners are appointed for the country.—Smi. Eq. Pr. 419.

Exannual Roll, the old way of exhibiting sheriff's accounts. Illeviable and desperate debts were transcribed into this roll, which was yearly read, to see what might be recovered.

Ex assensu patris, dower, a species of dower ad ostium ecclesiæ, during the life of the father of the husband, the son, by the father's consent expressly given, endowing his wife with parcel of his father's lands. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 105, s. 13.

Excambiator, a broker, one employed to exchange lands.

Excambium, an exchange; a place where merchants meet to transact their business; also an equivalent in recompense; a recompense in lieu of dower ad ostium ecclesiæ.—1 Reeve, pp. 101 & 103.

Exceptio, the designation for the defendant's plea.—Civil Law.

Exceptio ejus rei cujus petitur dissolutio nulla est.—Jenk. Cent. 37.—(There is no exception of that thing of which the dissolution is sought.)

Exceptio falsi omnium ultima.—(A plea denying a fact is the last of all.)

Exceptio nulla est versus actionem quæ exceptionem perimit.—Jenk. Cent. 106.—(There is no exception against an action which entirely destroys an exception.)

Exceptio probat regulam de rebus non exceptis.—11 Co. 41.—(An exception proves the rule concerning things not excepted.)

Exceptio quæ firmat legem, exponit legem.—2 Buls. 189.—(An exception which confirms the law, expounds the law.)

Exceptio rei judicatæ, a defence in the Scotch law that the matter has been adjudged in another court or country, and the judgment carried into effect.

Exceptio semper ultima ponenda est.—9 Co. 53.—(An exception is always to be put last.)

Exception, exclusion of anything or person; a stop or stay to an action; also the particular point of law stated in the margin of a demurrer. In Chancery, exceptions may be taken to pleadings if scandalous, and if a defendant's answer be insufficient, the plaintiff may file exceptions to it.—Smi. Ch. Pr. 344, 786.

In the Scotch law exception is synonymous with defence.

Exceptions to Evidence. See Bill of Exceptions.

Excessivum in jure reprobatur. Excessus in re qualibet jure reprobatur communi.—Co. 44.—(Excess in law is reprehended. Excess in any thing is reprehended at common law.)

Exchange [cambium, permutatio, Lat.], often contracted into change, a building or other place in considerable trading cities, where merchants, agents, bankers, brokers, and other persons concerned in commerce, meet at certain times to confer and treat together of matters relating to exchanges, remittances, payments, adventures, assurances, freights, and other mercantile negotiations, both by sea and land.

Also used to designate that species of mercantile transactions by which the debts of individuals residing at a distance from their creditors are satisfied without the transmission of money.

Par of exchange. The par of the currency of any two countries means, among merchants, the equivalency of a certain amount of the currency of the one in the currency of the other, supposing the currencies of both to be of the precise weight and purity fixed by their respective mints. Thus, according to the mint regulations of Great Britain and France, 1*l.* sterling is equal to 25 fr. 20 c., which is said to be the par between London and Paris. And the exchange between the two countries is said to be at par when bills are negotiated on this footing; that is, for example, when a bill for 100*l.* drawn in London is worth 2,520 fr. in Paris, and conversely. When 1*l.* in London buys a bill on Paris for more than 25 fr. 20 c. the exchange is said to be in favor of London, and against Paris; and when, on the other hand, 1*l.* in London will not buy a bill on Paris for 25 fr. 20 c. the exchange is against London and in favor of Paris.

Circumstances which determine the course of exchange. The exchange is affected, or made to diverge from par, by two classes of circumstances:—first, by any discrepancy between the actual weight and fineness of the coins, or of the bullion for which the substitutes used in their place will exchange, and their weight or fineness, as fixed by the mint regulations; and, secondly, by any sudden increase or diminution of the bills drawn in one country upon another.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Exchange, Bill of. See BILL OF EXCHANGE.

Exchange [fr. excambium, Lat.], Deed of, an original common law conveyance, for the reciprocal transfer of interests, ejusdem generis, as fee-simple for fee-simple, legal estate for legal estate, copyhold for copyhold of the same manor, and the like, the one in consideration of the other. It takes place between two distinct contracting parties only, although several persons may compose each party. The operative and indispensable verb is 'exchange,' which no longer implies a general warranty or right of re-entry (8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 4). An actual entry upon the property exchanged by the parties themselves to the deed is essential. The exchange is void if either party dies before entry, for, under such circumstances, the parties have no freehold in them, for the heir cannot enter and take as a purchaser, because he takes, under the deed, only by way of limitation in course of descent.

In consequence of the inconvenience arising from the implied warranty and re-entry, exchange fell into disuse, and mutual conveyances, the one in consideration of the other, were resorted to; but the abolition of this implied condition in law may tend to revive common law exchanges. See 1 Steph. Com. 269, 524, 664 n.

The General Inclosure Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, s. 92) provides for the allotment and award of any land to be inclosed in exchange for any other land within the parish in which the land to be inclosed shall be situate, and enables the Commissioners to effect exchanges of lands upon the written application of the persons interested in the lands proposed to be exchanged by directing inquiries whether the proposed exchange would be beneficial to the owners, and, if so, by framing under their hands and seals an order of exchange, with a map or plan of the lands to be given and taken in exchange, and such order is not to be impeached by reason of any infirmity of estate or defect of title of the persons on whose application it shall be made. The land taken in exchange remains and enures to the same uses, trusts, intents and purposes, and is subject to the same charges as the land given in exchange (s. 147). The act provides for the division of intermixed lands, and for the exchange of inconvenient allotments for public purposes for more convenient land, upon giving certain notices, and also empowers the Commissioners to apportion the expenses (ss. 148, 151); and see 9 & 10 Vict. c. 70; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 111; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 99; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 83 (s. 7 extends exchange and partition to rights, easements, and rent-charges); 14 & 15 Vict. c. 53; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 79; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 124; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 97; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 52; and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 31, which severally amend and explain the General Inclosure Act.

Exchange of Livings, effected by resigning them into the bishop's hands, and each party being inducted into the other's benefice; if either die before both are inducted, the exchange is void.—31 Eliz. c. 6, s. 8.

Excheat. See ESCHEAT.

Exchequer Bills, bills of credit issued by authority of Parliament. They are for various sums, and bear interest (generally from $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ to $2\frac{1}{2}d.$ per diem, per 100*l.*) according to the usual rate at the time. The advances of the Bank to Government are made upon Exchequer Bills; and the daily transactions between the Bank and Government are principally carried on through their intervention.

Notice at the time at which outstanding Exchequer Bills are to be paid off is given by public advertisement. Bankers prefer vesting in Exchequer Bills to any other species of stock, even though the interest be for the most part comparatively low; because the capital may be received at the Treasury at the rate originally paid for it, the holders being exempted from any risk of fluctuation. Exchequer Bills were first issued in 1696, and have been annually issued ever since.—McCull. Comm. Dict.; 2 Steph. Com. 596; 24 Vict. c. 5; 25 Vict. cc. 3 & 13. As to the punishment for the forgery of Exchequer Bills, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 8.

Exchequer [fr. eschequier, Nor.-Fr.; scaccarium, low Lat.; schatz, Germ., a treasure] Chamber, Court of, a tribunal of appeal to correct the errors of other jurisdictions.

First, it exists as a court of mere debate, such causes from the other courts being sometimes adjourned into it as the judges, upon argument, find to be of great weight and difficulty, before any judgment is given upon them in the court below. It then consists of all the judges of the three superior courts of common law, and now and then the Lord Chancellor also.

Second, it exists as a court of error, where the judgments of each of the superior courts of common law, in all actions whatever, are subject to revision by the judges of the other two sitting collectively. The composition of this court consequently admits of three different combinations, consisting of any two of the courts below which were not parties to the judgment appealed against.—11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, s. 8.

The 40 Geo. III., c. 39, established a Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland.

Exchequer, Court of, consists of two divisions, a court of revenue and a court of common law. It was established by William the Conqueror. Its equitable jurisdiction, except when it sits as a Court of Revenue, was transferred to the Court of Chancery by 5 Vict. c. 5. See A. G. v. Halling 15 M. & W. 687. As a court of revenue, it ascertains and enforces, by proceedings appropriate to the case, the proprietary rights of the Crown against the subjects of the realm. To proceed against a person in this department of the court is called to exchequer him. The practice and procedure on the revenue side of this court was amended by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, s. 9, et seq. As a court of common law, it administers redress between subject and subject in all actions whatever, except real actions. It is a court of record, and its judges are five in number, consisting of one chief and four puisné barons.—3 Step. Com. 402.

The 6 Anne, c. 26, established a court of Exchequer in Scotland.

Excise [fr. acciis, Dut.; excisum, Lat.], the name given to the duties or taxes laid on certain articles produced and consumed at home; but, exclusive of these, the duties on licenses, auctioneers, and post-horses, are included in the excise duties.

Excise duties were introduced into England by the Long Parliament in 1643, being then laid on the makers and vendors of ale, beer, cider and perry. The royalists soon after followed the example of the republicans, both sides declaring that the excise should be continued no longer than the termination of the war. But it was found too productive a source of revenue to be again relinquished; and when the nation had become accustomed to it for a few years, the Parliament declared, in 1649, that 'the impost of excise was the most easy and indifferent levy that could be laid upon the people.' It was placed on a new footing at the Restoration; and, notwithstanding Mr. Justice Blackstone says, that 'from its first original to the present time, its very name has been odious to the people of England,' it has continued progressively to gain ground, and is at this moment imposed on various important articles, and furnishes a large share of the public revenue of the kingdom. The management of the excise is placed in the Board of Customs.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Dr. Johnson's description of the excise is this:—'A hateful tax levied upon commodities, and adjudged, not by the common judges of property, but wretches hired by those to whom excise is paid.' See 6 Geo. IV. c. 81; 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 53; 9 Geo. IV. c. 47; 2 Wm. IV. c. 16; 4 & 5 Wm. IV. cc. 51, 75; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. cc. 52, 72; 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 49; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 44; 2 & 3 Vict. cc. 23, 24, 25, 32, 63; 3 & 4 Vict. cc. 18, 22, 49; 4 & 5 Vict. c. 20; 5 & 6 Vict. cc. 16, 25, 93; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 49; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 51; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 15; 10 & 11 Vict. cc. 41, 42; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 100; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 40; 13 & 14 Vict. cc. 9, 67; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 59; 16 & 17 Vict. cc. 37, 39, 127; 17 & 18 Vict. cc. 27, 30; 18 & 19 Vict. cc. 22, 38, 94; 19 & 20 Vict. cc. 34, 51, 82, s. 3; 20 Vict. c. 16; and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 61. As to its general management, see 6 Geo. IV. c. 81; 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 53; 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 51; 4 & 5 Vict. c. 20; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 42; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 121; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 1; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 61; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 94; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 113; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 84.

Exclusa, Exclusagium, a sluice to carry off water; the payment to the lord for the benefit of such a sluice.

Excommencement, excommunication.—Law French.

Excommunication, an ecclesiastical interdict or censure, divided into the greater and the lesser; by the former a person was excluded from the communion of the church and the company of the faithful, and was rendered incapable of any legal act; by the latter he was merely debarred from the services of the church.

Excommunication was formerly the process by which the decrees and orders of the Ecclesiastical courts were enforced; but in all cases of contempt of court it has now been abolished, and in lieu thereof, where a lawful citation or sentence has not been obeyed, the judge shall have power, after a certain period, to pronounce such person contumacious and in contempt, and to signify the same to the Court of Chancery: whereupon a writ de contumace capiendo shall issue from that court, which shall have the same force and effect as formerly belonged, in case of contempt, to a writ de excommmunicato capiendo.—53 Geo. III. c. 127, s. 2.

Excommunicatio minor est, per quam quis à sacramentorum participatione conscientiâ vel sententiâ arceatur; major est, quæ non solum à sacramentorum verum etiam fidelium communione excludit, et ab omni actu legitimo separat aut dividit.—Co. Litt. 133.—(The lesser excommunication is that by which a man, either by conscience or sentence, is expelled from participation in the sacraments; the greater is where he is not only excluded from participation in the sacraments, but from all community with the faithful, and from every legitimate act.)

Excommunicato capiendo. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

Excommunicato deliberando, a writ to the sheriff for delivery of an excommunicated person out of prison, upon certificate from the ordinary of his conformity to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction.—F. N. B. 63.

Excommunicato interdicitur omnis actus legitimus, ita quod agere non potest, nec aliquem convenire, licet ipse ab aliis possit conveniri.—Co. Litt. 133.—(Every legitimate act is forbidden an excommunicated person, so that he cannot act, nor sue any person; but he may be sued by others.)

Excommunicato recipiendo, or recapiendo, a writ commanding that persons excommunicated, who for their obstinacy had been committed to prison, but were unlawfully set free before they had given caution to obey the authority of the church, should be sought after, retaken, and imprisoned again.—Reg. Orig. 67.

Ex contractu (from a contract). One of the great classes of obligation from which a right of action accrues. The actions are (1) account; (2) assumpsit, or promises; (3) covenant; (4) debt; (5) detinue; (6) scire facias, or revivor.

Excript, a copy; a writing copied from another.

Exculpation, letters of, the warrant to an offender indicted for citing witnesses in his own defence.—Scotch Law.

Excusable homicide is of two sorts, either per infortunium, by misadventure, or se defendendo, upon a sudden affray.

Homicide, per infortunium, is where a man, doing a lawful act, without any intention of hurt, unfortunately kills another; but if death ensue from any unlawful act, the offence is manslaughter, and not misadventure.

Homicide, se defendendo, is where a man kills another upon a sudden affray, merely in his own defence, or in defence of his wife, child, parent, or servant, and not from any vindictive feeling.—4 Bl. Com. 178.

Excusat aut extenuat delictum in capitalibus quod non operatur idem in civilibus.—Bac. Max. r. 15.—(That may excuse or palliate a wrongful act in capital cases which would not have the same effect in civil injuries.) See Broome, Maxims, 291.

Excusatur quis quod clameum non apposuerit, ut si toto tempore litigii fuit ultra mare quacunque occasione.—Co. Litt. 260.—(He is excused who does not bring his claim, if, during the whole period in which it ought to have been brought, he has been beyond sea on any occasion.) But see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 10.

Excuss, to seize and detain by law.

Excussion, seizure by law.

Ex delicto (from a tort or offence). The actions which arise from torts are: (1) case, (2) trespass, (3) trover, (4) replevin.

Ex delicto non ex supplicio emergit infamia.—(Infamy arises from the crime, not from the punishment.)

Ex diuturnitate temporis omnia præsumuntur esse solemniter acta.—Jenk. Cent. 185.—(From lapse of time, all things are presumed to have been done properly.)

Ex dolo malo non oritur actio.—Cowp. 343. (From a fraud an action does not arise.)

Ex donationibus autem feoda militaria vel magnam serjeantiam non continentibus oritur nobis quoddam nomen generale, quod est socagium.—Co. Litt. 16.—(From grants not containing military fees or grand serjeanty, a kind of general name is used by us, which is socage.)

Exeat, a permission which a bishop grants to a priest to go out of his diocese; also, leave to go out generally.

Executed, something done or completed.

Executed consideration, a consideration which is executed before the promise upon which it is founded is made, where A. bails a man's servant, and the master afterwards promises to indemnify A.; but if a man promise to indemnify A. in the event of his bailing his servant, the consideration is then executory. With respect to an executed consideration, the rule is, that if it were not at the precedent request of the promiser, but a merely voluntary courtesy, it will not suffice to support a promise; therefore, in the first example, the promise would not be binding, unless the bailing were at the master's precedent request.—2 Step. Com. 60; Smith on Contracts; and Notes to Lampleigh v. Braithwait, 1 Smith, L. C.

Executed contract, where nothing remains to be done by either party, and where the transaction is completed at the moment that the agreement is made, as where an article is sold and delivered, and payment therefor is made on the spot. A contract is said to be executory where some future act is to be done, as where an agreement is made to build a house in six months, or to do an act on or before some future day, or to lend money upon a certain interest, payable at a future time.—Story on Contracts, 8.

Executed estates, estates in possession.

Executed fine, the fine sur cognizance de droit, come ceo que il ad de son done; or a fine upon acknowledgment of the right of the cognizee, as that which he has of the gift of the cognizor. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

Executed remainder. A vested remainder, which see.

Executed trust. When an estate is conveyed to the use of A. and his heirs, with a simple declaration of the trust for B. and his heirs, or the heirs of his body, the trust is perfect; and it is said to be executed, because no further act is necessary to be done by the trustee to raise and give effect to it; because there is no ground for the interference of a court of equity to affix a meaning to the words declaratory of the trust, which they do not legally import.—1 Sand. Uses and Trusts, 335.

As all trusts are executory in this sense, that the trustee is bound to dispose of the estate according to the tenor of his trust, whether active or passive, it would be more accurate and precise to substitute the terms perfect and imperfect for executed and executory trusts.—1 Hayes's Conv. 85.

Executed use, the first use in a conveyance upon which the Statute of Uses operates by bringing the possession to it, the combination of which, i. e. the use and the possession, form the legal estate, and thus the statute is said to execute the use.

Executio est finis et fructus legis.—Co. Litt. 289.—(Execution is the end and fruit of the law.)

Executio juris non habet injuriam.—2 Rol. Rep. 301.—(The execution of law does no injury.)

Executio est executio juris secundum judicium. 3 Inst. 212.—(Execution is the execution of the law according to the judgment.)

Execution, the last stage of a suit giving possession of anything recovered at law or in equity, and also the final sentence inflicted upon criminals. It is styled final process.

At common law, writs of execution are judicial processes, issuing out of the court where the record or other proceeding is, upon which they are grounded; and therefore, when the record or transcript of the proceedings is removed into any of the courts at Westminster from a county palatine, or from an inferior court under 19 Geo. III. c. 70, s. 4, or 33 Geo. III. c. 68, s. 1, or from an inferior court under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 21, the execution is issued out of the superior court.—4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 62, s. 31; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 106, s. 11. A writ of execution may be sued out at any time within six years after judgment actually signed by the master, in cases where a revivor or scire facias is not required, or where execution is not stayed by error, injunction, agreement, or the like. It is in force for one year. In promises, covenant, case, trespass, and replevin, the writ of execution for the plaintiff is for damages and costs; in debt, for the debt, damages, and costs; in detinue, for the goods or their value, with damages and costs. For the defendant in all cases, except replevin, the execution is for the costs only, but in replevin it is for a return of the goods also. The ordinary writs of execution are capias ad satisfaciendum; fieri facias; elegit; levari facias; habere facias possessionem; de retorno habendo; and capias in withernam.

The writ of execution must strictly pursue the judgment in the amount, in the number and names of the parties, and in the subject-matter. It is tested on the day on which it is issued, and is made returnable immediately on the execution thereof. By 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 16, 'no writ of fieri facias, or other writ of execution, shall bind the property of the goods of the party against whom such writ of execution is sued forth, but from the time that such writ shall be delivered to the sheriff, under-sheriff, or coroners to be executed; and for the better manifestation of the said time, the sheriff, under-sheriff, and coroners, their deputies and agents, shall upon the receipt of any such writ (without fee for doing the same), endorse upon the back thereof the day of the month or year whereon he or they received the same.' If two writs of execution against the same person are delivered to the sheriff, he must execute that first which was first delivered to him, even where both were delivered upon the same day; and he must set about executing the writ within a reasonable time after he receives it for execution; and if he omit doing so, and any damage arise to the party from his negligence, an action on the case may be supported against him. The sheriff cannot break open any outer door of the party's dwelling-house, in order to enforce a writ of execution; unless in the case of a writ of seisin, or habere facias possessionem. Writs of execution are seldom returned in practice, except the elegit and inquisition. Either party may, however, rule the sheriff to return the writ, even after he goes out of office, provided it be within six lunar months after the expiration of his term of office. If execution be sued out against two or more persons, and the whole amount be levied upon one, in actions ex contractu (unless upon a contract made with the defendants as partners in trade), the party upon whom the whole is levied may maintain an action against the others, and oblige them to contribute their respective shares; but in most cases in actions ex delicto he cannot thus compel a contribution, and he is, in general, altogether without remedy. An irregular execution will be set aside on motion, and usually with costs. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 57, abolished arrest for debts under 20*l.*—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 587, et seq.

In Chancery, for the purpose of enforcing compliance with a decree or order, the court not only commits the parties neglecting to comply therewith, but also sequesters their personal estate, and by a writ of assistance will order the delivery up of the estate itself, and may likewise compel a conveyance of lands; besides which, where money or costs are ordered to be paid the party may issue a fieri facias or an elegit for the purpose of enforcing payment. See 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 20, and Consol. Ord. 1860, ords. xxix., xxx.

The execution of a criminal is a species of justifiable homicide, provided it be in strict conformity with his sentence. It must be performed by the legal officer—the sheriff or his deputy.—4 Bl. Com. c. xxxii.

By 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 30, execution is not to be carried into effect until some days after conviction. See 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 77.

Among the Romans the execution of offenders was delayed, by decree of the senate, for ten days. Potest enim pœna dilata exigi, non potest exacta revocari.—Senec. De vitâ et spiritu hominis laturam sententiam diu multumque cunctari oportere, nec præcipiti studio, ubi irrevocabile sit factum, agitari.—Amm. Marcell. But this humane sentiment was anticipated by the Grecian legislator: νόμος ἄλλος περὶ θανάτου, μὴ μίαν μόνον ἡμέραν κρίνειν ἀλλὰ πολλάς.—Plat. Ap. Socr.

Execution of decree. Sometimes, from the neglect of parties, or some other cause, it becomes impossible to carry a decree into execution without the further decree of the court upon a bill filed for that purpose. This happens generally in cases where parties having neglected to proceed upon the decree, their rights under it become so embarrassed by a variety of subsequent events that it is necessary to have the decree of the court to settle and ascertain them. Such a bill may also be brought to carry into execution the judgment of an inferior court of equity, if the jurisdiction of that court is not equal to the purpose; as in the case of a decree in Wales, which the defendant has avoided by fleeing into England.

This species of bill is, generally, partly an original bill, and partly a bill in the nature of an original bill, though not strictly original.—Story's Eq. Plead. 342.

Execution of deeds, the signing, sealing and delivery of them by the parties, as their own acts and deeds, in the presence of witnesses. See DEED. As to compulsory executions, the 1 Wm. IV. c. 36, s. 15, rule 15, enacts, that when any person shall have been directed by any decree or order in Chancery, to execute any deed or other instrument, or make a surrender or transfer, and shall have refused or neglected to execute, make, or transfer the same, and shall have been committed to prison under process for such contempt, or being confined in prison for any other cause, shall have been charged with or detained under process for such contempt, and shall remain in such prison, the court may, upon motion or petition, and upon affidavit that such person has, after the expiration of two calendar months from the time of his being committed under, or charged with or detained under such process, again refused to execute such deed or instrument, or make such surrender or transfer, order or appoint one of the chief clerks, or if the act is to be done out of London, then, if necessary, one of the commissioners for taking affidavits, to execute such deed or other instruments, or to make such surrender or transfer, for and in the name of such person, and the execution of the said deed or other instrument, and the surrender or transfer made by the said chief clerk, &c. shall, in all respects, have the same force and validity as if the same had been executed or made by the party himself; and within ten days after the execution or making of any such deed or other instrument, or surrender, or transfer, notice thereof shall be given by the adverse solicitor to the party in whose name the same is executed or made, and such party, as soon as the deed or other instrument, or surrender, or transfer, shall be executed or made, shall be considered as having cleared his contempt, except as far as regards the payment of the costs of the contempt, and shall be entitled to be discharged therefrom, under any of the provisions of this act applicable to his case; and the court shall make such order as shall be just, touching the payment of the costs of or attending any such deed, surrender, instrument, or transfer.

As to execution by an attorney. It may be observed that a purchaser may insist upon the vendor's personal execution, and cannot be compelled to accept the conveyance executed under a power of attorney, unless an actual necessity appear for it; or he may be bound by condition or stipulation so to accept it. When, however, a conveyance is so executed, the attorney should enter into a declaration of trust that he will stand possessed of the purchase-money in trust for the purchaser, until it appear by satisfactory evidence that the vendor was alive at the time of such execution, or if he shall be dead, until the estate is duly conveyed to the purchaser.

The attorney to execute the deed must be appointed by a sealed writing. An appointee cannot generally delegate this act, nor can a party whose authority is strictly personal, as that of consent or discretion.

The attorney should sign the deed in the name of his appointor (Wilks v. Back, 2 East. 142 (1802), and 3 Pres. Abr. 68), thus—'A. B. (principal), by C. D. his attorney, duly authorised in that behalf by a letter of attorney, bearing date the —— day of ——.' It should also be delivered in the name and as the act of the principal, and the receipt-clause should be signed in a similar manner.

This letter or power of attorney, being a muniment of title, should accompany the deed, of which it authorises the execution, or be covenanted to be produced if it relate to other property, and an attested copy of it furnished.

Execution of wills. A will must be in writing (except in the case of soldiers and sailors in active service) and signed at the foot or end thereof by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction; and such signature must be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time; and such witnesses must attest and subscribe the will in the presence of the testator, and, though this is not essentially requisite, also in the presence of each other; but no form of attestation is necessary, although it is prudent in practice to embody in an attestation-clause all the statutory requirements. Appointments by will are to be executed like other wills, and will be valid although other required solemnities are not observed (7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 26, ss. 9, 10, 11, 12). Every will, so far only as regards the position of the signature of the testator, or of the person signing for him, is valid, if such signature be so placed at, or after, or following, or under, or beside, or opposite to, the end of the will, that it is apparent on the face of the will that the testator intended to give effect, by such his signature, to the writing signed as his will. No such will is to be affected by the circumstance that the signature may not follow or be immediately after the foot or end of the will; or by the circumstance that a blank space may intervene between the concluding word of the will and the signature; or by the circumstance that the signature may be placed among the words of the testimonium clause, or of the clause of attestation, either with or without a blank space intervening, or may follow, or be after, or under, or beside, the names, or one of the names, of the subscribing witnesses; or by the circumstance that the signature may be on a side, or page, or other portion of the paper or papers containing the will, whereon no clause, or paragraph, or disposing part of the will may be written above the signature; or by the circumstance that there may appear to be sufficient space on or at the bottom of the preceding side, or page, or other portion of the same paper on which the will is written, to contain the signature; and the enumeration of the above circumstances is not to restrict the generality of the enactment. But no signature is to be operative to give effect to any disposition or direction which is underneath, or which follows it; nor to give effect to any disposition or direction inserted after the signature is made (15 & 16 Vict. c. 24, s. 1; the second section gives the act a retroactive efficacy).

No obliteration, interlineation, or other alteration made in any will after its execution, is to be valid, or have any effect, except so far as the words or effect of the will, before such alteration, may not be apparent, unless such alteration be executed in like manner as is required for the execution of the will. But the will, with such alteration or part thereof, is to be deemed to be duly executed, if the signature of the testator and the subscription of the witnesses be made in the margin, or in some other part of the will opposite or near to such alteration, or at the foot or end of, or opposite to a memorandum referring to such alteration, and written at the end or some other part of the will.—7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 21. See Jarman on Wills and Williams on Executors.

Execution, Writ of. This process, the service of which was a preliminary step to enforcing obedience to a decree or order in Chancery, is abolished.—Consol. Ord. 1860, xxx., r. 4. See also Writs of Execution.

Executione facienda, a writ commanding execution of a judgment. Obsolete.

Executione facienda in withernamium, a writ that lay for taking cattle of one who has conveyed the cattle of another out of the county, so that the sheriff cannot replevy them. Reg. Orig. 82.

Executione judicii, a writ directed to the judge of an inferior court to do execution upon a judgment therein, or to return some reasonable cause wherefore he delays the execution.—F. N. B. 20.

Executioner, he that inflicts capital punishment; he that puts to death according to the sentence of the law.

Executive, that branch of the government which puts the laws into execution, as distinguished from the legislative and judicial branches. The body that deliberates and enacts laws is legislative; the body that judges and applies the laws in particular cases is judicial; and the body that carries the laws into effect, or superintends the enforcement of them, is executive. The executive authority, in all monarchies, is vested in the sovereign.

Executor [fr. exécuteur, Fr.], a person appointed by a testator to carry out the directions and requests in his will, and to dispose of the property according to his testamentary provisions after his decease.

The leading duties and responsibilities of an executor may be thus classed:—

(1) He will not be allowed, as against creditors, funeral expenses exceeding 20*l.* if the testator died insolvent; and if he neglects to secure the property, and loss ensue, he will be personally liable for a devastavit.

(2) Before probate of the will, an executor may effectually do most of the acts that he could do afterwards, because by the very appointment the testator has evinced personal confidence in his nominee, and, therefore, the interest of an executor arises not from the probate, but from the will; and for the same reason it has been held, that he may release a debt or assign a term for years before probate. Also, he may collect and secure assets, receive debts, and give effectual receipts, assent to a legacy, present bills or notes for payment, give notices of dishonor, or take proceedings in bankruptcy; so he may issue a writ of summons at common law. He may also file a bill in equity, but he must obtain probate before the hearing, though, strictly, an executor should not file a bill until he has obtained probate. He may be sued before probate, if he has acted. It is said that a person who is entitled to administration can, before obtaining letters of administration, do no act whatever; but it has been considered that he might file a bill in Chancery, although he may not be able to commence an action at law, and he may collect, secure, and ascertain the value of the property, so as to enable him to make affidavit that it does not exceed a certain value, as required by the statute.

(3) Instead of an inventory and valuation of the testator's personal property on stamped paper, it is now usual, in order to be safe, to have an accurate inventory made by any competent person, distinguishing such debts due to the estate as are sperate or good from those which are doubtful or desperate, and then obtain the written consent of all persons interested in the assets, or at least of the legatees or residuary legatee, so as to save the expense of a valuation. It is a usual and proper precaution, in cases of the least doubt, shortly after the funeral, to publish an advertisement in the principal newspapers for debtors to pay their debts, and for claimants to send in the particulars of their claims to a named person; and this is essential before the speedy payment of simple contract creditors, and still more before the payment of legacies; for if, without such advertisement, and without suit, an executor or administrator should hastily pay a simple contract creditor, and afterwards specialty debts should appear, he may be liable to the consequences of a misapplication of assets and devastavit.

(4) Probate should be obtained within six calendar months after death of testator, and if delayed after that time, a penalty of 100*l.* and 10*l.* per cent. on the property would be incurred. If there be a suit or dispute relative to the will or administration, the probate or letters of administration should be obtained within two calendar months after it has been ended (55 Geo. III. c. 184, s. 37). The probate should be obtained to the extent of the sum really expected to be received. An administrator, after obtaining letters of administration, stands in many respects in the same situation as an executor, and the cases relating to one in general equally apply to the other.

(5) It is the duty of the executor or administrator to collect and speedily reduce into money the personal assets, when not otherwise directed, especially if they be of a perishable nature. If executors be directed by the will to carry on the testator's business or trade, they should do so under the protection of the Court of Chancery. The 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 2, enables executors or administrators to recover for any injuries to the real or personal estate of the deceased, committed within six months before his death. Actions against executors or administrators may be supported for any wrong committed by the deceased to the real or personal property of another, provided they be brought within six months after the death of the deceased. Sec. 31 subjects executors or administrators personally to costs, when nonsuited or having a verdict against them, unless the Court or Judge otherwise order. But they will be allowed such costs out of the assets, unless they have been guilty of misconduct or fraud. If an executor be hastily pressed by one or more creditors, in case of any reasonable doubt, he should either act with the concurrence of the legatees and next of kin, or file a bill, or get a friendly creditor to file a bill, compelling all the creditors to come in and receive payment under a decree of a court of equity. Submissions to arbitration should restrict the arbitrator from awarding against the executor personally, and should be made with the consent of creditors, legatees, and next of kin.

(6) As an executor or administrator cannot sue himself, the law allows him, when he has been legally invested with his representative character, to retain out of any assets that may have come to his hands, to the extent of all funeral and testamentary expenses and debts legally paid by him out of his own pocket, and also any debt due to himself, before he pays any other creditor, in equal degree, and he may retain his own debt, notwithstanding a decree has been made in a suit by other creditors for administration of assets equally, and notwithstanding assets out of which he seeks to retain his debt came to his hands after decree, and even if the debt be barred by the Statute of Limitations. Where there are joint executors or joint administrators, they must, inter se, retain their debts rateably, and in proportion to the assets.

(7) It has long been settled that, amongst creditors in equal degree, an executor may, even after action commenced by an adverse creditor, and at any time before judgment therein, confess a judgment, and give a preference to any other favored creditor in the same or a higher degree, thereby postponing the party first suing; and unless assets should afterwards come to hand sufficient to pay both, the first suitor will be totally deprived of the benefit of his prior action, and this, although it be done for the express purpose of depriving the plaintiff of the debt. But a court of equity will, to a certain extent, by a decree, but not before, control and prevent the preference, upon bill filed by any creditor, on behalf of himself and all other creditors, against the executor or administrator, requiring him to account and distribute equally, upon which a proper division and distribution will be decreed, and this is considered in the nature of a judgment in favor of all the creditors.

(8) In general, legacies ought not to be paid within a year after the death of the testator, and not even then without an indemnity, if there be the least reason to apprehend that there are debts or claims outstanding. This year is allowed for the payment of legacies in analogy to the Statute of Distributions, which enacts, 'that no distribution of the goods of any person dying intestate be made till after one year after the intestate's death;' and in order that the executor may have full opportunity to obtain information of the state of the property, and within that period, an executor cannot be compelled to pay a legacy, even in a case where the testator directed it to be discharged within six months after his death. An executor cannot give himself or any other legatee (except in the case of specific legacies) any preference over other legatees, as he may in the case of debts, nor can he retain so as to pay himself; and in case of insufficiency of assets to pay the whole, all general legatees are to abate alike and in proportion to the amount of their respective legacies; and a legatee will be compelled to refund when the estate proves insufficient, whether security has been given by him for such purpose or not.

(9) An executor is not entitled to any remuneration for his own personal trouble or loss of time, unless it be expressed in the will; on which account it was that the law formerly gave to the executor the whole undisposed-of residue, unless, by some expression, to be collected from the will, as by a bequest to the executor for his trouble, a contrary intention was to be collected. But now the next of kin, and not the executor, is entitled to the unbequeathed residue.—11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 40, ss. 1, 2.

(10) All the executors should join in suing as well in equity as at law, otherwise the defendant may plead in abatement or defeat the proceeding, unless those who have not proved have formally renounced. Consult Toller, Wentworth, or Williams on Executors and Administrators.

The 22 & 23 Vict. c. 38, has enacted as follows:—

Where an executor or administrator, liable as such to the rents, covenants, or agreements contained in any lease or agreement for a lease granted or assigned to the testator or intestate, whose estate is being administered, shall have satisfied all such liabilities under the said lease or agreement for a lease, as may have accrued due and been claimed up to the time of the assignment hereafter mentioned, and shall have set apart a sufficient fund to answer any future claim that may be made in respect of any fixed and ascertained sum covenanted or agreed by the lessee to be laid out on the property demised or agreed to be demised, although the period for laying out the same may not have arrived, and shall have assigned the lease or agreement for a lease to the purchaser thereof, he shall be at liberty to distribute the residuary personal estate of the deceased, to and amongst the parties entitled thereto respectively, without appropriating any part, or any further part (as the case may be) of the personal estate of the deceased to meet any future liability under the said lease or agreement for a lease; and the executor or administrator so distributing the residuary estate shall not, after having assigned the said lease or agreement for a lease, and having, where necessary, set apart such sufficient fund as aforesaid, be personally liable in respect of any subsequent claim under the said lease or agreement for a lease; but nothing herein contained shall prejudice the right of the lessor, or those claiming under him, to follow the assets of the deceased into the hands of the person or persons to or amongst whom the said assets may have been distributed (s. 27).

In like manner, where an executor or administrator liable as such to the rent, covenants, or agreements, contained in any conveyance on chief rent, or rent charged (whether any such rent be by limitation of use, grant, or reservation), or agreement for such conveyance, granted or assigned to, or made and entered into with the testator or intestate, whose estate is being administered, shall have satisfied all such liabilities under the said conveyance, or agreement for a conveyance, as may have accrued due and been claimed up to the time of the conveyance hereafter mentioned, and shall have set apart a sufficient fund to answer any future claim that may be made in respect of any fixed and ascertained sum, covenanted or agreed by the grantee to be laid out on the property conveyed, or agreed to be conveyed, although the period for laying out the same may not have arrived, and shall have conveyed such property, or assigned the said agreement for such conveyance as aforesaid, to a purchaser thereof, he shall be at liberty to distribute the residuary personal estate of the deceased, to and amongst the parties entitled thereto respectively, without appropriating any part, or any further part (as the case may be) of the personal estate of the deceased, to meet any future liability under the said conveyance, or agreement for a conveyance; and the executor or administrator so distributing the residuary estate shall not, after having made or executed such conveyance or assignment, and having, where necessary, set apart such sufficient fund as aforesaid, be personally liable in respect of any subsequent claim under the said conveyance, or agreement for conveyance; but nothing herein contained shall prejudice the right of the grantor, or those claiming under him, to follow the assets of the deceased into the hands of the person or persons to or among whom the said assets may have been distributed (s. 28).

Where an executor or administrator shall have given such or the like notices as, in the opinion of the court in which such executor or administrator is sought to be charged, would have been given by the Court of Chancery in an administration suit, for creditors and others to send in to the executor or administrator their claims against the estate of the testator or intestate, such executor or administrator shall at the expiration of the time named in the said notices, or the last of the said notices for sending in such claims, be at liberty to distribute the assets of the testator or intestate, or any part thereof, amongst the parties entitled thereto, having regard to the claims of which such executor or administrator has then notice, and shall not be liable for the assets or any part thereof so distributed to any person of whose claim such executor or administrator shall not have had notice at the time of distribution of the said assets or a part thereof, as the case may be; but nothing in the present act contained shall prejudice the right of any creditor or claimant to follow the assets, or any part thereof, into the hands of the person or persons who may have received the same respectively (s. 29).

Executor de son tort. If a stranger take upon himself to act as executor, without any just authority, as by intermeddling with the goods of the deceased, or doing any other act pertaining to the office of an executor, he is called an executor de son tort, i. e. of his own wrong, and is liable to all the trouble of his usurped office, without any of the profits or advantages; but the performance of acts of necessity or humanity, as locking-up the goods, or burying the deceased, will not amount to such an intermeddling as will charge a person as executor of his own wrong.—1 Wm. Exs. 225.

Executor of an Executor. The interest in a testator's estate and effects, vested in his executor, at the decease of the executor devolves upon such executor's executor; but, in the case of the decease of an administrator, a fresh administration must be granted; for this reason, that, whereas an executor is appointed by the testator, an administrator merely derives his authority from the Court of Probate.

Executor lucratus. An executor who has assets of his testator who in his lifetime made himself liable by a wrongful interference with the property of another.—Davidson v. Tullock (Dom. Proc.), 6 Jurist (n. s.), 543.

Executory, performing official duties; contingent; also personal estate of a deceased; whatever may be executed.

Executory consideration. See CONSIDERATION.

Executory contract. See CONTRACT.

Executory devise. Mr. Fearne (Cont. Rem. 386) defines an executory devise to be strictly, such a limitation of a future estate or interest in lands or chattels (though in the case of chattels personal, it is more properly an executory bequest) as the law admits in the case of a will, though contrary to the rules of limitation in conveyances at common law. It is only an indulgence allowed to a man's last will and testament, where otherwise the words of the will would be void; for wherever a future interest is so limited by devise as to fall within the rules laid down for the limitation of contingent remainders, such an interest is not an executory devise, but a contingent remainder.

If a particular estate of freehold is first devised, capable in its own nature of supporting a remainder, followed by a limitation, which is not immediately connected with or does not immediately commence from the expiration of the particular estate of freehold, the latter limitation is incapable of taking effect as a remainder, but may operate as an executory devise if confined to the requisite limits of time, as provided by the rule of perpetuity.

Thus, if land be devised to one for life, and after his decease to B. in fee, the limitation to B. is immediately connected with and immediately commences on the expiration of the estate limited to A. during his life, and is, therefore, a remainder; but, if the land be limited to A. for life, and after the decease of A. and one year after his decease, to B. in fee, the interval of the year prevents the limitation to B. and his heirs from being immediately connected with and from immediately commencing at the expiration of A.'s life estate, and cannot therefore operate as a remainder, but operates as an executory devise. In the same manner, if land be limited to A. for life, and after his decease to B. and his heirs, with a proviso, that if B. shall survive A., and afterwards depart this life without leaving issue of his body living at the time of his decease, the land shall devolve to C. and his heirs; the limitation to B. and his heirs prevents the immediate connection of the estate limited to C. with the life estate of A., and prevents its immediate commencement on the expiration of A.'s life estate, and therefore makes it operate by way of executory devise.—Butler's Note (c) to Fearne, p. 397.

Three kinds of executory devises have been laid down, viz. :—

(1) Where a testator devises his whole fee-simple, but upon some contingency qualifies such devise, and limits an estate on the contingency: e. g. a devise of land to the testator's wife for life, remainder to C., his second son in fee, provided if D., his third son, should, within three months after the wife's death, pay 500*l.* to C. or his executors, then to D. and his heirs. D. has an executory devise.

(2) Where a testator, without disposing of the immediate fee, gives the future estate to arise either upon a contingency or at a period certain, unpreceded by, or not having the requisite connection with, any immediate freehold, to give it effect as a remainder.

The case of a devise to one, to take effect six months after the testator's decease, is an instance of the first class in this description.

And the case of a limitation to one for life, and from and after the expiration of one day (or any other period, not exceeding twenty-one years, we may suppose) next ensuing his decease, then over to another, may be adduced as an instance of the latter part of this description.

(3) The third sort of executory devises, comprising all that relates to chattels, is where a term or any personal estate is bequeathed to one for life, or otherwise, and after the decease of the devisee or legatee for life, or some other contingency or period, is given over to another person.

It is to be remarked that a remainder can only be limited in freehold estates. In personal property, under which both chattels real and chattels personal are included, there cannot be a remainder in the strict sense of that word; and therefore every future bequest of personal property, whether it be preceded or not preceded by a prior bequest, or limited on a certain or an uncertain event, is an executory bequest, and falls under the rules by which that mode of limitation is regulated.

The principal differences between an executory devise and a contingent remainder, are—

1st. That a contingent remainder may be limited in conveyances at common law; an executory devise is admitted only in last wills and testaments.

2ndly. That a contingent remainder relates only to lands, tenements, and hereditaments; an executory devise respects personal estates as well as real.

3rdly. That a contingent remainder requires a freehold to precede and support it; an executory devise requires no preceding estate to support it.

4thly. That a contingent remainder must vest, at farthest, at the instant the preceding estate determines; but in respect to an executory devise, if there be any preceding estate, it is not necessary that the executory devise should vest when such preceding estate determines.

And 5thly. That the great and essential difference between the nature of a contingent remainder and that of an executory devise consists in this, that the first may be barred and destroyed or prevented from taking effect by several different means; but it is a rule, that an executory devise cannot be prevented or destroyed by any alteration whatsoever in the estate out of which or after which it is limited.

If the executory devise be limited to take effect on an estate-tail, then the tenant in tail may by a deed of disposition in conformity with the stat. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, bar the entail, and all remainders, executory devises, and conditional limitations dependent thereupon. If the executory devise is expectant on an estate in fee, then, as the position intimates, there are no means of preventing it taking effect, if the event happen on which it is to arise.

Executory estates, interests which depend for their enjoyment upon some subsequent event or contingency.

Executory fines, the fines sur cognizance de droit tantum; sur concessit; and sur done, grant et render. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

Executory remainder, a contingent remainder, because no present interest passes.

Executory trusts. In the case of articles of agreement, made in contemplation of marriage, and which are consequently preparatory to a settlement; and in the case of those wills which are merely directory of a subsequent conveyance, the trusts declared by them are said to be executory or imperfect, because they require an ulterior act to raise and perfect them. They are rather considered as instructions for settlements than as instruments in themselves complete; and the Court of Chancery, in order to promote the presumed views of the parties in the one case, and to support the manifest intention of the testator in the other, will attach to the words expressive of the trusts a more liberal and enlarged construction than they would admit, if applied either to the limitation of a legal estate or a trust executed.—1 Sand. Uses and Trusts, 237.

Executory uses, springing uses, which confer a legal title answering to an executory devise, as when a limitation to the use of A. in fee, is defeasable by a limitation to the use of B., to arise at a future period, or on a given event.

Executrix, a woman appointed by a testator to perform his will.

Exemplificatione, a writ granted for the exemplification or transcript of an original record.—Reg. Orig. 290.

Exempli gratiâ [abbrev. ex.gr. or e.g., Lat.], for the purpose of example, or for instance.

Exemption, immunity; freedom from imposts; a privilege to be free from service or appearance.

Exempts, persons not bound by law.

Exennium, or Exhenium, a gift; a new year's gift.

Exequatur, an official recognition of a person in the character of consul or commercial agent, authorising him to exercise his power.

Exercitatorial power, the trust given to a shipmaster.

Exercitor navis, the temporary owner or charterer of a ship.

Exercituale, a heriot, paid only in arms, horses, or military accoutrements.

Ex facto jus oritur.—2 Inst. 49.—(The law arises from the deed.)

Exeter, or Exon Domesday, the name given to a record preserved among the muniments and charters belonging to the dean and chapter of Exeter Cathedral, which contains a description of the western parts of the kingdom, comprising the counties of Wilts, Dorset, Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall. The Exeter Domesday was published, with several other surveys nearly contemporary, by order of the Commissioners upon the Public Records, under the direction of Sir Henry Ellis, in a volume supplementary to the Great Domesday, folio, London, 1816.

Exfrediare, to break the peace; to commit open violence.

Ex frequenti delicto augetur pœna.—2 Inst. 479.—(Punishment increases with increasing crime.)

Ex gravi querelâ, a writ that lay for him to whom any lands or tenements in fee were devised (within any city, town, or borough wherein lands were devisable by custom), against the heir of the devisor when he entered and detained them from him.—Reg. Orig. 224. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36.

Exheredatio [Lat.], the act of disinheriting. The exclusion of a child by his father from the inheritance of any part of his estate.—Civil Law. See Sandars's Justinian, p. 278.

Exhibit, a document or other thing shown to a witness when giving evidence, and referred to by him in his evidence. The term is usually applied to a document referred to in, but not annexed to, an affidavit, and shown to the witness when the affidavit is sworn. A certificate, signed by the person before whom the affidavit is sworn, identifying the document, is usually endorsed upon the exhibit.

Exhibitant, a person who exhibits anything, as a complainant in articles of the peace.

Exhibition, an allowance for meat and drink, usually made by religious appropriators of churches to the vicar. Also, the benefaction settled for the maintaining of scholars in the universities not depending on the foundation.—Paroch. Antiq. 304.

In the Scotch law, it is an action for compelling the production of writings.

Exigence, or Exigency [probably a corruption of exigents, vitiated by an unskilful pronunciation], demand; want; need.

Exigendaries. See EXIGENTER.

Exigent, or Exigi facias (that you cause to be demanded), a judicial writ commanding the sheriff to demand the defendant from county court to county court, or, if in London, from husting to husting, until he be outlawed; or, if he appear, then to take and have him before the court on a day certain in term, to answer to the plaintiff in an action of, &c. It ought to be tested on the quarto die post the return of the ca. sa. in term. It must be returnable in the same or following term, on a day certain, and must have fifteen days at least between the teste and return; and, if possible, the return day should be regulated so that five hustings in London or county courts elsewhere, may be held between the teste and return of the writ, in order to save the expense of an allocatur exigent; for the exigent shall have such a return as that five county courts may intervene between the teste and return.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1297.

Exigenter [fr. exigendarius, Lat.], an officer of the Court of Common Pleas, who makes all exigents, proclamations, &c.

Exigible, demandable, requirable.

Exile [fr. exilium, Lat.], banishment; the person banished.

Exilium, spoiling. The author of Fleta distinguishes between vastum, destructio, and exilium; for he tells us that vastum and destructio are almost the same, and are properly applied to houses, gardens, or woods; but exilium is where servants are enfranchised, and afterwards unlawfully turned out of their tenements.—Fleta, l. 1, c. xi.

Exilium est patriæ privatio, natalis soli mutatio, legum nativarum amissio.—7 Co. 20.—(Exile is a privation of country, a change of natal soil, a loss of native laws.)

Exitus, children; offspring; also, the rents, issues, and profits of lands and tenements; or the conclusion of the pleadings.

Exitus acta probat; finis, non pugna, coronat. (The conclusion proves the fact; the termination, not the trial, crowns the victory.)

Exlegalitus, he who is prosecuted as an outlaw.

Ex-lex, an outlaw.

Ex maleficio non oritur contractus.—(From a tort a contract does not arise.)

Ex malis moribus bonæ leges natæ sunt.—2 Inst. 161.—(Good laws arise from evil manners.)

Ex mero motu (out of mere will).

Ex multitudine signorum colligitur identitas vera.—Bacon.—(True identity is collected from a number of signs.)

Ex nudo pacto non oritur actio.—Pl. Com. 305.—(An action does not arise from a nude contract.)

Ex necessitate legis (from the necessity of law).

Ex necessitate rei (from the urgency of the case).

Ex officio (officially; by virtue of office).

Ex officio informations, proceedings filed in the Queen's Bench by the Attorney-General, at the direct and proper instance of the Crown, in cases of such enormous misdemeanors as peculiarly tend to disturb or endanger the government, or to molest or affront the sovereign in discharging the royal functions. The information is tried by a jury of the county where the offence arose, and for that purpose, unless the case be of such importance as to be tried at bar, it is sent down by writ of Nisi Prius into that county, and tried either by a common or special jury, like a civil action.—4 Step. Com. 458.

Ex officio oath, an oath taken by offending priests; abolished by 13 Car. II. s. 12.

Exoine, Essoigne [Fr.], the excuse for not appearing in court when cited.—3 Step. Com. 699.

Exoneratione sectæ, a writ that lay for the Crown's ward, to be free from all suit to the county-court, hundred-court, leet, &c., during wardship.—F. N. B. 158.

Exoneratione sectæ ad curiam baron, a writ of the same nature, issued by the guardian of the Crown's ward, and addressed to the sheriffs or stewards of the court, forbidding them to distrain him, &c., for not doing suit of court, &c.—N. N. B. 352.

Exoneretur (that he be discharged), an entry made upon the bail-piece upon render of a defendant to prison in discharge of his bail.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 833, 869.

Ex parte (on behalf of), a proceeding by one party in the absence of the other.

Ex parte talis, a writ that lay for a bailiff or receiver, who, having auditors appointed to take his accounts, cannot obtain of them reasonable allowance, but is cast into prison.—F. N. B. 129.

Expatriation, the forsaking one's own country, and renouncing allegiance, with the intention of becoming a permanent resident and citizen in another country.

Ex paucis dictis intendere plurima possis.—Litt. s. 384.—(You can imply many things from few expressions.)

Ex paucis plurima concipit ingenium.—Litt. s. 550.—(From few things the mind conceives many.)

Expectancy, executory; relating to something in futuro.

Expectant, depending on hope.

Expectant estates, interests to come into possession and be enjoyed in futuro; they are of two sorts at common law—reversions and remainders.—2 Bl. Com. 163.

Expectation, in the doctrine of chances, is applied to any contingent event, upon the happening of which some benefit is expected. This is capable of being reduced to the rules of computation: for a sum of money in expectancy, when a particular event happens, has a determinate value before that event happens. Thus, if a person is to receive any sum, as 10*l.*, when an event takes place, which has an equal chance or probability of happening or failing, the value of the expectation is half that sum, or 5*l.*; but if there are three chances for failing, and only one for its happening, or one chance only in its favor out of all the four chances, then the probability of its happening is only one out of four, or one-fourth, and the value of the expectation is but one-fourth of 10*l.*, which is only 2*l.* 10*s.*, or half the former sum. And in all cases the value of the expectation of any sum is found by multiplying that sum by the fraction expressing the probability of obtaining it. So the value of the expectation on 100*l.*, when there are three chances out of five for obtaining it, or when the probability of obtaining it is three-fifths, is three-fifths of 100*l.*, which is 60*l.* And if s be any sum expected on the happening of an event, h, the chances for that event happening, and f, the chances for its failing; then, there being h chances out of $f+h$ for its happening, the probability will be $\frac{h}{f+h}$ and the value of the expectation is $\frac{h}{f+h} \times s$.

Expectation of life, in the doctrine of life annuities, is the share or number of years of life which a person of a given age may, upon an equality of chance, expect to enjoy. Consult Inwood's Tables.

Expediment, the whole of a person's goods and chattels, bag and baggage.

Expeditatæ arbores, trees rooted up or cut down to the roots.—Fleta, l. 2, c. xli.

Expedit reipublicæ ut sit finis litium.—Co. Litt. 303.—(It is for the public good that there be an end of litigation.)

Expeditate, to cut out the ball of a dog's fore-feet, for the preservation of the royal game. Manw. c. xvi.

Expenditors, persons appointed by commissioners of sewers to pay, disburse, or expend the money collected by the tax for the repairs of sewers, &c., when paid into their hands by the collectors, on the reparations, amendments, and reformations, ordered by the commissioners, for which they are to render accounts when thereunto required.

Expensæ litis (costs of suit).

Expensis militum non levandis, &c., an ancient writ to prohibit the sheriff from levying any allowance for knights of the shire, upon those who held lands in ancient demesne.—Reg. Orig. 261.

Experientia per varios actus legem facit. Magistra rerum experientia.—Co. Litt. 60.—(Experience by various acts, makes law. Experience is the mistress of things.)

Experts, sworn appraisers. Also witnesses who give evidence upon matters of science.

Expilation, robbery; the act of committing waste upon land to the loss of the heir; also abstracting the goods of a succession.

Expleta, Expletia, or Explecia, the rents and profits of an estate.—Old Records.

Explorator, a scout, huntsman, chaser.

Exportation, that part of foreign commerce which consists in sending out goods for sale, and which is therefore the active part of foreign trade, as the importation or purchasing of goods is the passive. As to the exportation of arms, &c., see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 45.

Exports, the goods or produce which are sent abroad.

Expositio, quæ ex visceribus causæ nascitur, est aptissima et fortissima in lege.—10 Co. 24. (That exposition, which springs from the vitals of a cause, is the fittest and most powerful in law.)

Exposing in a public thoroughfare a person infected with a contagious disease is a common nuisance, and punishable accordingly.—4 Step. Com. 351.

Ex post facto (from something after the fact).

Express, that which is not left to implication.

Express condition. See CONDITION.

Express contract. See CONTRACT.

Ex præcedentibus et consequentibus optima fiet interpretatio.—1 Rol. Rep. 375.—(The best interpretation is made from the context.)

Expressa non prosunt quæ non expressa proderunt.—4 Co. 73.—(The expression of things, of which, if unexpressed, one would have the benefit, is useless.)

Expressio eorum quæ tacitè insunt nihil operatur.—Co. Litt. 210.—(The expressing of those things which are tacitly implied has no effect.)

Expressio unius personæ est exclusio alterius. Co. Litt. 210.—(The mention of one person is the exclusion of another.)

Expressum facit cessare tacitum.—(What is expressed makes what is silent to cease.)

Expressum servitium regat vel declaret tacitum.—Bacon.—(Let service expressed rule or declare what is silent.)

Expromission, a species of novation, as a creditor's acceptance of a new debtor, who takes the place of the old debtor, who is discharged.

Expromissor, a surety; bail.—Civ. Law.

Expropriation, the surrender of a claim to exclusive property.

Ex provisione mariti (from the provision of the husband).

Expurgation, the act of purging or cleansing.

Expurgator, one who corrects by expunging.

Extend, to value the lands, &c., of one bound by a statute, who has forfeited his bond, at their yearly value, so that it may be known when the creditor will be paid his debt.

Extensâ manerii. 4 Edw. I. s. 1. It is a direction for the making of a survey or terrier of a manor and its appendages.

Extension, an indulgence by giving time to pay a debt, or perform an obligation.

Extent, or Extendi facias (that you cause to be extended), the peculiar remedy to recover debts of record due to the Crown; it differs from an ordinary writ of execution at the suit of a subject, because under it the body, lands, and goods of the debtor may be all taken at once, in order to compel the payment of the debt. It is not usual, however, to seize the body.

There are two kinds of Extents, in chief, and in aid. (1) Extent in chief. It issues from the Court of Exchequer, and may bear teste and be made returnable on any day certain in term or vacation (5 & 6 Vict. c. 86, s. 8). It directs the sheriff to take an inquisition or inquest of office, on the oaths of lawful men, to ascertain the lands, &c., of the debtor, and seize the same into the Queen's hands. The writ should be preceded by a scire facias in order to bring the debtor into court, and afford him an opportunity to show cause against it; but where the debt is in danger of being lost, the extent will be issued without a scire facias, upon an affidavit of circumstances; and after the sheriff's return, the debtor, if he dispute the debt, or a third person, if he claim the property set forth in the inquisition, may enter an appearance and plead to the extent; issue is then joined, and it is decided either on demurrer or by a trial before a jury. If judgment be given for the Crown, it is that the subject take nothing by his traverse or plea; if given for the defendant or claimant, it is an award of amoveas manus. Error will lie upon the judgment, provided the Attorney-General consent to the proceeding. It is enacted by 2 & 3 Vict.

c. 11, that no debt due to the Crown on judgment, statute or recognizance, inquisition of debt, obligation, or specialty, or acceptance of office, shall affect any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, as to purchasers or mortgagees, unless and until such memorandum or minute thereof, as in the act provided, shall be left with the Senior Master of the Court of Common Pleas, who shall forthwith enter the particulars in a book to be entituled, 'The Index to the Debtors and Accountants to the Crown;' and farther that, whenever a quietus shall be obtained by a debtor or accountant to the Crown, and an office copy thereof shall be left with such Master, together with a certificate signed by the accountant-general, that the same may be registered, that the Master shall forthwith enter the same in the said book accordingly; and also that it shall be lawful for the Lords of the Treasury, or any three of them, by writing under their hands (upon payment of such sums as they shall think fit to require into the receipt of her Majesty's Exchequer, to be applied in the liquidation of the debt or liability of any debtor or accountant to the Crown, or upon such other terms as they may think proper), to certify, that any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, of any such Crown debtor, or accountant, shall be held by the purchaser or mortgagee thereof, wholly exonerated from all further claim of the Crown; or in cases of leases for fines, to certify that the lessee shall hold the premises exonerated in like manner, without prejudice to the right of the Crown to the reversion upon such lease, and the rents and covenants reserved by the same; and thereupon the same lands, tenements, and hereditaments shall respectively be held exonerated as aforesaid.

There is also an extent in chief in the second degree, which is a hostile proceeding by the Crown against the debtor of a Crown-debtor, against whom also an extent in chief has issued.

(2) Extent in aid. It issues, not at the suit of the Crown, like an extent in chief, but at the suit or instance of a Crown-debtor against a person indebted to himself; and it is grounded on the Statute of Extent, 33 Hen. IV. c. 39, and on the principle that the Crown is entitled to the debts due to the debtor. The practice is governed by 57 Geo. III. c. 117.

There is a special writ of extent, which is issued in the event of the death of a Crown-debtor, and is called a diem clausit extremum, because it recites the death of the party. The sheriff is commanded to inquire, by a jury, concerning the property of the deceased debtor, and seize them into the Crown's hands.—4 Step. Com. 75.

Exterritoriality, immunity from a country's laws, such as that enjoyed by an ambassador.

Extinguishment, the annihilation of a collateral interest, or the supersedure of one interest by another and greater interest, thing, or subject in that out of which it is derived. It is of various natures as applied to various rights.

(1) Extinguishment of common. If he who is entitled to common appurtenant, purchase any part of the land which is subject to his right of common, that right is extinguished for the whole: and so, if he release his right over any part of the land. But it has been justly doubted whether in any case (and especially if all persons who have common appurtenant in the same land concur in discharging some part of it), this legal trap should be allowed to operate.—Burton's Comp. 437. If one of the tenants of a manor purchase any part of the land over which he has a right of common appendant, his right over the rest will continue. So on the alienation of any part of land to which common is appendant or appurtenant (though the latter is less favored by the old law), the right of common is preserved and apportioned.—1 Bac. Ab. 628. All incorporeal hereditaments of necessity, or arising by operation of law, and services, may be extinguished, excepting ways.

(2) Extinguishment of copyhold. When a tenant conveys to his lord, or does an act denoting his intention of not holding of his lord any longer, his copyhold is extinguished. When the lord does an act inconsistent with the nature of the tenure, e. g. conveys to the tenant the freehold or releases to him his seignorial rights, an enfranchisement is effected. See COPYHOLD.

(3) Extinguishment of debt. A creditor, by accepting a higher security than he had before, extinguishes the first debt. And when judgment is given for a debt, it supersedes or extinguishes the previous obligation. So, if a feme-sole debtee marry her debtor, or an obligee marry one of two joint obligors in a bond, or a debtor make his debtee, or vice versâ, his executor, in these cases the debt is extinguished.—Plowd. 184; 1 Salk. 304.

(4) Extinguishment of estates. If a person have a yearly rent out of lands, and afterwards purchase those lands, so that he has as good an estate in the land as in the rent, the rent is extinguished; for no one can have a rent issuing out of his own land; though a person must have as high an estate in the land as in the rent, or the rent will not be extinct.—Co. Litt. 147. It appears that an estate by statute, recognisance, or elegit, may be extinguished by any act (as a deed of defeazance or of release), which extinguished the debt.—Burt. Comp. 373.

(5) Extinguishment of an interesse termini. A mere interesse termini can neither promote nor hinder the merger of any estate, nor can itself, properly speaking, be surrendered; but it may be extinguished by surrender in law, or by assignment or release.—Burt. Comp. 364.

(6) Release by way of extinguishment. If my tenant for life make a greater estate than he is warranted in granting, as a lease to A. for life, remainder to B. and his heirs, and I release to A., this extinguishes my right to the reversion, and shall enure to the advantage of B.'s remainder as well as of A.'s particular estate.—2 Bl. Com. 325.

Extirpatione, a judicial writ, either before or after judgment, that lay against a person who, when a verdict was found against him for land, &c., maliciously overthrew any house, or extirpated any trees upon it.—Reg. Jud. 13, 56.

Extocare, to grub up lands and reduce them to arable or meadow.—Mon. Angl. t. 2, p. 71.

Extorsively, oppressively.

Extortio est crimen quando quis colore officii extorquet quod non est debitum, vel supra debitum, vel ante tempus quod est debitum.—10 Co. 102.—(Extortion is a crime, when, by color of office, any person extorts that which is not due, or more than is due, or before the time when it is due.)

Extortion [fr. extorqueo, Lat., to wrest away], any oppression under color of right. It differs from bribery, in that the latter consists in the offering a present, or receiving one if offered; the former in demanding a fee or present by color of office. See EXACTION.

Ex totâ materiâ emergat resolutio.—Wing. 238.—(Let the resolution arise from the whole case.)

Extra costs, those charges which do not appear upon the face of the proceedings, such as witnesses' expenses, fees to counsel, attendances, court-fees, &c., an affidavit of which must be made, to warrant the Master in allowing them upon taxation of costs.

Extract, a draught or copy of a writing.

Extracta curiæ, the issues or profits of holding a court, arising from the customary fees, &c.—Paroch. Antiq. 572.

Extradition, the act of sending by authority of law a person accused of a crime to a foreign jurisdiction, where it was committed, in order that he may be tried there. It is usually the subject of international treaty. Conventions have been entered into by this country with France and Denmark for the apprehension and extradition of persons charged with murder, attempt to murder, forgery, or fraudulent bankruptcy; and with the United States of America for the apprehension and extradition of persons charged with those offences, and also with piracy, arson, or uttering forged paper; and acts of parliament have been passed for carrying into effect those conventions. See as to France, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 75, amended by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 120; as to Denmark, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 70; and as to the United States, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 76, amended by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 120.

Extrajudicial [fr. extra, and judicium, Lat.], out of the regular course of legal procedure.

Extra legem positus est civiliter mortuus.—Co. Litt. 130.—(He who is placed out of the law is civilly dead.)

Extraneus est subditus qui extra terram, i. e. potestatem regis, natus est.—7 Co. 16.—(A foreigner is a subject who is born out of the territory, that is, government of the king.)

Extraparochial [fr. extra, and parochia, Lat.], out of any parish.

Extra territorium jus dicenti non paretur impunè.—10 Co. 77.—(The sentence of one adjudicating beyond his territory cannot be obeyed with impunity.)

Extravagantes, those decretal epistles which were published after the Clementines. They were so called because at first they were not digested or ranged with the other papal constitutions, but seemed to be, as it were, detached from the canon law. They continued to be called by the same name when they were afterwards inserted in the body of the canon law. The first extravagantes are those of Pope John XXII. successor of Clement V. The last collection was brought down to the year 1483, and was called the common extravagantes, notwithstanding that they were likewise incorporated with the rest of the canon law.—Encyc. Lond.

Extra viam, out of the way.

Extra vires, beyond their powers.

Extumæ, reliques in churches and tombs.

Ex turpi causâ non oritur actio.—(An action arises not from a base cause.)

Exuperare, to overcome; to apprehend or take.—Leg. Edm. c. ii.

Ex visitatione Dei (by the visitation of God).

Ex vi termini (from the force or meaning of the expression).

Ey, ea, or ee [either fr. ig, an island, by melting the Saxon g into y, which is usually done; or fr. the Saxon ea, water, river, &c., or fr. ieag, a field, by the same kind of melting. Gibson], water.

Eye-witness, one who gives testimony to facts seen by himself.

Eyre [fr. eyre, Fr.; iter, Lat.], the court of justices itinerant; and justices in eyre are those only, which Bracton in many places calls justiciarios itinerantes. The eyre also of the forest is nothing but the justice-seat, which is, or should, by ancient custom, be held every three years by the justices of the forest, journeying up and down for such purpose.—Cowel.

Ezardar, a farmer or renter of land, in the districts of Hindoostan.—Indian.

F.

F, a stigma put upon felons with a hot iron, on their being admitted to the benefit of clergy, abolished by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 6.

Fabric lands [ad fabricam reparandam, Lat.], land given to provide for the rebuilding or repair of cathedrals and churches. Anciently, almost every person gave something by his will to be applied in repairing the fabric of the cathedral or parish church where he lived.

Facinus quos inquinat æquat.—(Guilt makes equal those whom it stains.)

Facio, ut des (I perform, that you may give).

Facio, ut facias (I do, that you may do).

Fac simile probate, where the construction of a will may be affected by the appearance of the original paper, the court will order the probate to pass in fac simile, as it may possibly help to show the meaning of the testator.—1 Wms. Ex. 298.

Facta armorum, feats of arms, jousts, tournaments, &c.

Facta sunt potentiora verbis.—(Deeds are more powerful than words.)

Facta tenent multa quæ fieri prohibentur.—12 Co. 125.—(Deeds contain many things which are prohibited to be done.)

Facto, in fact; where anything is actually done.

Factor [fr. facteur, Fr.], a substitute in mercantile affairs; an agent employed to sell goods or merchandise consigned or delivered to him by or for his principal, for a compensation commonly called factorage or commission. Hence he is often called a commission-merchant or consignee; and the goods received by him for sale is called a consignment. He is a home factor when he resides in the same state or country with his principal, and a foreign factor when he resides in a different state or country. He differs from a broker in some important particulars, for he may buy and sell in his own name, but a broker must in that of his principal; he is also entrusted with the possession, management, control, and disposal of the goods, and has a special property in, and a lien on, them, but a broker has none of these rights; yet neither can delegate his authority to another person, unless it is conferred by the usages of trade, or by the assent of his principal, express or implied. Factors have no incidental authority to barter the goods of their principal, or to pledge such goods for advances made to them on their own account, or for debts due by themselves; although they may certainly pledge them for advances lawfully made on account of their principal, or for advances made to themselves to the extent of their own lien on the goods. And they may pledge their principal's goods for the duties and other charges due thereon.

The general duty of a factor is to procure the best intelligence of the state of trade at his residence; of the course of exchange; of the quantity and quality of the goods at market; their present price, and the probability of a rise or fall; to pay exact obedience to the orders of his employers; to consult their advantages in matters referred to his discretion; to execute their business with all the dispatch that circumstances will admit; to be early in his intelligence, distinct in his accounts, and punctual in his correspondence.—1 Liverm. on Agency, c. iii., p. 69.

By the Factor's Act, 6 Geo. IV. c. 94, a person intrusted with and in possession of a bill of lading, or any of the warrants, certificates, or orders mentioned in the act, is to be deemed the true owner of the goods therein described, so far as to give validity to any contract or agreement made by him for the sale or disposition of the goods, or the deposit or pledge thereof, as a security for any money or negotiable instrument, if the buyer, disponee, or pawnee has not notice by the document or otherwise that such person is not the actual and bonâ fide owner of the goods. By 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, s. 51, it is enacted, that if any factor or agent shall, for his own benefit, and in violation of good faith, deposit or pledge any goods, bill of lading, certificate, warrant or order for delivery of goods, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be liable to fourteen years' penal servitude. While the 6 Geo. IV. c. 94, confirms bonâ fide sales, made in the ordinary course of business, in cases in which the purchaser had notice that the seller was merely an agent, it does not confirm bonâ fide advances made on goods, or on documents of title to goods, under the same circumstances. To obviate this discrepancy, to get rid of the litigation to which certain ambiguities in the 6 Geo. IV. c. 94, had given rise, and to facilitate commerce, the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39, was passed.—Story's Agency, 28.

Factorage, the wages, commission, or allowance made to a factor by a merchant.

Factory, a place where a number of traders reside in a foreign country for the convenience of trade; also a building in which goods are manufactured. As to labor in factories, see 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 103; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 15; 10 Vict. c. 29; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 54; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 104; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 38; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 78; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 117; 25 Vict. c. 8; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 64.

Factum, a person's act or deed; anything stated or made certain.

Factum à judice quod ad ejus officium non spectat, non ratum est.—10 Co. 76.—(An action of a judge, which relates not to his office, is of no force.)

Factum negantis nulla probatio.—(A negative fact is no proof.)

Factum non dicitur quod non perseverat.—5 Co. 96.—(That is not called a deed which does not continue operative.)

Factum unius alteri nocere non debet.—Co. Litt. 152.—(The deed of one should not hurt another.)

Facultas probationum non est angustanda.—4 Inst. 279.—(The faculty of proofs is not to be narrowed.)

Faculties, Court of, a jurisdiction or tribunal belonging to the archbishop. It does not hold pleas in any suits, but creates rights to pews, monuments, and particular places, and modes of burial. It has also various other powers under 25 Hen. VIII. c. 21, in granting licenses of different descriptions, as a license to marry, a faculty to erect an organ in a parish church, to level a churchyard, to remove bodies previously buried.—4 Inst. 337; 2 Chit. Gen. Prac. 507.

Faculty, a license or authority; in ecclesiastical law a privilege granted by the ordinary to a man by favor and indulgence to do that which by law he may not do, e. g. to marry without banns, to erect a monument in a church, &c.

Faculty of Advocates, the college or society of advocates in Scotland, who plead in all actions before the courts of sessions, justiciary, and exchequer.

Fæder-feoh, the portion brought by a wife to her husband, and which reverted to a widow, in case the heir of her deceased husband refused his consent to her second marriage; i. e. it reverted to her family in case she returned to them.—Anc. Inst. Engl.

Faggot, a badge worn in popish times by persons who had recanted and abjured what was then adjudged to be heresy, as an emblem of what they had merited.

Faida, malice or deadly feud.

Failing of record, when an action is brought against a person, who alleges in his plea matter of record in bar of the action, and avers to prove it by the record; but the plaintiff saith nul tiel record, viz. denies there is any such record: upon which the defendant has a day given him by the court to bring it in: if he fail to do it, then he is said to fail of his record, and the plaintiff is entitled to sign judgment.—Termes de la Ley.

Faint action, a feigned action.

Faint pleader, a fraudulent, false, or collusive manner of pleading to the deception of a third person.—3 Edw. I. c. 19.

Fair pleader. See BEAU-PLEADER.

Fairs [fr. foire, Fr.; forum, nundinæ, Lat.], these institutions are very closely allied to markets. A fair, as the term is now generally understood, is only a greater species of market, recurring at more distant intervals. Both are appropriated to the sale of one or more species of goods, the hiring of servants or labourers, &c.; but fairs are in most cases attended by a greater concourse of people, for whose amusement various exhibitions are got up. No fair can be holden without grant from the Crown, or a prescription which supposes such grant. Before a patent is granted, it is usual to have a writ of ad quod damnum executed and returned, that it may not be issued to the prejudice of another fair or market already existing. The grant usually contains a clause that it shall not be to the hurt of another fair or market; but this clause, if omitted, will be implied in law: for if the franchise occasion damage either to the crown or a subject, in this or any other respect, it will be revoked; and a person, whose ancient title is prejudiced, is entitled to have a scire facias in the Queen's name to repeal the letters-patent. If her Majesty grant power to hold a fair or market in a particular place, the lieges can resort to no other, even though it be inconvenient. But if no place be appointed, the grantees may keep the fair or market where they please, or rather where they can most conveniently. As to times of holding fairs and markets, these are either determined by the letters-patent appointing the fair or market, or by usage.—1 Step. Com. 671; 2 Ibid. 73, 537; and 3 Ibid. 45; McCull. Comm. Dict. See The Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 14.

Fait [fr. factum, Lat.], a deed or writing. See DEED.

Fait enrolle, a deed enrolled, as a bargain, and sale of freeholds.

Faith, Articles of. See ARTICLES OF RELIGION.

Faitours, evil doers; idle livers; vagabonds.

Falang, a jacket or close coat.—Blount.

Falcatura, one day's mowing of grass, a customary service to the lord by his inferior tenants. Falcata, the fresh grass mowed and laid in swathes. Falcator, the tenant-mower.—Kenn. Glos.

Fald, or Falda, a sheep-fold.—Old Records.

Faldage [fr. faldagium, bar. Lat.], a fold-course, i. e. common of pasture for sheep.

Faldæ cursus, a sheep-walk.

Fald-fee, a composition paid anciently by tenants for the privilege of faldage.

Faldisdory [fr. falde, Sax., a hedge, and stop, a place], the bishop's seat or throne within the chancel.

Faldstool, or Foldstool, a place at the south side of the altar, at which the sovereign kneels at his coronation.

Faldworth, a person of age, that he may be reckoned of some decennary.—Du Fresne.

Falesia, a hill, or down by the sea-side.—Old Records.

Falk-land. See FOLKLAND.

Falkland Islands. See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 13, amended by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 121.

Fall of land, a quantity of land six ells square superficial measure.

Fallow-land, land ploughed, but not sowed, and left uncultivated for one or more years, with a view to exterminate weeds, and to enable it to fix those atmospherical elements which promote vegetable growth, and which are exhausted by repeated crops of the same kind.

Fallum, an unexplained term for some particular kind of land.

Falmotum. See FOLKEMOTE.

Falsa demonstratio non nocet.—6 T. R. 676. (False description does not vitiate.)

Falsa orthographia, sive falsa grammatica, non vitiat concessionem.—9 Co. 48.—(Bad spelling or bad grammar does not vitiate a grant.)

Sir John Doderidge says:—'Though the lawyers' Latin cannot defend itself in bello grammaticali, will grammarians utterly condemn the use thereof? Methinks they should not, but might give lawyers leave to speak in their own dialect.'—Treat. on Tenures; Noy's Max. Byth. ed. 266.

False character to servants. See FALSE PERSONATION.

False imprisonment, restraining personal liberty without lawful authority, for which offence the law has not only decreed a punishment, as a heinous public crime, but has also given a private reparation to the party as well by removing the actual confinement for the present by habeas corpus, as by subjecting the wrongdoer to an action of trespass, &c. usually called an action of false imprisonment, on account of the damage sustained by the loss of time and liberty.—3 Step. Com. 499; 4 Ibid. 179.

False judgment, writ of, a process that lies, by way of appeal, to the superior courts from inferior courts not of record, to amend errors in their proceedings.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1333.

False Latin. When law proceedings were written in Latin, if a word were significant, though not good Latin, yet an indictment, declaration, or fine should not be made void by it; but if the word were not Latin, nor allowed by the law, and it were in a material point, it made the whole vicious.—5 Rep. 121; 2 Nels. 830.

False news, spreading, to make discord between the sovereign and nobility, or concerning any great man of the realm, is a misdemeanor, punishable at common law by fine and imprisonment, which is confirmed by statutes Westm. 1, 3 Edw. I. c. 34; 2 Rich. II. st. 1, c. 5; and 12 Rich. II. c. 11.

False oath. See PERJURY.

False personation to obtain property. Frauds of this description were indictable at common law as misdemeanors, and punishable by fine and imprisonment, but are now made penal by the express provisions of Acts of Parliament. By 7 Geo. IV. c. 16, s. 38, and 2 Wm. IV. c. 53, s. 49, to personate any soldier, in order fraudulently to receive his pay, pension, wages, or prize-money, is felony, and punishable by penal servitude for life, or such term of years as the court shall adjudge; or if the personation be for the purpose of obtaining prize-money, with penal servitude for life, or for not less than three years. By 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 20, s. 84, to personate any seaman or marine with a like fraudulent intention, is also felony, and punishable with penal servitude for life, or not less than three years, or imprisonment for not more than four or less than two years. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 3, whoever shall falsely personate the owner of any share or interest of or in any stock, annuity or other public fund transferable at the Bank of England or of Ireland, or in the capital stock of any body corporate, company, or society, established by charter or by virtue of an Act of Parliament, or the owner of any dividend or interest payable in respect of such share or interest, and shall thereby transfer or endeavour to transfer any such share or interest, or thereby receive or endeavour to receive any money due to such owner, shall be guilty of felony, and be liable to penal servitude for life or any term not less than three years, or to imprisonment for not more than two years. By 32 Geo. III. c. 56, if any person shall personate a master, and give a false character to a servant, or assert in writing that a servant has been hired for a period of time or in a station, or was discharged at any time, or had not been hired in any previous service, contrary to truth; or if any person shall offer himself as a servant, pretending to have served where he has not served, or with a false certificate of character, or shall alter a certificate, or shall pretend not to have been in any previous service, contrary to truth, such offenders are liable, on conviction before two justices of the peace, to be fined 20*l.* and in default thereof to be imprisoned with hard labour for any time not more than three nor less than one calendar month. By 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 83, the false personation of voters at an election of a member of Parliament is made a misdemeanor, punishable with imprisonment and hard labour for any term not exceeding two years.

False plea. See SHAM PLEA.

False pretences, obtaining property by. This offence, though closely allied to larceny, is distinguishable from it, as being perpetrated through the medium of a mere fraud; it is a misdemeanor at common law, and punishable by fine and imprisonment. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 88, whosoever shall by any false pretence obtain from any other person any chattel, money, or valuable security, with intent to defraud, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable to be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years; provided always, that if, upon the trial of any person indicted for such misdemeanor, it shall be proved that he obtained the property in question in any such manner as to amount in law to larceny, he shall not by reason thereof be entitled to be acquitted of such misdemeanor, and no person tried for such misdemeanor shall be liable to be afterwards prosecuted for larceny upon the same facts. As to the form of the indictment and evidence, see same section. Whosoever shall by any false pretence cause or procure any money to be paid or any chattel or valuable security to be delivered to any other person, for the use or benefit, or on account of the person making such false pretence, or of any other person with intent to defraud, shall be deemed to have obtained such money, &c., within the meaning of s. 88 (s. 89). Whosoever, with intent to defraud or injure any other person, shall by any false pretence fraudulently cause or induce any other person to execute, make, endorse, or destroy the whole or any part of any valuable security, or to write, impress, or affix his name, or the name of any other person, &c., or the seal of any body corporate, &c., upon any paper or parchment, in order that the same may be afterwards made, or converted into, or used, or dealt with as a valuable security, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and is liable to the same punishment (s. 90).

False prophecies, with intent to disturb the peace, are unlawful, as they raise enthusiastic jealousies in the people, and terrify them with imaginary fears. They are punishable as misdemeanors. By 5 Eliz. c. 15, the penalty for the first offence is a fine of 10*l.* with one year's imprisonment; for the second, forfeiture of all goods and chattels, and imprisonment during life.

False return by a sheriff, mayor, &c. to a writ is remedied by a special action on the case.

False signal, or lights, exhibiting, with intent to bring ships into danger, is a felony punishable with penal servitude for life.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 47.

False verdict. Formerly, if a jury gave a false verdict, the party injured by it might sue out and prosecute a writ of attaint against them, either at common law or on the statute 11 Hen. VII. c. 24, at his election, for the purpose of reversing the judgment and punishing the jury for their verdict; but not where the jury erred merely in point of law, if they found according to the judge's direction. The practice of setting aside verdicts and granting new trials, however, has so superseded the use of attaints, that there is no instance of one to be found in our books of reports later than in the time of Elizabeth; and it is now altogether abolished by 6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 60.

False weights and measures. By 5 Geo. IV. c. 74, 6 Geo. IV. c. 12, and 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 63 (repealing the former acts on the subject), standards are fixed for length, weight, and capacity, and it is provided that all contracts for sale by weight or measure, where no special agreement is made to the contrary, shall be taken to refer to the standards so established. The 55 Geo. III. c. 34, provides for the punishment of offenders using false and deficient measures. The 37 Geo. III. c. 143, gives magistrates in petty sessions summary jurisdiction herein. See 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 38.

Falsi crimen, fraudulent subornation or concealment, with design to darken or hide the truth, and make things appear otherwise than they are. It is committed:—(1) By words, as when a witness swears falsely; (2) by writing, as when a person antedates a contract; (3) by deed, as selling by false weights and measures.

Falsifying judgments, reversing them.

Falsifying a record, a high offence against public justice, punishable by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, ss. 27, 28.

Falsing of dooms, an appeal from the sentence of a court.—Scotch Law.

Falsonarius, a forger.

Falso retorno brevium, a writ that lay against a sheriff, who had execution of process, for a false return.—Reg. Jud. 43.

Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus.—(False in one thing, false in all.)

Fama, fides, et oculus non patiuntur ludum. 3 Buls. 226.—(Fame, faith, and eyesight do not suffer a cheat.)

Fama, quæ suspicionem inducit, oriri debet apud bonos et graves, non quidem malevolos et maledicos, sed providas et fide dignas personas, non semel sed sæpius, quia clamor minuit et defamatio manifestat.—2 Inst. 52.—(Report, which induces suspicion, ought to arise from good and grave men, not indeed from malevolent and malicious men, but from cautious and credible persons, not only once, but frequently; for clamour diminishes, and defamation manifests.)

Famacide [fr. fama, Lat., reputation, and cædo, to kill], a slanderer.—Scott.

Familia, all the servants belonging to a particular master; also a portion of land sufficient to maintain one family.

In the widest sense among the Romans, it signified the totality of that which belongs to a Roman citizen who is sui juris, and therefore a paterfamilias.

But the word 'familia' is sometimes limited to signify persons, that is, all those who are in the power of a paterfamilias, such as his sons (filiifamilias), daughters, grandchildren, and slaves.—Smith's Dict. Antiq.

Famosus libellus, an infamous libel.

Fanatio. See FENCE-MONTH.

Faqueer, or Fakir, a poor man, mendicant; a religious beggar.—Indian.

Farandman, a traveller or merchant stranger.

Fardel of land, the fourth part of a yard-land. Noy says an eighth only, because, according to him, two fardels make a nook, and four nooks a yard-land.—Compl. Lawy. 57.

Farding-deal, or Farundel of land, the fourth part of an acre of land.

Fare, a voyage or passage by water; also the money paid for a passage either by land or by water.

Farinagium, toll of meal or flour.

Farleu, money paid by tenants in lieu of a heriot. It is often applied to the best chattel, as distinguished from heriot the best beast.

Farlingarii, whoremongers and adulterers.

Farm, or Ferm [fr. firma, Lat.; feorme, Sax., food, and feorman, to feed], land taken upon lease under a yearly rent, payable by the tenant. It is a collective word, consisting of many things, as a messuage, land, meadow, pasture, wood, common, &c. In Lancashire a farm is called ferm-holt; in the north, a tack; and in Essex, a wike.—Termes de la Ley.

Farm let [ad firmam tradidi, Lat.], operative words in a lease, which strictly mean to let upon payment of a certain rent in farm, i. e. in agricultural produce.

Farmer, one who cultivates hired land, also the lessee of taxes or tolls.

Faro, an unlawful game.—4 Step. Com. 353.

Farthing [fr. feowen, Sax., four], the fourth of a penny.

Farthing of gold, an ancient coin, containing in value the fourth part of a noble.

Farthing, or Farthingdell of land, a quantity of land, the extent of which is not known. Some say it is a quarter of an acre.

Farundel of land. See FARDING-DEAL.

Faryndon Inn, the ancient appellation of Serjeant's Inn, Chancery Lane.

Fasins, a faggot of wood.

Fast-day, a day of mortification by religious abstinence. As to such a day being reckoned in proceedings, see 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 158 & 159.

Fastens een or even [fr. vastal-abend, low Sax.], Shrove-Tuesday, the succeeding day being Ash-Wednesday, the first of the Lenten fast.

Fastermans, or Fasting-men [homines habentes, Lat.], men in repute and substance; pledges, sureties or bondsmen, who, according to the Saxon polity, were fast bound to answer for each other's peaceable behaviour.—Encyc. Lond.

Fasti, fas signifies divine law; the epithet fastus is properly applied to anything in accordance with divine law, and hence those days upon which legal business might without impiety (sine piaculo) be transacted before the prætor, were technically denominated fasti dies, i. e. lawful days. Varro and Festus derive fastus directly from fari (Varro, De Ling. Lat. vi. 2; Festus s. v. Fasti), while Ovid (Fast. i. 47) may be quoted in support of either etymology.

The sacred books in which the fasti dies of the year were marked were themselves denominated fasti; the term, however, was employed in an extended sense to denote registers of various descriptions, and many mistakes have arisen among commentators from confounding fasti of different kinds. Consult Smith's Dict. of Antiq. for the several fasti.

Fatetur facinus qui judicium fugit.—3 Inst. 14.—(He who flees judgment confesses his guilt.)

Father-in-law [socer, Lat.], the father of one's wife or husband.

Fathom [fr. fad, Teut.], a measure of 6 feet in length.

Fatua mulier, a whore.

Fatuous persons, idiots.

Fatuus, apud jurisconsultos nostros, accipitur pro non compos mentis; et fatuus dicitur, qui omnino desipit.—4 Co. 128.—(Fatuus, among our jurisconsults, is understood for a man not of right mind; and he is called 'fatuus' who is altogether foolish.)

Fausetum, a faucet, musical pipe, or flute.

Fautors, favorers or supporters of others; abettors of crimes, &c.

Favor, challenge to. See CHALLENGE.

Favorabilia in lege sunt fiscus, dos, vita, libertas.—Jenk. Cent. 94.—(Things favorably considered in law are the treasury, dower, life, liberty.)

Favorabiliores sunt executiones aliis processibus quibuscunque.—Co. Litt. 289.—(Executions are preferred to all other processes whatever.)

Favores ampliandi sunt; odia restringenda.—Jenk. Cent. 186.—(Favors are to be enlarged; things hateful restrained.)

Feal, tenants by knight-service, who swore to their lords to be feal and leal, i. e. faithful and loyal.

Feal, and Divot, a right in Scotland, similar to the right of turbary in England, for fuel, &c.

Fealty [fr. fidelitas, Lat.; feaulté, Fr.], the special oath of fidelity or mutual bond of obligation between a lord and his tenant; the general oath being the allegiance performed by every subject to his sovereign, but this is better known by its more significant appellation of the oath of allegiance. Although foreign jurists consider fealty and homage as convertible terms, because in some continental countries they are blended so as to form one engagement, yet they are not to be confounded in our country, for they do not imply the same thing, homage being the acknowledgment of tenure, and fealty, the vassal-oath of fidelity, being the essential feudal bond, and the animating principle of a feud, without which it could not subsist. Fealty comprehends the following obligations, viz.:—(1) Incolume, that the tenant do no bodily harm to his lord; (2) Tutum, that he do no secret damage to him in his house; (3) Honestum that he damage not his reputation; (4) Utile, that he do no damage to him in his possessions; (5) Facile; and (6) Possibile, that he render it easy for the lord to do any good, and not make that impossible to be done which was before in his power to do.—Leg. Hen. I. c. 5.

Feasts, anniversary days of rejoicing, either on a civil or religious occasion. Opposed to fasts.

Our feasts are either (1) immoveable, such as Christmas-day, the Circumcision, Epiphany, Candlemas-day, Lady-day, All Saints, and All-Souls, besides the days of the several apostles St. Peter, St. Thomas, &c.; these are always celebrated on the same day of the year; or (2) moveable, such as Easter, which fixes all the rest, as Palm Sunday, Good Friday, Ash Wednesday, Sexagesima, Ascension-day, Pentecost, Trinity Sunday, &c.

The four principal immoveable feasts of the year, which the English jurisprudence has assigned for the reservation or payment of rents on leases, are, the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary on Lady-day, being the 25th of March; the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, held on the 24th of June; the Feast of St. Michael the Archangel, on the 28th of September; and that of St. Thomas the Apostle, on the 21st of December.—5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 3; 3 Jac. I. c. 1; and 12 Car. II. c. 30.

Federal Government. When two or more sovereign or independent states mutually agree not to exercise certain powers incident to their several sovereignties, but to delegate the exercise of those powers to some person or body chosen by them jointly, there is said to be a federal union of those states, and the person or body to whom the exercise of such powers is delegated is called the Federal Government. The Germanic Confederation, the Swiss Confederation, and the United States of North America, are instances of Federal governments.

Fee [fr. feoh, Sax.; fee, Dan., cattle; feudum, low Lat.; feu, Scot.], property, peculiar; reward or recompense for services. Also an estate of inheritance divided into three species: (1) fee-simple absolute; (2) qualified or base fee; (3) fee-tail, formerly fee-conditional.

Fee-base. See BASE FEE.

Fee-conditional. See CONDITIONAL FEE.

Fee-expectant, where lands are given to a man and his wife, and the heirs of their bodies.

Fee-farm-rent, where an estate in fee is granted, subject to a rent in fee of at least one-fourth of the value of the lands at the time of its reservation, and such rent appears to be called fee-farm, because a grant of land reserving so considerable a rent, is indeed only letting lands to farm in fee-simple, instead of the usual method of life or years.—1 Step. Com. 685.

Fee-simple, a freehold estate of inheritance, absolute and unqualified. It stands at the head of estates as the highest in dignity and the most ample in extent; since every other kind of estate is derivable thereout, and mergeable therein, for omne majus continet in se minus. It may be enjoyed not only in land, but also in advowsons, commons, estovers, and other hereditaments as well as in personalty as an annuity or dignity, and also in an upper chamber, though the lower buildings and soil belong to another.

A fee-simple generally (5 Rep. 115) is pure, without condition, and unrestrained, except by the laws of escheat, and the canons of real-property descent. Noy, in his Treatise on Tenures, p. 65, says: 'This estate can never perish, so long as the substance, whereof the estate ariseth, hath a being. And, therefore, albeit that he which is seized of such estate, happen to die without heir, yet the same estate is not extinguished, but, by act in law, in some other degree, transferred to the lord of whom the lands were holden, by way of escheat; because the land, wherein the tenant hath such estate, doth still continue. But, if a man seised in fee of a rent-charge or rent-seck, dieth without heir, this fee-simple, although it be of the first sort, doth perish; because the rent, wherein he hath estate, being transitory, is, by such dying without heir, quite swallowed up and drowned in the land out of which it did issue.' It is not, however, confined to any particular line or species of heirs, but descends to the owner's heirs general, whether lineal or collateral, paternal or maternal, male or female, born or unborn.

Littleton, in his Tenures (s. 1), gives a description of this estate, which appears to have been adopted by every subsequent writer. His language is this:—

A person who holds 'in fee simple is he which hath lands or tenements to hold to him and his heires for ever. And it is called in Latin feodum simplex, for feodum is the same that inheritance is, and simplex is as much as to say lawful or pure. And so feodum simplex signifies a lawful or pure inheritance. For if a man would purchase lands or tenements in fee simple it behoveth him to have these words in his purchase, to have and to hold to him and to his heires: for these words (his heires) make the estate of inheritance. For if a man purchase lands to have and to hold for him for ever; or by these words, to have and to hold to him and his assignes for ever: in these two cases he hath but an estate for term of life, for that there lack these words (his heires), which words only make an estate of inheritance in all' transfers, inter vivos.

This estate may be created by agreement or act of parties, evidenced either by a deed or will.

In a deed the word 'heirs' is so absolutely necessary either expressly or by direct and immediate reference to constitute a fee or inheritable estate, that not even a synonymous term, nor any periphrasis or circumlocution, will have that effect, how clear soever the intent of the parties using such language may be. But such a sentence as this: 'to the use of all and every, the child and children, share and share alike, if more than one, as tenants in common and not as joint-tenants, and if but one child, then to such only child his or her heirs and assigns for ever,' will pass the fee-simple to all the children, notwithstanding the word 'their' is omitted, for the words 'his or her heirs' will operate as words of limitation on all the preceding words in the sentence.—4 T. R. 39. The common law adopted this strict and necessary rule to rebut the presumption of the grant being but a life-freehold, and also to avoid uncertainty—the mother of contention. And so far has this prescriptive rule been carried that the word 'heirs' in the plural number was held by Lord Coke (Co. Litt. 9 a) essential, and a conveyance to A. and his 'heir' in the singular number, vested in A. a life-freehold only; because it was contended the heir cannot take a fee-simple by descent, as he is but one, and therefore, in such case, cannot take anything. But the term 'heir' is a nomen collectivum, operating similarly as heirs in the plural number. Perhaps a limitation to A. and his heir would be ruled by the Courts, in the present day, as conveying a fee-simple.—Dubber dem. Trollope v. Trollope, Amb. 453. See, however, Bayley v. Morris, 4 Ves. 794. The word 'heir' in the singular number only is a word of purchase, and not of limitation.—Gilbert on Uses, p. 24; 2 Prest. Est. 8. A limitation to 'A. and heirs,' omitting 'his' will pass but an estate for life, on account of its uncertainty.—Plowd. 28. But in the following cases a fee-simple will pass without the word 'heirs:' (1) By creation of nobility by writ, which of itself ennobles the blood to a man and his lineal heirs, unless the writ otherwise limit it; the creation of nobility by patent, however, gives no inheritance without proper words. (2) In gifts that take effect by reference; as if A. give land to B. and his heirs, and then B. grant to A. as fully as A. had before granted to him. — Chambers on Estates, 31. (3) Where one coparcener or joint-tenant release all right to another, for words of inheritance are not necessary in a release of a right; and (4) Where one coparcener grants a rent to the other, for equality or owelty of partition, a fee-simple in the rent will pass without the word 'heirs,' for the rent is substituted for the fee.

In practice the phrase universally adopted in the designation-clause of deeds, in order to transfer a fee-simple absolute, is—'to A., his heirs, and assigns, for ever.'

The word 'assigns' is not material, and may be omitted, for it gives no other privilege to the owner than that which the law itself confers upon him by virtue of his estate, as entitling him to alien or transfer it; and the phrase 'for ever' not being limitary but simply declaratory of the time during which the property shall be enjoyed, may also be omitted in the conveyance.

It must be remarked that the word 'successors' is the proper term to be used in transfers to corporations sole, it corresponding to the word 'heirs.' In every conveyance then of a fee-simple or perpetual estate to a bishop, rector, or any other corporation sole, other than the queen, the word 'successors' is as necessary as the word 'heirs' in a grant to a private person. But in transfers to the queen or to corporations aggregate, as the head and fellows of a college, a dean and chapter, the mayor and commonalty of a city, &c., neither 'successors' nor 'heirs,' nor any other word of perpetuity is requisite, because they never die as such, but enjoy a kind of legal immortality; nor is it necessary in the case of a corporation sole, when the grant is made to it by its corporate or collective name, as a grant to the church of A.—1 Atk. 437.

This stern and inflexible rule is now wisely confined to formal deeds, which are duly deliberated upon and weighed as to the precise and technical effect of the language inserted in them before they are executed by the parties thereto. In wills, however, which are frequently written and signed, without counsel and without proper deliberation, and often during an unanticipated malady, and amidst the consternation of a sick chamber, the law relaxes this iron principle, declaring (1 Vict. c. 26, s. 28) 'that after 1st January 1838, where any real estate shall be devised to any person without any words of limitation, such devise shall be construed to pass the fee-simple, or other the whole estate or interest which the testator had the power to dispose of by will in such real estate, unless a contrary intention should appear by the will.'

It will be advisable, however, notwithstanding this wholesome statutable provision, to introduce into wills, more especially when they are prepared by a professional man, the technical words which are absolutely indispensable in the case of deeds, so as to express with certainty the testator's intention respecting the quantity of estate which he desires shall be devised.

The attributes or incidents, rights and privileges of this estate, are the following:—

(a) An uncontrollable power of alienation, whether by deed, gift, or will; and, whether of the whole or part of the estate. This power may be partially limited thus: a condition that the tenant shall not alien to a given person or any of his heirs; or a devise in fee to A. and B. on condition that they shall not alien to any but sisters or their children (Litt. s. 361; 4 East, 173; 3 Ves. 324), or for a given time.

A new kind of inheritance cannot be created, for if one convey an estate to A. and his heirs male, or to A. and his heirs female, the word 'male' or 'female' is to be rejected, and A. will have the estate to him and his heirs generally.—Litt. s. 31. So a grant to A. and his heirs, on the part of his mother, will descend to his heirs on the part of his father, the words italicised being rejected.

Inheritable offices of personal trust, dignity or foundership cannot be alienated.

(b) If the owner die intestate, it descends to his heirs general, male or female, lineal or collateral, according to the canons as settled by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, except the estate be subjected to gavelkind, borough-English, or copyhold customs, when the particular custom vacates the general law, for consuetudo loci observanda est (6 Rep. 67).

(c) It is subject to the curtesy of a husband, and the dower of a wife, as the case may be, provided the right of the former be consummated by the necessary stipulations having been perfected, or that of the latter has not been barred.

(d) The owner has an uncontrollable power of waste over it.

(e) It is liable to all the owner's debts (1 Wm. IV. c. 47; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 104; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11; 2 & 3 Vict c. 60; and 11 & 12 Vict. c. 87), after the unexempted personalty has been exhausted.

(f) It escheats to the lord of the fee for want of heirs, except in the case of persons having the legal estate, as trustees or mortgagees in pursuance of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, s. 46, which act also prevents the forfeiture of such estates by reason of the attainder or conviction for any offence of a trustee or mortgagee.

(g) It is forfeitable for treason of the beneficial owner to the crown absolutely; for murder, to the crown during a year and a day, and then to the lord of the fee absolutely; for other felonies to the crown, during a year and a day, and then the lord takes the profits during the felon-owner's life, who still retains the legal estate, which upon his death devolves upon his heir-at-law, unless the offender have otherwise disposed of the estate in reversion expectant on his decease.—1 Cru. Dig. 63. The forfeiture relates back to the commission of the crime, so as to shut out and make void all intermediate transfers of and charges upon the estate.

Fee-tail. See TAIL.

Fees, certain perquisites allowed to officers in the administration of justice, as a recompense for their labor and trouble, ascertained either by acts of Parliament, by rule or order of court, or by ancient usage. As to Common Law fees, see 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1693; and in Equity, see Smi. Ch. Pr. 842. Fees in Chancery are paid by means of stamps.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 8.

The fees of the steward of a manor are regulated entirely by custom, and a customal or list of fees to be taken, under every circumstance, is generally handed down from steward to steward. When the steward charges enormously, the copyholder may bring an action on the case, to recover the excess, and it has been suggested that an indictment would lie for extortion colore officii. The fees of the steward of a manor who is a solicitor, but acts in the character of a steward only, are not taxable under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 37. In transactions where these fees are large or numerous, a special agreement is generally made between all parties.—Allen v. Aldridge, 5 Beav. 401. As to barristers' fees, see BARRISTER.

Feigned action. See FAINT ACTION.

Feigned diseases, simulated maladies.

Diseases are generally feigned from one of three causes—fear, shame, or the hope of gain. Thus a man engaged in the military or naval service will pretend to be afflicted with various maladies, in order to escape the performance of military duty; the mendicant, to avoid labor and to impose on public or private beneficence; and the criminal, to prevent the infliction of punishment. The spirit of revenge, and the hope of receiving exorbitant damages, have also induced some to magnify slight ailments into alarming illnesses. On this subject, Foderé (vol. ii. p. 452) observes, at the time when the conscription was in full force in France, 'that it is at present brought to such perfection as to render it as difficult to detect a feigned disease as to cure a real one.'

Zacchias has given five general rules for the detection of feigned diseases :—

(1) That inquiry should be made of the relatives and friends of the suspected individual as to his physical and moral habits, and as to the state of his affairs, and what may possibly be the motive for feigning disease—particularly whether he is not in immediate danger of some punishment, from which this sickness may excuse him.

(2) Compare the disease under examination with the causes capable of producing it; such as the age, temperament, and mode of life of the patient.

(3) The aversion of persons feigning disease to take proper remedies. This, indeed, will occur in real sickness; but it rarely happens when severe pain is present.

(4) Particular attention should be paid to the symptoms present, and whether they necessarily belong to the disease.

(5) Follow the course of the complaint, and attend to the circumstances which successively occur.—Beck's Med. Jurisp. c i. For a table of feigned diseases, see Dung. pp. 379–383.

Feigned issue, a proceeding whereby an action is supposed to be brought by consent of the parties to determine some disputed right, without the formality of pleading, saving thereby both time and expense. It may be ordered either by a court of law or equity, or by a judge under the Interpleader Act, 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 58. The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 19, after reciting that many important questions are now tried in the form of feigned issues, by stating that a wager was laid between two parties interested in respectively maintaining the affirmative and the negative of certain propositions; but that such questions may be as satisfactorily tried without such form, enacts, that in every case where any court of law or equity may desire to have any question of fact decided by a jury, it shall be lawful for such court to direct a writ of summons to be sued out by such person or persons as such court shall think ought to be plaintiff or plaintiffs against such person or persons as such court shall think ought to be defendant or defendants therein, in the form set forth in the second schedule to the act annexed, with such alterations or additions as such court may think proper; and thereupon all the proceedings shall go on and be brought to a close in the same manner as is now practised in proceedings upon a feigned issue.

This enactment is an enabling and not a compulsory one, and, therefore, feigned issues may still be stated in the form of wagers between the plaintiff and defendant, as they used to be before the act.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 890.

Felagus, a companion, but particularly a friend who was bound in the decennary for the good behaviour of another.

Feld, field; in composition, wild.—Blount.

Fele, or Feal homagers [fr. fai, Sax.; fides, Lat.], faithful subjects.

Fellow [quasi, to follow, Minshew; fr. fe, Sax., faith, and lag, bound, Junius; fallow, Scot.], a companion; one with whom we consort; a member of a college or corporate body.

Fellow-heir, co-heir; partner of the same inheritance.

Felo de se (a felon of himself), a self-murderer; one who feloniously commits self-murder. The barbarous mode of burying such persons is abolished; the only legal consequences of the crime are now forfeiture and deprivation of Christian burial.—4 Geo. IV. c. 52, s. 1.

Felon [fr. felon, Fr.; felo, low Lat.; fel, Sax.], one who has committed a felony.

Felonia implicatur in quâlibet proditione.—3 Inst. 15.—(Felony is implied in every treason.)

Felonia, ex vi termini, significat quodlibet capitale crimen felleo animo perpetratum.—Co. Litt. 391.—(Felony, by force of the term, signifies any capital crime perpetrated with a malignant mind.)

Felonious homicide, killing a human creature without justification or excuse. It is of two kinds :—(1) Killing one's self, or felo de se. (2) Killing another.

Felony [fr. félonie, Fr.; felonia, Lat.; some deduce it fr. φῆλος, Gk., a deceiver, fr. fallo, Lat., to deceive; Spelman derives it fr. the Teutonic or German fee, a fieu or fief, and lon, price or value]. In its original signification it meant the penal consequences resulting from the commission of certain offences, i. e. the forfeiture of the offender's lands and goods at Common Law, but in modern times it imports the offence itself. See 1 Mill's Log. 40, note.

Female-labor, the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 99, altogether prohibits the employment of women and girls in mines and collieries after 1st of March 1843, under heavy penalties.

Feme, or Femme, a woman.

Feme-covert, a married woman. See COVERT-BARON.

Feme-sole, an unmarried woman.

Femicide, the killing of a woman.

Fence, a hedge, ditch, or other enclosure of land for the better manurance and improvement of the same.

Fence-month, or Defence-month, a time during which deer in forests do fawn; when their hunting is unlawful. It begins fifteen days before Old Midsummer, and ends fifteen days after it.—Manw. pt. 2, c. xiii.

Feneration [fr. fœneratio, Lat.], usury; the gain of interest; the practice of increasing money by lending.

Fengeld, a tax or imposition, exacted for the repelling of enemies.

Feod, or Feud, the right which the vassal had in land, or some immoveable property of his lord, to use the same and take the profits thereof, rendering unto the lord such duties and services as belonged to the particular tenure; the actual property in the soil always remaining in the lord.—Spelm. Feuds and Tenures.

Feodal, of or belonging to the feod or feud.

Feodal system. See FEUDAL SYSTEM.

Feodality, fealty. See FEALTY.

Feodary, or Feudary, an officer of the court of wards, appointed by the master of that court under 32 Hen. VIII. c. 26, whose business it was to be present with the escheator in every county at the finding of offices of lands, and to give evidence for the king, as well concerning the value as the tenure; and his office was also to survey the land of the ward, after the office found, and to rate it. He also assigned the king's widows their dower; and received all the rents, &c. Abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Feodatory, or Feudatary, the tenant who held his estate by feudal service.

Feodum est quod quis tenet ex quâcunque causâ, sive sit tenementum sive redditus.—Co. Litt. 1. (A fee is that which any one holds from whatever cause, whether tenement or rent.)

Feodum simplex quia feodum idem est quod hæreditas, et simplex idem est quod legitimum vel purum; et sic feodum simplex idem est quod hæreditas legitima vel hæreditas pura.—Litt. s. 1.—(A fee-simple, so called because fee is the same as inheritance, and simple is the same as lawful, or pure; and thus fee-simple is the same as a lawful inheritance, or pure inheritance.)

Feodum talliatum, i. e. hæreditas in quandam certitudinem limitata.—Litt. s. 13.—(Fee-tail; that is an inheritance limited in a definite descent.)

Feodum. See FEOD.

Feodum, or Feudum antiquum, a feud which devolved upon a vassal from his intestate ancestor.

Feodum laicum, a lay-fee.

Feodum militis, a knight's fee.

Feodum, or Feudum novum, a feud acquired by a vassal himself.

Feoffee, one put into possession.

Feoffee to uses, the person in whom, before the Statute of Uses, the legal seisin or feudal tenancy of the land was vested, the substantial and beneficial ownership or use being in the cestui que use. The statute destroyed the estate of the feoffee to uses, and conveyed the possession to the cestui que use, who has now the legal estate, his use being executed by the statute.

Feoffer, one who gives possession of anything.

Feoffment [fr. feoffare, to give a feud], a deed (29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 1, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 3) evidencing and explaining the transmuting of the possession of a freehold estate, the transmutation being effected by a ceremony technically called livery of seisin.

The incidents to this assurance are:—

(1) The feoffor or person conveying must have actual seisin or possession of the freehold to be conveyed. But if a lessee for years be possessed, the feoffor may nevertheless enfeoff the feoffee with the freehold, if the tenant will give his consent to it, and such consent will not operate as a surrender or forfeiture of the lease.

(2) The feoffee must be capable of taking by feoffment, and must not have the actual seisin already: therefore, one joint-tenant cannot convey his share of the freehold to his companion by feoffment, since he is seised per my et per tout.

(3) The appropriate operative verbs are, 'give, grant, and enfeoff.'

(4) The estate must be either a freehold in possession or expectant upon a chattel interest.

(5) The freehold must not be put in abeyance or expectancy, but must take effect in præsenti.

(6) The livery of seisin may be by the feoffor or his attorney going upon the land, and giving to the feoffee or his attorney a clod, branch, or turf, or in the case of a house the knocker, ring, or latch of the door, in the name of seisin of all the lands and tenements contained in the deed or charter of feoffment. This is called livery in deed. The attorney (if any) must be appointed by deed, and if the feoffment be by deed-poll, the letter of attorney may be contained in it, and so, if it be by indenture; but the attorney should then, it has been said, be a party to it.

There is another kind of livery which is within view or in law, when the feoffor or feoffee not being upon the land, or in the house, the livery is given of yonder property, whereupon the feoffee must make entry on it. This livery can neither be made nor received by attorney.

(7) When a particular estate for years and a freehold remainder are created at the same time, the livery in deed must be given to the lessee for years; the freehold then commences in præsenti, though to be enjoyed in futuro.

(8) A memorandum that livery of seisin was given should be endorsed on the feoffment, although it will be presumed to have been given, when not endorsed, where the possession has been enjoyed for 20 years according to the tenor of the feoffment, or it may be proved by parol evidence, and equity will supply the want of it, where the deed was made for a good or valuable consideration.

(9) Estoppel operates upon a feoffment so far as to bind the feoffor's estate during his own life.

(10) A feoffment was a tortuous conveyance, i. e. if a person attempted to convey by it a greater freehold than he had, he forfeited the estate of which he was seised; but now it is a rightful (droiturel) or innocent conveyance, transferring only the estate which the feoffor can lawfully convey, being void pro tanto the excess, and so operating no forfeiture.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 4.

Feoffment to uses. A feoffment is a conveyance at the common law, so far as it conveys the land to the feoffee; if it is directed to operate to, or to the use of the feoffee, it has no other operation than at the common law: but if it is directed to operate to the use of any other person, then, though it be a common law conveyance, so far as it conveys the land to the feoffee, it derives its effect from the Statute of Uses, so far as the use is limited by it to the person or persons in whose favor it is declared. Thus, if A. be desirous to convey to B. in fee, he may do so by enfeoffing a third person, C. (of course with livery of seisin), to hold to him and his heirs to the use of B. and his heirs: the effect of which will be to convey the legal estate in fee-simple to B. For, since the Statute of Uses, the legal estate passes to the feoffee by means of the livery, as it would have done before; but no sooner has this taken place, than the limitation to uses begins to operate, and C. thereby becomes seised to the use defined or limited; the consequence of which is, that by force of the legislative enactment the legal estate is co instanti taken out of him, and vests in B., for the like interest as was limited in the use, that is, in fee-simple. B. thus becomes the legal tenant as effectually as if the feoffment had been made to himself, and without the intervention of a trustee. This method is not much practised, in consequence of the livery of seisin.—2 Sand. Uses and Trusts, 13; Watk. Conv. 288.

Feoffor. See FEOFFER.

Feoh, or Fioh, cattle; money.

Feorme, a certain portion of the produce of the land due by the grantee to the lord according to the terms of the charter.

Feræ naturæ, Animals. Beasts and birds of a wild disposition, such as deer, hares, coneys in a warren, pheasants, partridges, &c., as distinguished from those domitæ naturæ, or tame, such as horses, sheep, poultry, &c. They are not whilst living the subjects of absolute property, but a man may acquire a qualified property in them either: (1) Per industriam, by his reclaiming and making them tame by art and industry, or by so confining them that they cannot escape, e. g. deer in a park, hares or rabbits in an enclosed warren, &c. The property in them only continues so long as they remain in a man's actual possession, but ceases if they regain their liberty, unless they have animus revertendi, as in the case of pigeons, tame hawks, &c. (2) Ratione impotentiæ, on account of their inability, as when birds, coneys, &c., make their nests or burrows on a man's land, and have young ones, then he has a qualified property in the young until they can fly or run away. (3) Propter privilegium, when a man has the privilege of hunting, taking and killing certain wild animals, usually called game, in exclusion of other persons. He has a transient property in them so long as they continue within his liberty, and may prevent any stranger from taking them therein; but the instant they depart from his liberty, his qualified property in them ceases. Of animals ferœ naturæ when dead, reclaimed, or confined, if they are fit for food, larceny may be committed at common law. See 2 Bl. Comm. 391; Steph. Comm. vol. i., 164, 673; ii., 419, 237, 569; iii., 358; iv., 199, 200; and see Roscoe's Crim. Evid., 454; see also 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 11–24.

Ferdella terræ, a fardel-land; ten acres; or perhaps a yard-land.

Ferdingus, apparently a freeman of the lowest class, being named after the cotseti.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Ferdwit [fr. ferd, Sax., army, and wite, punishment], quit of manslaughter committed in the army; also a fine imposed on persons for not going forth in a military expedition.—Cowel.

Feriæ, holidays; generally speaking, days or seasons during which free-born Romans suspended their political transactions and their law-suits, and during which slaves enjoyed a cessation from labor.—Cic. De Leg. ii. 8, 12. All feriæ were thus dies nefasti.

All feriæ were divided into two classes—feriæ publicæ and feriæ privatæ. The latter were only observed by single families or individuals, in commemoration of some particular event which had been of importance to them or their ancestors.—Smith's Dict. Antiq.

Ferling, the fourth part of a penny; also the quarter of a ward in a borough.—Old Records.

Ferlingata, a fourth part of a yard-land.

Ferlingus, or Ferlingum, a furlong, which see.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Ferm, or Fearm, a house and land let by lease.

Fermary, an hospital.

Fermier, one who farms any public revenue in France.

Fermisona, the winter season for killing deer.

Fern. Unlawfully and maliciously setting fire to growing fern or to a stack of fern is a felony. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 16 & 17.

Fernigo, a piece of waste ground where ferns grow.

Ferrets are not the subjects of larceny.—3 Step. Com. 8 n.

Ferriage, the fare paid at a ferry.

Ferry, the right to carry persons and their goods in boats across a river, and to take toll for such carriage. It is a franchise, and can only be created by license from the Crown or by Act of Parliament. See Steph. Comm. i., 671, 673; and iii., 520 n.

Ferspeken, to speak suddenly.

Fesance, an act.

Festinatio justitiæ est noverca infortunii.—Hob. 97.—(Hasty justice is the stepmother of misfortune.)

Festing-men. See FASTING-MEN.

Festing-penny [fr. festnian, Sax., to confirm], earnest given to servants when hired or retained in service.

Festinum remedium, a prompt redress.

Festum (a feast).

Festum stultorum (the feast of fools).

Feu, or Few, a free and gratuitous right to lands, made to one for service to be performed by him, according to the proper nature thereof. Feu, in Scotland, means vassal-tenure, in contradistinction to wardholding, or military tenure.—Scotch Law.

Feu, or Few annual, the rent due by the reddendo of the property of the ground, before the house was built within burgh.—Ibid.

Feud. See DEADLY FEUD.

Feudal. See FEODAL.

Feudal system, that scheme of tenure which the Conqueror perfected in this country, thereby displacing the Saxon laws of property, and which was the chief institution of the middle ages. See TENURE.

While the principles of realty are for the most part of feudal derivation, the rules concerning personalty are brought from the civil law, or the law of nature. Sir Robert Chambers, in his Treatise on Estates and Tenures, epitomizes the history of the Feudal System as follows:—

The duration of the feudal law has by some writers been fancifully enough distinguished into four ages:

(1) In its infancy, the lands given to the soldiers, which were not yet called feuds, and perhaps had no general denomination, were held by the mere will and pleasure of their lord.

(2) The second age began when some regard was had to descent. It is supposed, that at first the son of a tenant was put into possession of his father's land, not as having a better right, but as being naturally more known and more favored than a stranger. That which was reasonable by degrees became customary, and when the son without any cause alleged was excluded, the lord was considered as exercising summum jus, as acting unkindly, though not illegally. In time the advantages of a more certain settlement were discovered, and grants were made to a tenant and his sons. These grants were, however, interpreted in their most literal rigor.

(3) In the third age those possessions which, while they were granted only for life, or at most with very strict limitations, had been termed beneficia, began to be made indefinitely inheritable, and took the name of feuds. The succession to a feud was for some time strictly lineal.

The three periods of the feudal law which have been mentioned are called its infancy, childhood, and youth.

(4) Then commenced its fourth age or maturity: the order of descent was settled, collateral relations were admitted to inheritance, the reciprocal obligations of lord and tenant were fully understood, and some princes, the first of whom was the Emperor Conrad the Second, had published edicts in writing for regulating feudal successions.—Craig. Feud. lib. passim.

About a century after the Conquest the feudal law received its completion by the book De Feudis, now appended to the body of the civil law, and compiled in the time of Frederic the First. This book comprises some decretal epistles of popes and some edicts of emperors, with the opinions and decisions of feudal lawyers, particularly of those from whose collections it was chiefly compiled, Gerardus Niger and Obertus de Horto. This was the highest state of the feudal law, in which, like all other human things, it continued a short time, and from which it afterwards declined.

Feudbote, a recompense for engaging in a feud or quarrel.

Feudist, a writer on feuds, as Cujacius, Spelman, &c.

Feudum. Fidelis ero verè domino vero meo.—(A fee. I will be truly faithful to my true lord.)

Feuds, Book of, published during the reign of Henry III., about the year 1152. The particular customs of Lombardy, as to feuds, began to be the standard and authority to other nations, on account of the greater refinement with which that kind of learning had been there cultivated. It is probable that this compilation was known here, but it does not appear that it had any other effect than influencing our lawyers to study their own tenures with more diligence, and work up the learning of real property with much curious matter of a similar kind. Thus, tenures in England continued a peculiar species of feuds, partaking of certain original qualities in common with others; but when once established here, growing up with a strength and figure entirely their own. While most of the nations in Europe referred to the Book of Feuds as the grand code of law by which to correct and amend the imperfections in their own tenures, there is not in our law-books any allusion that intimates the existence of such a body of constitutions.—2 Reeves, 55.

Fiar, opposed to life renter. The person in whom the property of an estate is vested, subject to the life renter's estate.—Scotch Law.

Fiars prices, the value of grain in the different counties of Scotland, fixed yearly by the respective sheriffs, in the month of February, with the assistance of juries. These regulate the prices of grain stipulated to be sold at the fiar prices, or when no price has been stipulated.

Fiat (let it be done), a decree; a short order or warrant of some judge for making out and allowing certain processes.

Fiat in bankruptcy, the authority of the Lord Chancellor to a commissioner of bankrupts, which authorized him to proceed in the bankruptcy of a trader mentioned therein. It was abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, and a petition for adjudication substituted.

Fiat justitia ruat cælum.—(Let right be done, though the heavens should fall.)

Fiat prout fieri consuerit, nil temere novandum.—Jenk Cent. 116.—(Let it be done even as it is accustomed to be done, let nothing be innovated rashly.)

Fiaunt [fr. fiat, Lat.], warrant.

Fictio cedit veritati. Fictio juris non est ubi veritas.—(Fiction yields to truth. Where there is truth, fiction of law exists not.)

Fictio, fictions, in Roman law, are like fictions in English law, of which it has been said that they are 'those things that have no real essence in their own body, but are so acknowledged and accepted in law for some especial purpose.' The fictions of the Roman law apparently had their origin in the edictal power, and they were devised for the purpose of providing for cases where there was no legislative provision. A fiction supposed something to be which was not, but the thing supposed to be was such a thing as, being admitted to be a fact, gave to some person a right, or imposed on some person a duty. Various instances of fictions are mentioned by Gaius.

It was by a fiction that the notion of legal capacity was extended to artificial persons, that is, to such persons as were merely supposed to exist for legal purposes. Numerous instances of fictions occur in the chapters entitled Juristische Personen, in Savigny's System des Heut. R. R. vol. ii.

Fictio legis iniquè operatur alicui damnum vel injuriam.—2 Co. 35.—(A fiction of law improperly works loss or injury to any one.)

Fictitious actions, actions brought upon pretended rights.

Fictitious payee, a payee who does not exist.

Fide-jussor, a surety, or one that obliges himself in the same contract with a principal, for the greater security of the creditor or stipulator.—Civ. Law.

Fidei-commissum, a testamentary disposition, by which a person who gives a thing to another imposes on him the obligation of transferring it to a third person. The obligation was not created by words of legal binding force (civilia verba), but by words of request (precativè), such as 'fidei committo,' 'peto,' 'volo dari,' and the like, which were the operative words (verba utilia). If the object of the fidei-commissum was the hæreditas, the whole or a part, it was called fidei commissaria hæreditas, which is equivalent to a universal fidei-commissum; if it was a single thing, or a sum of money, it was called fidei-commissum singulæ rei. The obligation to transfer the former could only be imposed on the heres; the obligation of transferring the latter might be imposed on a legatee.

It appears that there were no legal means of enforcing the due discharge of the trust called fidei-commissum, till the time of Augustus, who gave the consuls jurisdiction in fidei-commissa.

Fidei-commissa seem to have been introduced in order to evade the civil law, and to give the hæreditas, or a legacy, to a person who was either incapacitated from taking directly, or who could not take as much as the donor wished to give. Gaius, when observing that peregrini could take fidei commissa, observes that, 'this' (the object of evading the law) 'was probably the origin of fidei-commissa;' but by a senatus-consultum, made in the time of Hadrian, such fidei-commissa were claimed by the fiscus. Fidei-commissa were ultimately assimilated to legacies.—Gaius, ii. 247–289; Ulp. Frag. tit. 25; Sand. Just. 347.

Fidelitas. De nullo tenemento, quod tenetur ad terminum, fit homagii; fit tamen inde fidelitatis sacramentum.—Co. Litt. 676.—(Fealty. For no tenement which is held for a term is there the oath of homage, but there is the oath of fealty.)

Fidem mentiri, when a tenant does not keep that fealty which he has sworn to the lord.—Leg. Hen. I. c. 53.

Fides est obligatio conscientiæ alicujus ad intentionem alterius.—Bacon.—(Faith is an obligation of conscience of one to the will of another.)

Fiducia. If a man transferred his property to another, on condition that it should be restored to him, this contract was called fiducia, and the person to whom the property was so transferred was said fiduciam accipere—Cic. Top. 10. A man might transfer his property to another for the sake of greater security in time of danger, or for other sufficient reasons.—Gaius, ii. 60.

Fiduciary [fr. fiduciarius, Lat.], one who holds anything in trust.

Fief, a fee; a manor, a possession held by some tenant of a superior.

Fiefs were originally called terræ jure beneficii concessæ; and it was not till under Charles le Gros, the term fief began to be in use.—Du Cange.

Fief d'haubert, the Norman phrase for knight-service.

Fierding courts, inferior ancient Gothic courts, so called because four were established within every superior district or hundred.

Fieri facias, usually abbreviated fi. fa. (that you cause to be made), a judicial writ that lies for him who has recovered any debt or damages in the Queen's courts. It is a command to the sheriff, that of the goods and chattels of the party he cause to be made the sum recovered by the judgment, together with interest, at 4*l.* per cent. from the time of entering up the judgment, and have the money and interest, and the writ itself, before the queen, or before her justices, if in the Common Pleas; or her barons, if in the Exchequer, at Westminster, immediately after the execution of the writ, to be rendered to the party who sued it out. If the sheriff return nulla bona, an alias fi. fa. may issue; and upon that being returned, a pluries, or a testatum fi. fa. may be issued into another county.

By 8 Anne, c. 14, s. 1, 'no goods or chattels whatsoever, lying or being in or upon any messuage, lands, or tenements, which are or shall be leased for life or lives, term of years, at will, or otherwise, shall be liable to be taken by virtue of any execution on any pretence whatsoever, unless the party at whose suit the said execution is sued out, shall, before the removal of such goods from off the premises, by virtue of such execution or extent, pay to the landlord of the said premises, or his bailiff, all such sum or sums of money as are or shall be due for rent for the said premises at the time of the taking such goods or chattels by virtue of such execution, provided the said arrears of rent do not amount to more than one year's rent; and in case the said arrears shall exceed one year's rent, then the said party, at whose suit such execution is sued out, paying the said landlord, or his bailiff, one year's rent, may proceed to execute his judgment, as he might have done before the making of this act; and the sheriff or other officer is hereby empowered and required to levy and pay to the plaintiff as well the money so paid for rent as the execution-money.' And see 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 67, as to short tenancies.

Under this execution can be taken all personal goods and chattels, excepting wearing apparel, &c. to the value of 5*l.* (8 & 9 Vict. c. 127, s. 8). Also any money or bank-notes (whether of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, or of any other bank or bankers), and any cheques, bills of exchange, promissory notes, bonds, specialties, or other security for money belonging to the person against whose effects a fi. fa. shall be sued out. (1 & 2 Vict. 2. 110, s. 12). The sheriff cannot sell an estate in fee or for life, unless, perhaps, an estate pur autre vie; but he may sell leases and terms for years. Neither can fixtures be seized, but emblements may. The seizure and sale of straw, chaff, turnips, manure, hay, grapes, roots, vegetables, &c. on lands let to farm, are regulated by 56 Geo. III. c. 50. As to growing crops, see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 25, s. 2. If the sheriff seize the goods of a stranger, he will be liable to an action. The goods of a woman cohabiting with a defendant cannot be taken in execution, although she passes as his wife. If the sheriff return that he has taken goods, but that they remain in his hands for want of buyers, a venditioni exponas is issued to compel a sale; but if the sheriff have gone out of office after such return, instead of a venditioni exponas, a distringas nuper vicecomitem, addressed to the present sheriff, issues, commanding him to distrain the late sheriff to sell the goods, or forfeit issues to the amount of the debt. An elegit or a ca. sa. may issue after a fi. fa. if the judgment be not satisfied.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 134.

A fi. fa. may be issued in Chancery suits, for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction of any pecuniary demand, to which a person may be entitled under a decree or order of the court.—1 & 2 Vict., c. 110; and Consol. Ord. 1860, Ord. xxix. 3.

Fieri facias de bonis ecclesiasticis (that you cause to be made of the ecclesiastic's goods), when a sheriff to a common fi. fa. returns nulla bona, and that the defendant is a beneficed clerk, not having any lay fee, a plaintiff may issue a fi. fa. de bonis ecclesiasticis, addressed to the bishop of the diocese, or to the archbishop (during the vacancy of the bishop's see), commanding him to make of the ecclesiastical goods and chattels belonging to the defendant within his diocese, the sum therein mentioned. 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1272.

It can be obtained in Chancery. See Consol. Ord. 1860, Ord. xxix. 4.

Fieri feci (I have caused to be made), a return made by a sheriff when he has executed a writ of execution.

Fifteenths, a tribute or imposition of money, anciently laid generally upon cities, boroughs,

&c. through the whole realm; so called, because it amounted to a fifteenth part of that which each city or town was valued at, or a fifteenth of every man's personal estate, according to a reasonable valuation.—Cam. Brit. 171.

Fightwite, making a quarrel to the disturbance of the peace.

Figures, the numeral characters by which numbers are expressed or written, as the ten digits, which are usually called the Arabic or Indian figures, from their supposed origin. The 6 Geo. II. c. 14, allows the expressing numbers by figures in all writs, &c., pleadings, rules, orders, and indictments, &c. in courts of justice, in like manner as had been commonly used in the said courts, notwithstanding anything in 4 Geo. II. c. 26.

Filacer, Filazer, or Filizer [fr. filum, Lat.; file, filace, Fr., a thread], an officer of the superior courts at Westminster, who files original writs, &c. and issues processes thereon.—2 Wm. IV. c. 39, s. 4; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 110, s. 2.

Fild-ale, or Filk-ale [fr. fillen, Sax., to fill, and ale], an ale feast. A term applied to an extortionate practice of officers of the forest, and of bailiffs of hundreds, of compelling persons to contribute to the supplying them with drink, &c. Prohibited by the Carta de Foresta. 4 Inst. 307.

File [fr. filacium, Lat.], a thread, string, or wire, upon which writs and other exhibits in courts and offices are fastened or filed, for the more safe keeping of, and ready reference to, the same.

Filiation [fr. filius, Lat.], the relation of a son to his father; correlative to paternity.

Filiatio non potest probari.—Co. Litt. 126.—(Filiation cannot be proved.) But see 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101.

Filicetum [fr. filix, Lat., fern brake], brackie land, land where ferns grow.—Co. Litt. 4.

Filiotus, a little son; a godson.

Filius in utero matris est pars viscerum matris. 7 Co. 8.—(A son in the mother's womb is part of the mother's vitals.)

Filius mulieratus, the eldest legitimate son of a woman who was illicitly connected with his father before marriage.

Filius populi, a son of the people, a natural child.

Filum aquæ, medium, the thread or middle of the stream where a river parts two lordships; also the middle of any river or stream which divides counties, townships, parishes, manors, liberties, &c.

Filum viæ, the thread or middle of a road.

Final decree, a conclusive decision of the court, as distinguished from interlocutory.

Final judgment. See JUDGMENT.

Final process, a writ of execution on a judgment or decree.

Finances, the revenue of a sovereign or state, or the money raised by loans, taxes, &c. for the public service.

Financier, a person employed in the economical management and application of public money.

Finder, a searcher employed to discover goods imported or exported, without paying custom.

Finder of goods acquires a special property in them, available against all the world, except the true owner; he is bound, however, before appropriating them to his own use, to take all the means in his power to discover the owner. If the property had not been designedly abandoned, and the finder knew who the owner was, or with due exertion could have discovered him, he is held guilty of larceny if he keep and appropriate the articles to his own use.—Merry v. Green, 7 M. & W. 623; Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Str. 505; and 1 Smith, L. C.

Fine, a sum of money, or mulct imposed upon an offender, also called a ransom; an income or a sum of money paid at the entrance of a tenant into his land; a sum paid for the renewal of a lease; and an assurance by matter of record, founded on a supposed previously existing right.

In every fine which was the compromise of a fictitious suit, and resembled the transactio of the Romans, there was a suit supposed, in which the person who was to recover the thing was called the plaintiff, conusee, or recognisee, and the person who parted with the thing the deforceant, conusor, or recognisor. It was termed a fine for its worthiness, and the peace and quiet it brought with it—finis fructus exitus et effectus legis.

There were five essential parts to the levying of a fine:—(1) The original writ of right, usually of covenant, issued out of the Common Pleas against the conusor, and the præcipe, which was a summary of the writ and upon which the fine was levied; (2) the royal license (licentia concordandi) for the levying of the fine, for which the Crown was paid a sum of money called king's silver, which was the post-fine, as distinguished from the præ-fine, which was due on the writ; (3) the conusance, or concord itself, which was the agreement expressing the terms of the assurance, and was indeed the conveyance; (4) the note of the fine, which was an abstract of the original contract or concord; (5) the foot of the fine, or the last part of it, which contained all the matter, the day, year, and place, and before what justices it had been levied. A fine was said to be engrossed when the chirographer made the indentures of the fine and delivered them to the party to whom the conusance was made. The chirograph or indentures were evidence of the fine..

A fine without proclamation was a fine at the Common Law, and a fine with proclamations (which was to be proclaimed openly in the Common Pleas once a term for four terms next after its engrossment) was a fine according to the statute 4 Hen. VII. c. 24, and of this sort were most fines. A fine was single when an estate was granted to the cognisee, and nothing rendered to the cognisor; or double, when there was a render back again either of the land itself or something out of it, for some new estate.

There were four sorts of fine:—(1) A fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, &c., which was the most common, and was an acknowledgment on record of a previous gift or feoffment.

(2) A fine sur done grant et render was obsolete. It consisted of two parts, a grant and a render, and operated like a feoffment and re-enfeoffment.

(3) A fine sur conuzance de droit tantum gave or transferred only the right or estate which was in the conusor. It was generally used to pass a reversionary interest or to surrender a life estate.

(4) A fine sur concessit, which might have been either for years, for life, in tail or in fee. It conveyed the estates of wives, and created terms, which were binding, by estoppel, on contingent or executory interests. See 1 Touch. c. ii., and 1 Pres. Conv. c. ii. Fines were abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74. See TAIL.

The chirograph of a fine is sufficient evidence of its acknowledgment. It will be proper to see that the fine agrees with the deed leading or declaring the uses; that the parcels are sufficient to comprise the property conveyed; that the proclamations are endorsed; and that the possession has gone according to the fine.

Fine adullando levato de tenemento quod fuit de antiquo dominico, an abolished writ for disannulling a fine levied of lands in ancient demesne to the prejudice of the lord.—Reg. Orig. 15.

Fine capiendo pro terris, &c. an obsolete writ which lay where a person, upon conviction of any offence by jury, had his lands and goods taken, and his body imprisoned, to be remitted his imprisonment, and have his lands and goods redelivered to him, on obtaining favor of a sum of money, &c.—Reg. Orig. 142.

Fine force, where a person is compelled to do that which he can in nowise help.—O. N. B. 63.

Fine non capiendo pro pulchre placitando, an obsolete writ to inhibit officers of courts to take fines for fair pleading.

Fine pro redisseisinâ capiendo, an old writ that lay for the release of one imprisoned for a redisseisin, on payment of a reasonable fine.—Reg. Orig. 222.

Fines for alienation, one of the oppressions of the feudal system, abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Fines in copyholds. A fine which is preserved by 12 Car. II. c. 24, s. 6, is a sum of money payable by custom to the lord. There are three classes of fines:—(1) Those due on the change of the lord; (2) Those on the change of the tenant; and (3) Those for a license to empower the tenant to do certain acts.

When the fine is due on the change of the lord, such change must be by the act of God, and not in consequence of any act of the party. It can therefore be only claimed on the death of the lord.

When the fine is due on the change of the tenant, it matters not whether that change is effected by the act of God or by the tenant's own act. Whenever the tenancy is changed, there a fine is payable. Should the tenant be compelled to pay a fine by reason of any act of the lord, he would be subject to much oppression; but where it is the consequence of his own act, he is left to his own discretion.

Those fines which are due on licenses by the lord, to empower the tenant to do certain acts, as to demise, &c. are rare. There must be a special custom to support such fine, for, by general custom, fines are due only on admissions.

Upon admittance, then, a fine becomes due to the lord, unless there is a special custom to the contrary. This fine, as well as the steward's fees, are payable by the purchaser; and even a covenant to surrender copyholds, at the costs of the vendor, is not broken by the non-payment of this fine, the title being perfected by admittance.—Graham v. Sime, 1 East. 634.

The admission fine is primâ facie uncertain and arbitrary, or rather arbitrable, unless a special custom fix it; it must, however, be reasonable, and not excessive, for excessus in re quâlibet, jure reprobatur communi, and two years' improved value of the land, deducting quit-rents, but not land-tax, is now the full extent which the courts will allow the lord to take in the exercise of this arbitrary power, except on voluntary grants, for then it is altogether in the lord's option. On the death of a surrenderee before admission, the lord must admit his heir on payment of a single fine only.—1 Scriv. Cop. 341. But if the heir of a copyholder die before admission, his heir or devisee could not compel admission, except on payment of a double fine. Without a special custom for it, the remainder-man is not liable on the death of the tenant for life, to pay a fine; for the admittance of the life-tenant is an admittance of those in remainder or reversion, and although there is an alteration of the tenant yet there is not any of the estate; but the heir or surrenderee of a reversioner or remainder-man, as well as the surrenderee of a particular tenant, must be admitted and pay a fine.

If a copyholder intend that the estate shall be sold at his death, he may save a double fine by giving a power of sale to his executors, for the donee of a power is not admitted, but the appointee only, upon whose admittance a fine is due; if, however, he devise the copyhold to trustees, upon trust to sell, then the trustees must themselves be admitted; a trustee, and not the cestui que trust, is the person to be admitted the lord's tenant.

If the fine be certain, the tenant should come prepared to pay it, but the lord cannot refuse admittance because the fine is not tendered to him. When the fine is uncertain, the practice is to fix a reasonable day and place of payment.

Upon payment of the fine, the steward delivers a copy of the court-roll, which is the tenant's muniment of his title.

Fines for endowment, anciently paid to the lord when a married woman was endowed: they were grounded on the feudal exactions.

Fines for offences, amends, pecuniary punishment, or recompense for offences committed against the sovereign and the laws, or the lord of a manor, &c.—4 Bl. Com. 378.

Fines mandatorum domini regis per rescripta sua [scil. brevia] diligenter sunt observandi.—5 Co. 87.—(The limits of the king's mandates in his rescripts [i. e. writs] are to be diligently observed.)

Finire, to fine, or pay a fine upon composition and making satisfaction.—Old Records.

Finis rei attendendus est.—3 Inst. 51.—(The end of a thing is to be attended to.)

Finis finem litibus imponit.—3 Co. 78.—(A fine puts an end to litigations.)

Finis unius diei est principium alterius.—2 Buls. 305.—(The end of one day is the beginning of another.)

Finis. Talis concordia finalis dicitur, eo quod finem imponit negotio, adeò quod neutra pars litigantium ab eo de cætero potest recedere.—Co. Litt. 121.—(A fine. Such a concord is called final because it puts an end to the business, so that neither of the litigants can recede from it thenceforth.)

Finitio, death.

Firderinga, a preparation to go into the army.

Firdfare, and Firdwite. See FERDWIT.

Fire-arms, under this designation is comprised all sorts of guns, fowling-pieces, blunderbusses, pistols, &c. The manufacture of these weapons is of considerable importance; employing at all times, but especially during war, a large number of persons.

In consequence of the frequent occurrence of accidents from the bursting of insufficient barrels, the legislature has most properly interfered, not to regulate their manufacture, but to prevent all persons from using or selling barrels that have not regularly been proved in a public proof-house. The first act for this purpose was passed in 1813, but it was soon after superseded by a fuller and more complete one: the 55 Geo. III. c. 59. This statute imposes a fine of 20*l.* on any person using, in any of the progressive stages of its manufacture, any barrel not duly proved; on any person delivering the same except through a proof-house; and on any person receiving for the purpose of making guns, &c. any barrels which have not passed through a proof-house. This penalty may be levied on conviction before two justices; and like penalties are imposed on persons counterfeiting the proof marks.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Firebare, a beacon or high tower by the seaside, wherein are continual lights, either to direct sailors in the night, or to give warning of the approach of an enemy.

Firebote, fuel for necessary use, allowed to tenants out of the lands granted to them.

Fire-ordeal, the trial by red-hot iron, used upon accusations without manifest proof (though not without suspicion that the accused might be guilty). The person accused if he denied was adjudged to take red-hot iron, and to hold it in his bare hand, which, after many prayers and invocations that the truth might be manifested, he must adventure to do, or yield himself guilty, and so receive the punishment that the law, according to the offence committed, awarded.

Some were adjudged to go blindfolded, with their bare feet over certain plough-shares, which were made red-hot and laid a little distance one before another. If the person undergoing the ordeal either in passing through them did chance not to tread upon them, or treading upon them received no harm, then by the judge he was declared innocent. This kind of trial was practised in England upon Emma the mother of King Edward the Confessor, who was accused of dishonesty of her body with Alwyne, Bishop of Winchester; and being led blindfolded unto the place where the glowing hot irons were laid, went forward with her bare feet, and so passed over them, and being gone past them all, and not knowing whether she were past them or not, said, 'O! good Lord! when shall I come to the place of my purgation?' And having her eyes uncovered, and seeing herself to have passed them, she kneeled down and gave thanks to God, for manifesting her innocence by her preservation from being hurt. A trial like this is recorded of Kunigund, wife unto the Emperor Henry the Second, who being falsely accused of adultery, to show her innocence, did, in a great and honorable assembly, take seven glowing irons one after another in her bare hands, and had thereby no harm.—Verstegan's Rest. Dec. Intel. 65.

Fire policy, a contract in writing effected at an insurance office, whereby, in consideration of a single or periodical payment of premium, the company engages to pay an assured person such loss as may occur by fire to his property described in the policy, within the period therein specified, to an amount not exceeding a particular sum fixed for that purpose by such policy.—2 Step. Com. 134. As to duties on fire-insurances, wheresoever made, see 19 Vict. c. 22, and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 7.

Fire and Sword, Letters of, anciently issued from the privy council of Scotland, addressed to the sheriff of the county, authorising him to call for the assistance of the county to dispossess a tenant retaining possession, contrary to the order of a judge or the sentence of a court.

Fireworks discharging, a common nuisance. See 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 54; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 25; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 139.

Firkin, a measure of capacity, containing nine gallons.

Firm, the name or names under which any house of trade is established.

Firma, the fee or acknowledgment which a tenant pays to his lord in Scotland; also a tribute anciently paid towards the entertainment of the King of England for one night; also victuals, provisions, or rent.

Firma Alba. See Alba Firma.

Firman, a passport or permit granted by the Great Mogul to foreign vessels to trade within the territories of his jurisdiction.

Firmarius, a fructuary.—1 Reeves, 324.

Firmary, the right of a tenant to his lands and tenements.

Firmatio, the doe season; a supplying with food.—Leg. Inæ. c. 34.

Firmaun, or Phirmaund, an order, mandate, an imperial decree, royal grant or charter.—Indian.

Firme, a farm.—Old Records.

Firmior et potentior est operatio legis quàm dispositio hominis.—Co. Litt. 102.—(The operation of the law is firmer and more powerful than the disposition of man.)

Firmura, liberty to scour and repair a milldam, and carry away the soil, &c.—Blount.

First fruits, an incident to the old feudal tenures, being one year's profits of the land, after the death of a tenant, which belonged to the king. Hence arose the claim of the head of the church to the first year's profits of every clergyman's benefit; otherwise called annates or primitiæ. By 2 & 3 Anne, c. 8, the first fruits of all benefices, except those under the value of 50*l.* per annum, which are exempted from the payment of first fruits, were vested in trustees to form a perpetual fund, called Queen Anne's Bounty, for the augmentation of poor livings.—2 Step. Com. 553.

Fisc, or Fiscus [fr. fiscus, Lat., a great basket], the treasury of a prince or state.

The word fiscus signified a wicker basket or pannier, in which the Romans were accustomed to keep and carry about large sums of money (Cic. 1 Verr. c. viii.; Phaedr. Fab. ii. 7), and hence fiscus came to signify any person's treasure or money chest.

The importance of the imperial fiscus soon led to the practice of appropriating the name to that property which the Cæsar claimed as Cæsar, and the word fiscus, without any adjunct, was used in this sense (Juv. Sat. iv. 54). Ultimately the word came to signify, generally, the property of the state, the Cæsar having concentrated in himself all the sovereign power, and thus the word fiscus finally had the same signification as ærarium, in the republican period. It does not appear at what time the ærarium was merged in the fiscus, though the distinction of name and of thing continued at least to the time of Adrian. In the latter periods the words ærarium and fiscus were often used indiscriminately, but only in the sense of the imperial chest, for there was then no other public chest.—Smith's Dict. Antiq.

Fiscal, belonging to the exchequer; revenue.

Fishery, the right to take fish. Fisheries are either free, common, or several. A free fishery is the exclusive right of fishing in a public river, and is a royal franchise. Common of fishery, or common of piscary, is the right of fishing in another man's water. A several fishery is the exclusive right of fishing, and he that has it, according to Blackstone, 'must also be (or at least derive his right from) the owner of the soil.'—2 Bl. Com. 40. This position of Blackstone has been questioned. See Harg. Co. Litt. 122 a, n. (7); Holford v. Bailey, 8 Q. B. 1000; 13 Q. B. 427; and Marshall v. The Ulleswater Steam Navigation Company, 32 L. J. (Q. B.), 139. See also 2 Selw. N. P.

The term fisheries is also applied to fishing-grounds, or parts of the sea where at certain seasons great numbers of fish are taken. The right of frequenting these has frequently been the subject of dispute between nations, and sometimes of treaties.

For an enumeration of the statutes relating to fisheries, see 3 Step. Com. 276, 277. As to salmon fisheries, see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 97; 26 & 27 Vict. cc. 50 & 114. As to exportation of salmon at certain times, see 26 & 27 Vict. c. 10.

As to cutting through or destroying the dam, floodgate, or sluice of, or putting lime or noxious materials in, a fishpond or water which is private property, or in which there is a private right of fishery, with intent to take or destroy fish, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 32. As to the unlawful taking or destroying of fish, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 24 & 25.

Fisk, the right of the Crown to the moveable estate of a person pronounced rebel.—Scotch Law.

Fitung, strife.

Fitz [Nor. fr. fils, Fr.], a son. It is used in law and genealogy; as Fitzherbert, the son of Herbert; Fitzjames, the son of James; Fitzroy, the son of the king. It was originally applied to illegitimate children.

Fitzherbert. The most distinguished writer upon law in the reign of Henry VIII. He was first a serjeant, and some years after a judge of the Common Pleas. The first book published by this learned author was his Grand Abridgment, printed in 1514 by Richard Pynson. So useful a work soon required another supply. In 1516 a second edition was printed by Wynkyn de Wordo, or perhaps this is one of the books printed for him abroad, where the Law-French was better understood, and where, for that reason, many of our law books used to be printed. In 1534 he published his new Natura Brevium, which was reprinted in 1537. Several books were printed in this reign on the office and duty of a justice of the peace. The first was in 1515, in which year we find two works printed by different printers under the title of The Boke of Justices of Peas. In 1534 there appeared another work, entitled, The Boke for a Justyce of Peace never so well and diligently set forth. All these were without any name. Afterwards, in 1541, we find The New Booke of Justyces of Peace made by Anthony Fitzherbert, Judge, lately translated out of Frenche into Englishe. These are all the writings that are known to belong to Fitzherbert upon the law of England: several anonymous tracts have been attributed to him, though upon no sufficient authority.

The Abridgment is a work of singular learning and utility. If the date of Statham's publication could be ascertained to be antecedent to this, many reflections might be founded on the comparative excellence of the present work; it might then be said to be formed on that of Statham; that Statham's was the commonplace book of that time, and as such furnished a basis on which the superstructure of Fitzherbert's more enlarged and improved work was raised; that the experience of a few years pointed out the defects of the former, and enabled Fitzherbert to make the necessary corrections. The foundation for these observations being very uncertain, we can only remark that the latter work is five times the size of the former; that it contains the cases as low down as the time of its publication; that these are abstracted more fully, and convey the sense of the book more satisfactorily; otherwise, the order of Statham's work, in the titles, seems to be followed, and the cases seem to be arranged with the same disregard to method and connection. This abridgment was a valuable acquisition to the lawyers of this period, but was superseded by the abridgment of Sir Robert Brooke in after-times; the latter abridger had the advantage of his predecessor in possessing many year-books which he had never seen. The original cases, on the other hand, of the reigns of Richard II., Edward II., Edward I., and Henry III., which are to be found only in Fitzherbert, preserve to this work a reputation entirely its own. Several in other reigns, and particularly about his own time, are not taken from any book we have, so that Fitzherbert's, though in general an abridgment, is also in many parts an original work.

Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium, like his other performance, is an improvement of a more ancient work of the same nature and title. It is remarkable that this treatise on the nature and effect of the principal writs in the Register was published at a time when those writs were, many of them, going into disuse, and soon afterwards became obsolete, so that hardly nine parts in ten of this work make a portion of our present law.

Five-mile Act. 35 Eliz. c. 2. See 5 Reeves, 114.

Five-minute-clause, a provision which is sometimes inserted in a separation deed, stipulating, that if the husband and wife should be at any time together for five minutes, after either of them had requested the other to retire, the deed should instantly become void.

Fixtures, things of an accessory character, annexed to houses or lands, which become, immediately on annexation, part of the realty itself, i. e. governed by the same law which applies to the land, in conformity with the maxim quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit.—1 C. L. Rep. 280 (1854).

The application of this legal principle, however, is not uniform, as may be thus shown:—

(1) Between landlord and tenant. If the chattels be not let into the soil, they are not fixtures at all, and may be removed at will, like any other species of personal property. When the chattel is perfectly connected with the freehold, either by being let into the earth itself, or by being cemented, or otherwise united to some erection previously attached to the ground, the question then arises—when may the tenant remove such fixtures, and when not?

The general rule as to annexations made by a tenant during the continuance of his term is the following:—Whenever he has affixed anything to the demised premises during the term, he can never again sever it without his landlord's consent; the property by being annexed to the land immediately belongs to the freeholder; and a tenant by making it a part of the freehold is considered to have abandoned all future right to it, so that it would be waste in him to remove it afterwards: it therefore falls in with his term, and comes to the reversioner as part of the land. But a tenant may so construct the erections, that they shall not be deemed fixtures; thus if he erect even buildings—as barns, granaries, sheds, and mills—upon blocks, rollers, pattens, pillars, or plates, resting on brickwork, they may be removed; for unless they be affixed to the freehold, by being let into it, or are, by means of rails, mortar, or the like, united to it, they remain merely moveable chattels.

The exceptions to the above rule are three: (a) In favor of trade. A tenant may safely remove such things which he has fixed to the freehold for purposes of trade or manufacture, provided the removal cause no material injury to the estate. This exception has been expressly decided to extend to furnaces, coppers, brewing-vessels, fixed vats, salt pans, and the like; to machinery in breweries, collieries, and mills, such as steam-engines, cider-mills, and the like; to buildings for trade, as a varnish-house, built on plates laid on brickwork, and a shed called a Dutch barn, formed of uprights rising from a foundation of brick. (β) For agricultural purposes. By 14 & 15 Vict. c. 25, s. 3, if any tenant of a farm or land shall, after the passing of the Act [24th of July 1851], with the consent in writing of the landlord for the time being, at his own cost and expense, erect any farm-building either detached or otherwise, or put up any other building, engine, or machinery, either for agricultural purposes, or for the purposes of trade and agriculture (which shall not have been erected or put up in pursuance of some obligation in that behalf), then all such buildings, engines, and machinery, shall be the property of the tenant, and shall be removable by him notwithstanding the same may consist of separate buildings, or that the same, or any part thereof, may be built in or permanently fixed to the soil, so that the tenant making any such removal do not in anywise injure the land or buildings belonging to the landlord, or otherwise do put the same in like plight and condition, or as good plight and condition, as the same were in before the erection of anything so removed: Provided nevertheless, that no tenant shall, under the provision last aforesaid, be entitled to remove any such matter or thing as aforesaid, without first giving to the landlord or his agent one month's previous notice in writing of his intention so to do; and thereupon it shall be lawful for the landlord, or his agent on his authority, to elect to purchase the matters and things so proposed to be removed, or any of them, and the right to remove the same shall thereby cease, and the same shall belong to the landlord; and the value thereof shall be ascertained and determined by two referees, one to be chosen by each party, or by an umpire to be named by such referees, and shall be paid or allowed in account by the landlord, who shall have so elected to purchase the same. (γ) For ornament and convenience. The following have been held removable:—Hangings, tapestry, and pier-glasses, whether nailed to the walls or panels, or put up in lieu of panels; marble, or other ornamental chimney-pieces; marble slabs, window blinds; wainscot fixed to the walls by screws; grates, ranges, and stoves, although fixed in brickwork; iron backs to chimneys; beds fastened to the walls or ceiling; fixed tables, furnaces, and coppers, mash-tubs, and fixed water-tubs; coffee and malt-mills; cupboards fixed with holdfasts; clock-cases, iron ovens, and the like; provided the separation occasion but little or no damage. The fixtures must be moved before the tenant's term or interest expires, unless perhaps in the case of a strict tenancy at will, when the tenant may be allowed a reasonable time after the determination of his tenancy, if his interest were not terminated by his own act.—Woodf. Land. and Ten. 493, et seq.

(2) Between the heir and the personal representative of the terre-tenant. Though the fixtures will generally pass with the freehold to the heir, yet such of them as are put up for ornament, domestic use, or trade, devolve to the personal representative, provided they can be easily removed, and not essential to the enjoyment of the inheritance.

(3) Between the tenant of a particular estate and the remainder-man or reversioner, a similar rule applies as in the last case, though the right is more favorably construed.—Amos and Ferard on 'Fixtures.'

Flaco, a place covered with standing water.

Flagrante delicto (in the very act of committing the crime).

Flecta, a feathered or fleet arrow.

Fledwite, or Flightwite [fr. flyth, Sax., flight, and wite, punishment], a discharge from amerciaments, where a person having been a fugitive came to the peace of our lord the king, of his own accord, or with license.
